63. In the case of trades not well organised agreements such as those above referred to would not be possible. Nor could they reasonably be enforced in the case of trades which were to a great extent localised. For instance, in the case of a trade confined to Sheffield, it does not seem reasonable that the organised employers and workpeople in that city should be allowed to fix the wages that should be paid in a factory to be established in Scotland or Wales.

64. Some cases of difficulty of this kind have been brought to our notice. Thus, the anvil trade is practically confined to Staffordshire, and there is an agreed price list for the work. It was claimed by the Trade Union that this list should be adhered to in certain works in Sheffield, and that the same rates of wages should be paid in whatever part of the country works might be established (Q. 1487-98).

Again, the London Master Builders' Association have agreements with the various Trade Unions providing for certain rates of wages to be paid throughout the area within twelve miles of Charing Cross, and members of a Trade Union at, say, Kingston and Croydon cannot accept work at lower rates than those agreed upon. There are, however, builders at Kingston and Croydon who do not pay the London rates of wages, but somewhat lower rates, employing non-union men. The Trade Union rate at Kingston and Croydon is, of course, the London rate, but it is easily seen that the rate obtained by the majority of workpeople in these districts may be something less. The question then arises whether the current rate of the district in the case of Kingston and Croydon is the London rate or the lower rate prevailing in those places (Q. 2312-20, 2340-4, 5661-70).

65. A few of the Trade Union witnesses expressed themselves in favour of a uniform rate of wages throughout their trade, and several showed some reluctance in admitting that wages were influenced by the cost of living or that the cost of living showed much variation in different localities, but most agreed that wages tended to be lower in the rural districts and small towns. Mr. Dew, of the Amalgamated Carpenters and Joiners, however, considered that there should be more uniformity than there is, and that difference in cost of living did not justify the wide range in the rates agreed to by his Society, varying from 10½d. per hour in London to such figures as 4⅞d. at Falmouth, 5½d. at Cirencester, 5¾d. at Milford Haven, etc. (Q. 2245-54). Differences of this kind he thought were mainly due to the weakness of the Unions in the smaller provincial towns.

66. A solution of the difficulty which arises in connexion with the Fair Wages Clause when the factory is an isolated one might perhaps be found in comparing the wages paid with those paid in other trades in the same district, or with those paid in the same trade in other districts, taking into account the cost of living. A brush manufacturer informed us that he would be obliged to pay about the same rates as were paid by a neighbouring paper manufacturer, as otherwise his workpeople would leave him (Q. 5080-3), and he suggested that the case of the isolated factory might be dealt with by analogy with other trades in the district. A direct comparison of this kind would, however, be only possible as regards day-work, and perhaps only in respect to unskilled labour of a kind that could migrate freely from one trade to another.

67. The investigations of the Board of Trade with regard to rents, prices, wages, and the cost of living might, we think, afford material for arriving at fairly safe conclusions on these points. But, although the case of the isolated factory may theoretically present some difficulty, we do not find that it is at all of frequent occurrence in practice.

"SECTIONISING."

68. A further difficulty in the enforcement of the "current rate" arises from the increasing tendency to "sectionise" or subdivide work according to the various degrees of skill required for the performance of each operation, the less skilled portions being paid for at lower rates than the others. A Trade Union rate fixed on the assumption that all the operations are carried through by one individual consequently tends to become broken up, or to apply only to those operations which require the highest skill.

69. For example, in the tinplate and sheet-metal working trades the Union claimed that it was the custom of the trade in making up any article that the workman should complete it throughout (save where machinery was utilised, for which an allowance would be made in the price), and they objected to one man making the parts and another soldering them together (Q. 404-8).

Representatives of the London Clothiers Cutters' Trade Union objected to the practice followed in some workshops of employing women or young people in subsidiary operations connected with the cutting out of garments, such as taking the various portions from the knife cutter, putting in the trimmings, placing on the tickets and tying the whole with string, it being claimed that the skilled man who chalked the pattern and prepared the layers of cloth for the knife should also perform the operations referred to after the cloth left the knife cutter. One witness stated that he had worked in a shop where three cutters were employed to do the marking-in —the critical part of the work—while eight or nine lads whose wages did not exceed 16s. a week were engaged to lay up and pile the pieces of cloth one on top of another to be put under the machine, the general practice in shops recognised as "fair" by the Union being for the man who does the marking-in to pile up the cloth ready for the knife. It may be mentioned that cutters are paid by time and the objection to the practices complained of arises in this case out of the alleged displacement of skilled labour (Q. 993-1003; 971; 957-963).

Representatives of the Vellum (Account Book) Binders' Union stated that they had no objection to the subdivision of work provided their minimum rate of wages was paid (Q. 1048). They objected to the employment of women at lower rates than those paid to men and only recognised the employment of boys to the extent of one apprentice to three journeymen, contending that boys should be engaged only for the purpose of being educated to become competent binders (Q. 1060-66). They objected, for example, to work such as "flush binding" being done by cheap labour, contending that this, although a lower class of work done by apprentices in their first or second year in most "fair" houses, was still a portion of their trade and should be done by their men. They did not recognise anything in their trade as unskilled or less skilled (Q. 1048-52).

70. The principal objections that have been raised to the system of "sectionising" work, of which instances have been mentioned above, are that skilled men are displaced (Q. 1003); that the system tends to depress the rate of wages of the skilled workman (Q. 569); that when a portion of the work is given to an unskilled man too great a deduction is made from the skilled man's wages for the assistance received, and that the unskilled man does not get the benefit of the whole of the deduction, but receives only part, part going to the employer (Q. 2678-90); that it does not produce a supply of competent workers and is not an adequate substitute for apprenticeship (Q. 3239); that it causes men to lose their skill in the trade (Q. 570); that young persons taught one section of the trade are subsequently displaced by other young people, the rate of wages paid being insufficient for adults, that these persons are thus on arriving at manhood or womanhood without proper means of livelihood, that the insufficiently trained workpeople produced by the system, if they remain in the trade, have difficulty in finding situations, and if they join the Trade Union draw a disproportionate amount of unemployed pay (Q. 3238-40; 562); and that when the lighter portions of the work are given to less skilled workpeople the skilled workman is left with an undue proportion of the more difficult work (Q. 2641).

71. The above points are mentioned to show the grounds on which the Trade Union witnesses base their objection to the system of "sectionising" work; but so far as the matter affects the present Fair Wages Clause the only question that arises is whether the persons employed on a section of work are receiving the current rate of wages for persons competent to perform that work.

72. The whole tendency of modern industry is towards specialisation of this kind; and there appears to be no good reason for restricting Government contractors in particular in this respect by obliging them to stereotype existing methods of production when Government work is in question, instead of allowing them to exercise their ingenuity in devising what they consider to be improved methods of manufacture.

73. Where a similar method of subdivision of labour exists in a number of establishments there is a possibility of a recognised rate of payment being established for each of the various sections of the work, and in that case no difficulty arises in ascertaining the current rate of wages. Where, however, the methods of subdividing the work vary considerably in the different shops (as would appear to be the case in the clothing trades), or where "sectionising" has been introduced in one shop but is not usual elsewhere, no standard rate of payment for the various sections of work can be said to exist. In such cases the term "current rate of wages" is not applicable and the present Fair Wages Clause would not appear to give the worker any protection. Each case must be treated on its merits, as in any other instance where no current rate can be found.

74. But, subject to this qualification, we cannot recommend that a Government contract should be used as a means of interfering with a natural and legitimate tendency in the development of economic production.

EMPLOYMENT OF WOMEN.

75. Another phase of the same tendency is shown in the employment of women and young persons on work formerly done by men, or still done by men in some establishments.

Some of the Trade Union witnesses objected to the employment of women at all in their trades, and most agreed in asking that when women are employed they should be paid the same rates of wages as men.

Thus the representative of the London Society of Compositors said that the work of a compositor was work to be done by a man and not by a woman, on the ground that it had always been regarded as men's work, and a large number of men had consequently been trained to do that work. He did not suggest that there was anything unsuitable for women in the work, but objected to their employment on the ground that cheap female labour disorganised the employment of men. He would have no objection if they were paid the same rates of wages as men. The women are employed mainly on plain composition, they do not learn the whole art of composing, but are limited to certain preliminary portions of the work, and further they are unable to do the heavy work of locking up and lifting the formes (Q. 191-7; 247-9).

Representatives of the Scottish Typographical Association who dealt with the conditions in Edinburgh, where a large number of girls are employed in type-setting, contended that such girls should receive the same rates of wages as men compositors (Q. 2949). They considered that the employment of women and girls at lower rates than those current for men was an infraction of the Fair Wages Clause (Q. 2932). The girls, however, do not get an all-round knowledge of the trade, and they are mainly employed on easier work (Q. 2948).

Witnesses on behalf of the Vellum (Account Book) Binders contended that when the book left the sewer every portion of the work should be done by men (Q. 1058-9), or, at any rate, that the persons employed, men, women, or boys, should receive the men's standard rate of wages (Q. 1045). As regards the ground of their objection to the employment of women, they said: "If we are going to allow employers to "introduce women on our work at less rates than we get, the time will come when "we shall be required no longer" (Q. 1061).

Again, the Secretary of the London Bookbinders said: "from the time the book comes down from the women sewn the various operations are claimed by us" (Q. 3269). "The binding of the book after it leaves the sewer we claim as a whole. "It is admitted on all hands that the women could not do the work right out; there "are some parts of the work too heavy, and so on. Because certain parts of the work "are light and capable of being done either by a woman or a boy we do not agree that "they should be allowed to do them, or that the employer should have the right to pick "and choose, and say: 'Well, you can do this little portion, while the men can do the "'heavier and more difficult part.' We say that the work as a whole should be man's "work. We can pick work out like that in almost any trade" (Q. 3298). Provided that the same rates of wages were paid, however, they would not object to the women, but the witness admitted that if such a rule of equal payment were enforced the women would cease to be employed (Q. 3295).

In the brush trade there are classes of work now done by women which men used to do years ago and to which the men have not of late years raised any objection, such as the drawing of bristles (Q. 5142; 5150; 5275). Wire drawing and polishing are now almost entirely done by women (Q. 3706). In recent years, however, women have been introduced in "pan work"; that is, setting the knots with pitch. Where they are employed on this work a man is engaged to bore the holes in the blocks in which the knots have to be set. The women then do the pitching and put the knots in the holes, receiving, according to the statement of the Secretary of the Amalgamated Brushmakers' Society, 50 per cent. less wages than would be paid to a man. The witness stated that the woman's portion involved less skill than doing the work throughout; but he considered that too great a deduction was made from the price on account of the boring being done by other workpeople, and he contended that the women "ought to be paid exactly what a man would be paid and what men are paid in "other works" (Q. 3709). The Secretary of the United Brushmakers' Society also stated that there had been a very considerable increase of women workers to the prejudice of men. His Union did not object to the employment of women but asked that they should not be paid lower rates than men; he agreed that the probable result of such a rule would be that women would not be employed. He thought the enforcement of the payment of the Trade Union rate of wages by the contractor would assist in preventing the employment of women at lower rates than men. He stated that the making of hair brushes and tooth brushes was now women's work absolutely, and his Union raised no question in respect of that. The complaint in regard to the employment of women had reference mainly to the making of bass brooms, which they looked upon as the heaviest part of the trade (Q. 1977-84; 2041-5).

As regards the leather trades, evidence was given to the effect that the employment of women had increased considerably in recent years (Q. 3515; 3894; 4002). They are employed on stitching (Q. 3437). The representative of the Midland Leather Trades Federation had no objection to the employment of women, except that their cheaper labour displaced men. The women are unorganised and are paid at piece rates which he calculated were in some instances 35 per cent. below those fixed by his Union in a price list which the employers had rejected. He thought the women were quicker on the light work than men, but that, taking heavy and light work together, their work was on the whole not as durable. He had no objection to women being employed if they were paid the same piece rates of wages as men (Q. 3433-45; 3517).

The representative of the London Saddle and Harness Makers and of the Military Harness and Accoutrement Makers' Unions thought that women should be paid for the limited part of the work which they could do at the same rates as men who could do the whole. He considered that the greater part of the work could not be done efficiently by women (Q. 4007-11)

In the tinplate working trade a Trade Union representative complained of the employment of women in soldering and stated that his Union had a rule prohibiting their members from working with women (Q. 550).

76. As regards the evidence on behalf of employers, this was adverse to the payment to women of the same rate of wages as to men and it was pointed out that were such a rule enforced women would not be employed. Thus Mr. Straker, the representative of the Master Printers' Federation, stated that at the same rate of wages women were not as cheap as men (Q. 4483), whilst Mr. Unwin, representing the same body, stated that he had no objection to pay a woman for the work she does at the same rate as he paid a man for it, but that the point was that the woman had to be helped. The woman compositor as a type setter "is cleaner and better than a man; but she is only to be paid a portion of a man's wages because there must be a man to take her type from her and finish it up." Women work monotype and linotype machines and Mr. Straker considered them better as monotype operators than men. In London the agreement between the employers and the Compositors' Society prohibits women working linotype machines (Q. 4488-4500).

A Managing Director of an Edinburgh firm of printers who have no type-setting or type-casting machines stated that the larger proportion of his compositors were females and that men were kept to do advertisements, look after the girls, and do difficult work occasionally. Some of the girls could set up Greek, Hebrew, Algebra, &c. The girls' wages were rather more than half the men's. Their rate per line was not the same; the girls' corrections were heavier; they were more economical than men but "not so satisfactory, because they are always going off for sickness of some kind" (Q. 4582; 4586; 4590; 4675).

A witness representing the Master Saddlers' Federation gave evidence to the effect that certain stitching in a riding saddle for which the Trade Union price was 9s. 6d. occupied a man twelve hours. In shops where this work is done by women the time would be ten hours, but the women would receive only 4s. 6d. on the average, the hourly rate thus being 9½d. in the case of the men and 5½d. in the case of the women. The women's work is equally well done. The witness stated that the man is slower than the woman at this needlework, and that when the work is done it is impossible to tell whether it has been done by man or woman (Q. 5789; 5873-82).

77. There would seem little doubt that the effect of any regulation providing that women employed on Government work, in which they enter more or less into competition with men, should be paid the same rates of wages as men, would tend to deprive the women of employment. In most cases they are employed because they are cheaper, and the lower rate of wages is alleged to be justified by various reasons, such as (1) the greater proportion of time spent in learning the work in the case of women. After the girl has been taught there is the possibility of very shortly losing her. Fresh hands are constantly wanted among the women, whereas the men may stay for years; (2) the majority of the women do not expect to stay at the work for life, but to get married. Consequently they do not serve a long apprenticeship, and however expert at one section of work generally fail to become as good all round workers as men; (3) for physical reasons they are unfitted for certain portions of work, and consequently require help occasionally; (4) there is less continuity in their work owing to more frequent illness and domestic claims on their time; (5) there are restrictions on the employment of women under the Factory Acts which do not apply to men.

78. But when allowance has been made for these and other considerations, it may be doubted whether women's wages fall below men's only by an amount which would be justified on the ground of the increased expense which is incurred in certain directions by their employment; and the really important factors would appear, generally speaking, to be the unorganised condition of women's labour and the fact that in many cases the woman is quite willing to accept a lower rate of wages than a man, owing to the smaller claims upon her and the support she may receive from her relatives.

79. The competition of female labour is viewed with considerable alarm in certain trades by the representatives of the men, but we do not see any ground on which the Government can on general principles restrict the employment of women on work which they can do efficiently, and no such intention is apparent in the Fair Wages Resolution.

80. The resolution enjoins the payment of the current rate of wages, but we do not think that it was the intention of the resolution to enforce the payment to women of the rate "current" for men employed on the same class of work. We are, however, conscious that the unorganised condition of women's labour does tend to depress their rate of wages, and renders it necessary for Government Departments to watch very carefully the trades in which women are engaged on contract work.

It may be hoped that in course of time improvement will be effected in this respect; but for reasons which have been indicated above, it is probable that in many employments female labour will always be found more economical than male labour. So long as the "current rate" for both kinds of labour is paid we do not think that the Government is called on to interfere.

PROPOSED RESTRICTION OF CONTRACTS TO "FAIR HOUSES."

81. Several of the Trade Union witnesses went further than suggesting the enforcement of Trade Union rates of wages and conditions on Government contract work, and proposed that only those firms recognised as "fair" should be invited to tender for Government work.

A firm appears to be regarded as "fair" by a particular Trade Union when it observes the Trade Union rates of wages and conditions of labour, and many Unions draw up a list of "fair firms" for the guidance of their members, the omission of a firm from the list implying that no member of the Union should work there.

82. The alleged grievance with which this proposal is intended to deal is the practice of certain firms to pay the current rate of wages to those of their workpeople who are employed on Government contract work, while those employed on other work are paid at lower rates of wages. When the Government work has ceased, the men who were employed on it may cease to receive the current rate. A somewhat similar complaint is made in regard to the building trade that the men employed on a building in course of erection may be paid the current rate of wages, while those doing preparatory work in the shops in another locality may be paid at less than the current rates of that locality. It is contended that the Government should not encourage firms which are paying less than the current rates of wages, and so tending to lower the rates of wages generally.

83. In some trades it is possibly true that there are a sufficient number of firms recognised as "fair" to obviate any necessity of the Government's inviting other firms to tender, and the restriction of the contracts to such "fair" firms might lead to a diminution in the complaints from the Unions in those trades of infringement of the Fair Wages Clause, but as a general policy this course of action would be attended with great difficulties.

84. It is doubtless true, as pointed out by Mr. Dew (Q. 2220), that if in an establishment where Government contract work is being carried out the men on private work are being paid less than the current rate of wages, it is very difficult to ensure that the men are receiving the current rate for the contract work, especially in cases in which a man may not be employed continuously on the latter, but may for part of his time be engaged on the private work.

85. But it would appear that still greater difficulties are involved in the proposed restriction to "fair houses." Even when a list of "fair" firms has been drawn up it has been prepared by only one side, and while it might be possible to accept a list agreed upon by both employers and men, it is clearly impossible for the Government to accept a list drawn up only by the Trade Union, and to debar all firms not mentioned in the list from competing for Government work. We are not aware of any case in which a list of "fair" houses has been drawn up by employers and workpeople in consultation, and the absence of such a list is no doubt partly due to the lack of agreement as to what constitutes a "fair" house.

86. Whether a list of "fair" houses existed or not, the Government would apparently, if the proposal in question were adopted, be under the obligation of seeing that fair wages were paid and the proper conditions observed not only on the Government work, but on all other work carried out by the firm, an obligation which might necessitate an enormous amount of inquiry to which the employers would decline to submit.

87. Again, it is to be noted that many contractors employ various classes of labour represented by different Trade Unions, and a contractor may be regarded by some of these Unions as "fair" for some classes of work and as "unfair" by others, so that the task of the Government in deciding whether the contractor in question is to be allowed to tender is no easy one. Although it was suggested to us that, in order to qualify for Government work, the contractor should be "fair" in all trades and not only in that affected by his contract, it is conceivable that the majority of the Unions concerned might not view with favour a decision to exclude from all Government work a firm which they regarded as "fair," but which happened to be regarded as unfair by a Union only a small number of whose members were employed, say, in work subsidiary to the main business of the firm.

88. Finally, all the difficulties which have already been dealt with under the heading of Trade Union Rates and Conditions and which need not be again described, also arise in connexion with the present proposal, since a "fair" house is understood to be one which observes not only Trade Union rates but also Trade Union conditions.

89. Accordingly we are unable to recommend the adoption of the proposal that Government contracts should be restricted to "fair houses." But we think that great care should continue to be taken in selecting firms to be placed on the list of contractors, so as to ensure that only good employers are admitted, and that consideration should be given by the Departments to any representations that may be made to them by Trade Unions with regard to lists of "fair houses."

POSTING OF RATES OF WAGES, ETC., AT WORKS.

90. Although in most cases there is no doubt that the workpeople know what are the current rates of wages in their district which the contractor is obliged by the Fair Wages Clause to pay on Government work, there may be instances where such is not the case. The representative of the Parliamentary Committee of the Trade Union Congress stated that his Committee attached considerable importance to the proposal that a schedule of the wages paid, both time and piece rates, should be posted in some conspicuous place at the works where a Government contract was being carried out, the Schedule to be amended when changes in the current rate took place (Q. 60-63; 174).

Such a course would perhaps assist in preventing evasion of the Fair Wages Clause by making it known to the workpeople employed that contract work was being done, and by making it clear what rates of wages the contractor was expected to pay.

91. The employers who gave evidence were not greatly opposed to the suggestion, although they thought it unnecessary. It was suggested that where, as in a large printing works, several classes of labour were employed the posting of the rates of wages might create jealousy among the various classes who were paid at different rates (Q. 4531-33).

One witness stated that he had had some trouble, when such a schedule of wages had been displayed at his works, in explaining to various classes of labourers that they were not engaged upon the work provided for in the schedule (Q. 4565).

It is also conceivable that the proposal might involve an undesirable exposure of the details of the business to persons other than employees who might chance to see the Schedules (Q. 4534).

92. Where, as appears to be sometimes the case, more especially with female labour, various rates of wages are being paid to persons whose occupations are not markedly different, if they differ at all, a schedule of the rates of wages actually being paid would be of no use in preventing evasion of the Fair Wages Clause, as it would set up no independent standard, and it would be very likely to create jealousy.

93. On the whole we are of opinion that it will be sufficient if the "Fair Wages Clauses" of the contract are posted in all works in which Government contracts are being executed, and if it is left to the workers to see that the employer carries out his obligations in this respect.

PUBLICATION OF NAMES OF CONTRACTORS.

94. Several of the Trade Union witnesses asked for facilities for ascertaining where Government contracts are placed. Under the present system, as already noted above (§ 11), the names of Stationery Office contractors are posted outside that Office, and some particulars of most contracts for building work are readily ascertainable from the trade papers, while in other cases the most that has been done has been to furnish copies of tender forms to certain persons representing the organised workpeople. In some trades, e.g., shipbuilding, there is no difficulty in ascertaining whether a contractor is doing Government work, but it is complained that in many instances owing to the difficulty of ascertaining whether particular work is or is not being done under a Government contract, cases of infringement of the Fair Wages Clause may pass unnoticed by the workpeople or the officials of the Trade Unions, or may only be discovered when the contract is nearly completed, and any action that can be taken is not likely to lead to useful result.

95. Although the arrangement made by the War Office, Admiralty and Post Office with the Trade Union Congress Parliamentary Committee, under which it is made known when tenders are about to be invited, appears to have been of considerable help to the Trade Unions in at any rate some trades, it is said to be quite insufficient in the smaller trades, where it still remains impossible to trace the contract. The Trade Unions therefore desire to have information as to the names and addresses of those Government contractors who are at any time carrying out contract work, and they suggest that the desired end might be obtained by the publication of the names and addresses of contractors, or by furnishing the Trade Union Congress Parliamentary Committee with the names for distribution to the Secretaries of the Unions affected.

96. The employers who gave evidence before us, although not in favour of the proposal, were not on the whole strongly opposed to it. Many local authorities publish the names of contractors, and in Canada the names of Government contractors, brief particulars of the nature of the work and amount of the tender, and schedules of the wages to be paid to the workpeople engaged are published in the Canadian Labour Gazette.

97. Some employers, however, thought that difficulties might arise in obtaining supplies of materials if the names of contractors were published. It having become known that a manufacturer had engaged to supply a number of articles for which he required to purchase certain materials, the persons from whom he wished to purchase might put up the price against him (Q. 5589). Probably this is a kind of difficulty only likely to arise in a trade in which (as in the cutlery trade) large contracts are exceptional, or in the case where the market for the necessary materials is a narrow one. With a wide market it is unlikely that there will be sufficient combination to raise the price against a single contractor, and in trades in which large contracts are common, e.g., building, Government work does not stand on any different footing in this respect from other work in which the alleged difficulties do not appear to arise. Possibly a delay of two or three weeks between the allocation of the contract and the publication of the name of the contractor would in most cases suffice to enable him to make the necessary arrangements for the purchase of materials.

98. It appears to us unnecessary, if publication be decided upon, to make the names of successful tenderers known before the work commences, and accordingly we think that while, as a general rule, the names and addresses should be published within a few weeks, in exceptional cases publication might be delayed at the request of the contractor if good reason could be shown. We suggest that the names should be published in the Board of Trade Journal, or Board of Trade Labour Gazette, it being left to the discretion of the contracting Departments to omit from the list any contracts which it is deemed inexpedient to publish for reasons of public policy. We do not think it necessary that the small contracts, say under £500 in value, should be published.

99. An objection to the publication of the names of contractors which was brought to our notice by certain witnesses was that such publication might have a tendency to damage the contractor's business with his ordinary customers, in those trades in which it is not the usual practice for supplies to be obtained by direct contract with the manufacturer but through a middleman (Q. 4920-8). The difficulty does not appear, however, to apply to any great extent to Government contracts, and we do not think that it constitutes any valid argument against the suggested publication of names.

SUB-LETTING AND HOME WORK.

100. The question of sub-letting is dealt with at present in Government contracts by clauses which either forbid the transfer of any portion of the contract without the written consent of the Department or prohibit all sub-letting except such as is customary in the trade, while home work is prohibited in certain cases, e.g., in contracts for made-up clothing, caps, etc., by a clause obliging the contractor to execute the whole of the work at his own factory. Direct payment of wages to the worker and not through any foreman or other person supervising the work is also enforced in some contracts.

101. The objection to sub-letting is of course the resulting increase of difficulty in ascertaining whether in fact the work is being executed under the conditions laid down in the contract; but it is not possible to prohibit the practice altogether, as in some contracts it would be quite contrary to trade custom, and probably very inconvenient, for the contractor to attempt to carry through the whole of the work himself.

102. Thus, the Secretary of the Basket, Skip and Hamper Makers' Federation desired the abolition of sub-letting altogether in his own trade and objected, for instance, to an ammunition maker having the contract for the shell baskets as well as for the shells (Q. 2074-81), but he agreed that a basket maker must sub-let the making of the metal parts which are used in certain baskets (Q. 2136-9).

103. On the whole, however, in regard to actual sub-letting by one employer to another very little complaint has been made in the evidence given before us.

104. A practice to which more objection was taken is that generally known among the workpeople as "sub-contracting," in which work is given out, not to an independent employer, but to a person employed by the firm holding the contract, who, in turn, gives the work to persons working under him. This system presents considerable variety in matters of detail, and in some cases appears to be firmly established and to meet with no opposition, while in other cases it is not so prevalent and is opposed by some sections of the workpeople.

105. Where men work together in sets or groups it is customary in some trades for a piece-work price to be fixed covering the whole work of the set, and this price may be paid to the head man of the set, who divides it among the members of the gang in certain fixed proportions or as may be arranged, while in other cases the members of the gang may be paid direct through the firm's cashier. This system is common in many of the Sheffield and Birmingham trades. Thus, the head man of a set engaged in forging a steel shaft has three or four men under him whom he pays; in a file-cutting shop an overseer may pay ten or twenty men, all paid on a recognised scale; in forging table knives by hand the forger has his own striker and pays him, the forger's name alone appearing on the wages book. Where customs of this sort are well established, and provided that the payments are made to the subordinate workers on a recognised basis, little objection appears to be taken to the system.

106. It is when a special price is fixed between the employer and the sub-contractor and there is suspicion that the latter pays his subordinates according to no fixed rule, and is, in fact, making a profit out of their labour rather than merely earning wages by his own labour, that the system leads to complaint on the part of the workpeople. It is difficult to draw the line where the system becomes objectionable, but it is clear that, in effect, practices of this kind may pass by gradations into undoubted sweating of the kind met with in the tailoring trades.

107. Objections were raised by the Secretary of the Lock and Key Smiths' Trade Union to a system under which work is given out at a price to a few so-called foremen, who alone are responsible to the employer, and who engage and pay men working under them doing various sections of the work. The practice occurs more particularly in the making of small brass padlocks, this work lending itself to "Sectionising." The persons employed are not outworkers. No record of their wages appears in the firm's books, and it is alleged that they are paid at lower rates than prevail in those firms where such sub-contracting does not obtain, and where the wages are paid direct from the office (Q. 3546-55; 3588-90).

108. A similar "little master" system within the factory is to be found in the hollow-ware trade, more especially in the commoner class of work, but it is stated that on Government work it is not a practice that has existed to any large extent, and it is a custom objected to by the Ironplate Workers' Union (Q. 3037-45). In this case, therefore, a clause providing for direct payment by the contractor to the workpeople might perhaps be introduced into the contract without giving rise to difficulty.

109. An extension of the system just described arises in some cases by the work being done, not on the contractor's premises, but on those of the sub-contractor. Thus the cutting and drilling of keys is largely done in small shops by outworkers employing one or two men or youths, the firm supplying the necessary castings. The best firms, however, are said to do the cutting and drilling of keys on their own premises. In Admiralty contracts for locks, it has been provided since 1893 that all the work shall be done on the contractor's own premises, except the making of the keys and castings. The Trade Union Secretary suggested that the Factory clause should be extended to the cutting and drilling of the keys (Q. 3591; 3616; 3577-80).

110. As regards work actually carried on in the workpeople's homes, although some witnesses expressed their disapproval, it was generally admitted not to be feasible to prohibit home-work on all Government contracts. The Basket, Skip and Hamper Makers' Federation prohibit home-work, and they desire such prohibition to be enforced in all Government basket work (Q. 2149-51). On the other hand, the Secretary of the Amalgamated Society of Brush Makers, although opposed to home-work, agreed that all districts were not ripe for the enforcement in brush contracts of a clause obliging the contractor to carry out the work at his own factory. He stated that there was more home work on Government contracts for brushes than on private work, because the large quantities ordered of the same kind of brush facilitated out-work. Any prohibition of home-work would not affect the members of the Union or the majority of the trade, but would affect the majority of the workers in the South London district, where the practice is of old standing (Q. 3719-35). The greater part of the work of putting bristles into "drawn" brushes is and always has been done at home by women, who are paid direct by the firm (Q. 5085, 5967-74).

111. Miss Irwin stated that it had been urged upon her that in Government contracts the rates of wages were lowered by the competition of outworkers. Her Council did not recommend its abolition, but regulation by licensing, fixing a minimum wage, etc. (Q. 6179-80).

112. A prohibition of home-work would necessitate the provision of additional accommodation for the workers brought into the factory, and would doubtless involve considerable hardship to numbers of persons who, through infirmity or domestic claims on their time, are unable to attend at a factory, but who are able to do certain kinds of light work, such as tooth-brush "drawing" or embroidery, in their own homes. As, however, the general question of home-work has formed the subject of a special enquiry by a Committee of the House of Commons, the results of which have recently been published,* we think it unnecessary to deal specially with the case of home-work on Government contracts.

113. As regards sub-letting and the kind of sub-contracting dealt with above, it appears to be quite impracticable to prohibit them entirely on Government contracts, and cases of difficulty must be dealt with by careful consideration of the customs of the trade.

SOME MINOR POINTS OF DIFFICULTY.

114. In addition to the matters dealt with in previous sections of this Report mention may be made of certain minor points which occasionally give rise to difficulty in the administration of the Fair Wages Clause.

Definition of District.

115. The word district does not occur in the Fair Wages Resolution of the House of Commons, but in view of the fact that wages in the same trade generally vary in different parts of the country, the Resolution is interpreted by the Government Departments as obliging the contractor to pay the current rate of wages of the district in which the work is carried out, and on the whole little difficulty arises in practice in determining in what district the work is being done. Occasionally however, work is executed on the outskirts of a town or on the border line between two districts, and disputes arise between the workpeople and the employers as to which of two current rates shall be paid or as to whether the work is being executed in a district for which there is a current rate.

Thus, the current rates of wages in a certain trade are higher in Birmingham than in Dudley. A firm doing work at Oldbury claimed that the current rate in their case was the Dudley rate, while the workpeople claimed that the firm was within the Birmingham area for this purpose (Q. 44).

Reference has already been made to the case of places such as Sutton and Kingston where, although they come within the area for which there are rates of wages agreed upon between the London Master Builders' Association and the Trade Unions, the latter have difficulty in maintaining the agreed rate.

It is impossible to frame a definition of "district" which shall be of general application, and cases of this kind must be dealt with individually on their merits after inquiry into the circumstances.

Extension of Fair Wages principle to Materials used by Contractors.

116. The President of the Yorkshire Textile Workers' Union suggested that the principle of the Fair Wages Clause should apply to the manufacture of the material used by the contractor, so that, for example, an employer holding a contract to make cloth for the Government should be held responsible for the conditions under which the yarn he uses was made, safeguarding himself by a warranty from the spinner (Q. 1284).

It is obvious that it would be quite impracticable to enforce generally any rule of this character. Under such a provision a builder, for instance, would have to satisfy himself that the current rates of wages had been paid to the men engaged in quarrying the stone and slate, making the bricks, nails, locks, screws, glass, girders, paint, and numberless other things which were to be used in the execution of the contract. As the materials used by the contractor would generally be indistinguishable at the place of manufacture from those supplied for other purposes, any inquiry as to the conditions under which they were made could not be confined to those articles destined to be used in the contract work, and the ultimate result would be practically to make Government contractors responsible for the payment of current rates of wages on all work in every industry throughout the country.

* Report from the Select Committee on Home Work; PP. 246 of 1908.

Difference in Piece Prices as between Government and other work.

117. Some instances have been brought to our notice in which reasons are alleged for paying a piece rate of wages on Government contract work different from that paid for similar private work. These fall into two classes: (a) Cases in which a lower rate for making an article is alleged to be justified by the large number made, which facilitates the work, and (b) cases in which a higher piece rate is alleged to be necessary owing to the greater care required to meet the strict inspection to which the articles are subjected.

(a) In the cutlery trades employers contended in their evidence that the workmen were able to quote a special price for the large quantities made for Government Departments, the continuous work on the same pattern leading to greater dexterity in the work. Large contracts are quite exceptional in these trades and the standard price lists, it is contended, are meant to apply to small quantities. The standard lists are gradually being modified under new conditions and there is a practice of making special arrangements between employers and workmen for the execution of large Government orders at lower piece prices (Q. 5540-3; 5538; 5550). This procedure is obviously one which gives rise to some difficulty in considering the question whether the Fair Wages Clause is being observed.

(b) In certain trades there are special lists of prices for making Government work. The iron plate workers, for example, have such a list, and the Secretary of their Trade Union stated that it was the general practice to pay higher rates on Government work, because it is a better class of work, is subject to inspection and if not properly made is returned. The Government articles, however, are not exactly the same as those for the general market (Q. 3004-17).

A brush manufacturer stated that the workmen charged 18 knots a penny for making a certain kind of brush when it was known to be for the Navy, but that when the same brush was made for the employer's regular trade it was charged for at the lower rate of 20 knots a penny (Q. 5128).

118. The extent to which the repetition of the same pattern facilitates the work or to which a longer time is required for making Government work, owing to a higher standard of quality, are matters on which there would not seem to be unanimity of opinion among masters and men, and the relation of the two classes of special prices in question to the current rate prescribed in the Fair Wages Clause is a matter as to which no hard and fast rule can be laid down, and cases of difficulty can only be decided on their merits. If, after careful enquiry, it appears that the exceptionally large number which the workman makes under a Government contract does in fact appreciably facilitate the work, a reduction from the ordinary price may possibly be justified on the ground that new conditions have been set up to which the current rate does not apply. On the other hand, if it appears that the Government patterns differ in some material respect from ordinary commercial patterns, or that the standard of workmanship required is appreciably higher, then, the conditions being different from those to which the current rate on ordinary work applies, it is conceivable that it may not be sufficient compliance with the Fair Wages Clause for the contractor to pay merely the current rate applicable to ordinary work.

In the consideration of these cases we have been led to the conclusion that it would be desirable that in each Department there should be a periodical revision of the specifications and patterns with a view to the adoption wherever possible of the same classes of articles as are made for the ordinary trade when the latter are more economical.

GREATER UNIFORMITY OF WORKING.

119. There are some slight differences in the form of the labour conditions inserted in their contracts by the different Government Departments which might be removed, as there seems to be no good reason why contracts affecting the same trade should contain different clauses on matters affecting the labour employed. We therefore suggest that a uniform set of clauses should be drawn up for use by all the Departments. Not all of these clauses are required in all contracts, a clause obliging the contractor to execute the work in his own factory or to pay the workpeople direct, for example, being unnecessary in an engineering contract, but it is desirable that there should be uniformity of practice in regard to the particular clauses which should apply to the various trades.

120. Some saving to the State and diminution of trouble to contractors might ensue from greater co-operation among the Departments in the matter of inspection. There are probably few cases, so far as general supplies are concerned, in which the nature of the work required by two Departments varies so greatly that a separate inspection by each of them is necessary, and it would seem quite feasible to devise a system whereby an inspection by the Department most affected should in the majority of cases suffice for all. An application to be placed upon the list of firms from which tenders are invited having been received by one Department, the fact might be communicated to the other contracting Departments, and an arrangement arrived at for an inspection on behalf of all. In this way there might be evolved a uniform list of contractors eligible to tender for work required by any one of the Departments, in place of the present Departmental lists.

121. We regard it as a matter of great importance that the methods of settlement of disputes arising out of the Fair Wages and Subletting Clauses of Government contracts should be as simple and prompt as possible, bearing in mind, however, that where general principles and wide issues are involved the more permanent solution, even at the risk of some delay, is to be preferred to a partial and temporary one.

122. There are practically two methods:—

(a) Voluntary settlement between employers and the workpeople concerned or their representatives.

(b) Appeal to the Government Department that entered into the specific contract.

The usual method of investigation under (b), after any necessary preliminary correspondence, etc., is to send an Inspector to get into touch with all parties concerned and to get the facts on the spot. If the Department gives its decision promptly—and we desire specially to emphasise the importance of this point—this method is as good as any that can be devised where the question is one of ascertaining facts and where practically only one Department is concerned.

123. If, however, it appears from preliminary enquiry that questions of principle will arise, and that a decision of one Department might affect others, it will probably be advantageous to remit the case for further enquiry to a body that might attempt a solution likely to be of a more permanent character. It should be left entirely to the discretion of the Department that entered into the contract to call in the aid of such a body, and we hope and believe that the disposition of each Department would be to settle its cases on its own initiative as far as practicable, and remit only those involving wider issues and affecting other Departments as well.

124. We do not contemplate that an arbitration tribunal should be established, but that an advisory Committee should be formed of representatives of the contracting Departments, the final responsibility in any particular case resting with the Department concerned. Such a Committee should make all possible use of the information in the possession of the Board of Trade and might call in the assistance of that Department when making local inquiries. Further, it might be desirable in some cases for a representative of the Board to attend the meetings of the Committee.

With a reasonable degree of co-operation from employers and labour organisations, we think that the recommendations of such a body, while not absolutely binding, would no doubt be acted upon in most cases by all concerned, and that greater uniformity of action would thus be secured.

We do not contemplate that such a Committee should act as a Wages Board, but we think that it might play an important part in the prevention of confusion from the overlapping of several Departments, and it might render some assistance if applied to by parties concerned in settling piece rates for Government articles.

SUMMARY OF CONCLUSIONS.

125. (a) We recommend that the present wording of the Fair Wages Clause, which obliges the contractor to pay the current rates of wages for competent workmen in the district where the work is carried out, should be retained (§ § 14-23).

(b) While we do not recommend that words intended to enforce the observance of "Trade Union conditions" should be inserted in Government contracts, we think that such conditions of employment as are generally accepted in the district in the trade concerned must be taken into account when considering the question whether a particular contractor is observing the Fair Wages Clauses (§ § 24-26).

(c) We think that, where persons are employed at piece rates of wages on work for which a current time rate exists, the general principle that the piece work earnings for a given period should exceed the standard time wages for the same period on similar work should be recognised; and we recommend that contractors should be enjoined to keep proper records of the time worked by their workpeople in all cases of this kind (§ § 27-29).

(d) In the case of trades which can be identified as unorganised, or in any other cases in which the Department concerned considers that difficulties are likely to arise in ascertaining the "current rates of wages," we recommend that one or other of the methods suggested in § 33 should be adopted (§ § 30-67).

(e) We cannot recommend that Government contracts should be restricted to what are known technically as "fair houses," but we think that great care should continue to be taken in selecting firms to be placed on the list of contractors so as to ensure that only good employers shall be admitted (§ § 81-89).

(f) We recommend that in all works where Government contracts are being executed a copy of all the labour conditions of the contract should be prominently exhibited for the information of the workpeople (§ § 90-93).

(g) We recommend that, so far as practicable and at the discretion of the Departments concerned, the names and addresses of all firms obtaining Government contracts should be published in the "Board of Trade Journal" or "Board of Trade Labour Gazette" (§ § 94-99).

(h) We recommend that there should be uniformity among the Departments in the wording of all clauses dealing with the conditions of labour in contracts affecting the same trades (§ § 119-120).

(i) We think that every effort should be made to ensure all possible co-operation among the different contracting Departments in such matters as inspection, the investigation of complaints and the interpretation of the Fair Wages Clauses in difficult cases. With a view to furthering this object, we suggest that a Committee should be formed of representatives of the different contracting Departments, who should meet from time to time for the discussion of matters of common interest, and the settlement of disputed questions (§ § 121-124).

126. We desire to place on record our appreciation of the assistance which we have received from our Secretary, Mr. J. J. Wills, of the Board of Trade. His knowledge of the subject matter of our enquiry and his ability in elucidating the questions which we had to consider have been of the highest value.

G. H. MURRAY.
R. BAILEY.
F. W. BLACK.
H. DE LA BÈRE.
ARTHUR WILSON FOX.
J. H. HILLIER.
A. F. KING.

J. J. WILLS,
Secretary.

18*th November*, 1908.

APPENDIX I.

PRESENT FAIR WAGES CLAUSES IN GOVERNMENT CONTRACTS.

WAR OFFICE.

Fair Wages Clause.

No portion of this contract shall be transferred without the written permission of the Secretary of State for War. Subletting, other than that which may be customary in the trades concerned, is prohibited. The wages paid in the execution of this contract shall be those generally accepted as current in each trade for competent workmen in the district where the work is carried out.

Factory Clause in Head-Dress and Light Sewings (Bags, etc.) Contracts.

The contractor undertakes that all articles included in this contract shall be made up, and the material cut out, in his own factory, as specified in the schedule, and that no work shall be done at the homes of the workpeople. Any infringement of this condition, if proved to the satisfaction of the Secretary of State for War, shall render the contractor liable to a penalty not exceeding £100 for each offence, which may be deducted in the manner laid down in Clause VI., conditions of contract.

Special Clauses in Contracts for Harness, Saddlery, Caps, Made-up Clothing and Tents, and Accoutrements.

The contractor undertakes that all garments included in this contract shall be made up, and the material cut out, in his own factory as specified in the schedule, and that no work shall be done at the homes of the workpeople. Any infringement of this condition, if proved to the satisfaction of the Secretary of State for War, shall render the contractor liable to a penalty not exceeding £100 for each offence, which may be deducted in the manner laid down in Clause 6, conditions of contract. *In addition thereto the Secretary of State for War may forthwith terminate any or all existing contracts, and may recover from the contractor any loss resulting from such termination.

All wages earned by workers engaged in making up the garments shall be paid direct to them, and not through (1) a foreman, or (2) others supervising, or taking part in, the operations upon which the workers are engaged. Any breach of this clause by those specified at (1) or (2), if proved to the satisfaction of the Secretary for War, shall render the contractor liable to the cancellation of any or all existing contracts, and also to payment of any loss resulting from such cancellation.

The firm's and workers' wages books, together with the details on which they are based, for all workers, so far as relate to this tender, shall be open to the inspection of the Secretary of State for War, or his representative, at such times as he may think fit.

* Applies only in the case of caps and made-up clothing and tents.

Notice for Accoutrement Contracts—

"NOTICE.

"Extract from Resolution of the House of Commons in regard to the rates of workmen's wages, dated 13th February, 1891:—

"'That in the opinion of this House, it is the duty of the Government, in all Government contracts, to make every effort to secure the payment of such wages as are generally accepted as current in each trade for competent workmen.'

"In accordance with the above resolution, all contractors for accoutrements are bound by the terms of their contracts with the War Department to pay all workers employed under those contracts the rates of wages current for competent workers in the respective localities where the work is performed, and to put up a copy of this notice, prominently, in their workshops, where work for the War Department is carried on.

"By Order of
"The Secretary of State for War."

Special Clause in Work Contracts.

*No portion of this contract shall be transferred without the written permission of the Secretary of State for War. Subletting, other than that which may be customary in the trades concerned, is prohibited. The wages paid in the execution of this contract shall be those generally accepted as current in each trade for competent workmen in the district where the work is carried out. The contractor will be required to put up a copy of the notice on page 7 prominently in all workshops, yards, enclosures, pay offices, etc., where work for the War Department is carried on.

Notice for Works Contracts—

"NOTICE.

"Extract from Resolution of the House of Commons in regard to the rates of workmen's wages, dated 13th February, 1891:—

"'That in the opinion of this House, it is the duty of the Government, in all Government contracts, to make every effort to secure the payment of such wages as are generally accepted as current in each trade for competent workmen.'

"In accordance with the above resolution, all contractors for War Department works are bound by the terms of their contracts with the War Department to pay all workmen employed under those contracts the rates of wages (without any deduction), current for competent workmen in the respective localities where the work is performed, and to put up a copy of this notice, prominently, in all workshops, yards, enclosures, pay offices, etc., where work for the War Department is carried on.

"By Order of "The Secretary of State for War."

* This does not refer to the purchase of materials necessary for carrying out the work.

ADMIRALTY.

(a) Supplies.

Wages.—The wages paid in the execution of this contract shall be those generally accepted as current in each trade for competent workmen in the district where the work is carried out.

Transfer of contract.—This contract, or any part, share, or interest in it, shall not be transferred or assigned by the contractors directly or indirectly to any person or persons whomsoever, without the written consent of the Admiralty.

(b) Clothing.

Work to be done at contractors' factory.—All the clothing included in this contract shall be made up solely at the contractors' own factory at *

, and no work whatever in connection therewith shall be done at the homes of the workpeople or elsewhere. In the event of any breach of the foregoing stipulation the contractors shall pay to the Admiralty as and for liquidated damages and not by way of penalty such sum as the Admiralty shall in their absolute discretion assess, not exceeding the sum of £100 in respect of each such breach. The amount of such liquidated damages shall be deducted from the amount of any bill payable to the contractors under this contract, and in the event of there being no such bill payable, or none of sufficient amount for the recovery of such liquidated damages, the same shall be recoverable in due course of law.

Wages.—The wages paid in the execution of this contract shall be those generally accepted as current in each trade for competent workmen in the district where the work is carried out. The contractors shall keep a full record of the net wages received by each person engaged on the contract, such record to be produced whenever required for the inspection of an Admiralty officer. All wages earned by workers engaged in making up the articles shall be paid direct to them, and not through a foreman or others supervising or taking part in the operations on which the workers are engaged.

* Address of factory to be inserted at time of tendering.

(c) Ships and Machinery.

Wages.—The wages paid in the execution of the whole of the work shall be those generally accepted as current for competent workmen in each trade in the district in which the work is carried out.*

For unskilled labour the wages paid for work performed under the contract (or order, as the case may be) in any of H.M. Dockyards, shall not be less than the dockyard hourly rate current for that class of labour employed on similar work. No persons other than British subjects shall be employed in H.M. Dockyards in the execution of the work or any part thereof.†

(d) Building Materials.

The wages paid in the execution of this contract shall be those generally accepted as current in each trade for competent workmen in the district in which the work is carried out. This condition shall also apply to all sub-contracts entered into by the contractor in connection with this contract, and the contractor shall procure the insertion of a provision to the same effect in any such sub-contract.

(e) Works.

The wages paid in the execution of the whole of the work shall be those generally accepted as current in each trade for competent workmen in the district in which the work is carried out. This condition shall apply to all sub-contracts entered into by the contractor in connection with the said works, and the contractor shall procure the insertion of a provision to the same effect in any such sub-contract.

* This clause appears in all these contracts.

† This clause is usually inserted when work has to be done by the contractor in the dockyard.

OFFICE OF WORKS.

(a) Building.

The builder shall pay the workmen employed on the work at the building or on the site and not elsewhere.

The wages paid by the builder to workmen employed by him on the execution of works shall be those generally accepted in each trade for competent workmen in the district where they are employed, and the contractor's wages books and time sheets for all workmen, as far as they relate to this contract, shall be open to the inspection of the Commissioners of Works or their representative at such times as they may think fit.

(b) Engineering.

The wages paid by the contractor to workmen employed by him on the execution of works shall be those generally accepted in each trade for competent workmen in the district where they are employed, and the contractor's wages books and time sheets for all workmen so far as they relate to this contract shall be open to the inspection of the Commissioners of Works or their representatives at such times as they may think fit.

(c) General Supplies.

Wages.—The wages paid in the execution of this contract shall be those generally accepted as current in each trade for competent workmen in the district where the work is carried out.

Work in factory.—The contractors shall undertake that all articles included in this contract shall be made in their own factory or workshop at ****

Inspection of work, wages books, etc.—The contractors' factories and workshops and the goods in process of manufacture and also the contractors' wages books and time sheets shall be open to inspection at all reasonable times by the Controller of Supplies or his representative.

(d) Clothing.

All garments hereby contracted to be supplied shall be made up at the contractors' factories at *, or other factory to be approved by the Commissioners of Works, and no work shall be done at the houses of the workpeople. Any infringement of this condition, if proved to the satisfaction of the Commissioners, shall render the contractors liable to a penalty not exceeding ten pounds for each offence, which sum may be deducted or paid in manner provided by Article 13 of this contract.

The contractors shall not sublet the whole or any part of this contract, and shall pay the workmen employed in the execution thereof such wages as shall be generally accepted as current in each trade for competent workmen.

GENERAL POST OFFICE.

FAIR WAGES CLAUSES.

(a) Electrical Engineering, Stores, etc.

The wages paid for all work performed under the contract shall be those generally accepted as current in each trade for competent workmen in the district where the work is carried out.

The contractors' and workers' wages books, together with the details on which they are based, for all workers, so far as relate to this tender, shall be open to the inspection of the Postmaster-General, or his representative, at such times as he may think fit.

[These clauses are used in contracts for electric lighting, power installations, wireless telegraph installations, pipe laying, mail-bag apparatus, sealing wax, cords and twines, parcel receptacles, paper for Savings Bank Department, sale of waste paper, telegraph and telephone stores of all descriptions (excepting poles obtained from abroad), etc.]

(b) Clothing.

The wages paid for all work performed under the contract shall be those generally accepted as current in each trade for competent workmen in the district where the work is carried out.

All wages earned by workers engaged in work in connection with this contract shall be paid directly to them, and not through (1) a foreman, or (2) others, supervising, or taking part in, the operations upon which the workers are engaged. Any breach of this clause by those specified at (1) or (2), if proved to the satisfaction of the Postmaster-General, shall render the contractor liable to the cancellation of this contract and all other contracts for His Majesty's service, and also to payment of any loss resulting from such cancellation.

The contractor's and workers' wages books, together with the details on which they are based, for all workers, so far as relate to this tender, shall be open to the inspection of the Postmaster-General, or his representative, at such times as he may think fit.

[These clauses are used in contracts for the manufacture of uniform clothing, boots and waterproofs, and materials for Post Office clothing.]

(c) Head Dresses.

The wages paid for all work performed under the contract shall be those generally accepted as current in each trade for competent workmen in the district where the work is carried out.

The Postmaster-General will not consider that Clause 14 is being properly complied with unless:—

(a) Piecework rates are so fixed that the wages which an average female worker can earn shall be not less than 13s. 6d. per week of 54 hours, free of all deductions.

(b) The average wages actually earned in any four consecutive weeks, by any person working on the contract, are at a rate not less than 3d. per hour.

This clause shall apply to all women and girls (not being learners), employed either wholly or partly on the contract, at the factory named in Clause 12.

All wages earned by workers engaged in work in connection with this contract shall be paid directly to them, and not through (1) a foreman, or (2) others, supervising, or taking part in, the operations upon which the workers are engaged. Any breach of this clause by those specified at (1) or (2), if proved to the satisfaction of the Postmaster-General, shall render the contractor liable to the cancellation of this contract and all other contracts for His Majesty's service, and also to payment of any loss resulting from such cancellation.

The contractors' and workers' wages books, together with the details on which they are based, for all workers employed wholly or partly on the contract, shall be open to the inspection of the Postmaster-General, or his representative, at such times as he may think fit.

[N.B.—The printed rates, 13s. 6d. and 3d., apply to London and all other places excepting Aldershot. For Aldershot the rates are 11s. 3d. and 2½d.]

SUBLETTING CLAUSE.

No portion of the contract shall be transferred without the written permission of the controller of stores. Sub-letting, other than that which may be customary in the trades concerned, is prohibited.

FACTORY CLAUSE.

The contractor undertakes that all articles included in this contract shall be made up in his own factory at and that no work shall be done at the homes of the workpeople. Any infringement of this condition, if proved to the satisfaction of the Postmaster-General, shall render the contractor liable to a penalty not exceeding £100 for each offence, which may be deducted or made payable in the manner laid down in Clause——

[This Clause is used in contracts for the manufacture of uniform clothing and head dresses.]

STATIONERY OFFICE.

The contractor shall not underlet any work to be done under this contract, or assign the contract to any other person without the written consent of the Controller; he shall in all other respects conform to the following Resolution passed by the House of Commons on the 13th February, 1891, and renewed on the 21st March, 1893:—"Resolved, that, in the opinion of this House, it is the duty of the Government in all Government contracts to make provision against the evils recently disclosed before the Sweating Committee, to insert such conditions as may prevent the abuse arising from sub-letting, and to make every effort to secure the payment of such wages as are generally accepted as current in each trade for competent workmen." In the event of any infringement of this condition the Controller shall have power, at any stage of the work contracted for, to close the contract without payment to the contractor, who shall in such case either return or pay to the Controller the value of any materials supplied under the conditions of the contract. The contractor shall further undertake that, in the engagement and employment of workmen and others required for the execution of any work ordered under this contract, no preference shall be given as between "unionists" and "non-unionists."

APPENDIX II.

VIEWS OF EMPLOYERS' PARLIAMENTARY COUNCIL.

Copy of letter from the Secretary of the Fair Wages Committee to the Secretary of the Employers' Parliamentary Council.

7, Whitehall Gardens, S.W.,
January 21st, 1908.

DEAR SIR,

With reference to previous correspondence I am desired by the Committee appointed to consider the working of the Fair Wages Resolution of the House of Commons, as embodied in Government Contracts, to inform you that representations have been made to them on behalf of Trade Unions on the following points:—

1. It is stated that in some cases difficulties arise in regard to the interpretation to be placed on the words "wages current in each trade for competent workmen in the district where the work is carried out." It has accordingly been suggested that Government contracts should contain a clause obliging the contractor to pay the "Trade Union rate of Wages," or the Trade Union rate as agreed upon by the employers and workmen in the district. Where there is no such rate in existence it has been suggested that the rate of the nearest town where there is a Trade Union rate should be enforced. This suggestion has been put forward by some witnesses as being particularly applicable to cases in which work is carried out by a firm in a district where there is no other employer engaged in the trade, and especially where a firm may have removed its factory to a more or less rural district.

2. Some witnesses ask that the "Trade Union conditions" (in addition to the rate of wages) should be enforced, with a view to the regulation of such matters as the hours of labour, number of apprentices, the employment of boys, women and girls, piece-work, etc., in trades where such matters are dealt with in the working rules.

3. It has been suggested that the principle of the Fair Wages Clause should apply not only to work forming the subject of the contract, but to all work carried out by the contractor, and that firms which do not recognise in all their work the rates of wages, hours of labour and other conditions agreed upon by Trade Unions and employers should not be eligible to contract for Government work.

4. With regard to female labour some witnesses object altogether to the employment of women in certain trades, while others would have no objection to women being employed at the same rates of wages as are paid to men.

5. Objection is also taken to the employment of unskilled or less skilled labour on portions of a job, while the men paid at higher rates are confined to those portions which involve greater skill.

6. On the subject of piece-work earnings it has been contended that a firm cannot claim to be paying the current rate of the district if the current hourly rate is obtained only by persons employed on piece-work, and that it is not sufficient for the earnings per week to be equal to, or greater than, the standard weekly rates for time work, but that the piece-work earnings should exceed the latter in a certain proportion assumed to be generally recognised as customary in the trade.

7. It is also contended that it is an infringement of the Fair Wages Clause for men to be paid the standard weekly rates of wages but to be compelled to work longer than the recognised hours in order to obtain such wages.

8. Certain witnesses ask for facilities for ascertaining with what employers the contracts are placed; and some suggest that the names of all who are successful in obtaining Government contracts should be published.

9. It is suggested that Schedules of the rates of wages paid, and hours of labour observed, should be posted in all shops and at all works where Government Contracts are being carried out, and that pay sheets and wages books should be open to official inspection.

My Committee would be glad to learn the views of your organisation or of any representative members of it, on the matters alluded to above and on any others coming within the scope of the inquiry, the nature of which will be seen from the enclosed copy of the terms of reference.

I should therefore be obliged if you would kindly inform me of the names of any witnesses who would be willing to give evidence before the Committee.

I am,
Yours faithfully,
(Signed) J. J. Wills.

The Secretary,
Employers' Parliamentary Council,
25, Victoria Street.
Westminster.

Observations of the Employers' Parliamentary Council received in reply to the above letter.

OBSERVATIONS OF THE EMPLOYERS' PARLIAMENTARY COUNCIL ON THE REPRESENTATIONS MADE TO THE COMMITTEE ON BEHALF OF TRADE UNIONS AS SET OUT IN THE SECRETARY'S LETTER OF THE 21st JANUARY, 1908.

Before dealing with the representations in detail, the Council venture to make two general observations:

(a) It cannot be denied, on the one hand, that any person giving out work to be done by contract has a right to insist upon the inclusion in the contract of any terms he desires; and this right must belong to the Government equally with any other person or body.

(b) The Council, on the other hand, are of opinion that it is highly inexpedient to impose conditions which set up an outside authority to control the relations between a contractor and his workpeople, and they believe that the experience of the commercial world as a whole is in favour of this view. It is, of course, well known that the conditions now commonly included in contracts with Government Departments and other public authorities were never heard of until they were advocated on purely sentimental grounds; and it is therefore plain that they can have no basis in practical business expediency. And, while to impose such conditions would be inexpedient in a private person when disposing of his own means, it is still more inexpedient on the part of the Government when disposing of the means of the taxpayers, for there can be no doubt that every restriction imposed upon contractors means additional cost, and is considered by them in fixing the prices at which they tender.

Subject to the above general statements, the Council beg leave to offer the following detailed observations, the paragraphs being numbered to correspond with the paragraphs of the Secretary's letter:—

1. The Council cannot see that any difficulty should arise as is alleged, and desire most strongly to protest against the idea that "the Trade Union rate of wages," as such, should be considered as in any way binding upon a contractor. If a rate of wages has, in fact, been agreed upon between employers and workmen in any district (whether such rate is a Trade Union rate or not), there may be some show of reason for enforcing it in a Government contract; but to require any contractor to pay the Trade Union rate of wages simply because it is the Union rate is to hand him over gagged and bound to a small body of men who could easily ruin him if they wished to do so. The further suggestion, that a firm which may have removed its factory "to a more or less rural district" is to be forced to pay the Trade Union rate current in the nearest town, is still more monstrous. Many firms have gone to very considerable expense in the last few years for the purpose of establishing their works away from big towns, and the condition suggested really means that their expenditure in this respect is to be thrown away by their being deprived of one of the main advantages of working in a rural district.

2. The observations made under (1) with reference to "Trade Union rates of wages" apply equally to 'Trade Union' conditions." Even, however, if the paragraph be understood to refer to conditions agreed upon by employers and workmen, such an extension of the paternal oversight of a Government Department is most objectionable, and calculated to make Government work distasteful to contractors of good standing.

3. The Council desire to point out that the effect of this proposal, if acceded to, would be to limit very much the number of contractors who would compete for public works, as it would practically exclude a contractor from competing for other work with contractors outside of and unfettered by such conditions, and in operation would lead to interminable dispute and trouble.

4. The suggestion that female labour should not be employed at all, or should only be employed at the same rate of wages as men, which is practically identically the same, is nothing more nor less than an attempt on the part of the men who put it forward to secure a monopoly, and therefore higher wages, for their own labour. There can be no other argument for it.

5. It would appear to the Council to be one of the plainest dictates of common sense that unskilled, and therefore less highly paid, labour should be employed on unskilled work, and more highly skilled and more highly paid labour employed where skill is required.

6. The suggestion in this paragraph appears so illogical that it defeats itself. If work is given out as piece-work it is priced on a scale that is advantageous to both sides, the worker being able to earn higher wages and the employer to get his work done at an ascertained cost. The suggestion appears to be that a worker should be encouraged to waste his time and be relieved from his contract, and the employer should suffer all loss resulting therefrom; and such a system would result, as it is probably intended it should, in rendering work by the piece utterly impracticable.

7. Assuming that "standard weekly rates of wages" are to be enforced, this contention logically follows.

8. There would seem to be no objection to the publication of the names of those who have secured Government contracts.

9. If this is only to apply to Government work, there would probably be no reason why such conditions should not be posted up. Contractors would undoubtedly resent the official inspection of their account books, but it is possibly not an unreasonable stipulation if the enforcement of so-called fair wages be once admitted.

(Signed) FREDERICK MILLAR,
Secretary.

APPENDIX III.

COMMUNICATION RECEIVED FROM THE LONDON CHAMBER OF COMMERCE (MANUFACTURERS' SECTION).

Oxford Court, Cannon Street,
London, E.C.
4th May, 1908.

J. J. Wills, Esq., Secretary,
Committee on the Fair Wages Clause in Government Contracts, Board of Trade,
7, Whitehall Gardens, S.W.

Dear Sir,

I am directed by the Manufacturers' Section of this Chamber to refer to your letter of the 21st January, 1908, conveying the representations which have been made to your Committee on behalf of Trade Unions with regard to the working of the Fair Wages Resolution of the House of Commons as embodied in Government contracts. The Section desire to lodge a strong protest against any official interference with the rates of wages paid on contract work on the following grounds:—

(a) That a manufacturer in one district, who has a lower rate of wages than obtain in another district, is placed in a more favourable position than his competitors for obtaining such contracts.

(b) That it is not equitable, or necessary, that the rate of wages for the same work should be the same in every district, as it is admitted by all that the cost of living in some districts is much less than in others.

(c) That the suggestion in paragraph 8 would be an unfair interference with the relations of employers and employees, inasmuch as if the names of Government contractors are published, it will expose their business to all the hectoring tactics of the various Trade Unions. There are very few general businesses in the country which do not combine in their premises more than one class of employee, and it would enable all the different Trade Unions to interfere. This interference would undoubtedly cause many manufacturers to fall out as Government contractors, and thus diminish competition to the detriment of the nation.

With regard to the statement in Clause 4, that some witnesses would have no objection to women being employed at the same rate of wages as are paid to men, I am to point out that female labour is generally employed in subsidiary processes, and it is, therefore, absurd to contend, as a general principle, that they should be paid at the same rate as men.

Referring to the objection in Clause 5 to the employment of unskilled or less skilled labour on portions of a job while the men paid higher wages are confined to those portions which involve greater skill, I am to say that if the most skilful workers could not be employed on the best work it would be fatal to efficient and economical production, and, at the same time, deprive the workers of all incentive to excel. It is to the interests of both employers and employed that ability should be recognised and encouraged.

I am also to submit that when British manufacturers are in competition with foreign-made goods, it would be impossible for the Government to satisfy themselves that any particular rates of wages were being paid or particular conditions observed in respect of the manufacture of the foreign goods in question. Therefore, seeing that the British Government have no control over the rates of wages paid or conditions of labour abroad, there would be an unfair differentiation between British and foreign goods, to the prejudice of the home manufacture.

I am to request that these observations may be brought under the notice of the members of your Committee.

Yours faithfully,

KENRIC B. MURRAY,
Secretary.

APPENDIX IV.

COMMUNICATION RECEIVED FROM THE IRISH TRADES UNION CONGRESS.

Irish Trades Union Congress,
Parliamentary Committee,
Dublin, June 15th, 1908.

J. J. Wills, Esq.,
Secretary Fair Wages Committee.

Sir,

I am instructed to forward you annexed copies of resolutions adopted at the fifteenth annual Irish Trades Union Congress, held in Belfast on the 8th to 10th June inst., and to request that you will be good enough to bring them under the notice of your Committee.

I am, sir,
Your obedient servant,
E. L. Richardson,
Secretary.

Amendment of Fair Wages Resolution.

"That this Congress urges upon the Irish Members of Parliament the necessity of having the 'Fair Wages' Resolution amended by inserting the words 'Trade Union rate.'"

War Department Contracts.

"That it be an instruction to the Parliamentary Committee to bring under the notice of the War Department the necessity for having a clause inserted in tenders that the contractor shall observe the conditions, hours of labour, and pay the wages recognised and agreed upon between the employers and Trade Unions of the district (the rate to be paid irrespective of piecework earnings) in which the work is carried on, and a schedule of wages paid shall be posted in some conspicuous place in the works where the work is done. Failing such agreement as to conditions, hours, or wages, those in operation in the nearest town or district in which the work is carried on under such agreement shall be taken to apply; any firm or contractor not recognising the above-mentioned conditions on all their work, shall be deemed an 'unfair' house, and not eligible for Government work."

APPENDIX V.

COMMUNICATION RECEIVED FROM THE SCOTTISH COUNCIL FOR WOMEN'S TRADES.

58, Renfield Street, Glasgow.
26th May, 1908.

Dear Sir,

In connection with the evidence which I submitted to your Committee on the 14th of May, my Parliamentary Bills Committee have now had a further opportunity of considering the various points arising in connection with the employment of women on Government contract work, and they have adopted the accompanying resolution, which I have been instructed to forward to you.

I am, dear sir,
Yours faithfully.
Margaret H. Irwin.

J. J. Wills, Esq.,
Secretary to the Fair Wages Committee.

Resolution on Fair Wages Boards for Government Contracts.

"The Scottish Council for Women's Trades having in view the special disabilities of women workers arising from the absence in the majority of women's employments of trade organisations which can fix and secure the payment of a standard rate of wages to women, would earnestly and respectfully urge on the Fair Wages Committee the desirability for having established through the medium of a Wages Board under the Board of Trade a standard wage for women employed on all Government contract work. The Council would further urge that in order to insure the practical application of the standard fixed by such a Board, special women inspectors be appointed whose duty it would be to visit works, to interview the workers, and to take all necessary steps for ascertaining that the legal rate is being adhered to."

APPENDIX VI.

COMMUNICATIONS RECEIVED FROM CERTAIN CORPORATIONS IN REGARD TO THE FAIR WAGES CLAUSES IN THEIR CONTRACTS.

(i) BRADFORD.

Town Hall,
Bradford,
9th April, 1908.

SIR.

I have now had an opportunity of going into the questions raised in your letter of the 30th ultimo with regard to Fair Wages Clauses in contracts, and have pleasure in supplying you with the following information relating to the experience of the Bradford Corporation, dealing with your numbered paragraphs seriatim:—

(1) Advertisements inviting tenders and tender forms include the following clause:—

"The contract will be let subject to the Fair Contracts Clauses of the Corporation, which may be seen at the Town Clerk's office, and which the accepted contractor will be required to sign."

The Fair Contracts Clauses are attached to, and form part of, the formal contract. A print of the Clauses is sent herewith, from which you will see the conditions laid down in regard to rates of wages, hours of labour, etc.

(2) Conditions of this nature were first laid down and embodied in contracts as a result of a resolution of the City Council of the 13th December, 1898.

(3) A copy of the clauses at first inserted in tender forms and in contracts is sent herewith, and it will be seen that they differ from those now in force. The reason for the change is, shortly, that doubts were expressed:—

(1) Whether the Corporation could enforce the penalties specified in their Fair Contracts Clause should the contractors' undertakings be not observed.

(2) Whether the Corporation could enforce the provisions in a case where any contractor, subsequent to the date of the contract, paid a less rate of wages than the standard rate which obtained at the date when his contract was signed (by taking upon himself to define the "standard rate of wages" as meaning the rate in existence at the date of the signing of the contract).

(3) Whether the Corporation could enforce the provisions (by taking upon themselves to define the "standard rate of wages" as meaning the standard for the time being in force) against any contractor who was not paying the standard (if any) for the time being obtaining.

(4) Whether, if the standard rate of wages agreed between masters and men did exist at the time of signing the contract and it had been terminated by either party since, there was any standard applicable under the Corporation's Fair Contracts Clause which could be enforced.

(5) Whether, where there was no organisation of the masters or the men, the standard rate of wages could be said to be the rate which was being paid by the bulk of the employers.

(4) No difficulties have been met with with regard to the interpretation of the clauses now in force.

(5) I am not aware that the contractors attempt to evade the clauses.

(6) On an allegation being made from any source that a contractor is not complying with the conditions in question, the matter is fully investigated. Only two complaints have been made since the adoption of the clauses in July, 1903, and in neither case were the allegations proved.

(7) In the event of complaints, the contractors' books are examined, the masters and the workmen concerned are invited to attend before the investigating committee, inquiries are made both from the masters' and the workmen's organisations.

(8) Out of some hundred of contracts, only the two complaints above mentioned have been lodged. Boilermakers were the contractors concerned in each case.

I am, Sir,
Your obedient Servant,
FREDERICK STEVENS,
Town Clerk.

J. J. Wills, Esq.,
Secretary of Committee on Fair Wages,
Board of Trade,
7, Whitehall Gardens,
London, S.W.

CITY OF BRADFORD.

FAIR CONTRACTS CLAUSES ENFORCED FROM DECEMBER, 1898, TO JULY, 1903.

Clauses in tender forms.

Persons tendering must give an assurance that they have paid to their workmen for the three months preceding date of tender not less than the minimum standard rate of wages, and undertake to continue to pay, during the contract, the said rate of wages.

The contractor must undertake that in the event of his giving a false assurance as to the past payments to workmen, or committing any breach of his undertaking as to payments under his contract, he shall forfeit and pay as damages to the Corporation, or in the alternative the Corporation may deduct and retain out of any moneys in their hands otherwise due to him under this contract, a sum equal to five per cent. on the value of the work completed at the date of the Corporation being satisfied that he has given them such false assurance, or that such undertaking has not been complied with, and the Corporation shall be authorised, if they think fit, in addition to enforcing their claim to such damages, to cancel his contract by reason of his failure to observe the requirements as to such payments to workmen employed by him.

Clauses in contracts.

And the contractors hereby severally and respectively give an assurance that they have paid to their workmen for the three months preceding the date of their tender not less than the minimum standard rate of wages, and undertake that they will continue to pay during the contract the same rate of wages, and agree that in the event of the said assurance as to past payments to workmen proving false or their committing any breach of their undertaking as to payments under this contract, they shall and will forfeit and pay as damages to the Corporation, or, in the alternative, the Corporation may deduct and retain out of any moneys in their hands otherwise due to them under this contract a sum equal to five per cent. on the value of the work completed at the date of the Corporation being satisfied that such assurance is false or that such undertaking has not been complied with, and the Corporation shall be authorised, if they think fit, in addition to enforcing their claim to such damages, to cancel the contract, so far as concerns the particular contractor or contractors, by reason of the contractors' failure to observe the requirements as to such payments to workmen employed by them. And the contractors hereby agree that any penalty to which they, their, or his executors, administrators or assigns may become subject hereunder, shall and may be recoverable as liquidated damages, or may be deducted from any moneys due to them or any of them by the Corporation under these presents.

CITY OF BRADFORD.

FAIR CONTRACTS CLAUSES.

The following is the form of Fair Contracts Clauses adopted as a standing order of the Council, viz. :—

And the contractor hereby gives an assurance that during the three months immediately preceding the date of his tender for this contract he has paid the whole of his workmen not less than the standard rate of wages as hereinafter defined, and he undertakes that he will continue to pay that rate of wages to all his workmen employed thereon during the existence of the present contract; such standard rate of wages to be deemed to be the rate mutually agreed upon by the Masters' Association and the Trade Unions respectively concerned, or in case there should at any relevant time be no such rate as aforesaid, then such rate of wages to be deemed to be that last mutually agreed upon by the Masters' Association and the Trade Unions respectively concerned. Provided that in the case of engineers, founders and metal workers the rate of wages and conditions of employment last agreed upon as between the Federated Engineering Employers and the Allied Trade Unions shall be observed. And in the event of his assurance aforesaid being false in any particular, or in the event of the contractor committing any breach of his undertaking aforesaid, the Corporation may, if they think fit, after giving him notice in writing of their intention so to do, forthwith enter upon and take possession of the works and site and of all such materials and plant upon the site or on any ground contiguous thereto intended to be used for the works, and all such materials thereafter used in or about the completion of the said works shall become the property of the Corporation absolutely, and the Corporation shall retain and hold all such plant until the works shall have been completed under the powers hereinafter conferred upon them. And if the Corporation shall exercise the above power, they may complete the contract themselves by direct labour or engage any other person to complete the contract, and may exclude the contractor, his agents, and servants from entry upon or having access to the works, the Corporation or such other person, as the case may be, using for that purpose the plant and materials above mentioned in so far as they are suitable and adapted to such use. Upon the completion of the works the Architect shall certify the sum paid to such person as aforesaid, or expended by the Corporation in completing the works as aforesaid. Should the amount so certified exceed the amount which would have been due to the contractor upon the completion of the works by him the difference shall be payable by the contractor to the Corporation, and may be retained out of any moneys in their hands due to the contractor, or if no such moneys exist, or they shall be insufficient, the difference shall be paid by the contractor to the Corporation on demand, and the Corporation shall be entitled to sue the contractor for such difference. The Corporation shall not be liable to make any payment or compensation to the contractor for or on account of the use of the plant and materials aforesaid for the completion of the works under the provisions hereinbefore contained. After the works shall have been so completed as aforesaid, the Corporation shall give notice to the contractor of such completion, and may require him from time to time, before and after such completion, to remove from the site his plant and all such materials as aforesaid as may not have been used or be required in or for the completion of the works. If such plant and materials, or any of them, are not removed within twenty-one days after notice shall have been so given, the Corporation may remove and sell the same, holding the proceeds less the cost of the removal and sale, to the credit of the contractor. Any notice to be given to the contractor under this clause may be given by leaving the same at his address above stated, or by registered letter sent to him at that address.

That for the purpose of ascertaining whether the contractor is or has been paying the standard rate of wages, the contractor shall, whenever called upon by the Town Clerk of Bradford, submit his wage-books to such accountant as the Town Clerk shall direct for examination at such time or times as the Town Clerk may think fit.

Provided always that if the completion of the said works shall be interrupted by frost or continued wet or bad weather, or by a strike or lock-out of the workmen in any particular trade employed thereupon by the contractor, not being a strike or lock-out due directly or indirectly to the contractor neglecting or refusing to pay the standard rate of wages as defined in the foregoing clause, or by any other cause which in the opinion of the architect shall be unavoidable by the contractor, of which interruption, frost, bad weather, strike, lock-out, or other cause the architect shall be the sole judge, or in case the building shall be destroyed or damaged by fire, storm, or inevitable accident, the period (or any portion thereof as the architect in his discretion may think reasonable and proper) during which the works shall be interrupted by such frost, bad weather, strike, lock-out, or other cause, or by destruction or damage, according to the certificate of the architect, shall not be reckoned within the time allowed for completion.

The Council have also adopted the following standing order, viz. :—

That in the event of any person or firm acting in contravention of the Fair Contracts Clauses when carrying out any work for the Council, no further tender from such person or firm shall be considered for a period of five years.

Every contract for work with the Corporation will be let subject to the various points named in the above standing orders, which will apply as the circumstances of each contract may require.

FREDERICK STEVENS,
Town Clerk.

Town Hall, Bradford,
14th July, 1903.

Signature of Contractor .....

Date .....

(ii) GLASGOW.

City Chambers, Glasgow,
31st March, 1908.

J. J. Wills, Esq.,
Board of Trade,
7, Whitehall Gardens,
London, S.W.

Fair Wages Clause in Corporation Contracts.

Sir,

I am in receipt of your communication of yesterday's date, enclosing copy of the terms of reference of the Committee appointed by the Treasury to consider the working of the Fair Wages Resolution of the House of Commons, as embodied in Government contracts, together with a copy of that resolution, and asking to be furnished with information on the subject in relation to contracts for works made by this Corporation.

It was in 1903 that the first form of the clause inserted in Corporation contracts was adopted by this Corporation. Since then the clause has been considerably modified, and I send you enclosed copies of the original form of the clause, and also of the form in which it now appears in the Standing orders of the Corporation for the year 1907-1908.

The forms of the clause now enclosed answer the queries (1) and (2) in your letter.

As regards query (3), I may say that the reason for the change in the form of the clause, which has been made between 1903 and the present time, has been that there are certain members of the Independent Labour Party, and representatives of Trades Unions, members of the Town Council, and it has been upon the motion of these members that the Corporation have been led to alter the clause to its present form.

(4) It may be said that the Corporation have not experienced any practical difficulty in its interpretation. In special cases members of the Corporation, either at meetings of the Corporation, or of its Standing Committees, have brought forward alleged cases of nonconformity to the provisions of the clause by certain contractors. If the Corporation or the Committee were satisfied that any reasonable ground existed for the allegation, the next step taken has been to appoint two or more members of the Committee interested to examine the books of the alleged defaulting contractor, and to report the result of their inquiry. In any case, where it has been found that the terms of the clause were not being strictly complied with, intimation has been made to the contractor that unless this were done, the contract would be taken out of his hands, and that he would be held liable for any loss or damage the Corporation might sustain through having to re-let the contract. I do not think, however, that any case has actually occurred where such a course has been followed.

(5), (6) and (7) These queries have been practically answered by what is stated under No. (4).

(8) The proportion of cases in which the Corporation have had to take the steps before indicated, since the clause was at first adopted, has not been numerous, and the cases which have actually occurred have chiefly been in contracts for building work, and for cartage work.

I shall be glad to furnish you with any further specific information in my power in regard to this matter on again hearing from you.

I am, Sir,
Your obedient Servant,
John Bowers,
Town Clerk Depute.

GLASGOW CORPORATION.

FAIR WAGES CLAUSE IN CORPORATION CONTRACTS.

I.—Form of clause as originally adopted in 1903.

All Corporation contracts shall contain a clause requiring the contractor to pay to all competent workpeople employed by him not less than the minimum standard rate of wages in each branch of the trade, or, where no such standard exists, such wages as are generally recognised as fair in the trade, and in districts where the Glasgow scale of wages does not apply, to pay to said workpeople employed by him in connection with Corporation contracts not less than the minimum standard rate of wages paid in such district, or, where no such standard exists, such wages as are generally recognised as fair in the trade in such district.

II.—Form of clause as it appears in the Corporation Standing Orders for 1907-8.

All specifications issued by the Corporation shall provide that only persons or firms paying the standard rate of wages or piece prices to all competent workers for all classes of work, whether under contract or otherwise, and recognising Trades Union conditions, shall be eligible to estimate for and receive Corporation contracts. And all specifications issued by, and all contracts made with, the Corporation shall embody the following provisions and conditions:—

(1) The contractor shall pay to all competent workpeople employed by him not less than the standard rate of wages or piece prices in each branch of the trade; or, where no such standard rate or piece prices exist, such wages or piece prices as are generally recognised as fair in the trade: and, in districts or places where the Glasgow scale of wages or piece prices do not apply, to pay not less than the standard rate of wages or piece prices paid in such districts or places; or, where no such standard rate or piece prices exist, such wages or piece prices as are generally recognised as fair in the trade in such districts or places.

(2) The contractor shall not receive any payment or consideration for any extra work over the estimated or contract price unless the extra work has been formally sanctioned by the Committee interested before any part of the extra work is executed.

(3) If the contractor shall be found to have offered or given any gratuity, bonus, discount or bribe of any sort to any Corporation officer or employee, it shall be competent for the Corporation forthwith to cancel his contract, and to hold him liable for any loss and damage which the Corporation may thereby sustain.

(iii) LEICESTER.

Town Hall, Leicester,
Town Clerk's Office,
10th April, 1908.

SIR,

Adverting to your letter of the 30th ultimo, and the enclosures sent therewith relating to the Fair Wages Clause inserted in contracts, I beg to inform you in reference to the specific points mentioned in your letter, as follows:—

1. The conditions in regard to rates of wages, etc., at present inserted in tender forms and contracts for works are as set out in the print sent herewith, marked "D."

2. A condition in reference to fair wages was first inserted in Corporation contracts after the 28th July, 1891.

3. The changes which have been made in the form of words employed are shown by the copies of clauses sent herewith, marked "A," "B," "C," and "D." The change from clause "A" to clause "B" was to strengthen the provision with respect to sub-contracting, and to provide for a special penalty for breach. The alteration shown in form "C" was made in a general revision of the conditions of contract by counsel. Clause "D" incorporates the Trades Union conditions of labour.

4. I am not aware of any difficulties of interpretation.

5. Evasion has taken place by sub-contracting and not enforcing the terms of the clause on the sub-contractors, also by employing men who were admittedly not up to the full standard of efficiency, and who were willing to accept lower wages. In one case painters' labourers were employed to do painters' work at labourers' wages.

6. The Corporation act on receipt of complaint, including complaint as provided for in the concluding paragraph of the print herewith marked "D."

7. Investigations are made by means of correspondence, conferences with contractors and representatives of workmen, and (where it can be arranged) perusal of books, etc.

8. Complaints have arisen in only nine cases (so far as I can ascertain) since the introduction of the clause into contracts. These related mostly to trades connected with building ironwork, painting and woodwork.

I am, Sir,
Your obedient Servant,
WM. H. TINDALL,
For Town Clerk.

The Secretary,
Board of Trade,
7, Whitehall Gardens, S.W.

LEICESTER.

A.—CLAUSE IN USE FROM 1891 TO 1895.

Sub-Letting and Standard Wages.

The contractor shall not assign his contract, or any part thereof, or make any sub-contract with any other person or persons for the execution of any portion of the work, without the consent in writing of the Corporation or the Borough Surveyor, and he shall pay not less than the current local standard rate of wages to all workmen and labourers employed.

B.—CLAUSE IN USE FROM 1895 TO 1900.

Standard Rate of Wages.

The contractor shall pay not less than the current local standard rate of wages to all the workmen employed by him in the execution of his contract, and if the contractor sub-let any portion of his contract under and in accordance with clause 9 of these conditions, he must provide for this condition being imposed, and must enforce its observance by the sub-contractor or sub-contractors.

If the contractor or any sub-contractor or sub-contractors shall be proved to the satisfaction of the Corporation or the Committee having charge of the work to have paid less than the current local standard rate of wages, the contractor shall pay to the Corporation a sum of £10 as and for liquidated damages for each and every case of under-payment.

C.—CLAUSE IN USE FROM 1900 TO SEPTEMBER, 1902.

Fair Wages.

The contractor shall pay not less than the current local standard rate of wages to all the workmen employed by him in the execution of the contract, and if the contractor should be permitted to sub-let any portion of his contract he must impose this condition on, and enforce its observance by, his sub-contractors. If the contractor, or any sub-contractor shall be proved to the satisfaction of the Corporation or a committee thereof, to have made to any workman employed in the completion or maintenance of the works any payment at less than the current local standard rate of wages, the contractor shall pay to the Corporation a sum of £10 as and for liquidated damages for each and every such payment.

D.—CLAUSE IN USE SINCE SEPTEMBER, 1902.

BOROUGH OF LEICESTER.

CONDITIONS OF CONTRACTS.

Clause adopted by the Council, 30th September, 1902.

In every tender for any work to be done for the Corporation, the person tendering should be required to state that he pays such rates of wages and observes such hours of labour and conditions of employment as are then recognised and practised by the employers and the trade unions of the town or district in which the work tendered for is to be done; and if no such organisation or organisations exists or exist, that he pays the rate of wages and observes the hours of labour and conditions of employment which are accepted for similar work by the employers and the organised trades in the town or district nearest to the place where the said work is to be done.

In all future contracts the following clause should be inserted:—"The contractor shall not, without the previous consent in writing of the Council, assign the contract, or the benefits, or the burdens thereof, or any part thereof, nor shall he, without the previous consent in writing of the surveyor, make any sub-contract for the construction, completion, or maintenance of the works, or any part thereof, and the names of the firms from whom the contractor proposes to obtain materials or manufactured articles, together with a list of the articles which he proposes they should supply, shall be submitted to the surveyor for approval before any order is placed. The rates of wages to be paid to, and the hours of labour, as well as the rules and conditions regulating the employment of, workmen and others engaged or employed in carrying out the contract, shall be such as are recognised by the employers and the respective Trade Unions in the town or district where such contract is to be executed; and where no such organisation or organisations exists or exist, such rates of wages, hours of labour, and conditions of employment as are, for similar work to that specified in the contract, generally paid or observed in the organised trades in the town or district nearest to the place in which the contract is to be executed. The contractor or any sub-contractor approved as aforesaid, or anyone employed by them respectively, shall attend when so required before the Council or any Committee of the Council to give explanations and information. In case of any breach of the provisions of this clause by the contractor or any sub-contractor, the Council shall be at liberty to determine the contract. If the contractor or any sub-contractor shall be proved, to the satisfaction of the Council or any of its committees, to have made to any workman employed in the completion or maintenance of the works any payment less than the said rate of wages, or to have failed to observe the hours of labour and conditions of employment as aforesaid, the contractor shall pay to the Council a sum of £10 as and for liquidated damages for each and every such payment or failure to observe the conditions of this clause."

Whenever any member of the Council has reason to believe that the principles of the above clause have been infringed, he should, on communicating with the Committee having charge of the work, be afforded an opportunity of explaining the case to them.

ERNEST V. HILEY,
Town Clerk.

1st October, 1902.

(iv) LIVERPOOL.

Town Clerk's Office (Leasing Department), Municipal Buildings,
Liverpool,
27th April, 1908.

SIR,

In reply to your letter of the 30th ultimo, requesting certain information with regard to the working of the "Fair Wage Clause" in contracts entered into by this Corporation, I beg to inform you that the Corporation have a list of almost every description of trade, and any firm desiring to be placed on that list has to apply on a special form (copy enclosed, marked "A"). The applications are submitted to the Committees and are considered on their merits, and if the firms are found on enquiry to be capable of carrying out the work they are placed on the list.

When the Corporation require any work carried out or any articles to be supplied, the firms on the list are invited to send in tenders for that special work. When a tender has been accepted by the Council the firm tendering has to sign a contract (copy enclosed, marked "B").*

The following are my replies to your questions:—

(1) The conditions with regard to rates of wages, hours of labour, etc., are now inserted in tenders and forms of contracts in the form enclosed, and marked "C." This clause has been inserted since November, 1907.

(2) Conditions of a similar character were inserted in Corporation contracts in November, 1891.

(3) The original clause (copy of which is enclosed and marked "D") has been altered from time to time, as shown.

The first alteration was made in 1896, when the words "or approximate" were deleted, as this term was found to be vague, and the word "equivalent" remaining alone was more definite in its meaning.

The word "respectively" in the third clause was eliminated in the year 1900 as being unnecessary, and on the same date the words "or such rate of wages and hours of labour as are equivalent thereto" were also struck out, because it was considered that the alteration as to the rate of wages and hours of labour in the former part of the clause should not be qualified in any way.

In regard to the alteration in the word "performed," the Corporation had in view the preventing of any contractors preparing any part of the work in other towns where the rate of wages and hours of labour were less than in Liverpool, and it was thought that the word "completed" would bind the contractor to some extent to prepare all his work in this city.

(4) The Corporation have experienced no difficulty with regard to the interpretation of the clause relating to the rate of wages and hours of labour in their contracts.

(5) Contractors have in some instances tried to evade this clause, and one illustration of this is given in the answer to (3) with regard to the preparation of the work in other towns.

(6) No special steps are taken to ensure that the contractor complies with the condition in question, and no inspectors are employed, but in the case of building contracts the Corporation have their own clerk of works who superintends the work, and in the case of clothing they have an examiner of clothing. If any complaint is made either by the workpeople or otherwise, it is specially investigated.

(7) In the event of dispute arising the Corporation would have to obtain evidence as to the proper rate of wages and hours of labour in force at the time, and if it is thought that the contractor is evading the same he is at once communicated with, and if he is unable to furnish a satisfactory answer he is struck off the "List of Corporation Contractors" above mentioned.

(8) As far as can be ascertained, only one case has arisen in recent years presenting any difficulty, and this has been with regard to the construction of staircases in alterations to certain premises belonging to the Corporation. The contractor obtained these staircases from a firm who did not pay the standard rate of wages, and on his attention being called to the matter, he stopped any further orders, and had the remainder of the staircases worked on the job by his own men. There was no further difficulty with the contractor.

* One clause only is printed below (Enclosure C).

I enclose a copy of the standing orders of the Council relating to this matter.

I trust that this information will be of use to you, and should you require anything further I shall be pleased to furnish it.

I am, Sir,
Your obedient Servant,
EDWARD R. PICKMERE,
Town Clerk.

J. J. Wills, Esq.,
Board of Trade,
7, Whitehall Gardens,
London, S.W.

A.—FORM OF APPLICATION TO BE PLACED ON THE LIST OF CONTRACTORS.

CITY OF LIVERPOOL.

TENDERS FOR THE SUPPLY OF MATERIALS AND FOR THE EXECUTION OF WORKS.

.....hereby apply to be placed upon the list of contractors for

[NOTE.—In specifying the Articles, &c., in respect of which you may desire to be placed upon the List of Contractors, insert the number and description thereof as shown on list supplied, and use separate form for each item.]

Insert "I" or "We" where required.

† Insert "My" or "Our."

* Insert "Me" or "Us."

If any tender which.....may submit shall be accepted by the Corporation,.....undertake to execute the work, or supply the materials required in accordance with a contract to be prepared by the Town Clerk, and to give such security for the due performance of the contract as the Corporation may require, and.....hereby declare that.....firm pays the rate of wages and observes the hours of labour recognised or agreed upon between the Trades Unions and the employers in the locality in which† ..... firm carries on business, and.....do hereby undertake in carrying out any contract between*..... and the Corporation to pay the rate of wages and observe the hours of labour recognised or agreed upon between the Trades Unions and the employers in the locality in which the work for carrying out the contract is to be completed, and that.....will not transfer, assign or underlet, directly or indirectly, the contract or any part, share, or interest therein without the written consent of the Corporation under the hand of the Town Clerk, and that in case such consent is given.....shall be held responsible for all work done by any such Sub-Contractor, and for its being carried out under the same conditions as if executed by*... ..... and that.....agree to a condition being inserted in the contract to carry out this undertaking.

Dated this.....day of.....19 .

Name.....
Address.....
.....

C.—COPY OF CLAUSE INSERTED IN ALL CONTRACTS FOR WORK REQUIRED TO BE EXECUTED FOR THE LIVERPOOL CORPORATION.

3.—That the contractor in carrying out this contract shall pay the rate of wages and observe the hours of labour recognised or agreed upon between the Trades Unions and the employers in the locality in which the work for carrying out the contract is to be completed and that the contractor shall not transfer assign or underlet directly or indirectly this contract or any part share or interest therein without the written consent of the Corporation under the hand of the Town Clerk and that in case such consent is given the Contractor shall be responsible for all work done by any such sub-contractor and for its being carried out under the same conditions as if executed by the contractor.

D.—COPY OF ORIGINAL CLAUSE INSERTED IN ALL CONTRACTS OR WORK REQUIRED TO BE EXECUTED FOR THE LIVERPOOL CORPORATION SINCE NOVEMBER, 1891, AND SHOWING SUBSEQUENT ALTERATIONS.

(a) Struck out November, 1900.

(b) Altered November, 1904.

(c) to (c) Struck out November, 1900.

(d) Struck out November, 1896.

That the contractor shall pay the rate of wages and observe the hours of labour recognised and agreed upon between the Trades Unions and the employers [(a) respectively] in the locality in which the work for carrying out the contract is to be [(b) completed]; [(c) or such rate of wages and hours of labour as are equivalent [(d) or approximate thereto (c)]; and that the contractor will not transfer assign or underle† directly or indirectly this contract or any part share or interest therein without the written consent of the Corporation under the hand of the Town Clerk.

(v) SHEFFIELD.

Town Clerk's Office,
Town Hall,
Sheffield,
7th April, 1908.

SIR,

With reference to your letter of the 30th ult., enclosing copy of the terms of reference of the Committee appointed by the Treasury to consider the working of the Fair Wages resolution of the House of Commons (copy of which you also enclosed) as embodied in Government contracts, and inquiring as to the working of the Fair Wages Clause in this city, I beg to send you, enclosed herewith, print of a Standing Order adopted by the City Council on the 10th April, 1907, which came into operation on the 1st August, 1907, and amended on the 11th September following, and in answer to the points raised in your letter of the 30th ult. I have to state as follows:—

(1) The conditions in regard to rates of wages, hours of labour, etc., at present inserted in tender forms or contracts for work to be executed for the Sheffield City Council are set out in such copy of Standing Order enclosed.

(2) The date when such conditions were first inserted in the tender forms and contracts was shortly after the Standing Order came into operation.

(3) No changes have been made in the form of words employed.

(4) Up to the present no difficulties have been met with in regard to the interpretation of such clauses in contracts with the Council.

(5) No instance of any method of evasion by contractors has been brought to the knowledge of the Council, but in this connection the answer to paragraph (7) should be borne in mind.

(6) As to the steps taken to ensure that the contractor does, in fact, comply with the conditions, it will be observed from the Standing Order that the Council are empowered to examine the books and wages sheets of the contractor. This has been done in one or two instances, but I believe it is correct to say that it was only so done in consequence of representations made by or on behalf of Trades Unions of the employees.

(7) The method adopted in the event of dispute arising with a view of ascertaining what are the proper rates of wages, hours of labour, etc., to be paid and observed in the carrying out of the contract has been as follows: The representatives of the Trades Unions and of the contractors have appeared, by invitation, before a Committee or Sub-Committee of the Council, when opportunity has been afforded to both sides of stating their case.

(8) Only one or two cases have arisen since the Standing Order has been operative—it will be remembered it has been only recently adopted—and these were, I believe, in the engineering trade.

For the information of your Committee, I beg to enclose (A) print of the Clauses as to Fair Wages and Conditions of Labour, etc., drawn on the lines of the Standing Order and as inserted in the formal contracts,* and (B) a copy of the clause on the same point which was inserted in Corporation contracts prior to the adoption of the Standing Order referred to, in order that you may see the difference between the two sets of clauses, and to explain that the Council were of opinion that the old Clause (B) was not sufficiently drastic to deal with the question of fair wages and conditions of labour, and consequently they adopted the fresh clauses provided for in the Standing Order.

I am, Sir,
Your obedient Servant,
R. M. Prescott,
Town Clerk.

J. J. Wills, Esq.,
Secretary,
Treasury Committee re Fair Wages, etc.,
Board of Trade,
7, Whitehall Gardens,
London, S.W.

CITY OF SHEFFIELD.

STANDING ORDER WITH REGARD TO PAYMENT OF STANDARD RATES OF WAGES AND OBSERVANCE OF PROPER HOURS AND CONDITIONS OF LABOUR.

(Made by the City Council on the 10*th day of April*, 1907; to come into operation on the 1*st day of August*, 1907; Amended 11*th September*, 1907.)

1. (1) There shall be kept at the Town Clerk's office a list of the rates of wages and the hours of labour and conditions of employment to be paid and observed by the Council in works which are in the nature of construction or manufacture, and which the Council may resolve to carry out without the intervention of a contractor on a site within the City.

(a) The list shall, in the first instance, be settled by the Council upon the recommendation of the Special Committee appointed by the Council on the 23rd day of October, 1906, and shall be based on the rates of wages, hours of labour, and conditions of employment jointly recognised by Trade Unions and employers, and in operation in Sheffield for and in respect of such work.

(b) The list shall be revised from time to time by the Council upon the recommendation of the Finance Committee, so as to keep it at all times as far as possible in accordance with the rates of wages, hours of labour, and conditions of employment for the time being jointly recognised by Trades Unions and employers, and in operation in Sheffield for and in respect of such work.

(c) Where in any trade there are no recognised standard rates of wages, hours of labour, and conditions of employment the Council shall settle the list of the rates of wages, hours of labour, and conditions of employment for such trade, and shall from time to time revise the same as may be necessary.

(d) Before the original or any revised list shall come into operation notice thereof shall be advertised in two local newspapers with an intimation that copies of the list may be obtained on application at the Town Clerk's office, and that the Committee concerned will be prepared within a calendar month from the date of such advertisement to consider any objections thereto which may be made to them by associations of employers or workmen.

(e) The list shall at all times be open to a public inspection.

(2) Whenever the Council shall resolve to carry out any such works as aforesaid on a site outside the City a similar list shall be settled in the manner prescribed with respect to the above-mentioned list, by the Committee in charge of the works, and shall be based on the rates of wages, hours of labour, and conditions of employment jointly recognised by Trades Unions and employers and in operation in the district in which such works shall be carried out for and in respect of such works. Where in any trade there are no recognised standard rates of wages, hours of labour and conditions of employment the list settled by the Council shall apply as mentioned in paragraph (1) (a).

2. In inviting tenders for works in the nature of construction or manufacture to be executed for and on behalf of the Council, the instructions for tender or other form of application issued by the Council shall state that in the case of all workmen to be employed by the contractor he will be required to pay wages at rates not less, to observe hours of labour not greater, and conditions of employment not less favourable to his workmen, than the rates, hours, and conditions set out in the Council's list if the work is to be executed within the city, or than the rates, hours, and conditions jointly recognised by Trades Unions and employers and in operation in the district where the work is to be executed when such work is to be executed outside the city, or, in case of work to be executed outside the city in a trade where there are no recognised standard rates of wages, hours of labour and conditions of employment than the rates, hours, and conditions set out in the Council's list as mentioned in paragraph (1) (a), the advertisements inviting tenders for such works shall state that the contractor will be required to comply with the Council's form of clause respecting wages, hours and conditions of labour, and prohibition against sub-letting, a copy of which will be sent by the Town Clerk upon application.

---

* Enclosure A is not printed below.

3. The contractor shall be required, in addition to the above, to insert in a schedule to be added to the contract the names of the various classes of labour which he intends to employ, together with the places where such labour will be employed, and the rates of wages, hours of labour, and conditions of employment to be paid and observed in respect to each class of labour, and no tender shall be accepted unless the rates of wages, hours of labour, and conditions of employment inserted in such schedule are in accordance with the provisions of Clause 2 of this Standing Order with respect to rates of wages, hours of labour, and conditions of employment, and such schedule shall be added to and shall form part of the contract. Provided nevertheless that the contractor may alter or vary the place or places where such labour will be employed by giving the Council not less than seven days' previous notice in writing to that effect. The said contract shall provide that for every breach as regards the rates of wages the contractor shall on demand pay to the Council as liquidated damages, and not as a penalty, the sum of £5; and for every breach as regards the hours of labour shall on demand pay to the Council as liquidated damages, and not as a penalty, for each day on which such breach shall have been committed, and for each workman in respect of whom it shall have been committed, a sum at the rate of 5s. per hour for every hour or fraction of an hour during which such workman shall have been so employed beyond the maximum number of hours in the said schedule provided.

4. In all contracts for the supply of raw material or manufactured articles or for the supply of stores to be used in maintenance, a clause shall be inserted that with respect to all materials, articles, or stores produced, manufactured, or supplied by the contractor, the contractor will in the production or manufacture or supply thereof (as the case may be) pay to his workmen wages at rates not less, and observe hours of labour not greater, and conditions of employment not less favourable to his workmen, than the rates, hours and conditions recognised jointly by the Trades Unions and employers of the district where the work is carried on, and that the contractor shall for every such breach as regards the rates of wages on demand pay to the Council as liquidated damages, and not as a penalty, the sum of £5, and shall for every such breach as regards the hours of labour on demand pay to the Council as liquidated damages, and not as a penalty, for each day on which such breach shall have been committed and for each workman in respect to whom it shall have been committed a sum at the rate of 5s. per hour for every hour or fraction of an hour during which such workman shall have been employed by the contractor beyond the maximum number of hours during which under the terms of this clause he ought to have been employed.

5. In all contracts for works of any description a clause shall be inserted that the contractor shall not without the written consent of the Council under the hand of their Town Clerk (which consent may be given subject to such conditions, if any, as the Council may think fit to impose, but shall not be arbitrarily or unreasonably withheld) assign or underlet the contract or any part thereof or make any sub-contract for the execution or performance of the works or any part thereof, and for each and every breach by the contractor of this clause the contractor shall, notwithstanding the condonation of any prior or other breach, pay to the Council on demand as liquidated damages, and not as a penalty, the sum of £250.

6. Every contract for works of any description shall provide that if any workman or workmen in the employment of the contractor be not paid the rate of wages as in the contract or schedule thereto is provided, the Council may pay to any workman or workmen who may have been underpaid the difference between the amount of wages which he or they may have been paid by the contractor and the amount which he or they would have been paid if the stipulation as to wages had been observed, and may deduct from any moneys due or to become due to or seek to recover from the contractor under the contract the amount of the said difference so paid to such workman or workmen.

7. In addition to any other liability which any contractor may be under for breach of contract, arising out of the requirements of this Standing Order, the contractor committing such breach, or any contractor who does not carry out and observe the conditions of this Standing Order with reference to all other work which he may be executing and carrying out in Sheffield or within a radius of ten miles from the Town Hall, shall not be allowed to tender for any work of construction or manufacture or supply to be executed for the Council until such contractor shall have satisfied the Council that he will in future comply with the provisions of this Standing Order.

8. In all contracts for works of any description a clause shall be inserted that the contractor shall to the satisfaction of the Council provide and keep a proper wages book or wages books or sheets in which shall be correctly and properly entered from time to time the names of, and wages paid to, and the hours of labour observed by all workmen employed in respect of the said contract and shall from time to time when requested by notice in writing under the hand of the Town Clerk produce the same or any of them to the Town Clerk or to anyone nominated by the Council in such notice in writing who shall be at liberty to inspect and take copies of or extracts therefrom, and in all such contracts provision shall be made that for each and every breach of this clause by the contractor in failing to provide and keep such proper book or books or sheets as aforesaid, the contractor shall on demand pay to the Council as liquidated damages, and not as a penalty, the sum of £20, and for each and every breach of this clause in failing to produce such book or books or sheets for inspection and taking copies thereof or extracts therefrom as aforesaid, the Contractor shall on demand pay to the Council as liquidated damages, and not as a penalty, the sum of £20.

9. In all contracts for works of any description a clause shall be inserted that in case of any breach by the contractor of any one or more of the stipulations aforesaid it shall be lawful for the Council (and instead of claiming payment to them by the contractor of the liquidated damages, if any, payable by the contractor as aforesaid in respect of such breach) to determine the contract in the same manner and to the same extent as the Council have power to determine the same under the clause in that behalf contained in the contract in the events therein mentioned, and that if the contract shall be determined under this present power, then all the provisions of that clause shall apply as if the contract had been determined under that clause.

B.—FAIR WAGES CLAUSE AS INSERTED IN SHEFFIELD CORPORATION CONTRACTS PRIOR TO ADOPTION OF STANDING ORDER OF AUGUST, 1907.

The contractor shall pay to all workmen employed by him not less than the minimum standard rate of wages recognised by trade societies in the district where such men are employed, and shall observe the recognised hours and proper conditions of labour, and if there shall be no such standard rate of wages or recognised hours and proper conditions of labour in such district, he shall pay to such workmen not less than the minimum standard rate of wages recognised by trade societies in Sheffield, and observe the recognised hours and proper conditions of labour prevailing there in respect of the particular trade in which such men are employed. In the event of any breach of this clause, in reference to the rate of wages so paid, the contractor shall pay to the Corporation as and for liquidated and ascertained damages, a sum of money equal to three times the amount by which the actual rate of wages paid by him for any particular class of work is below the said minimum standard rate of wages for such work. In the event of any other breach of this clause, the contractor shall pay to the Corporation the sum of £50 as and for liquidated and ascertained damages. The several conditions shall apply to every sub-contractor to whom the work contracted for, or any part thereof, may, under and subject to the terms in that behalf, of Clause 2* hereof, be let by the contractor.

(vi) WEST HAM.

Town Hall,
West Ham, E.
30th May, 1908.

SIR,

I am directed by the Council to advert to your letter of the 30th March last with reference to the insertion of Fair Wages Clauses in contracts entered into by the Council, and to furnish you with the following information on the matters set out in your communication:—

(1) The following clause relating to rates of wages and hours of labour is inserted in tender forms and contracts relating to the supply of goods to the Council:—

> "(8) Contractors tendering for any contract with the Council will be required to pay to the whole of their workmen such rate of wages and observe such hours of labour as are recognised by the workmen's Trades Unions, and in force at the time of signing the contract. In the event of any breach of his agreement the contractor shall forfeit to the Council the sum of £50, which shall be deemed liquidated and ascertained damages, and may be recovered by action, or deducted by the Council from any sum or sums due or to become due to the said contractor under the contract, or otherwise howsoever."

In all tender forms and contracts relating to constructive works, the conditions inserted relating to rates of wages, etc., are those set out in the form attached hereto and marked A.

In addition to these clauses the following is inserted in all tender forms and contracts with the Council:—

> (9) "The contractor shall not assign his contract or any part thereof to any other person, nor shall he underlet to or make a sub-contract with any other person or persons for the execution of any part of the work appertaining to the contract, without the consent in writing of the Council, but shall employ his own workmen thereon, who are to be paid by him in wages by the day; and in case the contractor assigns or makes over this contract, or without the consent of the Council underlets, or makes a sub-contract contrary to this agreement, he shall forfeit to the Council the sum of £ † which shall be deemed liquidated and ascertained damages, and may be recovered by action or deducted by the Council from any sum or sums due or to become due to the said contractor under this contract, or otherwise howsoever; and should the contractor or his agent give any gratuity to any officer of the Council, the Council shall be at liberty to determine his contract."

The contractor's special attention is called to Clauses (8) and (9), as they will be strictly enforced.

2. Date when conditions of this kind were first inserted in the contracts:—

The "Fair Wage" or "Labour Clause" was first introduced into the Council's contracts after the 24th February, 1891, when the Council adopted the following resolution:—

> That any person or firms tendering for a contract with the Council shall be required to make a declaration that they will pay such rate of wages and observe such hours of labour as are recognised and determined by the London Trades Council, and in the event of any charges being established against such person or firms of paying less than the minimum rate of standard wages in each branch of the trade or undertaking, their contract shall not be accepted, and that it be referred to the officers to bring up to the Council in Committee clauses embodying the above to be inserted in all future contracts.

Following upon this resolution the undermentioned clause was inserted in all tender forms and specifications:—

> * * * and hereby declare that . . . will pay such rate of wages and observe such hours of labour as are recognised and determined by the London Trades Council.

3. Any changes which have been made in the form of words employed and the reasons for such changes—

The resolution passed on the 24th February, 1891, remained in force until the 12th January, 1892, when the following was substituted:—

> That any person or firm tendering for a contract with the Council shall be required to make a declaration that they will, in the event of their tender being accepted and a contract entered into, pay to the whole of their workmen employed in the borough such rate of wages and observe such hours of labour as are recognised by the workmen's Trades Unions and in force at the time of signing the contract, and that in the event of a breach of such declaration the Council do enforce against the contractor the penalty clause in its entirety.

---

* The clause prohibited sub-letting, except with consent of Council.

† This amount varies according to the value of the contract.

The reasons for the alteration of the "Labour Clause" from time to time are not set out in the Council's minutes, and I do not think that I ought to quote from the reports in the local press the arguments used by members of the Council when the various alterations were under consideration, but it may safely be said that the resolution set out above was passed to get rid of a difficulty raised by the resolution of the 24th February, 1891, which referred to rates of wages, etc., recognised and determined by the London Trades Council, such rates not being applicable to work executed in the Provinces. After a very short time it was found that the resolution of the 12th January, 1892, was almost inoperative as it applied only to workmen employed in the borough, and on the 26th April, 1892, it was amended by deleting therefrom the words "employed in the Borough."

The following clause was inserted in tender forms and contracts after the last mentioned date until about June, 1898:—

> Contractors tendering will be required to pay to the whole of their workmen such rate of wages and observe such hours of labour as are recognised by the workmen's Trade Unions and in force at the time of signing the contract. In the event of any breach of this agreement the contractor shall forfeit to the Council the sum of £ * which shall be deemed liquidated and ascertained damages, and may be recovered by action or deducted by the Council from any sum or sums due, or to become due, to the said contractor under the contract or otherwise howsoever.

In the meantime several complaints had been received of alleged breach of the "Labour Clauses," and on investigation it was found that there was considerable doubt as to what was the recognised Trade Union rate of wages for some particular class of workmen, and to get rid of this difficulty the Council on the 26th October, 1897, adopted the following resolution:—

> That it be referred to the various committees having the control of labour to draw up for the consideration of the Council a schedule of the rate of wages to be paid to, and the hours of labour to be observed by, all classes of workmen employed by the Council or engaged on work executed for them.

The matter was duly considered by the various committees, and when their reports were submitted to the Council the resolution adopted on the 26th April, 1892, was rescinded on the 26th April, 1898, and resolutions to the following effect were then agreed to:—

> (a) That the rates of wages as revised by the Council in committee be adopted as a schedule for insertion in all contracts entered into by the Council involving the employment of these particular classes of workmen, and that a clause be framed making the contractor responsible for paying such rates to all men engaged under the contract either by himself or any sub-contractor.
>
> (b) That the agreed rates and hours for the London building trade be adopted as a schedule in all building contracts, and that a clause be inserted requiring contractors to pay all men engaged on work under their contract, and to see that all men employed by any sub-contractor thereon shall be paid such rates and shall observe the agreed hours.
>
> (c) That the present "Labour Clause" be rescinded and a clause framed on the lines of that now in force in the contracts of the London County Council prescribing the rates recommended by the Council in Committee as a schedule to be paid on all work performed for the Council within 20 miles of Charing Cross, and that beyond that radius contractors be required, as in the case in London, to specify in their tenders the rates proposed to be paid by them.

In accordance with these resolutions a schedule of wages and hours of labour similar to Form B attached hereto was prepared and inserted in all tenders and contracts for constructive works after June, 1898, together with Clauses 1 and 2 set out in Form A attached

Clause 4 in Form A was inserted in tenders and contracts for constructive works following the adoption of a resolution to that effect by the Council on the 10th January, 1899.

With a view to securing the observance of the Labour Clauses the Council on the 12th January, 1897, adopted a resolution requiring contractors to exhibit a copy of the schedule of rates of wages, etc., in order that the workmen themselves might ascertain whether they were receiving the proper rate of wages, and thereafter Clause 3 (Display of Notice) in Form A attached became part of the tender form and contract for constructive works.

The Council in February, 1899, established a 48-hour week for the whole of their workmen, and at the same time revised the rates of wages, with the result that in some cases the men received more than the agreed Trade Union rates. This condition of affairs remained in force until September, 1903. On 9th December, 1902, the Council passed a resolution "that the whole question of Trade Union rates, hours and conditions, in its broadest aspect, be referred to the Finance Committee for investigation and report." The matter was duly considered by the Committee, and on 22nd September, 1903, the Council adopted their report as follows:—

> (a) That it be an instruction to the various committees responsible for the employment of labour to pay all workmen employed under their direction the Trade Union rate of wages as agreed between the accredited representatives of the Trades Unions and the employers in all cases in which such an agreed rate exists, and to cause such workmen to observe the hours of labour similarly agreed between the representatives of the Unions and employers.
>
> (b) That in all cases in which no rate of wages or hours of labour have been agreed between the Trades Unions and the employers it be an instruction to the committee employing labour to bring up forthwith recommendations defining rates of pay and hours of labour for all classes of workmen.
>
> (c) That a provision be inserted in all future contracts or agreements (including those relating to the casual supply of horses and carts) requiring contractors to pay the aforesaid agreed Trade Union rates and to observe the aforesaid hours, and where such Trade Union rates and hours do not apply contractors be required to pay the rates and observe the hours fixed by the Council on the recommendation of the respective committees, in so far as they may be applicable to the work to be performed under the contract, and that the schedules attached to contracts for constructive works be modified accordingly.

The effect of the adoption of the above resolutions was that the Schedule B attached was revised to practically its present form, and inserted in all contracts since September, 1903. Some slight alterations were made in this schedule in April, 1906, prior to which the last alteration in Trade Union conditions in the building trades was agreed upon.

4. The nature of any difficulties which may have been met with in regard to the interpretation of such clauses in contracts.

These are dealt with in the answer to Question No. 3 above.

5. Methods, if any, by which contractors have sought to evade the clauses.

I do not think there has been any deliberate attempt to evade the clauses. The breaches of the clauses have been largely due to misunderstandings as to the Trade Union rates in force and have, in most instances, been rectified on the mistake being pointed out to the contractors.

---

* This amount varied according to the value of the contract.

6. The steps taken to ensure that the contractor does in fact comply with the conditions in question.

With this object in view the Council adopted the clause (Display of Notice, No. 3 in Form A attached) referred to in page 7 of this communication, and they also adopted the following resolution on the 12 July, 1904, with regard to printing work:—

"That in order that full effect be given to the spirit of the Council's Trade Union resolutions, it be resolved that the printing contract be given only to a firm or firms included in the list of fair houses, as published by the London Society of Compositors, and that it be an instruction to the Council's officials that orders for printing outside the regular contract be given only to houses appearing in the same list."

Beyond the above, however, no action has been taken except upon complaint received from the workpeople, or from Trade Unions, or other societies.

On the 26th February, 1907, the Council had this subject under consideration and they adopted the following resolution:—

"That it be a direction of the Council that the officers report to the various committees, from time to time, on any breach of the labour clauses that is brought to their notice."

In the case of the contract for the supply of tramway uniforms an inspection of the contractor's books has been made on several occasions to see that the rates of wages specified in the schedule are in fact paid to the workpeople engaged.

7. The method adopted in the event of dispute arising or complaint being made, to ascertain what are the proper rates of wages, hours of labour, etc., to be paid and observed in the execution of the contract.

In the event of any complaint being received it has always been the custom to communicate with the contractor concerned, and in nearly every case where there was any foundation for the complaint the mistake, as pointed out in the answer to Question No. 5, has been immediately rectified by the contractor.

The adoption of the schedule of rates of wages and hours of labour (Form B attached) has, it is believed, minimised to a large extent the possibility of any misunderstanding as to the rates to be paid to any particular class of workmen.

In the case of a dispute as to the proper rate, information has been sought both from Trade Union officials and from the Employers' Associations.

In no single instance have legal proceedings been necessary.

8. Some indication of the proportion of cases in which difficulty arises, and the trades most affected.

The number of cases in which difficulty has arisen is not readily obtainable, but having regard to the large number of contracts entered into the proportion of bonâ fide complaints has been comparatively very small. The contracts most affected were those relating to the building and engineering trades, and the main point of dispute has been as to the proper rate of pay prevailing in certain districts for specified classes of workmen.

I am, Sir,
Your obedient Servant,
FREDERICK E. HILLEARY.

J. J. Wills, Esq.,
Board of Trade,
7, Whitehall Gardens, S.W.

Enclosure A.

COUNTY BOROUGH OF WEST HAM.

FAIR WAGES CLAUSES INSERTED IN CONTRACTS FOR CONSTRUCTIVE WORKS.

Rates of Wages.

1. The contractor shall pay all workmen (except a reasonable number of legally-bound apprentices) employed by him in and about the execution of this contract or any part thereof wages, and wages for overtime respectively, at rates not less than the rates stated or provided for in the schedule attached to and being portions of the form of tender, and for each and every breach by the contractor of this stipulation, and notwithstanding the condonation of any prior or other breach, the contractor shall, on demand, pay to the Council as liquidated damages, and not as a penalty, the sum of £5.

Hours of Labour.

2. The contractor shall observe, and cause to be observed by such workmen, hours of labour not greater than the hours of labour stated or provided for in the said schedule, and for each and every breach by the contractor of this stipulation, and notwithstanding the condonation of any prior or other breach, the contractor shall, on demand, pay to the Council as liquidated damages, and not as a penalty, for each day or week, as the case may be, in which any such breach shall be committed, and for each workman in respect of whom it shall be committed, the sum of 5s. per hour for every hour during which in each day or week, as the case may be, each such workman shall be employed by the contractor beyond the maximum number of hours stated or provided for in the said schedule, provided that this stipulation shall not be construed to prohibit overtime if such overtime be in accordance with the rules of the Trade Unions concerned.

Display of Notice.

3. The contractor shall at all times during the continuance of this contract display and keep displayed upon the site of the works, and in every factory, workshop, or place occupied or used by the contractor, in or about the execution of this contract, in a position in which the same may be easily read by all workmen employed by the contractor in or about the execution of this contract a clearly printed or written copy of the said schedule hereto, and for each and every breach by the contractor of this stipulation, and notwithstanding the condonation of any prior or other breach, the contractor shall, on demand, pay to the Council as liquidated damages, and not as a penalty, for every day during which such breach shall be or continue the sum of £3.

Rates and Hours generally.

4. A tender shall not be accepted unless it is stated by the contractor in the tender, and proved to the satisfaction of the Council, that the contractor at the date of the tender pays to the whole of his workmen such rate of wages, and observes such hours of labour, as are recognised by the workmen's Trades Unions in the several localities where his work is done. If after the contract is signed it shall be proved that the said statements of the contractor in the tender are contrary to fact, the Council shall be entitled to rescind the contract, or, at its option, to recover from the contractor, as liquidated damages, and not as a penalty, the sum of £50.

Town Clerk's Department,
West Ham,
3rd January, 1907.

10th APRIL, 1906. Enclosure B. ALL PREVIOUS LISTS CANCELLED.

COUNTY BOROUGH OF WEST HAM.

SCHEDULE OF RATES OF WAGES AND HOURS OF LABOUR.

PART I.

For all work done at the site mentioned in the specification, or within a radius of 20 miles, measured in a straight line from Charing Cross, in the County of London.

TRADES.	Rate of pay per hour.	Hours of labour per week.		Rate of pay for Overtime.
				Week-days (except Saturdays.)			Saturdays.
		Summer.	Winter—Thirteen weeks after Second Monday in November.	Until 8 p.m.	8 p.m. until 10 p.m.	After 10 p.m.	Until 4 p.m.	After 4 p.m., and Sundays and Xmas Day.
BUILDING TRADES—	d.
Carpenters	10½	50	44	Time and a quarter.	Time and a half.	Double time.	Time and a half.	Double time.
Joiners	10½
Bricklayers	10½
Bricklayers (cutting and setting gauged work)	11½
Masons	10½
Masons (fixing)	11¼
Masons (granite work)	11¼
*Smiths, fitters, gasfitters, etc.	9 to 10
Watchmen	4s. 6d. per night 12 hours.	After	12 hours, 6d. per hour.
			First 10 weeks. / Last 3 weeks.
Plumbers	11	47	41½ / 44	—	8 p.m. to 11 p.m. Time and a half.	11 p.m. to 7 a.m. Double time.	1 p.m. to 5 p.m. Time and a half.	5 p.m. to 7 a.m. Monday. Double time.
Plumbers' mates	7
			Winter—12 weeks after second Monday in November.
			3 weeks at beginning and 3 weeks at end. / Six middle weeks.
Plasterers	11	50	47 / 44	Time and a quarter.	Time and a half.	Double time.	Time and a half.	Double time.
Painters and glaziers	8½
Labourers and navvies	7	50	47 / 44	After 7 p.m. until 8 p.m. Time and a half.	Time and a half.	Double time.	Time and a half.	Double time.
Granite sett paviors	10½	56½	50 / 50	Time and a quarter.	Time and a half.	Double time.	1 p.m. to 8 p.m.	8 p.m. to 6 a.m.
Wood block paviors	9
Paviors' labourers	7
Timbermen	8	50	47 / 44	Time and a quarter.	Time and a half.	Double time.	Time and a half.	Double time.
Scaffolders	7½
Slaters	9
Hot-water engineers	9½
Zinc workers	9½
Bell-hangers	9½
Paper-hangers	9
Painters' labourers	6½
French polishers	8
Wheelwrights	9½
Lath-renders	Piecework price as per trade list.
Machinists employed in working—
Trying up machine	10 to 11	50	47 / 44	Time and a quarter.	Time and a half.	Double time.	Time and a half.	Double time.
Vertical spindle	11
Band saw	10 to 11
Tenoning machine	10 to 11
Joiner's saw bench	11
Cross-cut saw	10
Universal moulding machine	11
Small four-cutter machine	11
Rope feed bench machine	10
Rack bench machine	9½
Panel planing machine	8
Hand-feed planing machine	8
Mortising machine	7½ and 8
Scotch derrick drivers	9½	50	47 / 44½	Time and a quarter.	Time and a half.	Double time.	Time and a half.	Double time.
Steam navvy and grab drivers	9
Drivers of steam cranes and travellers	8½
Locomotive drivers	8½
Stationary engine drivers	8
Portable engine drivers	8
Traction engine and steam roller drivers	9

* In shops, General Smiths and Fitters to work Summer hours throughout the year, should the Employer desire it.

TRADES.	Rate of pay per hour.	Hours of Labour.	Rate of pay for Overtime.
ELECTRICAL TRADE—
	d.
Wiremen	$8\frac{1}{2}$ to $9\frac{1}{2}$	54 hours per week.	First two hours—Time and a quarter. Second two hours—Time and a half. After four hours until starting time next day—Double time.
Jointers	9
Labourers	$6\frac{1}{2}$
Armature winders	8
Armature winder helpers or labourers	$6\frac{1}{2}$
Transformer winders	8
Magnet winders	7
ENGINEERING TRADE—
Brass finishers, Coppersmiths, Turners, Fitters and erectors, Millwrights, Smiths	$8\frac{3}{4}$ to $9\frac{1}{4}$	54 hours per week.	First two hours—Time and a quarter. After first two hours until 6 a.m.—Time and a half. Sunday work—Double time. Night shifts—Time and a half.
Pattern makers	$9\frac{1}{4}$
Borers	$8\frac{3}{4}$ to $9\frac{1}{4}$
Slotters and planers	$8\frac{3}{4}$ to $9\frac{1}{4}$
Hammermen	7
Labourers (employed in engineering trade)	6
	per day,
Drillers	5s.
	per hour,
Barge builders	9d.	54 hours per week.	$10\frac{1}{2}$d. per hour.
Watermen and lightermen	6, 7 or 8 a.m., until 6, 7 or 8 p.m., 6s. per day.	12 hours per day.	After 12 hours' work up to 9 p.m.—1s. per hour.
	8 to mid-night,
Watermen and lightermen	4s. per night.	4 hours.
	8 p.m. to 6 a.m.,
Watermen and lightermen	6s.	10 hours.
	Sunday up to 10 a.m.,
Watermen and lightermen	4s.
	after 12 noon,
Watermen and lightermen	6s.
	whole day,
Watermen and lightermen	8s.
	per hour,
Stablemen	6d.
ASPHALTE PAVING—
	per day,
Spreaders	6s. to 6s. 6d.
Potmen and labourers	5s.
CARMEN—
	per week.
One horse	30s.	60 hours per week.
Two horses	32s.

Part I. of this Schedule is believed to include all the trades which the Contractor may require to employ in or about the execution of this Contract at the site mentioned in the Specification, or within the radius aforesaid. If, however, he should employ at the site aforesaid, or within the radius aforesaid, any workman or workmen in any trade not so included, the rate of wages (and rate of wages for overtime) to be paid to such workman or workmen are not to be less, and his or their hours of labour are not to be more, than the rate of wages (and rate of wages for overtime) and hours of labour respectively, which at the date of the Contractor's tender were recognised and in practice obtained by the Trades Unions of the London district.

PART II.

For all work done outside a radius of 20 miles, measured in a straight line from Charing Cross, in the County of London, namely, at where all work not done within the radius aforesaid, is intended to be done.

Trades.	Rate of pay per hour.	Hours of labour per week.			Rate of pay for Overtime.
		Summer, 40 weeks.	Winter—12 weeks after second Monday in November.		Week-days (except Saturdays).			Saturdays.
			3 weeks at beginning and 3 weeks at end.	Six middle weeks.	Until 8 p.m.	8 p.m. until 10 p.m.	After 10 p.m.	Until 4 p.m.	After 4 p.m. and Sundays and Xmas Day.
Building Trades—
Carpenters
Joiners
Bricklayers
Bricklayers (cutting and setting gauged work)
Masons
Masons (fixing)
Masons (granite work)
Smiths, fitters, gas fitters, &c.
Watchmen
Plumbers
Plumbers' mates
Plasterers
Painters and glaziers
Labourers and navvies
Granite sett paviors
Wood block paviors
Paviors' labourers
Timbermen
Scaffolders
Slaters
Hot-water engineers
Zinc workers
Bell-hangers
Paper-hangers
Painters' labourers
French polishers
Wheelwrights
Lath-renders
Machinists employed in working—
Trying up machine
Vertical spindle
Band saw
Tenoning machine
Joiner's saw bench
Cross-cut saw
Universal moulding machine
Small four cutter machine
Rope feed bench machine
Rack bench machine
Panel planing machine
Hand-feed planing machine
Mortising machine
Scotch derrick drivers
Steam navvy and grab drivers
Drivers of steam cranes and travellers
Locomotive drivers
Stationary engine drivers
Portable engine drivers
Traction engine and steam roller drivers

Trades.	Rate of pay per hour.	Hours of labour.	Rate of pay for Overtime.
Electrical Trade—
Wiremen
Jointers
Labourers
Armature winders
Armature winder helpers or labourers
Transformer winders
Magnet winders
Engineering Trade—
Brass finishers
Coppersmiths
Turners
Fitters and erectors
Millwrights
Smiths
Pattern makers
Borers
Slotters and planers
Hammermen
Labourers (employed in engineering trade)
Drillers
Barge builders
Watermen and lightermen
Watermen and lightermen
Watermen and lightermen
Watermen and lightermen
Watermen and lightermen
Watermen and lightermen
Stablemen
Asphalte Paving—
Spreaders
Potmen and labourers
Carmen—
One horse
Two horses

Part II. of this Schedule is believed to include all the trades which the Contractor may require to employ in or about the execution of this Contract outside the radius aforesaid. If, however, he should employ outside the radius aforesaid any workman or workmen in any trade not so included, the rate of wages (and rate of wages for overtime) to be paid to such workman or workmen are not to be less, and his or their hours of labour are not to be more than the rate of wages (and the rate of wages for overtime) and hours of labour respectively, which at the date of the Contractor's tender were recognised and in practice obtained by the Trade Unions of the district in which the work is done.

N.B.—The attention of the Contractor is particularly called to the fact that, should any work be intended to be executed outside the 20-mile radius, Part II. of the Schedule must be filled up, as to rates of wages, hours of labour, and rate of pay for overtime. Should the whole of the work be intended to be executed within the 20-mile radius, then the same to be stated in writing on Part II. of the Schedule.

APPENDIX VII.

FAIR WAGES CLAUSES IN CONTRACTS ENTERED INTO BY LOCAL AUTHORITIES (1905).

[NOTE.—Full particulars of the clauses specifying conditions as to wages, etc., inserted by the various Local Authorities of the United Kingdom in their Contracts are given in H.C. 307 of 1905. A summary of the chief types of such clauses, based on the Return referred to, is given below. No account has been taken of any changes which may have been made since the issue of the Return. Information with regard to the present practice of the London County Council will be found in the evidence of the Clerk to the Council (published in the Minutes of Evidence), and recent information respecting the contracts of certain other Councils is given in Appendix VI. of the present volume.]

The London County Council insert in their contracts clauses providing that the contractor shall pay the workmen employed on the contract not less than the rates of wages (and overtime rates) set out in a schedule drawn up by the Council and included in the contract. Another schedule shows the maximum hours of labour, and overtime beyond such hours is only permitted "in accordance with the rules of the Trade Unions concerned." The schedule of hours is to be posted up at all works where men are employed on the contract. The schedules are believed to include all the trades required, but in case of a contractor employing workmen in a trade not included in the list he is to pay them the rates (ordinary and overtime) and observe the hours "recognised by Associations of employers and Trade Unions, and in practice obtained in London" or "in the district in which the work is carried out."

Wages books are to be produced when called for, and, if workmen are found to have been paid less than the rates provided for, the difference in wages is to be paid by the Council and deducted from the sums due to the contractor.

Subletting is forbidden without the consent of the Council. When it is permitted the sub-contract must be with an approved firm. The contractor is responsible for the acts of the latter; the sub-contractor must covenant to observe the scheduled rates of wages and hours of labour on work done within 20 miles of Charing Cross, and on other work such wages and hours as are recognised by employers' associations and Trade Unions, and in practice obtained in the district where the work is carried out.

The scheduled rates of wages and hours of labour are paid and observed by the Council on works carried out by themselves within a radius of 20 miles of Charing Cross.

Schedules of wages and hours are also included in their contracts by the West Ham, Edmonton, Camberwell, Lewisham and Woolwich Councils.

Agreed rates.—A common form of clause is one providing that the contractor shall pay not less than the local standard rates of wages of the district where the work is carried out, as settled between the Trade Unions and the employers, or the employers' associations. This form is adopted at, for example, Barrow, Newcastle-on-Tyne, Sunderland, Blackburn, Preston, Liverpool, Birkenhead, Chester, Leicester, Northampton, Southampton, Brighton, Bath, Cardiff and Newport (Mon.). At Barrow and Wolverhampton the words "or such rate of wages and hours as are equivalent or approximate thereto" are added.

In most of the cases where it is provided that such agreed rates shall be paid, it is not stated what rate is to be paid where no such agreement exists.

Provision for this event is, however, made at Northampton, where, when no employers' association and Trade Union exist, the contractor is to observe the hours and rates of wages "generally accepted as fair in the trades of the district where such work is being done." The Islington Borough Council provides in such a case for the payment of such rate of wages as in practice prevails, while the Leicester Corporation have a clause under which the contractor is to observe such rates of wages, hours of labour and conditions of employment as are, for similar work, generally paid or observed in the organised trades in the town or district nearest to the place in which the work is executed.

At Bradford it is provided that, if at any time there is no rate mutually agreed upon, the rate to be paid is to be that last mutually agreed upon by the Masters' Association and the Trade Unions concerned.

A slightly different form of agreed rate clause is in use at Norwich, where the contractor is to pay the standard rates of wages of the district recognised by associations of employers and in practice obtained by the Trade Unions, and is to observe the hours and conditions that are current in the district.

In many cases where the rates of wages agreed upon between employers and Trade Unions are to be paid, it is also provided that the hours of labour agreed upon should be observed (e.g., at Newcastle, Liverpool, Brighton, Northampton). In some cases the hours and conditions of labour recognised by the employers and Trade Unions are to be observed (e.g., at Blackburn, Preston, Leicester, Cardiff and Newport).

It may be mentioned that at Blackburn and Preston it is provided that any question arising as to what are the standard rates, hours and conditions of labour are to be settled between the Trade Unions and employers' associations concerned.

Trade Union rates.—In a fair number of cases the obligation laid on the contractor is to pay the rate of wages recognised by the Trade Union for the district where the work is executed, and there is generally in addition some reference to hours, etc., and sometimes words showing that the Trade Union rate must be one actually paid in practice. Thus Battersea contracts provide for the rate "prescribed by the Trade Union"; Maidstone, the "Trade Union rate in force"; and Cork, the "current rate recognised by the Trade Union."

At Bootle, Stockton and Ipswich the rates and hours recognised by the Trade Union are to be observed; at Stockport the words "as usually paid and observed" are added; and at Fulham and Hackney the rates and hours are to be those recognised by the Trade Unions and "in practice obtained."

Accrington and Hammersmith contracts provide for the wages, hours and conditions recognised by the Trade Unions, while at Portsmouth the contractor "shall declare that he pays not less than the Trade Union rates of wages and observes the hours of labour and conditions recognised and in practice obtained by the Trade Unionists in the borough."

At Swansea the contractor is to pay the Trade Union rate and to conform to the recognised local working rules and customs; and at Macclesfield "pay the Trade Union rate, work the recognised number of hours, and observe the accepted conditions of employment in the district.

In the case of Sheffield Corporation contracts the contractor is to pay the Trade Union rate and observe the recognised hours and proper conditions of labour. If no such standard rate, recognised hours and proper conditions exist in the district, then the contractor is to pay the rate recognised by Trade Unions in Sheffield, and observe the recognised hours and proper conditions prevailing in that city in the trade concerned.

At Derby the workpeople engaged on the contract, whether employed in or outside the borough of Derby, are to be paid the rates recognised by the Trade Unions in Derby and in practice obtained, unless in the case of employment outside Derby there is a rate recognised by the Trade Union (and in practice obtained) in the district where the work is done, in which case such local rate is to be paid. A similar rule applies to hours and conditions of labour.

"Fair Houses."—In some cases it is definitely stated that the fair wage clauses are not only to apply to the workpeople engaged on the contract work, but to all employed by the contractor.

Thus at West Ham and Bethnal Green the person tendering must declare that he pays all his workmen Trade Union rates of wages and observes Trade Union hours.

Belfast and Manchester have standing orders under which contractors tendering for or executing work must be paying all their workpeople the rates of wages, and observing the hours of labour, agreed upon by the organisations of employers and workpeople, and must not prohibit their workpeople from joining Trade Unions; while at Bradford the contractor gives an assurance that, for three months immediately preceding his tender, he has paid all his workmen the rate agreed upon between the employers' association and the Trade Union.

At Glasgow only firms paying the standard rate of wages or piece prices to all competent workers for all classes of work, whether contract or otherwise, may tender, and at Greenock the tenderer is asked to state if he pays the standard rate for his district. At Southport, Aston Manor and Worcester also, the person tendering must declare that he pays the standard rates, and at Greenwich that he observes such rates and hours "as are considered just and fair in the various trades."

Standard rate.—In many cases it is provided that the "standard" rate should be paid, without any definition being given of what is intended by "standard rate."* Instances are Birmingham, Nottingham, Oldham, Bolton, Middlesbrough, Plymouth, Devonport, Dundee, etc. Sometimes it is added that the recognised hours and conditions of labour shall also be observed, e.g., at Burnley, Bury, Wigan, South Shields, Hull, Lincoln.

At Edinburgh and Glasgow the recognised standard rate must be paid, or such wages as are generally accepted as fair in the trade.

Current rates.—Wages generally accepted as current in the trade for competent workmen in the district where the work is executed are to be paid in the case of Gateshead, Walsall, Dudley and Bristol contracts.

Minimum rate.—Bermondsey contractors are to pay the rates agreed upon by the employers' associations and Trade Unions for the district, "unskilled labour in no case being paid less than 6d. per hour." In scavenging contracts at Hull a minimum wage of 21s. per week of 53 hours is specified, provision being made for aged men to be employed in certain cases at reduced rates. At Aberavon the contractor is to pay the standard rate and "the minimum rate of wages for any kind of labour is not to be less than 6d. per hour."

The above summary covers all the types of clause to be found in the Return of 1905, but (save in exceptional cases) the instances quoted are mainly from the larger towns. Most of the smaller boroughs and the great majority of the urban and rural districts, County Councils, and Boards of Guardians have no fair wage clauses in their contracts, as will be seen from the Tables appended, which summarise the whole Return.

* In some cases it is defined as the rate agreed upon between the employers' associations and Trade Unions, and such cases have been dealt with under the head of agreed rates. Doubtless this is what is intended in all cases where the parties are sufficiently well organised for such an agreed rate to exist.

These Tables show that 169 boroughs (county and non-county) in England and Wales specify conditions as to wages in their contracts. Of these, 96 state that the rates are to be those "current," "prevailing," "recognised," etc.; 40 that they are to be those agreed upon between employers and Trade Unions, and 29 those recognised by Trade Unions; while four fix the rates in the contract. The London County Council also fixes the rates to be paid.

In Scotland 23 burghs specify wages conditions, 18 being rates "current," "prevailing," etc., two those recognised by Trade Unions, two those agreed upon between employers and Trade Unions, and one those fixed in the contract.

In Ireland 11 town councils specify conditions as to wages, eight being "current rates," two, rates agreed upon between employers and Trade Unions, and one, rates recognised by Trade Unions.

STATEMENT SHOWING THE WAGES AND OTHER CONDITIONS OF LABOUR IMPOSED IN CONTRACTS BY LOCAL AUTHORITIES IN COUNTIES, BOROUGHS, URBAN DISTRICTS AND RURAL DISTRICTS, AND BY BOARDS OF GUARDIANS.

(Compiled from H.C. 307 of 1905.)

A.—England and Wales.

	Counties.	County Boroughs.	Non-County Boroughs.	Other Urban Districts.	Rural Districts.	Boards of Guardians.	Total.
I. Districts specifying in their contracts conditions as to wages, etc.	No.	No.	No.	No.	No.	No.	No.
Rates to be:—
(a) Those current in the district-	4	25	57	56	6	38	186
(b) Those recognised by Trade Unions-	—	9	20	19	—	25	73
(c) Those agreed on by associations of employers and employed	1	20	20	17	1	18	77
(d) Those prevailing or recognised at date of contract	2	9	5	6	—	3	25
(e) Those fixed in contract-	1	1	3	3	1	4	13
(f) Reasonable and proper wages	—	—	—	—	1	—	1
Total specifying conditions as to wages, etc.	8	64	105	101	9	88	375
II. Districts specifying various conditions as to employment, but not with regard to wages, etc.	6	1	13	56	26	22	124
III. Districts indicating conditions to be observed, but not making them part of contract	—	—	—	—	—	—	—
IV. Districts specifying no conditions of employment by contractors*-	47	6	163	636	604	535	1,991
V. Districts which have made no contracts	1	—	—	17	18	—	36
Total included in Return	62	71	281	810	657	645	2,526

* In some of these cases it is stated that conditions as to the wages to be paid or other conditions with regard to the persons to be employed will be inserted in future contracts for the execution of works or that they have not entered into any recent contract for the execution of works.

B.—Scotland.

	Counties.	Burghs.	Parish Councils.	District Committees.	Total.
I. Districts specifying in their contracts conditions as to wages, etc.:—	No.	No.	No.	No.	No.
Rates to be:—
(a) Those current in the district	—	17	8	—	25
(b) Those recognised by Trade Unions	—	2	5	—	7
(c) Those agreed on by associations of employers and employed	—	2	1	—	3
(d) Those prevailing or recognised at date of contract	—	1	—	—	1
(e) Those fixed in contract	—	1	—	—	1
Total specifying conditions as to wages, etc.	—	23	14	—	37
II. Districts specifying various conditions as to employment, but not with regard to wages, etc.	—	7	6	8	21
III. Districts indicating conditions to be observed, but not making them part of contract	—	—	—	—	—
IV. Districts specifying no conditions of employment by contractors	29	172	854	91	1,146
V. Districts which have made no contracts
Total included in Return	29	202	874	99	1,204

Note.—In addition there are a few cases in which a fair wages clause is inserted in certain contracts issued by the Local Authority, but not in all the contracts.

C.—Ireland.

	Counties.	Town Councils.	Other Urban Councils.	Rural District Councils.	Boards of Guardians.	Total.
I. Districts specifying in their contracts conditions as to wages, etc.:—	No.	No.	No.	No.	No.	No.
Rates to be:—
(a) Those current in the district	1	6	5	6	4	22
(b) Those recognised by Trade Unions	—	1	—	1	—	2
(c) Those agreed on by associations of employers and employed	—	2	—	—	—	2
(d) Those prevailing or recognised at date of contract	—	—	—	—	—	—
(e) Those fixed in contract	—	—	—	—	—	—
(f) In accordance with resolution of House of Commons	—	2	—	1	3	6
Total specifying conditions as to wages, etc.	1	11	5	8	7	32
II. Districts specifying various conditions as to employment, but not with regard to wages, etc.	1	—	2	10	4	17
III. Districts indicating conditions to be observed, but not making them part of contract	—	—	—	—	—	—
IV. Districts specifying no conditions of employment by contractors	25	1	73	188	148	435
V. Districts which have made no contracts	—	—	1	—	—	1
Total included in Return	27	12	81	206	159	485

Note.—In addition there are a few cases in which a fair wages clause is inserted in certain contracts issued by the Local Authority, but not in all the contracts.

FAIR WAGES COMMITTEE.

MINUTES OF EVIDENCE

TAKEN BEFORE THE

FAIR WAGES COMMITTEE

WITH

INDEX THERETO.

Presented to both Houses of Parliament by Command of His Majesty.

LONDON:
PRINTED FOR HIS MAJESTY'S STATIONERY OFFICE,
BY JAS. TRUSCOTT AND SON, LIMITED.

And to be purchased, either directly or through any Bookseller, from WYMAN AND SONS, LIMITED, 109, FETTER LANE, FLEET STREET, E.C.; and 32, ABINGDON STREET, WESTMINSTER, S.W.; or OLIVER AND BOYD, TWEEDDALE COURT, EDINBURGH; or
E. PONSONBY, 116, GRAFTON STREET, DUBLIN.

1908.

[Cd. 4423.] Price 2*s.* 7*d.*

15327/07.

TREASURY MINUTE,

Dated 14th August, 1907.

The First Lord recommends to the Board that a Committee be appointed to consider the working of the Fair Wages Resolution of the House of Commons of the 13th February, 1891, as embodied in Government Contracts, and to report whether any administrative changes, especially with a view to the prevention of evasion, the enforcement of the rate current in the district, and greater uniformity of interpretation and working, are desirable in order to enable the objects of the Resolution to be more effectually attained.

The First Lord further recommends that this Committee be constituted as follows, viz. :—

Sir G. H. MURRAY, K.C.B., Secretary to the Treasury, Chairman;

Mr. H. DE LA BÈRE, C.B., Assistant Director of Army Finance, War Office ;

Mr. A. WILSON FOX, C.B., Comptroller-General, Commercial Labour and Statistical Department of the Board of Trade ;

Mr. A. F. KING, Second Secretary, General Post Office ;

Mr. F. W. BLACK, Director of Contracts, Admiralty ;

Mr. R. BAILEY, M.V.O., Controller of H.M. Stationery Office ; and

Mr. J. B. WESTCOTT, M.V.O., H.M. Office of Works.

Mr. J. J. WILLS, of the Board of Trade, Secretary.

MY LORDS approve.

[Note.—On the death of Mr. Westcott, Mr. J. H. Hillier, Controller of Supplies, H.M. Office of Works, was appointed a member of the Committee in January, 1908.]

CONTENTS.

	PAGE
Treasury Minute appointing the Committee - - - - - - -	ii
Alphabetical List of Witnesses, with references to the pages where their Evidence and the Digest of the same will be found - - - -	iv
MINUTES OF EVIDENCE - - - - - - - - - - -	1
APPENDIX TO EVIDENCE - - - - - - - - - - -	291
INDEX :—
(i.) Digest of Evidence of each Witness - - - - - -	296
(ii.) General Index to the whole of the Evidence - - - -	313

1,500.—Wt T.I., 266. 12. 8. J. T. & S.

ALPHABETICAL LIST OF WITNESSES EXAMINED, WITH REFERENCES TO THE PAGES AT WHICH THEIR EVIDENCE AND THE DIGEST THEREOF WILL BE FOUND.

Name.	Description.	Evidence.			Index.
		Day.	Questions.	Page.	Page.
ALLEN, Mr. J.	Representative of the National Federation of Merchant Tailors.	16th	4943–5049	202	305
BAGLEY, Mr. W.	Representative of the Yorkshire Glass Bottle Manufacturers' Association.	17th	5318–5403	218	306
BAILEY, Mr. J. C.	Chairman of the Staffordshire Potteries Manufacturers' Association.	16th	4877–4942	198	305
BARTLETT, Mr. H. H.	Representative of the London Master Builders' Association.	19th	5641–5686	239	308
BEDFORD, Mr. H. H.	Master Cutler of Sheffield	19th	5534–5640	230	307
BENHAM, Mr. F. R.	Past Chairman of the Staffordshire Potteries Manufacturers' Association.	16th	4877–4942	198	305
BLACK, Miss C.	President of the Women's Industrial Council, London.	22nd	6451–6673	268	310
BURNS, Mr. A. R.	Representative of the Birmingham Branch of the Union of Saddlers, Harness Makers, etc.	13th	4360–4413	178	303
CHARLTON, Mr. R.	Representative of the National Amalgamated Society of Enginemen, Cranemen, Boilermen, etc.	12th	4015–4109	162	303
CHATER, Mr. J.	Chairman of the Coventry Engineers and Allied Trades Federation.	13th	4171–4277	168	303
CLARK, Mr. J. W.	Secretary of the Scientific Instrument Makers' Trade Society.	3rd	681–919	32	297
COFFEY, Mr. W.	Secretary of the London Consolidated Society of Journeymen Bookbinders.	10th	3223–3302	137	301
COLEMAN, Mr. W.	Secretary of the Basket, Skip and Hamper Makers' Federation.	6th	2057–2181	88	299
COLLET, Miss C. E.	Senior Investigator for Women's Industries in the Board of Trade.	23rd	6873–7011	284	311
CROFTS, Mr. W.	Secretary of the Table and Butcher Knife Hafters' Society.	8th	2824–2868	121	301
CUMMINGS, Mr. D. C.	Representative of Parliamentary Committee of the Trade Union Congress; Secretary of the Society of Boilermakers and Iron and Steel Shipbuilders.	1st	1–188	1	296
DAVIS, Mr. S.	Secretary of the Walsall Bridle Cutters' Trade Society.	11th	3530–3543	147	302
DEW, Mr. G.	Representative of the Amalgamated Society of Carpenters and Joiners.	7th	2182–2411	94	299
DIBDIN, Mr. J. G.	Representative of the Electrical Trades Union	6th	1821–1925	80	299
DICKENSON, Mrs. S.	Joint Secretary of the Manchester and Salford Women's Trades and Labour Council.	21st	6225–6450	260	309
FRASER, Mr. W.	Representative of the Federation of Master Printers and Allied Trades.	14th	4573–4687	186	304
FRIEND, Mr. E.	Representative of the Vellum (Account Book) Binders' Trade Society.	4th	1020–1263	45	298
GOMME, Mr. G. L.	Clerk to the London County Council	23rd	6674–6872	277	311
GORDON, Mr. J. C.	Secretary of the National Amalgamated Tin and Iron Plate, Sheet and Metal Workers' and Braziers' Union.	2nd	396–574	19	296

ALPHABETICAL LIST OF WITNESSES—continued.

Name.	Description.	Evidence.			Index.
		Day.	Questions.	Page.	Page.
GREENWOOD, Mr. A. -	Representative of the Engineering and Shipbuilding Employers' Federations.	18th	5404–5533	222	306
HARRIS, Mr. A. - - -	Secretary of the Labour Protection League -	2nd	262–395	15	296
HICKIN, Mr. C. - - -	Vice-President of the National Amalgamated Tin and Iron Plate, Sheet and Metal Workers' and Braziers' Union.	2nd	396–574	19	297
HOBSON, Mr. A. J. - -	President of the Sheffield Chamber of Commerce.	19th	5534–5640	230	307
HOLMES, Mr. J. - - -	Secretary of the National Hosiery Federation	5th	1558–1695	66	298
HOLMSHAW, Mr. R. - -	Secretary of the United Cutlery Trades Council, of the Scissors Grinders' Union, and of the Sheffield Federated Trades Council	8th	2463–2599	109	300
HOWES, Mr. H. W. - -	Secretary of the Printing Machine Managers' Trade Society.	10th	3125–3222	133	301
IRWIN, Miss M. H. - -	Secretary of the Scottish Council for Women's Trades.	21st	6027–6224	253	309
KAIL, Mr. H. - - -	Representative of the London Clothiers' Cutters' Trade Union.	3rd	920–1019	40	298
KENT, Mr. E. N. - - -	Representative of the British Brush Manufacturers' Association.	17th	5050–5191	208	305
LANE, Mr. W. - - -	Secretary of the Sheffield United Trade Committee of Carpenters and Joiners.	7th	2412–2462	106	300
LATCHFORD, Mr. E. - -	Secretary of the Amalgamated Society of Brushmakers.	11th	3659–3768	152	302
MACFARLANE, Mr. G. -	Past President of the National Federation of Building Trade Employers of Great Britain and Ireland.	15th	4688–4820	191	304
MAPPIN, Mr. A. S. - -	Secretary of the Sheffield Machine File Cutters' Union.	8th	2671–2823	116	300
MASON, Mr. A. - - -	Representative of the British Brush Manufacturers' Association.	17th	5263–5317	216	306
MASTERS, Mr. A. - -	Secretary of the Bone Brush Makers' Trade Society.	11th	3769–3830	155	302
MILLERCHIP, Mr. W. -	Secretary of the National Amalgamated Lock and Key Smiths' Society.	11th	3544–3658	147	302
MILNES, Mr. W. - - -	Secretary of the National Glass Bottle Makers' Society.	13th	4110–4170	166	303
MOORE, Mr. F. - - -	Representative of the Midland Counties Hosiery Manufacturers' Association.	19th	5687–5760	241	308
MORRISON, Mr. J. T. - -	Secretary of the London Saddle and Harness Makers' Trade Society, and of the Military Harness and Accoutrement Makers' Trade Union.	12th	3831–4014	157	302
NAYLOR, Mr. T. E. - -	Secretary of the London Society of Compositors.	1st	189–261	10	296
NOBLE, Sir A., Bart., K.C.B.	Chairman of the Engineering Employers' Federation. [Represented also the Shipbuilding Employers' Federation.]	18th	5404–5533	222	306
O'GRADY, Mr. J., M.P. -	Representative of the National Amalgamated Furnishing Trades Union.	5th	1696–1820	74	298
PORTER, Mr. S. G. - -	Secretary of the United Society of Brushmakers.	6th	1926–2056	84	299
POWER, Mr. G. - - -	Secretary of the Midland Leather Trades Federation.	11th	3403–3529	143	302
RICHARDS, Mr. T. - -	Representative of the Federation of Master Printers and Allied Trades.	14th	4573–4687	186	304

ALPHABETICAL LIST OF WITNESSES—continued.

Name.	Description.	Evidence.			Index.
		Day.	Questions.	Page.	Page.
RUDD, Mr. E. J.	Secretary of the United French Polishers' London Society.	3rd	575–680	29	297
SCOTT, Mr. J.	Representative of the Master Saddlers' Federation of the United Kingdom.	20th	5761–5882	245	308
SHARROCKS, Mr. W.	Representative of the Staffordshire District of the Boilermakers' Trade Union.	13th	4278–4359	174	303
SHAW, Mr. G. H.	Secretary of the Pen and Pocket Blade Forgers' Society.	8th	2600–2670	115	300
SIEMENS, Mr. A.	Representative of the Engineering and Shipbuilding Employers' Federation.	18th	5404–5533	222	306
SIMPSON, Mr. G.	Representative of the Edinburgh Branch of the Scottish Typographical Association.	9th	2869–2973	123	301
STRAKER, Mr. S. C.	Chairman of the London Master Printers' Association; Member of the Council of the Federation of Master Printers and Allied Trades.	14th	4414–4572	180	304
TAYLOR, Mr. J.	Secretary of the Anvil and Vice Trades' Association.	4th	1444–1557	63	298
TEMPLETON, Mr. J.	Secretary of the Scottish Typographical Association.	9th	2869–2973	123	301
TOLHURST, Mr. F. C.	Secretary of the London Branch of the Amalgamated Society of Lithographic Artists, Designers, Engravers and Process Workers.	10th	3303–3402	140	302
TURNER, Mr. B.	President of the General Union of Weavers and Textile Workers.	4th	1264–1443	56	298
UNWIN, Mr. E.	Vice-Chairman of the London Master Printers' Association; Member of the Council of the Federation of Master Printers and Allied Trades.	14th	4414–4572	180	304
WAKELY, Mr. E.	Hon. Secretary of the Master Bone Brush Manufacturers' Association.	20th	5883–6026	248	308
WALLIS, Mr. W. F.	Representative of the National Federation of Building Trade Employers.	15th	4821–4876	195	305
WATKINS, Mr. C. H.	Representative of the British Brush Manufacturers' Association.	17th	5192–5262	212	306
WEBB, Mr. S.	Secretary of the Galvanised Hollow Ware Sheet Metal Workers (Iron Plate Trade Society).	9th	2974–3124	128	301
WELCH, Mr. F. W.	President of the Vellum (Account Book) Binders' Trade Society.	4th	1020–1263	45	298
WHATLEY, Mr. T.	Representative of the London Clothiers' Cutters' Trade Union.	3rd	920–1019	40	297

MINUTES OF EVIDENCE

TAKEN BEFORE THE

DEPARTMENTAL COMMITTEE

APPOINTED TO CONSIDER

THE WORKING OF THE FAIR WAGES RESOLUTION OF THE HOUSE OF COMMONS OF 1891.

FIRST DAY,

Thursday, November 21st, 1907.

At 32, Great George Street, Westminster, S.W.

PRESENT:

SIR GEORGE H. MURRAY, K.C.B. (Chairman).

Mr. R. BAILEY, M.V.O.
Mr. F. W. BLACK.
Mr. H. DE LA BÈRE, C.B.
Mr. A. WILSON FOX, C.B.
Mr. A. F. KING.
Mr. J. B. WESTCOTT, M.V.O.
Mr. J. J. WILLS, Secretary.

Mr. DAVID CHARLES CUMMINGS, called and examined.

1. (Chairman.) You represent the Parliamentary Committee of the Trade Union Congress, I believe?—Yes.

2. I suppose we may take it that you speak on behalf of organised labour in the country generally, apart from particular points which individual trades may have to raise?—Yes; apart from any evidence the trades may give, I am here to speak generally in the interests of the Trade Union movement.

3. Before you begin, I think I might say that you may assume that the Government in all its Departments is as anxious as those whom you represent to see the intention of the Fair Wages Resolution carried out as completely and as accurately as possible. Unfortunately, owing to the imperfection of human language, we cannot always express as accurately as we could wish what our intentions are. If you have to provide in clear and concise language a formula which will apply to an immense number of transactions, a large variety of contracts, and a very big business all over the country, ambiguities and imperfections must necessarily arise in the wording. Our object to-day is to try and find out how the present form in which that Resolution is expressed can be improved, without, however, extending its scope. It is rather a matter of expression and of machinery that we are concerned with than anything else, and it is for that purpose we want your assistance. You know, so to speak, where the shoe pinches; and what we should like you to tell us is what alterations you would suggest in the words of the Fair Wages Resolution so as to express more completely and effectually the intention of Parliament?—Yes; I understand your attitude regarding it.

4. I gather from your proof that you wish to show generally the methods by which the intention of the Fair Wages Clause is evaded?—Yes. I will take the first method that I state in my proof. What I mean by the refusal to pay the Trade Union rates on the erection of buildings for the Government is this—a firm may be erecting a Government building, and the men who are actually upon the building may be paid the Trade Union rates, while the work that is being made in the shop—which is, after all, the chief part of it—is being paid below the recognised rates. The Parliamentary Committee have found, when approaching the different Government Departments from time to time, that such actions are looked upon as if they were not evasions, and the plea has been set up in some instances that under the wording of the Resolution, it is impossible to do what we desire to do, that is to say, to see that the recognised rates should be paid right out.

5. You have got instances of that, I suppose?—Yes. I have not got a particular instance of that with me to-day, but instances can be supplied to the Committee.

6. I was in hopes you would have had an instance?—I understand that Mr. Chandler, who is the Secretary of the Amalgamated Society of Carpenters and Joiners, is sending one of their representatives here with particular instances relating to different firms who have acted in that way. In this case, I have not got the instances, but I have mentioned instances in other cases later on in my proof.

7. Do you know what the contention was in those cases you are speaking of? I do not see at first sight how it could be argued that there was a compliance with the Fair Wages Resolution?—The argument was that the employer had set forth that he was complying with it, because he had men at work getting the recognised rate. Mr. Chandler informs me that whatever evidence they were able to bring to bear upon the Department, that the main portion of the work was being done by men who were not getting the rate, did not seem to have any weight; it was promised to be inquired into, and nothing came of it.

8. There was no question of sub-letting there?—There was no subletting at all; it was just the plain fact that they had practically two sets of men on.

9. Some of whom were being paid a fair rate, and others not?—Yes. A shop, or what is after all recognised as a shop, which is not a Trade Union shop, and is not paying the district rate, has not put itself into compliance, as I conceive, with the spirit of the Government Resolution. They proceed to pay a few men who are employed actually on the building itself the recognised rates, but the preparation of the work is done by other men who are not getting those rates.

10. I see your point; but without a specific instance, it is rather difficult to discuss it, is it not?—I concluded we were going into general methods, without bringing any firm into the black books of any Department.

11. Will you go on to your next point?—The next point applies to those employers who are doing work inside altogether; they employ a few odd men at the recognised rates, the rest being paid at lower rates, and they proceed to show that they are paying the recognised rates of the district, and use arguments to the effect that the other men who are getting less rates, or the boys who may be employed upon the job, are not after all full-rated men or competent men or journeymen. That, in our opinion, is only a subterfuge, and in many of the Corporations where the Resolution is more definite that would not be permitted to be argued. It is somewhat difficult to get at cases of that description.

12. Is not the Resolution sufficiently accurate on that point now, do you think?—I do not think it is, because "current rate" means anything.

13. Is the point you raise there that the current rate is not known in that case?—It is known to the firm who are paying the few men the current rate. Then, again, it happens in the instance of shops where they are not, on their general work, paying the current rate, that rate being simply paid when they are getting a Government contract.

14. There, again, they pay a portion of the men the current rate, and the rest below it?—Yes. They may even always have two or three specially skilled men getting higher than the current rate; but the general run of the men, the great mass of the men, are paid below the rate. That occurs to a large extent in the building trade. That is another complaint of Mr. Chandler's, and may be said to apply mostly to that trade.

15. Will you take your third point?—That is another matter which we have had reports upon from our committees on the various trades at times. That deals with the employers who pay the recognised rate to a few men simply while they are doing a Government contract, and directly it is finished revert to the old system. That is quite a common practice in some of the trades where the men are not too well organised.

16. That clearly is not covered by the Resolution as it stands?—No, it is not.

17. The Resolution applies only to wages paid for contract work done for the Government?—But we take up the position that the employer who does actions of this description is unfairly competing with a good employer who is, after all, responsible with the workmen for the arrangement of the rate. If a man can be allowed to do this for the time being, for the purpose of keeping himself in order with the Government Resolution, then he is helping to bring down the better employers to the lower level, and that we contend should not be done with Government work.

18. But you are going beyond that and dealing with private work?—We think the Government should not give encouragement to men of that description.

19. It would be rather difficult to carry that recommendation into effect, would it not?—No. I think to meet that case the Resolution should be differently worded, so that the contracts were only to be given to men who can show themselves to be fair houses.

20. Then your fourth point?—That refers to cases we have recently had before more than one Department. Employers have their offices in the big cities or towns and then move out into the country districts.

21. When you say "offices," do you include works?—No, not works. In some instances they may have a small branch place where the rates are paid; but in most cases their works are removed. They have been in the city or the town, as the case may be, and they remove out 10, 15, 20, or 30 miles into a country district, and then set up their own special rates, again competing unfairly with other employers. Take an example that I give in my proof with regard to it. There was a firm employed in the hosiery trade—that came before the War Office recently, I believe within the last 12 months. They removed 20 miles from Leicester, and they were the only firm doing hosiery in the locality to which they removed, and so they fixed their rates at nearly 50 per cent. less than the recognised rates at Leicester, and then called their rate the "current rate" of that locality. Mr. Steadman, M.P., with representatives from the hosiery trade, had an interview with both the Admiralty and the War Office upon this subject, and the answer we have got with regard to that matter has been that the rate paid is the current rate for that locality. That opens up a very big question. Every firm in the country could do that, and set up a new rate at once and call it the current rate of the locality, although it is not recognised by any association of the employers, or of the men, or by mutual recognition. It is simply the firm's decision that such shall be the rate, and it is impossible for the people who are isolated in that district to protest. That, we think, is one of the biggest evils of the faulty wording of the present Resolution.

22. The difficulty being, in fact, to define what is a "current rate" when there is only one firm at work in the district?—We say that the suggestion we make later on with regard to the old Resolution would prevent that.

23. Your remedy is that the conditions, hours of labour, and wages in operation in the nearest town in the district in which similar work is carried on should be taken to apply?—Yes.

24. That might be rather difficult to carry out, might it not, say, in a case where you have quite an isolated business? I know, for instance, of a considerable paper-making concern in a purely rural district in Hampshire, and there may not be another paper-making concern within 30 or 40 miles of it. It would be rather difficult to make the rate applicable, say, to a large town apply to a rural village 30 or 40 miles away, would it not?—I quite appreciate the difficulty that there would be there; and I feel that however much we may try to word the Resolution aright, we should still have some of these difficulties to face afterwards. What we are anxious to prevent is unfair competition by sweating wages, though I do not think I could say deliberately done with that object, but done certainly with a view to cheapen production all round, and done in a good many instances by firms who are doing Government work, who think they are quite safe upon the lists of the different Government Departments.

25. Would you admit, primâ facie, that work carried on, say, in a purely rural district might be paid at a lower rate than work carried on in a large town; or are you in favour of a uniform rate all over the country?—That rather deals with the first part of our amendment to the Resolution, "that all Government contracts shall contain a clause stating that the contractor shall observe the conditions, hours of labour, and pay the wages recognised and agreed upon by the employers and trade unions of the district (the rate to be paid irrespective of piecework earnings) in which the work is carried on, and a schedule of wages paid shall be posted in some conspicuous place in the works where the work is done."

26. The difficulty we are on now is that there is no rate recognised and agreed upon by the employers in the district, because there is only one employer. How are you going to meet that? Is it your proposal that he should be subject to a rate which may be in force 50 miles away?—Yes, that is our proposal. We think that will avoid the difficulty.

27. But other consequences might follow, might they not? It would be rather difficult to enforce a rate that is applicable to Portsmouth in a village 30 or 40 miles away, would it not?—That applies in our big trades. We have certainly got (and that would happen under any circumstances) different rates in different parts of the country which have grown up under different conditions and different methods of working, perhaps even the cost of living and of food having some bearing upon them. They slightly differ in all our trades. Take my own trade as an example.

Wherever a rate is fixed, it takes in all the villages and small shops until you border on to the next district, and wherever a shop exists that has removed into the country, the rate which is generally applied is that for the district which is nearest. That applies in very many instances up and down the country. We in our society especially—in the boilermaking as a part of the shipbuilding trade—apportion the country into different districts. That has been a matter of our own adoption after a considerable number of years; but the system works very well, and, generally speaking, I cannot see how it could not work in this case, especially if you made the further restriction that it should be applied to the nearest district where there was an agreement entered into. I think you will find, too, that the majority of the employers will agree with us on that point. They feel the competition even more keenly than we do when a man removes away and sets up exactly what conditions he likes, intending all the time to bring them down and to compete with them in the market. In all our trades we have constantly to meet the argument, "So-and-so has taken up an establishment at so-and-so, and unless you insist upon the rate there you will have to have it cut down here." You see people going into these districts without some conditions being applied to them restricting their action in that respect, means lowering by a great deal the conditions that have been obtained after very many years. Take our own Union, which is 73 years of age——

28. I cannot see how you are going to deal with an isolated industry in a district where the bulk of the work is of another kind; the nearest district doing the same work might be hundreds of miles away, and clearly the same conditions could not apply then?—That is possible in some trades, I admit.

29. Your own trade is probably pretty well concentrated in particular districts, and is at the same time pretty well spread over them?—Yes.

30. Supposing you could imagine in your district another trade coming and settling there of a different character altogether, should you propose to fix the rate of wages by a rate paid miles away? There is one instance you give in your proof of a firm at Sheffield which bears out your point; you claim that they ought to pay at Sheffield the Staffordshire wages?—Yes. A firm in Sheffield contracting for anvils for the India Office fixed its rate at 2s. per cwt. less than the rates in Stafford and Worcester, which, as all of us admit, is practically where that industry is being carried on. There is not another firm in Sheffield—indeed, I am not aware of another one in all Yorkshire—that makes anvils. Then Sheffield, in most trades—especially in the engineering trades—is looked upon as a better-paid district than any part of the Staffordshire district or of Worcester; yet in this instance they have gone below the general rates of the trade itself, although Sheffield is looked upon as one of the best-paid provincial towns in the country, or as one where the rates are higher than in the majority of provincial towns.

31. Suppose, instead of setting up at Sheffield, they had gone off to some quite small place and made an industry of their own there, would you still apply the same rule? Is the Staffordshire rate to extend all over the country in this particular business of anvil-making?—No, I do not say that. But when the rate in Staffordshire and Worcester is a certain fixed rate—and there are very few anvils made outside of that district—and a firm sets up a shop to make the anvils in a populous place like Sheffield, I do think they ought, in Government work, to be compelled to pay the workmen the same rate of wages. It is the same system going on, though it happened in this case to be at Sheffield; and it may be that in course of time the conditions there will alter; but for the present they are bringing about a very strong argument on behalf of the Worcester and Staffordshire makers that they must come down to the Sheffield rate. After all, we have to admit this, which does not apply in private contracts—that for some reason or other firms like to have Government contracts; and they feel the loss of them greater than they do competition in the open market. That is the impression they give us by the efforts they make to get these contracts.

32. I think I understand your view on that point. The Birmingham case that you mention is much the same, is it not?—Yes, but it has rather a different aspect. The Birmingham firm take a shop outside, and while not setting up a new industry, directly they get outside and have secured a Government contract, they reduce the price for copper-wire drawing from 6d. to 4½d. per ton. That has been sent to the India Office, I believe, within the last few weeks, and Mr. Steadman and Mr. Davis (who is connected with the Union concerned), informed me that the contention of the firm that they are paying current rates has up to the present been supported by the Government Office. It seems to us that the different aspect here is that they deliberately cut down prices. The men who are doing the work came out on strike—or, rather, it could scarcely be called a strike, as it only affects a few men—they left their work, and refused to do it at the reduced prices. Then two other men are employed, and the fact of their going into the employ of the firm is taken as proof of the conditions being satisfactory. It was practically a question between Unionist and non-Unionist. The contention raised by the Department, I believe, is that the two men who are employed are satisfied, and therefore they are getting the current rate. That seems to us a very wide interpretation of the meaning of the Resolution of the House of Commons, and is certainly not in accordance with the spirit in which it was passed. The objection that we raised about that matter through Mr. Davis, who was accompanied by Mr. Steadman, our Secretary, has not been supported by the Department concerned.

33. It is conceivable, is it not, that in that locality to which the work has been removed there is a case for paying lower wages than the wages paid in Birmingham?—I do not see the reason.

34. Suppose the cost of living, rent, and so forth, is very much less there, would you not admit that as a ground for paying a lower rate?—I do not admit it as a ground. It certainly has been used as a ground, and that has been the effect very often, but I do not admit myself that there is a good reason for doing it.

35. Do you think that wages ought not to depend at all on such things as the cost of living?—The cost of living is, of course, a very debatable point.

36. Yes, but assuming it can be proved?—Assuming it can be proved, there may be something in that case, but it is a very debatable point. It is argued, for instance, that living in London is excessively dear. I am an old London man, but I have lived in various parts of the country—Yorkshire and elsewhere—and I have been at our General Office in Newcastle for some years. I know places that are even dearer than London; but I admit that is argued as a reason.

37. Probably you also know places that are cheaper, do you not?—Yes, in some instances.

38. If rent, for instance, which is probably a very large factor in the matter, is very much lower, could not a man afford to take a lower rate of wages and yet keep himself as well as he was before?—He could afford to do it; but then other things may come in which would outset the excessive rent.

39. That may be so?—There is no place in the country, for instance, where food-stuffs are as cheap as they are in London, except perhaps in Leeds. I am speaking from my own experience. Where I am living at present—Newcastle-on-Tyne—rents are even dearer than in the suburbs of London, and food-stuffs are considerably dearer; yet it is held by some employers in Newcastle that the rates should be lower in Newcastle, because London is such a dear place to live in. Practical experience does not bear that out, and therefore it becomes a very debatable point.

40. But, still, you do not claim, I understand, that the wages in any particular industry should be the same all over the country?—No.

41. There must be variations?—There are variations, subject to conditions. In my own trade, as I can show later on, with regard to ship-building, the Scottish rate is the lowest.

42. If that is so, there may be a good reason for fixing a lower rate in some localities than in others?—Yes, there may be. If they were, say, 20 miles away from Glasgow and paid Glasgow rates, their rates would be low, and if they were 20 miles from London the rates would be higher, the difference being the same as between one firm paying the Glasgow rate and another firm paying the London rate. After all, we are only asking that they should be subject to the conditions that were agreed upon between the men and the employers in the locality, and that where there is no agreement they should be subject to the conditions of the nearest locality where there is an agreement.

43. I have pointed out that the difficulty in that case would be that you might enforce an urban rate of wages possibly in a rural district; do you see any objection to that?— There is a little difference. Mostly there is an agreement. What we want to avoid is the employer making his own rate, and practically putting pressure upon the people whom he employs in a remote district to accept what rate he likes.

44. Because he has isolated himself from other employers?—Yes. That is the difficulty we want to avoid. We have to face that, as it has been done by some employers. There is no question of agreement, and there is no question of argument; it is a question of compulsion. We think that would not be done by the employers were they subject to the conditions of the nearest locality. There is another method of evasion. Some employers have stated that they are in a certain locality, and therefore they will be bound by the current rates of that locality, while at the same time they are much nearer a higher paid centre of industry. That is the reason for my next instance, I do not think I ought to mention the name of the firm, but a firm at Oldbury claimed that they should be recognised by the Dudley rate. In this instance, I might say, that the Dudley rate has been agreed upon between the Dudley employers and the Trade Union, and that the Birmingham rate is an agreed rate. This brings out your point about the different rates between a more rural constituency and a town. The Birmingham rates are higher; and this Oldbury firm have stated to the Admiralty that they were paying the current rate of wages because they were in the Dudley district. They secured the contract for some boilers that went into the Chatham yard, for plant. Outside the Government Departments we have successively got this firm struck off the books. They have been struck off the list of the London County Council, because the London County Council held, after hearing evidence from both sides, that they were within the Birmingham area, and, refusing to pay the Birmingham rate, they were struck off the list. That was a clear attempt to deceive, because the firm is situated miles nearer to Birmingham than to Dudley; but in order to deceive the Government, and so put themselves right with the Department, they make statements of that description. Unless we have knowledge of the contract, it passes off quite easily, and nobody is aware how it has been done. We do know, in relation to this firm, that that is the method they are employing in getting contracts. They tried to do it with various municipalities—with the London County Council and with other places—and they got struck off the list of some of them.

45. Have you got any suggestion how to meet a case like that; how would you define a district, in fact?— I have no further suggestion.

46. That is what it comes to, is it not—the difficulty of defining a district?—Yes; it comes to be a question of definition. In my own trade, where there are two differing rates, I would say that a firm of that description should be held to be within the locality that it was nearest to. In this case that would be Birmingham. Had it been a few miles the other way, there would have been no objection, and it could have claimed the Dudley rate.

47. You are measuring from some spot which you assume to be the centre of the locality, I suppose?— Yes. You may go a good many miles in some trades and find no differing rates. Supposing there was one rate in Leeds and another rate in Manchester, and a firm was situate somewhere between them, if it was nearer to Manchester it would be compelled to be within the Manchester locality, and if it was nearer to Leeds it would be compelled to be in the other one. I am just giving you that as an illustration. That would be the best way to arrange the matter, and, understood in that way, it would prevent any confusion as to what district they were in. There may be argument when it comes to their being within half a mile or equi-distant.

48. Will you go on now with your further suggestions, that the contractor shall observe the conditions and hours of labour, and pay the wages recognised and agreed upon by the employers and Trade Unions of the district. The resolution that you suggest this Committee should adopt goes a little further than the Fair Wages Resolution, as it covers hours of labour and conditions generally, and the Fair Wages Resolution seems to be confined rather to wages?—That is so; this does go further.

49. What do you mean by the words "the rate to be paid irrespective of piece-work earnings"?—In most districts where there is piece-work, there is a piece-work rate and a day-work rate. We mean that the day-work rate shall be recognised irrespective of what men earn on piece-work. Of course, they will earn more at piece-work.

50. But the piece-work rate, I suppose, is based on the day-work rate?—Yes. We say that, in order to prevent an employer arguing that the men are earning more than the day rate at piece-work.

51. If they do actually earn more than the day-work rate, are you not satisfied?—No; we are not. We are only satisfied if they are paying the current day-work rate—not because of the earnings from the piece-work rate.

52. But if they are not on day-work at all, how can you apply the day-work rate except as a basis of the piece-work rate?—Even in our trade, which has more piece-work than any other trade in existence—that is to say, we are 90 per cent. piece-workers—there is not a firm in existence who have not a day-work rate, and who have not a few time-workers. We are anxious to preserve the time-rate beyond anything, and we do not want the argument to come in that because a man is on a piece-work rate, and he is earning by piece-work more than the current rate, as he invariably does, that should be held as an argument that the current rates are being paid.

53. Could you say the current rate was not being paid, if it was a fact that the man was getting more by piece-work?—Yes; if it was based on a lower day-work rate. That would be the reason.

54. He ought to earn more at the piece-work rate than he does, you mean, if it was based on a proper day-work rate?—Yes. Suppose, for instance, to take again the engineering trade as an illustration, suppose under time-work the current rate was 36s. per week for an engineer, and one shop was a time-work shop, and the next shop had a Government contract, their time-work rate being 34s., which was not recognised to be the current rate, but their men were on piece-work and they earned more than 34s. What we want to prevent is the employer arguing that these men are earning £2 because they are piece-workers, and that that is more than the current rate. His current rate after all is 34s., and their piece-work is based upon that. We want him to recognise as a basis the current time-work rate which is recognised by the employers.

55. Is there so definite a relation between the piece-work rates and the time-work rate that you could enforce that in all cases?—Yes.

56. Is the one roughly 33 per cent. more than the other?—It differs with the different trades. With us it is more than that, but I do not think it will run quite that with some trades. With men who are doing heavy work, like smiths and boilermakers and shipbuilders it is more than 33 per cent. and the average will go as high as 33 per cent. taking the whole country round. But where you get a lighter class of work, the difference is not so great. I should say that in those trades where the work is heavier the average would be more than that, but in some it may be less.

57. If you have the time-work rate in a district and the piece-work earnings which the man is actually getting, are you in a position to say whether the employer is paying him the current rate?—What we do in our own Society is this: the man is working piece-work and his piece rates are low, and we have a joint committee of employers and of men in which it is rearranged. We do not rearrange it, of course, on the earnings of one man, as he may be an incompetent man; but if it is proved after a fair trial that the men are unable to earn rates sufficiently good, then it is brought before what we call the joint board. In my own Trade Union we are much more advanced and further ahead in these matters of Joint Boards than they are in many others. There are not many unions that have a joint board. In all our big districts we have a joint board in the shipbuilding trade which settles all these things, and has schedules of prices which are not open to revision except on application from one side or the other, that is, unless we think it ought to be and can be brought up before this joint board. In our trade—and I do not want to use this as an argument in respect to other trades—if a man doing the heavy work is only earning 33 per cent. in excess over his day rates, we should raise the question on our side. But every time we rearrange the wages, the day-work rate has just the same consideration as the piece-work rate. Our piece-work rates are fixed, and if there was a reduction in wages to-morrow, we should agree to so much reduction on the time rates and so much on the piece prices.

58. Then what you want to ensure is that there shall be a fixed relation maintained between the time-work rate and the piece-work rate?—No, we do not want a fixed percentage; that is a matter for each individual union. We only want to concern ourselves with the time-work rate, which is sometimes evaded, or set aside, even where the piece-worker earns more.

59. It does not seem to me that you can do that unless you fix first of all the relation which the piece-work rate is to bear to the time-work rate?—That is too big a matter, I think, to undertake apart from the separate union itself. It is sometimes a very big matter even for one union; it sometimes takes us two years to revise a list.

60. Then you wish a schedule of the wages paid to be posted in some conspicuous place in the works where the work is done?—Yes.

61. Do you attach importance to that?—Yes, our committee attach some importance to that. I believe the Home Department in reference to the Factory Act of 1901 sent out an order compelling that to be done in the case of one or two trades in Scotland, notably, I think, in the chain trade and in the making of anchors, and in things of that description, for the shipbuilding industry.

62. (Mr. De la Bère.) Piece-rates only?—Quite true, piece-rates only. In this case, of course, we say that the time-rates should be scheduled as well, so that everybody should know what they are.

63. (Chairman.) And you think that that is important?—Yes, we think it is important that people should know what the rates are. I do not know that a great many instances could be cited, because it is always difficult to bring a charge against a firm that men have been taken in and given wages below the rate.

64. Of course, every man knows what he is getting himself?—Yes; and that causes trouble.

65. He also knows what the current rate is?—If a man leaves at the end of a week when he finds that he is not receiving the current rate, sometimes he is a marked man for a considerable time. The Employers' Federations are to-day so closely knitted together that it is quite easy for a man who makes himself obnoxious in that way to be marked for some considerable period. Even in our own trade just recently some men could not get a discharge note, and we were six weeks before we got that matter settled through the Federation. In Scotland they adopt a system of issuing discharge notes to their workmen, and if the men have not discharge notes, no other employer will take them on. There is an unwritten understanding that there is something wrong with a man, or he would have his discharge note. That is a matter which it is difficult to prove in the Law Courts, but it is easily understood by the employers when a man goes to look for other employment. That happened with four men, and we were six weeks before I could get it rectified through the employers' secretary.

66. Your next point is that "failing such agreement as to conditions, hours, or wages, those in operation in the nearest district in which similar work is carried on under such agreement shall be taken to apply"?—Yes.

67. Then "any firm who does not recognise the above-mentioned conditions on all their work shall be deemed an 'unfair' house and not eligible for Government work. Facilities shall be given by which Trade Union officials can learn to whom contracts are given in the trades they represent." You have a good many facilities of that kind now, have you not?—Yes. The War Office has granted us the fullest facilities. We get the knowledge that the contract is being given out, but we are not able to learn to whom the contract is given.

68. That is, you do not get to know the names of the firms?—We do not. We know that the contract is going to be given out, but we do not know exactly who is being invited to tender, and we do not know whom the contract is given to. The information only goes so far as to let us know that these contracts are going on the market. While it is quite easy in my own trade to trace it, it is not so easy to do that in other trades. In some of the trades where there is a considerable quantity of small work being given out—take, for instance, the Admiralty contracts, which include an enormous quantity of small goods, utensils and vessels of all kinds for the men, and the other different accessories, which are very numerous indeed, it is very difficult to trace them; but it is, of course, quite easy to trace the contract for a big ship.

69. What you want is a list of the contracts, and the names of the firms who have got them?—Yes; that is what we desire in the matter.

70. (Mr. De la Bère.) I certainly understood when those facilities were given a year ago that they were accepted as meeting, at any rate at the time, the views of those who asked for them, and that they were regarded as affording a satisfactory settlement of the difficulty?—Not quite satisfactory in that sense. We took it as a concession in the right direction, and were satisfied so far. We should have liked to have gone further; we should have liked to have got what we desired.

71. If you remember, I think the arrangement was sent to Mr. Steadman—I do not know whether it went to you—before it was actually brought out, in order to ensure that it was what he wanted; was that not so?—Yes. We had two deputations upon the matter, and I was on both of them. At the first deputation we understood that it was going much further.

72. The first deputation was early in the year, I think?—Yes. Then when the matter was sent to us, and we saw it did not go quite so far as we expected, we had another interview upon it, and found that Mr. Haldane, who was there, and Lord Tweedmouth, too, could not agree, or see their way to go much further in the matter.

73. I have only mentioned that, because it seems to me that you are going a little bit further than what apparently satisfied you last November?—That is it—it apparently satisfied us. We felt it was a step in the right direction, and in that sense we ultimately accepted it.

74. (Mr. Black.) My recollection is the same as Mr. De la Bère's. I was present at the meeting, and we certainly understood then from Mr. Steadman and his friends that if they had the list of firms from whom the Government was going to invite tenders, they would know whether they were fair houses or not, and that information would really meet the case. That was the understanding at that time, I think, was it not?—Yes, as far as most of the trades are concerned. And we got the list.

75. We gave it to you when big tenders were invited?—Yes. In the case of some of the trades you can trace it quite easily, but the difficulty arises with the trades who have a considerable quantity of small work. They have raised this objection since then, and that has caused us to make this suggestion.

76. (Chairman.) As regards the last part of your proof, I think you are taking us rather outside our reference. We are only concerned with the wages paid by Government contractors. If you have got any representations to make about the wages in the dockyards, I think you had better make them direct to the Admiralty, as that is not really part of our business?—I am quite willing to take your suggestion with regard to that. I had that doubt in my mind, and that is why I worded it in the manner it is worded.

77. If you will write anything you have to say to the Admiralty I have no doubt they will be very glad to consider it?—This matter has been sent off to the Admiralty.

78. I think we had better leave it to them, then?—I was hoping that the scope of your inquiry would permit you to go into that.

79 No, I am afraid it does not?—I must accept your ruling on the matter.

80. (Mr. King.) I should like you to tell me, if you will, how we are to get the information that a certain house is an unfair house. We know, say, that it is paying the proper wages on Government contracts, but how are we to find out what wages it is paying on other contracts? You suggest that every house which does not pay the current rates on all their work should be deemed an unfair house, but I do not quite see where we are to get the information that we must have before we can act in that matter?—I think it would be got in this way—if there is a recognised rate, as there mostly is, between the men and the employers, and a firm is not paying that recognised rate, it seems to me that it should be deemed an unfair house.

81. But how are we to know it?—By complaint, I think, from the union concerned.

82. We have the power to look at their wages books so far as our own work is concerned, but we cannot look at their wages books in respect of other people's work?—That is right. But suppose a firm got a contract and complaint was made in a proper way to the Government Department by which the contract was given, the complaint being that this firm were not paying the current rate except upon work obtained from the Government, then I should think the complainants should be called on to prove that, and if they proved their case, the firm should be struck off the list.

83. Is each Government Office to hold an inquiry and call witnesses and hear both sides?—It could be done by some committee in connection with them. The Board of Trade could do it, I suppose; they would be in a position to do that.

84. It would be a large business, I am afraid?—I do not think so.

85. We have had a lot of complaints as it is, some of which have proved groundless, and some of which have stood investigation?—There would have to be some inquiry if charges were made, there is no doubt of it.

86. At present we say: "No, we are not concerned." Do you want us to undertake this inquiry as regards every class of work these people are doing?—We think that if a firm is acting in such a manner as to endanger the good relationships between the workmen and the employers of the country, it should not be encouraged with Government work.

87. We want to know how you can find out where they do so. How are we to trace it?—The only way to trace it is to hold an inquiry in the matter. I will just give you a little illustration. It did not take us long. Of course, I quite know that this is only one case in many, but when I lived in Leeds some years ago, as the Yorkshire official of the union, I was a member of the Leeds School Board, and a complaint was made against a contractor. He was summoned before the Sites and Buildings Committee, of which I was a member, and we found out that the complaint was correct, and struck him off the list. The inquiry into that did not take us long.

88. That was a comparatively big contract; there would not be many contracts for buildings under the School Board in Leeds, would there?—No.

89. Two or three in a year at the outside?—Yes; it would only affect a few.

90. We place some thousands of contracts, small and large, and therefore, I ask, are we to investigate every one of these in which complaint is made about other people's work?—If it was a recognised principle that the Government work was only given to contractors who were paying the recognised rates in the district, you would have a good many of these contractors who would either pay the rate, or would not chance the issue in applying for contracts.

91. If you would be satisfied if we merely issue the notice and do nothing else, there would not be much difficulty?—You would be bound to inquire if a complaint was made, once the resolution was in this form.

92. Take another point: You said that in your union the principle of paying the rate of the town extended to the villages round?—Yes.

93. Would the arrangement have been agreed to by the employers in those villages, or would they not have been consulted—was it forced on them?—Putting it into that language, I expect it would be forced on to them to some extent.

94. The bigger towns forced it on to the smaller ones?—That is so. In my own Union the men are strongly organised, and in an ordinary Union wherever there is an agreement with the employers, the smaller employers in the villages are almost compelled to pay the same rate—I quite admit that.

95. About your areas, you said the country in your Union was mapped out into areas; are they always settled by distance?—Yes, to a very large extent.

96. But not entirely by distance?—Not a particular distance.

97. This Birmingham case you referred to was solely a case of distance, was it not?—Because in that case the contractor was much nearer Birmingham than Dudley.

98. I do not know the country, but it might be urged that Dudley is more closely connected with Oldbury than Birmingham is; would that not be a reason for paying the Dudley rate?—No. The same class of work is done in Birmingham.

99. I do not know the circumstances, but in your Union you do not always insist on distance as the dividing point, do you?—No. The distances are not all alike. In the more scattered districts the area is greater before there is any change. Taking the shipbuilding trade, it does not differ through the whole of the North-East Coast, and one meeting of Employers settles the prices in the shipbuilding trade right away from Hull to Blyth. It embraces the whole coast there, although in our own inner working of the Society there are five or six districts involved, or what we call districts, and there we simply have committees. But it is a joint association of the employers which discusses a question of that description. Therefore the difficulties are not great with us; the difficulties are greater with other trades.

100. Mr. Steadman approached the Postmaster-General only so recently as last summer about getting information, and all he asked for then was that the Secretary of the Parliamentary Committee of the Trade Union Congress was to be told, when we were issuing a tender, the names of the people invited and the form of tender used. He said nothing whatever about being told who obtained the contract. Is it since the summer that you have decided that you want to get the name of the contractor?—It is since our last Congress in September that there has been this desire to go further in the matter.

101. Mr. Steadman did not agree with that then?—He may have agreed, but not at that time; that was before last September.

102. But when he approached the Postmaster-General he did not ask for that?—We did in the first place, two years ago next February.

103. (Chairman.) At any rate, since the last Congress?—Since the last Congress the thing has grown into this shape.

104. And you have asked for this improved information?—Yes.

105. (Mr. King.) Which offices have you asked?—We have not asked any. This is the first time we put it before the Government. We should have asked this of various departments but for this inquiry coming on.

106. (Mr. Westcott.) As to the facilities for learning the names of the successful contractors in public buildings, of course, the majority of the contracts are put up to public tender, and the list of the tenders is always published in the building papers; is that not sufficient information in itself?—Yes, for the building trades it would be; but I think the desire for this comes from trades outside the building trades.

107. That I am not so much concerned with, but I know we always publish a list of the tenders within a week or two of the tenders being accepted, and that list is open to everybody?—Yes; and, of course, we know in the shipbuilding trade every man who gets a tender for the Admiralty.

108. You are speaking more of the cases where limited competition is entered into?—I am thinking of the small things.

109. (Chairman.) The small trades?—Yes.

110. (Mr. Westcott.) It seems to me we could not do anything more than publish the list of tenders in building, as far as we are concerned,. Then with regard to the exhibition of these rates, do you propose that they should be exhibited on the building itself—and I am speaking of buildings now, more than of ships or things of that sort. There are certain men employed, as you said just now, on the building, and others are employed in the shops on the preparation of the work; would you therefore have these lists exhibited in both places?—It would be advantageous to have them in both places, although I think the main idea is to have them on the works.

111. On the works in progress?—Yes.

112. As you know, a great deal of the joinery, and so on, is made in the shops, and perhaps the men in the shops who make the joinery never see the works. You would advocate it being posted in both places?—Yes.

113. (Mr. Black.) Shall we get any further detail on the point mentioned in the second paragraph of your proof, namely, that "other employers that contract for work that is completed inside the works employ a few odd men at the recognised rates, the rest being paid at lower rates, with the result that often inefficient men and boys do a large portion of the work under contract although they claim that they are paying the recognised rates." Shall we get any cases brought forward? My reason for asking is this, that under our system of inspection, in Admiralty cases we should go into the points that you mention there; and I am a little interested to know whether we shall get any case brought up against the Admiralty where you think we have not gone into it sufficiently. I do not think we should accept an excuse of that nature. Our inspector goes down into a district, and he gets into touch with labour organisations as well as, perhaps, with a number of employers, and I think we should not accept that kind of thing?—I think you will get some details.

114. If we could get a detailed case we should like to examine it?—I would have obtained details to bring, but for the information Mr. Steadman sent me that the different trades were coming on those points.

115. Now, to take your next point, that "other employers pay the recognised rates to a few men while they are employed on Government work, reverting back to lower rates immediately the Government contract is finished"; is there not sometimes a considerable difference between the standard of work for the Government and the standard of private work? We very often rigidly inspect and insist on a very high standard of quality, and I think some of your trade unions make us pay for it?—Yes, we do.

116. So you get a difference at once between the rate paid for Government work and the rate paid for private work, which makes one of the difficulties here?—Yes. There we are speaking exclusively of time-rates, and we do not mean piece-rates at all. We do not think the time-rates should be lower if the work is of a better quality. It means that if two men are working upon time-rates, the man who has got the piece-work to do on the work of a better quality will take longer to do it than the man who is on the work of an inferior quality. It is quite true that the Admiralty in some of our own districts pay for the riveting upon the vessels (but not for any other work) higher prices than are paid for the ordinary tramp steamer; and the same ruling applies to the liners.

117. (Chairman.) But you would not in that case describe it as an unfair house, would you?—No, not at all. In this case we are simply referring to the time-rate. We think the time-rate should be the same, and then if there was a difference in the quality of the work it would be shown in the different time it took to do it. Piece-work rates would be bound to differ, if men are to earn equally, where the work is of different qualities.

118. (Mr. Black.) Supposing it is a question of taking a lower class of work rather than of letting the workpeople be thrown out of employment. For instance, some employers told us they were busy making canvas for tents during the war between Russia and Japan, and they were rather busy for the Admiralty at the same time. When that work came to an end suddenly, they went to their workpeople and said, "Now, are you prepared to take on some cheaper work of another kind rather than be thrown out of work?" and they agreed with their people to do that kind of thing rather than that the work should pass altogether. How would you regard a case of that kind? That is done for the benefit of both sides, is it not—the employer wants to work, and it is good for the workpeople too?—As long as the employer was not lowering the prices of other people who were continually doing that kind of work.

119. Supposing a contractor has had certain work for the Government, and has more or less set up a certain current rate of wages, and then ceases to get work for the Government; he then has to compete for private work with firms who have never done Government work; is he to put himself out of court altogether, simply because he has done work in the past for the Government, although he may never do any Government work again?—No, I do not think he would put himself out of court.

120. You rather bar him by the way you put it here, do you not?—I do not quite see in what way.

121. I rather gather you to say that once he has taken up a certain rate for Government work he must never recede from it. Supposing he is competing with other firms who have never taken Government work at all, for private work, surely he is entitled to put the Government rate on one side and to compete on equal terms?—I did not mean to convey the idea you have in mind. The idea I wanted to convey was that he ought to be on equal terms. The idea I wanted to bring out was that the man who was competing at lower rates for private work than employers who recognised the rate agreed upon should not be encouraged by the Government.

122. Why should the Government control the one man and not the other?—He is making the Government pay for his unfair competition against others for private work. He is extracting from the Government sufficient profit to help him compete with the others who pay the recognised rate.

123. He may have very small Government orders, and then having suddenly lost the Government work, he competes for the private work with half-a-dozen other firms who have never touched Government work at all; do you say that he is bound by the fact that he has had a small Government order to maintain a higher standard of rates than those six firms?—We are not arguing that he should maintain a higher standard; we are only arguing that he should maintain a standard as high as the others.

124. I am assuming that it is the case that there are half-a-dozen firms who are not paying as high a standard as this man paid for the particular Government orders?—I do not see that it applies.

125. You are asking the Government to come down on this one man, you see?—Because he was not paying the agreed rate which the others are.

126. But you are seeking, after he has parted with the Government work, to complain because he has dropped back to the lower rates immediately his Government contract is finished, and we have done with the man?—I see your point now. I mean if the rates are lower than the rate generally accepted in the district.

127. (Chairman.) It is the current rate you have in mind?—Yes.

128. (Mr. Black.) I do not think that is the impression that we get from this paragraph?—That is what I mean to imply when I say they "pay the recognised rates to a few men while they are employed in Government work, reverting back to lower rates"—I should have put in "which are below the current rates"—"immediately the Government contract is finished." That is the correction I would like to make there.

129. Then with reference to the Oldbury case; I really do not know the Oldbury district, but I have been told that it lies between Birmingham and Dudley?—That is so.

130. It is partly very densely populated, and partly thins off into an almost rural district. Do you not think it is just possible, if you take that point that you mentioned, that it may be nearer the thinly populated part, and, therefore, nearer to the Dudley side of things, as it were, as regards the actual conditions, circumstances, cost of house rent, and everything of that kind, rather than being on the denser Birmingham side? Does it not seem rather hard that in a debatable district like that you should draw a hard and fast line and say that a firm ought to be struck off the list because they pay the Dudley rate, and not the Birmingham rate. When it is such a debatable area, and when the actual circumstances may not be determined by the mileage, does it not seem rather hard?—Yes, it may do so.

131. You have got a thinner populated area of country on the Dudley side than you have on the Birmingham side, so the distance does not really determine the point?—In this case, the Oldbury firm puts upon its papers that it is contractor to the Admiralty, and it is the so-and-so firm of Birmingham. All its business papers are headed "Birmingham"; but it has not an office in Birmingham, its offices are at the works at Oldbury.

132. I do not know this particular case?—Oldbury is practically just outside the radius of the City of Birmingham; it is only six miles from the centre This firm was getting contracts from the Admiralty, and was trying to get them from the London County Council. We did not make a complaint to the Admiralty because it was through before we got to know it; but in arguing with the London County Council and other municipal corporations the firm urged that they were in the Dudley district. That was investigated by an impartial body; they heard what we had to say; and they heard what the firm had to say; and they decided that the firm was not in the Dudley district, and, therefore, that they should pay the Birmingham wages.

133. I only want to make the general point that it seems a little hard to treat it as a sort of penal offence where the features are so very debatable?—It seems to me it would not be a hardship, because the paper they use when applying for a contract would have "Birmingham" on it.

134. But all that would be done by inspection. They would not deceive us for five minutes, because it would be done by inspection; our local overseer would come in and ascertain where the factory was?—Certainly; but the local overseer would not know, perhaps, the circumstances that they were citing the Dudley wages.

135. There might be Dudley and Birmingham firms in competition?—In this case I quite admit we did not make any complaint to the Admiralty. The contract was practically settled before we got to know they were in for it, and we thought it was no good making a noise after the contract was settled, although we had an immense volume of evidence which bore on the same point. I only use that as illustrating the means by which the Government can be led astray in regard to the rates paid in a locality.

136. As regards this moving into the country: are you not a little bit setting your face against what may prove to be a very useful movement? It creates some hardship on the workers in the town, naturally, to have these firms move out into the country and actively competing; still, do you not think you may be rather setting yourselves against a really good movement in itself? The worker gets healthier conditions, because, instead of having a couple of rooms in some little back slum in a city, he probably occupies a decent cottage in the country?—Yes, he may get healthier conditions.

137. It should be an example to other manufacturers; and if they find this man who is moving into the country is cutting them, it is an incentive to them to move out as well, is it not?—Take, as an illustration, the case of the firm who moved out from Leicester. It can certainly not be for the benefit of the workpeople to have the prices reduced 50 per cent. But that reduction was made possible by the man employing girls and others in the country who were not used to the work and were not capable people to do the work. I suppose it ultimately had to pass inspection; but still the employers had them practically at their mercy, and could insist on what rates they liked. Although there was no complaint, there was another firm in the North from Newcastle dealing in hosiery, but not for the Government, in which there was a strike. They simply went into the village and got the girls there, and reduced and reduced because they had all these people at their mercy. These people are tied up to the villages and cannot remove their homes, but they are subject to reductions whenever the employer sees he can make them with impunity. That is the difficulty that there is in the country districts.

138. Still, there may be bonâ fide cases?—Yes; I quite admit that.

139. And, in some cases, the worker may even get a benefit out of it?—There are employers who do it with quite the best intentions. There has never been any complaint against those firms, because in those firms the reduction may have been very slight indeed. The firms we want to stop in the different trades are those who do it with the very worst intentions; but we know there are any amount of excellent employers in the country.

140. We all recognise that. Shall we get definite proof that there was a reduction of 50 per cent?—Yes. Mr. Holmes of the Hosiery Union has the definite figures.

141. It certainly seems a very heavy cut?—Yes, it does.

142. (Mr. Wilson Fox.) Your trade, the boilermakers, is a very highly organised one and a very skilled one, is it not?—Yes.

143. Therefore probably your trade can get a uniform rate of pay in various districts more easily than almost any other trade there is?—Yes, I think we can; I think we have less trouble in that way.

144. The Boilermakers' Union are very exceptionally situated, as they have a monopoly practically of their class of work, I think?—Quite so; there is no other Trade Union in the trade.

145. I mean you can obtain your own terms pretty well about your rates of wages?—Scarcely so; there are strong federations of the employers.

146. Still, you go as near to it as anyone?—Yes.

147. And you could get as good conditions as any Union in the country?—Yes. We have a bigger weight behind us by the fact of the more complete organisation.

148. People must have boilers, and you have got all the skilled men in your Union?—Yes.

149. So you are very different to other people; but in discussing other industries, I understand that you quite admit that there must be a difference of wages according to localities, and the only difficulty arises how to fix those fairly as between district and district. You said that if an employer takes his works into a certain district in which there is no industry of that character, you might fix the rate having regard to the nearest place in which that particular industry is carried on?—Yes.

150. Would you consider whether you could not adopt the principle of taking the nearest district where that industry is carried on, having regard to the similarity of conditions between the two districts you are comparing? For instance, by taking the nearest district where that industry is carried on, you might get a rate which was very unsatisfactory—you might get a lower rate?—Yes, that is possible.

151. Supposing some papermakers went into Ipswich, and the nearest papermaking place was Bury St. Edmunds, which is a smaller place, then the papermakers at Ipswich might get a lower rate than they thought was fair, by taking Bury St. Edmunds as the standard because it was the nearest place?—That brings out this point—we would have no objection to the new centre being looked upon as paying the current rate, if an agreement could be come to with the Union and the firm there. It is only when an agreement cannot be come to, and there is no agreement, that we wish to apply the rate of the nearest centre.

152. Would it not be the best way to take the nearest place where an industry is carried on which, as far as may be, has got somewhat similar conditions, and not necessarily the nearest place?—Yes, that would be a very good way of doing it; but the question appears to me whether there would not be a debate as to what "similar conditions" meant.

153. Still, those are questions of fact. I will not go into the cost of living, but, after all, approximately, you could get at the difference in the cost of living in large towns. Rent is the chief factor, and prices may be some trouble, but practically one can say whether the cost of living to the working-man is much higher in one district than in another. That might be one element, might it not?—Do you mean the similar conditions should apply also to the cost of food and house-rent?

154. I say it might be an element, and probably it would have to be an element. I only point out to you that by taking the nearest district in which the work is carried on, the workman might be worse off than you might wish him to be?—Yes, there is that possibility, and it may happen, but I think it would be very rare that a case might happen.

155. It may be rather a crude way of doing it, and there may be better ways of ascertaining what really is a fair rate to be paid, if there is no current rate in that particular district?—I see the point in this way: Perhaps, even in my own trade, if we were to say "the nearest locality" it might be they are making quite a different type of boiler, that is to say, they might in the nearest locality be constructing water-tube boilers, and the contract might be for the old Lancashire or Cornish boilers. Then, of course, "similar conditions" would mean the nearest district doing similar work.

156. That is exactly one of my points about the words "similar conditions." I only want to put that point before you, that the nearest district for either party, employers or employed, might not be at all a satisfactory method of doing it, and that when you get these exceptional cases of a manufacturer going into a new district where there is nothing to compare with it, if we were to lay down that the nearest district in which a similar work was carried on was to be the standard, we might get an unfair result, and that another standard might have to be set up?—Yes, I think that would help it—"under similar conditions."

157. You say in your first paragraph that the employers "pay the recognised rates to the men fixing the work on the building under contract, the work itself being prepared at the works ready for fixing at wages below the recognised rates." I want to put to you, for instance, the case of a builder. He frequently does not make the materials on his own premises. Say he is putting up a building in Whitehall for the Government, do you, or do you not, go as far as to suggest that the Government should trace where those materials came from to the builder, where they were made, and whether they were made under fair conditions?—No, not quite in that sense. Take the Government building that is now going on in Whitehall; there is work coming in there that you could not trace.

158. I only want to find out how far you are going?—Some of it is coming from the Continent.

159. This man, in regard to his Government work, is paying what would satisfy all the Trade Unions for the work done in Whitehall, but some of his materials he might buy from the merchant; he might, for instance, buy an enormous number of nails from the merchant, and so on. I only want to know how far we are going in the direction of dealing with the prices paid for labour and materials which are used on Government buildings over which the immediate contractor has no control?—This applies principally to the carpenters. We say that the carpenters are employed in the shop making the work ready for fixing, and the same conditions should apply to work being prepared ready for fixing as apply to the work that is being fixed.

160. That is, in his own shop?—Yes.

161. (Chairman.) I think in answer to one of my questions you said you limited it to labour employed directly by the contractor?—Yes. Take the building in Whitehall. I have had the opportunity of going over it. Some of the plasterers' work that is being erected there, judging by the look of it, must be of Italian workmanship. I do not know whether it is or no, but we should not want to trace such a detail. I am referring to part of the work which is seldom done by Englishmen.

162. (Mr. Wilson Fox.) I would not have asked the question if I had heard you say to Sir George Murray that you put that limitation. I am quite satisfied with that, thank you. There is another point here, in which you say "other employers that contract for work that is completed inside the works employ a few odd men at the recognised rates, the rest being paid at lower rates, with the result that often inefficient men and boys do a large portion of the work under contract, although they claim that they are paying the recognised rates." If an employer, instead of employing efficient men employs, as you say, inefficient men and boys, in such a state of things as that it is no cheaper for the contractor or the employer, is it? I mean he has only got to employ more inefficient men and more boys, and then probably it will cost him just the same. I cannot conceive an employer doing it cheaper by substituting inefficient men and boys for efficient men?—He does not do it cheaper; he only thinks he does. I argue that the inefficient men are costly.

163. I should have thought the majority of the best employers would have appreciated that, and that that was not a very common occurrence?—No, it is not a common occurrence, because most employers recognise that efficient men are the best.

164. I am afraid I was a little late in coming, and I do not know whether anybody has asked you this question. You use the phrase in your proof, "employers who refuse to pay recognised Trade Union rates." Of course, the Fair Wages Clause does not mention Trade Union rates?—No, it says "the current rate."

165. I think it says "the rate current in the district," which is not quite the same thing?—No, it is not quite the same thing. When that Resolution was passed in 1891, the Trade Union world had the impression that it meant the Trade Union rate; and after all we consider the current rate should be the rate that has been generally agreed upon between the employers and the workmen's associations.

166. That is rather interesting; you thought at the time that it meant the Trade Union rate?—Yes, from watching the course of the debate. We consider it is only the faulty wording of it. It was meant to be the recognised rate as agreed upon between the employers and the workmen, which after all means the Trade Union rate.

167. You have got your rates, for instance, in the large towns, and so the point there is quite ascertainable; but you are in just as much trouble as the Government would be if a certain industry went out into the middle of Suffolk and set up there, because you would have no Trade Union rate there?—Yes, that is the difficulty.

168. You are just as much in a difficulty there as Mr. Bailey might be at the Stationery Office in trying to ascertain what the current rate would be?—Yes. The difficulty is that in going out into districts like that a union that is not strongly organised has to fight the position, and it is impossible to do anything, with the result that under the wording of this Resolution they cannot bring to bear any pressure upon the Government Departments in respect of firms of this description.

169. Then some industries have no Trade Union?—Very few in these days.

170. They are very few, but there are some?—Yes.

171. Supposing, for instance, that the Government were setting up an experimental farm somewhere, there would be no Trade Union rate in that case?—No, there would not be.

172. I see that you say in your suggestion as to what the Fair Wages Clause should be, that the schedule of wages shall be posted in some conspicuous place. Do you mean that when the contract is first handed to you and the men are first started at work, the rate they are then being paid when the work is started should be put up in the works, and then that any changes that are made should be notified? Supposing it is a long contract—for five years—and the current rate changed in the district during the time, you would suggest, I suppose, that the contractor who was doing the work for the Government should be changing his wages as the current rate in the district changes?—He would do that if he was one of the contractors that were acting with the employers' federations.

173. And he would be bound to do so, do you think, under the Fair Wages Clause?—Yes, he would be doing that, and we say that the man who is connected with Government work, and who is paying what rates he deemed best himself, should be compelled to do the same thing.

174. Would you put on this schedule all changes of that sort always?—Certainly; when changes take place in the district.

175. The last thing you want in the Resolution is that an unfair house shall not be eligible for Government work; you would find it very difficult, would you not, in some districts to say what is an unfair house?—It would be a house that was paying rates lower than were recognised in the trade.

176. In these districts which we have been discussing, you would have just as much difficulty in some cases as the Government in saying what was an unfair house, would you not?—Yes. There may be cases in that direction. I quite admit it would, perhaps, limit the tenders being asked for to the firms within the bigger and more populous districts. That, of course, would be the effect of it.

177. We all know it is pretty easy to find out what is the current rate, or, you may say, taking your own standard, what is a fair house, in a large town where there are a considerable number of works of the same character carried on; but the difficulty of all these questions arises in the exceptional cases, and to lay down what is an unfair house and what is not an unfair house might give the Trade Union just as much trouble, I suggest, as the Government to find out?—I do not think so. In most of the unions we know our fair employers; we know the employers who have agreed to pay a certain fixed basis of wages, and we characterise those that do not agree as unfair houses.

178. I am thinking of the works that go out—for instance, to Bury St. Edmunds and Bungay, and similar districts in Suffolk, the printing, paper-making, and so on. Where there is no standard, it would be very difficult, would it not, to say what is an unfair house, when it is once admitted that a different rate of wages is a fair thing to be paid in different districts, having regard to the nature of the district and the cost of living?—Yes; but there would be a big field, I think, for competition, even if the effect of our suggestion did limit the firms to those who were in the more populous districts.

179. That is another point, is it not, if we have got to fall back on that?—I know that would be the effect. What we are anxious to avoid is these firms being taken out into the country districts with these altered conditions and so bringing wages down in the trade.

180. Of course, the question of intention is a very difficult one to arrive at, is it not?—I do not say it is the intention to do it specially with regard to Government work; but, after all, it is a question of money, and it must be an intention of trying to cheapen production.

181. Still, I think you have got to face the fact that with the increased facilities for transport—tramways, railways, and so on—and with the high rates in towns, the tendency will be for these businesses to go out, and you have got to face the problem of these difficulties as much as the Government Departments have. That is all I was suggesting to you?—Yes; we know we have got to face those problems.

182. (Mr. De la Bère.) By a recognised Trade Union rate, you mean, I take it, a rate agreed upon between the employer and the union?—Yes.

183. In the more highly organised trades I imagine you would have no difficulty in getting the employer to pay his girls properly, because you would call your men out if he does not?—We should not have the slightest difficulty in that.

184. Most of the cases which you have mentioned as illustrating the methods of evasion would apply to the less highly organised trades?—Yes; and to districts where the men were not well organised; in even some of the well-organised trades it is true of just a few places.

185. You are anxious to get the Government to intervene to supplement the deficiencies, as it were, of the less organised—that is practically what it comes to, is it not?—We look at it also from this standard, as I have said more than once, that the effect of all this is a lowering of conditions all round, thus tempting the best employers to come down to their level. While we are willing to fight that with the private employers, we do look to the Government to help us with their contracts as being responsible for the Government of the country.

186. As regards the inefficient men and boys, I take it that the real difficulty is that in many classes of work it is very often an open and disputed question whether certain portions or a certain class of work is not properly boys' work; is that a real difficulty?—Yes; but in our trades we have got considerable numbers of apprentices.

187. That is rather exceptional; but there are other trades where there are certain operations which some people hold can quite properly be performed by boys and others maintain should be performed by men. That is a class of case you had in your view, I suspect, is it?—Yes. It is a class of case where perhaps there was a difference of opinion as to whether it was really boys' work or not. In the trades where there are apprentices, that objection never comes in, and the boys are allowed to do anything they are capable of doing.

188. But in the bulk of the trades which are employed on most Government contracts there are no apprentices now, I suppose?—No; I suppose there are not.

The witness withdrew.

Mr. Thomas Ellis Naylor, called and examined.

189. (Chairman.) You represent the London Society of Compositors as their General Secretary, I think?—Yes.

190. What we wish to ascertain from you is what objections you take to the present form of the Fair Wages Clause in Government contracts, and to the operation of it. You have got some instances, I think, of how it is evaded?—Yes, that is so.

191. Will you state them in your own words?—The present phraseology of the Fair Wages Clause is, as I understand it, "the current rate of the district." In my own particular trade there are many districts where there are no printers and therefore no current rate for printers. Many of the contracting firms in London, being in a large way of business and having plenty of capital, have put up branch establishments in districts that have either a low rate or no rate at all. A large firm in London may conceivably set up a branch establishment in a quiet country town where there are no printers; they may set up a large establishment there and employ a large number of operatives and determine what they shall pay those operatives, which, of course, becomes the current rate of the district, there being no other printers in the district. Seeing that the object of the Fair Wages Resolution was, first of all, to preserve a fair rate of wages to the employees and to avoid sweating in any form, it follows that if there is no current rate in a district, and there is no supervision as to what rate is fixed by the employer when he sets up these branch establishments, that he is in a position to pay such a rate as we might conceivably describe as being unfair. Our trade may be different from many others in the fact that there are a large number of towns where printers do not exist. In some cases branch houses have been set up during the past ten years and conditions have been introduced which we, as printers, regard as unfair. For instance, in my own department of the printing trade—and I only represent one department, that is the composing department, and I have no desire to speak for any other department—we regard the work of a compositor as work to be done by a man and not by a woman. That man gets a certain wage in London, which is 39s. We have found that certain contracting firms, and non-contracting firms too, but all of them potential contractors, have set up a house or branch in these districts and have introduced female compositors, not because female compositors can do the work any better—they cannot do it so well—but because they are in a position to teach girls, and quite young girls, the art and mystery of composing, and are paying them at a rate considerably below what we should regard as fair even for extra-London rates. There are instances where girls are employed at wages ranging from a few shillings up to about 29s. and 30s., according to their proficiency and experience. We contend that the work is men's work, or if women are to work at the same industry, that they should be paid the same rate as the men, seeing that we are discussing State work and Government contracts; otherwise the effect of introducing this female labour at a lower rate of remuneration means that in London, where the work possibly would have been done, or in the towns where higher prices for printers prevail, this work is being done by women and girls at low rates of pay and consequently at greater profits to the printer, setting up conditions which are not good for the community in the large towns, where the men are consequently thrown out of work.

192. May I interrupt you for one moment? On what ground do you contend that composing is work for men and not for women?—By the fact that it always has been regarded as men's work, and a large number of men consequently have been trained to do that work. The supply of labour, I think you will agree, always follows the demand, and if the demand has been set up for a large proportion of male labour, and a large number of apprentices have been introduced into the trade to supply the demand based on past experience and based also on the possible increase in the total amount of work to be produced, it follows that conditions are set up inimical to the interests of the community. A large number of men are attracted to the trade because it is a man's employment, and then conditions are introduced which makes the labour of those men a negligible quantity, and they are not required, if women and girls are introduced at a lower rate of wages and under conditions that men will not submit to. Therefore, by the introduction of cheap female labour, it follows that conditions are set up in the larger towns, by throwing men out of work, that are inimical to the interests of the community at large.

193. You do not suggest that there is anything unsuitable in the work for women, do you?—No, I do not.

194. It is merely on the ground that there are men already in it, and that it is unfair to prejudice them by the introduction of women; is that it?—Yes. I may say that women cannot do all the work. They can do only a certain proportion, the lighter portion of it. The composing department is divided into several sections. There is the simple task of setting type from the case, and the girls are generally put to that class of work. Then there is heavier work when the type is composed and made up into pages; they have to be put on a table similar to this, and locked up and taken off the stone, which is heavy work, and put on to the machine, which is also heavy work—work which girls cannot do. Consequently men are necessary in the department, although girls are employed; the girls are allowed to do the lighter part of the work. Against the presence of girls I do not suppose anyone would object, if they are paid the same price as the men for the same work. But when we find that contractors and non-contractors are employing these girls, taking them away from industries where there is a large demand for their labour—labour that cannot be supplied by men—it does not seem to me to be fair that these contracting firms should set up economic conditions entirely foreign to the trade.

195. Would not your argument lead to stereotyping the present form of labour in all departments? If a man is never to lose his work because some other form of labour is introduced, you would lose half the new inventions of the day, I suppose?—If you carry the argument to that extreme I should be prepared to acknowledge that that would be so, for, of course, I am bound to recognise that we are face to face with economic problems which we have to deal with in a practical manner. As an abstract proposition, I would say the present conditions should be stereotyped rather than that any body of men should be deprived of the right to live. But I am not urging that on you now, because I prefer to deal with the matter from the practical point of view. Here is labour-saving machinery introduced to cheapen the cost of production; against that my union has never taken any exception. We have had labour-saving machinery—the Linotype, the Monotype, the Wicks—all these machines have been introduced, and have, of course, displaced a large amount of labour. To that we have placed absolutely no opposition whatever. Although we have been sorry to think that our members should be displaced by these machines, yet we are bound to recognise that in the march of progress these things will come and will have to be met in some way or other. In the long run, of course, labour-saving machinery serves ultimately to increase the demand by cheapening the cost of production.

196. Might not the march of progress include the employment of women at lower wages than men?—Not if the direct result of the employment of women is to lead to the disorganisation of employment in the ranks of the men; seeing, too, that the wages paid to these women would not be considered to be a living wage, except for the fact that many of them have only themselves to keep, and many of them also have not even so much as themselves to keep and are simply working for a little extra money.

197. Then, is this your objection to the introduction of women, that it is a cheaper form of labour than the employment of men?—That it is a cheaper form of labour.

198. I am afraid that was rather a digression from what you began with. You were speaking of the transfer of a business from the town to the country, and the difficulty of fixing a current rate where there was no other employer in the district. Have you any suggestion for meeting that difficulty. How are you, in fact, to fix the current rate where there is only one person employing labour in the district?—I suggest you should employ the term "Trade Union rates and conditions." The Trade Union responsible for the control of that particular area would, of course, have an existing Trade Union rate which would apply to that district where hitherto there had been no printers.

199. They would have an organisation, would they?—They would have an organisation to cover that area, but there being no printers previously at work in that district, of course, the union would be out of contact and would have no control, and the current rate of the district would be fixed without reference to the Union.

200. You would leave the current rate of that district to be settled by the Trade Union duly formed, would you?—By the Trade Union in conjunction with the Masters' Association. Our own Union in London have an existing agreement with the master printers, and that rate covers an area of 15 miles from the General Post Office. There is another association that has the control of the areas outside of London, but their control is confined chiefly to the larger towns, for the simple reason that there are no printers in the smaller ones, and consequently no call for their duties. A large London printer will set up a branch in a district which is not under the control of the extra-metropolitan unions, with the result that he fixes his own rate. I do not say he fixes it at half the union rate, but he fixes it at something less. Consequently the union responsible for the particular area is taken at a disadvantage, because that is done without the knowledge of the union. Although the union could apply an existing agreement with the master printers, all these conditions are set up without the union's knowledge, for the simple reason that it is an out-of-the-way town that is chosen, and the master printer concerned takes good care not to advertise his methods too widely, with the result that these conditions are set up possibly in the course of a twelvemonth, and become thoroughly established. Then, of course, the union agreement covering that area is not properly observed by the particular branch of the firm that is set up in this district.

201. I thought we were taking the case of an area which was not covered by any union?—Theoretically the whole area is covered by the unions, but these districts do not come within what I might call the active area of the unions. There is a union, we will say, at Manchester which will have an effective control at Manchester and in all the large towns of Lancashire, but coming farther south there would be a gap between London and Manchester owing to the nature of the industries in that particular part of the country, which has not hitherto embraced printing. Naturally a printer, when he is looking out for a place, would choose that place which is the most remote from the centre of influence of the unions, so that he may do just as he pleases and set up the conditions that suit him best.

202. Supposing he takes a place, isolated and not, as you say, under the active control of any branch of your

Union, how are you to deal with him?—My suggestion is that he should be made to conform to the conditions laid down in the nearest town governed by the Union conditions.

203. The nearest town to the place where he has fixed his works?—To the place where he sets up his office.

204. Would that be always right, do you think?—I think it is the only security that the Government would have to ensure that the Fair Wages Resolution was obeyed.

205. Is it not conceivable that it might be fair to pay a lower rate of wages than in the nearest town, supposing it was in a purely rural district, say?—It is conceivable, and I daresay would work out so in practice in many instances. I may say that the Manchester Union, which controls a very large area, would make allowances, and do make allowances, in their existing agreements. Their agreements with the Manchester employers are several shillings a week higher than the terms that would prevail in the extreme east and west, their recognised rate ranging from 26s. up to about 36s.

206. Practically I think your suggestion comes to this, that the employer who moves his works to a new locality ought to be compelled to come to terms with his workmen on a basis to be fixed by the agreement between the nearest employers and the nearest workmen?—That is my suggestion.

207. In fact, he must join hands, so to speak, with the Masters' Union nearest to him?—Yes.

208. And the workmen in the same way would come under the control of the nearest workmen of their class?—That is so.

209. Would you go to your next point. I think you describe the conditions which do not conform to the spirit of the resolution as being excessive and underpaid overtime, and cheap boy and girl labour?—Yes. My suggestion is that you should endeavour to enforce Trade Union conditions as well as rates. In industrial conditions the rate of wages is only one factor in the treatment of the employees. There are others—hours, for instance. The Fair Wages Resolution makes no mention whatever of the hours of labour; it deals simply with rates of wages. Yet one employer might be paying 30s. a week and working his men 50 hours, and another might be paying 40s. a week, and yet, by working more hours, be treating his employees still more unfairly. At present you have no safeguard against an employer working his men and women an excessive number of hours per week. You have no safeguard against any employer compelling his employees to work overtime while paying them no extra rates for that overtime. We in our Union regard excessive overtime, whether paid or not paid, as unfair. We have set down a limit beyond which no man shall work in excess, and if conditions are introduced which would compel a man to work longer hours than we consider he ought to be allowed to work, then those conditions are necessarily to us unfair.

209*a*. Would not the "current rate" include the current rate for overtime as well as ordinary time?—The rate paid undoubtedly might be so arranged as to include the rate of pay for overtime. I am speaking now more particularly in reference to the excessive number of hours overtime worked, because an employer may easily compel his men to work two or three nights a week in addition to the day work. That is done frequently, and has been done in the printing trade in the past.

210. But they would be paid for that as night work?—Yes, they would be paid; but then there is another element in sweating besides that of low wages, and that is excessive hours of labour.

211. (Mr. Wilson Fox.) Even though paid at a fair rate, do you mean?—Even though paid at a fair rate the man would still be sweated, in so far as he is working excessive hours and is compelled to work excessive hours whether he wishes to or not.

212. (Chairman.) Have you rules limiting overtime?—In London we have a rule that a man shall not work more than eight hours' overtime per week.

213. (Mr. Bailey.) Do you know if the Typographical Association have a similar rule?—They have not a similar rule. In regard to boy labour, you have no protection against that in the Fair Wages Resolution. A man may pay fair rates of wages, he may work the recognised hours, and he may at the same time have twice as many apprentices or boys, against which the same objections may be urged as against cheap labour. You cannot say that is covered under the Resolution as it stands. If you specify Trade Union rates or conditions, or at any rate, if you use the word "conditions," that will cover all these points; and that seems to me to be far preferable to the present wording, and also to conform to the spirit in which the Resolution was passed.

214. (Chairman.) I think you propose to show that while London prices form the basis of many tenders, the work, or a large portion of it, may be sent to a country branch. What do you mean exactly by London prices forming the basis of a tender? I imagine that the tenders are sent in and accepted without reference to the place where the contractor lives?—What I mean is this: There are large London firms who would contract possibly for Government work, and they may have a London house and a branch house in the country. I believe that in one case there was a firm in London who contracted for Government work at London prices, because they only had London men, and it is obvious that such a firm can only contract at London prices when they have only got a London house. But this firm, having got a contract, set up a branch establishment some distance from London, where even a fair rate of wages, the recognised rate, might have been paid. They were receiving London prices for their work and sending the work away, or part of the contract away, to be done at their branch house at less than London rates. I am only pointing that out to show how easy it is for large offices, who happen to have sufficient capital, to set up branches in the country. Even those houses in London now that have no country branches may conceivably tender for Government work. They will take the London scale as a basis for tendering, and after having secured a ten years' contract it will pay them to invest a few thousand pounds in erecting a small printing office outside London and sending all the work to that office, for which they would be paid London rates, and yet they would be producing it under the cheaper country conditions.

215. I do not quite see why you call them London rates. The contractor who succeeded in getting that contract tendered at a certain price, I suppose; and in tendering he was in competition with people all over the country very likely. Why should you say that his price was a London price more than the price at which his provincial competitors tendered?—Because it seems to me that a London employer can only tender upon the prices that he pays to his men—that is, his wage cost, or his estimate of the wages that he will have to pay in London. In the past London men have succeeded in getting the contract, in spite of the fact that the London rate is so much higher than the provincial rate.

216. But suppose the contractor, knowing what he was going to do, and that he was going to put this work into his country branch, did not tender on what you call the London prices, but tendered on some other basis?—He might do that.

217. Why should you assume that he tendered on the basis of his London prices?—I point out that that can be done, and may be done. A London employer, for instance, may have sufficient work at the present time to keep the whole of his London staff employed, and he has no means of extending his premises, but he is anxious to extend his business. If he can get a Government contract for ten years, valued at some thousands of pounds, and he has a desire to get that work, he cannot do it in London, therefore he will open a country branch and do that work in the country. He may conceivably tender at the country rate, but possibly not. I venture to think that there have been cases in the past where London prices have been asked (and yet the work has gone into the country), because the nature of the work necessitated a great proportion of it being done in London. There are Minutes, Reports, and so on, proofs of which are wanted next morning, and consequently it would be impossible to get that work done in the country. But then the Government tenders embrace all kinds of work, including work which is not required immediately afterwards, and that work would, of course, be sent outside of London. Now, country firms who are in competition with London firms are not able to compete for many of the contracts that would be in the market, for the simple reason that they cannot answer to the time conditions, and consequently are out of the running altogether.

218. But if the contractor does pay the current rate of the district, and if it is a bonâ fide current rate, why should you object to his having got the contract on what you call London prices?—I do not object to it as a Trade Unionist. I simply put that before the Committee as not being quite in the interests of the State. If it is possible for a tender to be received lower than the tender which is successful from the same man, surely the Government should not be called upon to pay the difference beyond what might be called a fair rate of profit.

219. Perhaps they cannot get anybody to compete with him, and they are obliged to? That is the way in which these cases turn up, of course?—That may be so at the present time, but then if you have got one firm who is able to do this, it will soon follow that other firms will copy the example set, and there will be competition.

220. That you do not object to as a Trade Unionist, do you?—We do not object to competition, provided the competition is fair.

221. And you do not object to the contractor performing the work anywhere that he can, provided he pays the proper rate?—Provided he pays a fair rate of wages and observes Trade Union conditions.

222. Then you propose to show that this practice of sending work into the country does not lead to expedition in executing certain kinds of work, and has practically the same drawbacks as subletting. I do not quite see why you connect it with subletting?—The evils of subletting in its relation to the conditions imposed by the Fair Wages Resolution are that the first contractor does not know, or is not in close association with the conditions under which the work is being produced. I should say from what I know of certain firms that the conditions under which work is produced in these country establishments are not known to the real heads of the firm, who are generally in London, and that the management being entirely separate, and isolated in many cases, the capital also being separate, and consequently the profit on the business having to be made out of that business as distinct from the London business, it follows that there is not the same supervision from the head of the firm that is responsible that there would be supposing all the work was done in the same establishment. Therefore, you see there is the same lack of responsibility on the part of the local management as would exist in the case of the sub-contractor.

223. Except that you can get in this case at the actual contractor, and in the case of subletting you cannot, because you have the actual contractor under the obligations of his contract, one of them being to pay the proper rate of wages?—Yes, but then if no steps are taken to secure that in his branch house fair rates and conditions are being observed, there might just as well be a sub-contractor.

224. We have to secure that he carries out the terms of his contract, of course. Then you propose that the Fair Wages Resolution should stipulate for Trade Union rates and conditions of employment. Do you mean by that the rates agreed upon between masters and men, or the rates suggested by the Union?—I should be satisfied with the rates that are agreed upon between the employers and the employed.

225. That is substantially what is described in the Resolution as the current rate, is it not?—I take it that the current rate is not necessarily the Trade Union rate.

226. It would be the rate generally agreed upon, would it not?—Yes; but in many districts and in many trades there are no employers' organisations, and no agreements existing between the two parties; therefore the current rate in that instance is uncertain and is an indefinable rate.

227. How do you propose to define it? Are you any better off if you define it as the Trade Union rate?—Yes, because you may depend upon it that there is a Trade Union there. Most trades are organised nowadays, especially trades that would do Government work. Consequently if you have a Union, whether they have an agreement with the employers or not, the fact that the Union is there shows that there will be a Union rate, and that Union rate would be obtained by their members. Consequently you would be safe in taking that to be the fair rate of the district. There are no other means of ascertaining what is a fair rate, except by getting what those who are responsible, and those who represent the trade, have already fixed and determined as being a fair rate.

228. (Mr. De la Bère.) You are speaking now of other trades than your own?—Yes.

229. In your own trade they are synonymous practically, are they not?—Quite so. In my own trade there are employers' associations, and we have got on very well with the employers always. We endeavour to meet round the table and get a scale of prices very similar to the manner adopted by the miners. For that reason what is the Trade Union rate would be admitted by the employers themselves as the fair rate for the district. The only weakness of our position, if one may say so, is that outside of London we do not cover all the area that might be covered; consequently there are large patches of country where no agreements exist. It is in these places where printers in the past, and printers possibly in the future, will exploit, for the special reason that they are not troubled and worried by the Trade Union, and not compelled to pay Trade Union rates.

230. (Chairman.) Your last suggestion is that the contractors should be called upon to declare where the work is to be executed; what is the object of that from your point of view?—I am so much concerned with the interests of the Government that I did not deal with that from my own point of view. I think in the case of Government work the Government should know where it is to be produced, because my experience shows that in the past the Government could not have known where certain of its printing was being done, or going to be done. They knew the London firm which contracted for it, and they gave the tender to a London firm, but possibly many members of the Government might be surprised to know that the work had been sent out of London. Therefore, it seems to me, in the interests of Government Departments, that they should know where the work is being produced.

231. (Mr. Bailey.) You mentioned just now the cheap boy and girl labour; does your society limit the number of apprentices in any way?—Yes. Our limit is in the proportion of one apprentice to three journeymen.

232. I take it then that any labour which in your opinion might be properly put into the hands of boys you would contend should be given simply to the apprentices?—To the apprentices or to the journeymen.

233. I am thinking of boy labour?—We generally apply the term "boy labour" to apprentices as well, and when we speak of "boy labour" we mean apprentices as well as boys who are not apprentices.

234. You have mentioned also the long hours which are sometimes exacted for perhaps the Trade Union rate of wages; that is to say, supposing that you put 39s. a week down as the proper rate of wage for so many hours a week, there are certain employers who would pay the 39s. a week, but who would exact a greater number of hours than you would recognise?—Yes, and I think they could do that without violating the letter of the present Fair Wages Resolution, although they would be violating the spirit.

235. Have you considered whether that would not fall under that clause of the Resolution which forbids sweating?—I think it is an arguable point, but I do not think many employers would stop to consider that.

236. (Chairman.) Have you ever raised that question of employment for too long hours?—Raised the question where?

237. Have you ever complained that a contractor holding a Government contract is overworking his men in that way?—No, I think not. In our own Union the rule limiting overtime was passed by the members; it was not passed unanimously, as you may suppose, but the majority rules. Consequently, although there may be some men who may prefer to work night and day unceasing for the money they would get, yet the majority of the members of my Union have declared against excessive overtime, and have fixed the limit at 8 hours. In some cases I think you will agree that it is necessary to save a man from himself, and that it is not right that a man should be allowed to do anything, simply because he thinks it is to his own personal benefit to do it. A man may think it an advantage to himself to be intemperate in many ways, and yet the community imposes restrictions to prevent that man doing as he pleases. Here the Union steps in in the case of those men who are intemperate in the manner in which they endeavour to add to their wages by working excessive overtime. Not only is it done in the interests of the physical well-being and the moral well-being of the men, but it is also done with the view that those men outside the offices, who have no opportunity perhaps of getting work all the year round, shall have a greater or a more equitable opportunity of finding it, as the result of curtailing the hours of labour of the larger number.

238. (Mr. Wilson Fox.) With regard to this question of women, you have expressed your opinion upon the principle, but on the question of fact, at the present time, at any rate, there is not serious competition, is there, between men and women as compositors outside Scotland?—There is very little competition, but what competition there is is serious.

239. I may be wrong, and perhaps you will correct me if I am, but outside Scotland, where there are special circumstances, I do not know of any place where they employ these women except Reading, and possibly Dunstable?—Yes.

240. I may be wrong, and if you know of any other instances I should be glad to hear of them?—There are firms at Wolverton, Bushey and Maidstone, where they have girl labour.

241. Compositors?—Yes, certainly, girl compositors. As these offices have created a precedent, does it not follow that if they are allowed to do so unchecked, other offices will follow suit, and therefore the competition will become serious?

242. I only want to know the extent of it. A man is apprenticed for seven years?—Yes.

243. A woman is never learning for anything like that length of time, is she?—No.

244. Not more than four years?—No, I suppose not.

245. And then a large number of them, after they have been there a few years, go off and get married?—The lucky ones, yes.

246. You have got the majority of them who have not had anything like the training that men have had, and a large number of them going off to be married. The consequence is that you have got a less skilled class of women, and also a class remaining a very much shorter time at this work, and therefore they have very much less opportunity of becoming skilled. Therefore, as a matter of fact, you have not got very much to be afraid of from a practical point of view in their competition, have you?—I am afraid that we have, and if it were not for the Union in London, I venture to think that women would be all over the London trade. Fortunately, the London Union has been strong enough to keep them entirely out; but these London houses, as soon as they get beyond the sphere of influence of the London Union, by moving 20 or 30 miles outside, at once set up the conditions that I know they would set up in London if they thought they could do so unchecked.

247. Do you object to the employment of women as a principle, or do you only object to their being employed at a lower rate of wages?—I do not object to the employment of women in my trade, or in any trade, provided they are employed on equal terms with the men. You mentioned just now four years; that emphasises the point I made some time back that these girls are not able to do the whole art of compositors, but are limited to certain preliminary, as I may say, portions of compositors' work, and beyond that they cannot go, because of physical disabilities.

248. That is why I asked you whether you are really afraid of the competition, because you admit the physical disability; and they are doing a lower class of work on the whole?—They are not doing a lower class of work. I do not think that would be a correct term to use. They are doing work which every compositor is called upon to do at some time or other, that is, plain composition. Every compositor has to do that; it is not the inferior work; it is simply another portion of the work. Because it happens to make no demand upon the physical energy of the women, they are easily able to do it. But then the men have done, and are still doing, just the same class of work, combined, of course, with the many operations that go to make up the compositor's calling.

249. Do I understand that if they were paid the same rates for similar work to what the men are doing, you would not object?—No, we should not object.

250. Supposing they were paid the same piece-rate as the men are getting, you would not object?—We should not object. Membership of my Union is open to any lady (in fact, we had a lady member at one time) who is qualified to take up her card.

251. All I want from you is to find out whether your objection is on principle, or whether it is on the question of the money payment?—It is purely one of pay.

252. I understand that the work of the Scottish women in Scotland is very mechanical, as the Scottish work consists mainly of reprinting cheap London books?—That is so.

253. And that it is work which is much less skilled than many other classes of printing work?—Let me explain: the nature of the work is the same, but it happens to have more than the usual quantity of what we call straightforward composition. Now there is jobbing work and book-work——

254. That is purely a mechanical operation, is it not?—No, not at all, excuse me.

255. But it is much more like newspaper work?—Yes, but please do not assume that the compositor's work, even on newspapers, is mechanical. There is the copy—the transcript of this evidence possibly—after it has got into the printer's hands, and the copy is well written or badly written, and that has to be understood by the men or women composing it; and a certain amount of education is required in order to connect the sense of the subject and to punctuate it properly, as well as the mere mechanical operation of picking up the stamps, which is a subsidiary operation altogether.

256. All I want to emphasise is that these women in Scotland, where they are more largely employed, are doing a less difficult operation than they would be doing in most houses in London?—Possibly, as you say they are doing reprints—work which has been already printed once.

257. (Chairman.) Is there anything you would like to add to what you have said?—I do not think I can add anything more. I wish to emphasise what I and my members regard as being so highly important, and that is that the only gauge which the Government can have in determining what is and what is not a fair rate of wages and what are fair conditions of employment, is by comparison with the rates and the conditions already secured by the Trade Unions. The Trade Unions have devoted several generations to the work for the establishment of certain conditions, and I do not think any one can say that those conditions are better than they ought to be. If, therefore, they are not better than they ought to be, but only just so good as the Unions have been able to secure for their members, it suggests itself that those are the rates of pay and the conditions of employment that the Government should desire to enforce in all their contracts.

258. (Mr. Westcott.) The rate of pay is not sufficient; you want conditions as well—that is really what you mean, is it not?—That is so; we want the whole economy of the industry as recognised by the Trade Unions to be taken into account.

259. (Mr. Wilson Fox.) But you are satisfied with your organisation and the employers' organisation in London as a method for settling wages, are you not?—Yes.

260. What you want to do is to strengthen those organisations outside London; is that it?—My idea is to secure that the Government gets its work done fairly.

261. And by strengthening the organisations outside London you might do that?—Yes, possibly.

The witness withdrew.

SECOND DAY,

Thursday, 28th November, 1907,

At 32, Great George Street, Westminster, S.W.

PRESENT:

SIR GEORGE H. MURRAY, K.C.B. (Chairman).

Mr. R. BAILEY, M.V.O.
Mr. F. W. BLACK.
Mr. H. DE LA BÈRE, C.B.
Mr. A. WILSON FOX, C.B.
Mr. A. F. KING.
Mr. J. B. WESTCOTT, M.V.O.
Mr. J. J. WILLS (Secretary).

Mr. ARTHUR HARRIS, called and examined.

262. (Chairman.) You represent the Labour Protection League, I understand?—Yes.

263. You are its General Secretary?—Yes.

264. Could you give us some idea of the object of that League?—It is simply a registered Trade Union for unskilled labour and machinists in Woolwich Arsenal.

265. How many members have you got?—About 3,500 to 4,000 in the London district.

266. All in London?—Yes, either on the North or South of the Thames, from London Bridge to Woolwich.

267. Are any of your members in Government employment?—Yes, nearly 2,000.

268. Then you will have about 2,000 outside?—Yes.

269. What have you to say as regards the working of the Fair Wages Clause in Government contracts?—I have brought some striking instances of the working of the Fair Wages Clause as far as it affects unskilled labour. I propose only to deal with those, because we have had so much trouble in the House of Commons, whenever a discussion has been on about wages paid by the Government direct, as to what is the Trade Union rate in the district.

270. The words of the clause are the "current rate," as you know?—Yes, it is the current rate, or the standard rate, as some say. The Government on March 8, 1906, accepted this resolution: "That in the opinion of this House, the conditions of labour in the Arsenal should be, as regards wages and rights of combination, equal to the best Trade Union private firm."

271. They are dealing there with the Arsenal?—That is right. They would not take a minimum wage, as was proposed at first, but they accepted the rates of wages paid by the best firms in the district. I have got a list of 31 firms who are Government contractors within the London area. Some of them contract for machinery under the Admiralty, some of them for munitions of war under the War Office, and others under the Post Office for the general implements that are used there. The whole question is the minimum rate of wages. Whenever we raise a question about Government contractors not paying the wages, we can never get what we call a proper Trade Union rate of wages recognised by the Government for unskilled labour.

272. Do you mean by the Government for the purposes of the contract, or by the Government for the purposes of paying its own men?—Either way, whether you refer it to the contractor or whether you refer it to the Government direct. They will not accept what we term the rate of the district.

273. We are now dealing, you see, not with the rate that the Government itself pays to its own employees, but with the rate paid by its contractors to their men?—I understand.

274. I want you to confine yourself to that point, if you would?—All right; I will. I have got 31 firms on my list here, as I say, and only one of those firms pays 6d. an hour to its labourers in the London district. That one firm comprises two works, that which was Messrs. Penns, which is the Thames Limited, and one at West Ham, which is the Thames Limited. That is the only firm that contracts for Government work which pays 6d. an hour for unskilled labour. In the year 1889, after what was termed the Great Dock Strike, that rate was generally recognised to be the price for unskilled labour.

275. You would infer from what you say, would you not, that the current rate in that district is less than 6d. per hour?—I may quote a navvy who works for the Borough Council or who works for a private contractor; he gets 7½d. an hour, and the bricklayer gets 7d.

276. Where?—In the same district where the factory hand is compelled to exist on 5d. an hour working for the Government indirectly on a Government contract.

277. But the bricklayer, for instance, would be a skilled labourer?—I should have said the bricklayer's labourer. In the London area he gets 7d. per hour, a scaffolder gets 7½d., and an excavator gets 7½d. Those are accepted as Trade Union conditions by even the London County Council.

278. You find that 30 firms out of the 31 in the district you are speaking of pay less than 6d.?—Yes, and some of them pay as low as 5d. or 4½d. per hour for a week of 54 hours.

279. (Mr. Bailey.) Are all those 31 firms Government contractors?—They are Government contractors, and are taken from the Government list supplied by the War Office.

280. (Chairman.) Does that not suggest, as I said before, that the current rate in that district is less than 6d.?—I have just made the statement that if you take the unskilled labour—and you would term the bricklayer's labourer unskilled, you would term the road sweeper unskilled, and you would term the navvy, as we call him, unskilled—the rates I have quoted for it are 7d. and 7½d., and the other would be about 30s.

281. All in that district?—In any district in London; and I am only quoting the London district. I have a firm here outside the London area, who are large Government contractors and who are paying their labourers 4d. per hour.

282. What sort of work are they engaged on?—They are engaged on general labouring work—any work that is required of an unskilled character.

283. Where are they?—At Ponders End, near Edmonton. Then a firm at Charlton are large Government contractors for the Post Office, and they are paying as low as 4½d. per hour, and 1½d. per hour for girls on Government contracts.

284. Have you any other evidence besides what you have mentioned as to the rate being 6d., 7d., and 7½d.?—Yes. The docks have unskilled labour—that is, all the docks in the London area; and I am pleased to say outside the London area there are better wages than we have got even in London, as far as the dock work goes. The labourers there who are casual are mostly on piece-work, but there is not one of those men employed at less than 6d. or 7d. an hour, 6d. being the very lowest.

285. Have you complained to any of the Departments that contract with those firms that they are not paying a fair rate?—Yes, we have, lots of times.

286. And what answers did you get?—We rarely got an answer at all from the firms.

287. But from the Government Department?—That they were trying to ascertain the facts that we have laid before you. We have been told that they have altered them, but we have inquired, and we have not found out that there has been any alteration made.

288. Have you got any specific instances in which you have not got satisfaction from the Government Department?—Yes; in the cases of these firms at Deptford and Bromley-by-Bow.

289. What answers did you get in those cases from the Department that was contracting?—That there were inquiries being made.

290. You never got anything else?—I never got anything else.

291. You never got a final answer?—No, never; and I have complained to the heads both of the Admiralty and the War Office, namely, to the First Lord and to the Secretary of State for War.

292. When was that?—On three or four occasions. I have been, under successive Governments, responsible for asking the Government to advance the wages of its own employees, and we have had to quote firms in support of the application. The only firms that we could quote in that district, practically speaking, would be the Thames, Limited, or the docks.

293. On the specific question of the payment of an unfair rate of wages by these contractors, you have not been able to get any satisfactory answer?—No. If you were to look over this list of 31 firms you would find three or four, perhaps five different rates of wages paid by the firms to labour—I do not say to skilled labour, because I do not profess to know anything about that. Taking unskilled labour, some will get 5½d. per hour for 54 hours; some will do 54 hours for 22s. per week; and others 56 hours for 22s. per week. What I would suggest is that the Committee should recommend that there should be some minimum fixed. My argument has always been that if the Government accepts a resolution to be a model employer of labour, then, where there is no permanent rate of wages fixed by a Trade Union, they ought to insert a minimum, surely, based on what they are paying themselves. The Government themselves have recognised practically in the London district 6d. an hour as a minimum, that is, they pay a minimum of 23s. per week, and they value the extra emoluments at 1s., which comes to just 6d. an hour for a 48-hour week. They have recognised 6d. per hour.

294. We should like, I think, to go more closely into these cases that you have produced to the different Departments, and in relation to which you have not got satisfaction from them. You need not state them now, but afterwards could you send the Secretary copies of your letters and of the replies that you got?—Yes, I could.

295. You have not got any specific case at the moment, I suppose, that you could quote where you did not get a satisfactory answer?—I have mentioned one firm especially.

296. Could you give us the date and the exact facts?—I could not; it is about two or three years ago. I have not interfered with this, probably, since the last Committee of Inquiry in the House of Commons, of which Sir Matthew White Ridley was Chairman.

297. That was in 1897, I think?—Yes.

298. Have you not made any complaint since then?—No; we have not to these firms; we thought it no good. We have repeatedly written to the Army Contracts Committee at the War Office complaining about the work being given out, and questions have been asked in the House of Commons, but there have been no results as far as we are concerned, anyway, and the men have not even got a rise of wages. This is a proof of that: There are 31 firms here, and, with one exception, not one of them pays the proper rate. We do not recognise the Government, I might say, as a good employer of unskilled labour; but they are model to these anyway—that is my point. This information is based on facts obtained by my own personal inquiries.

299. You must have got some answers from the War Office, or the Admiralty, for instance?—Yes; saying that they had made inquiries, and that they found the contractors were paying the current rate in the district for that class of work. The great difficulty is that there is no fixed rate of wages for unskilled labour in London, unless you take the builders' labourers, the dock work, and excavating work in general. The rates of wages are 7½d. per hour for excavators, 7½d. per hour for scaffolders, and 30s. per week for grain porters in the docks. There is no man employed in the London and East India Docks, or in the Surrey Commercial Docks, or in the Millwall Docks, at less than 6d. per hour; and that is a very small section.

300. Is it your evidence, in fact, that in the districts you are speaking of 6d. per hour is the current rate?—It is the lowest rate. The current rate would be 7d. as I have said before; and I contend for 7d. per hour, if you take builders' labourers.

301. Yet you have one case there of a firm paying 4d.?—Yes; one firm.

302. Whom do they contract for?—They contract for each branch of the Government.

303. I forget whether you said what they do?—They are electricians.

304. Is it one of your suggestions that the Government should itself consider that what it pays its own unskilled men is the current rate?—No, I do not say that. The Government have made statements repeatedly that they are not prepared to take the lead in wages, but they are prepared to follow the best employers. If they recognise that 6d. per hour is the lowest that a workman can exist on in the metropolitan area, I think where there are no fixed wages governing a particular trade, that they ought to insert that as a minimum in their contracts.

305. Have you any other suggestions to make of a practical kind as regards the working of the Clause?—As I say, that is what we complain of. I might say that it is a very difficult thing to organise these men, and, therefore, these men are probably not organised so well as the skilled workmen are. The skilled workmen probably would be able, through the force of their union, to get the recognised Trade Union rate; but these men are often creatures of circumstances, and the employers pay these wages.

306. Have you noticed that the Fair Wages Resolution has had any effect in raising wages generally since it has been in operation?—We have always quoted it, and it has had an effect in some respects. In two cases down at Erith, I think, we were able to bring pressure to bear. We were able to bring pressure to bear on these particular firms—or, rather, the Woolwich Trade and Labour Council was, by reporting the circumstances of the wages paid there to the respective Departments they got the contracts from, and so I think they were able to get them raised a halfpenny or three farthings per hour.

307. What do these firms pay for unskilled labour?—5d.; but they are just outside the London area.

308. You would say that 5d. is the current rate on the edge of the London area, I suppose?—About 5d. or 5½d. I should say down there for that class of work.

309. I see you suggest that the Government should state a minimum wage in their contracts?—With respect to unskilled labour, not to skilled labour. I only speak as to unskilled labour. I mean a wage beyond which you cannot go lower, and which the firms could not depart from.

310. Do you suggest that on the ground that unskilled labour is not organised?—No; but I do not think it is thoroughly organised in the various manufacturing districts in London.

311. Is it on that ground that you suggest that a minimum wage should be fixed for unskilled labour?—No, but on the question of an existence for the men. It seems to me to be hard where the unskilled workman has got to be the victim, and the only victim, of the Fair Wages Clause. Under the Fair Wages Clause, the skilled trades probably would, through their organisations, be able to get the rate which their Unions had fixed in the district; but in regard to the unskilled man, employers seem to pay him whatever they like. All the skilled trades at a place like Messrs. ——, or ——, would get the recognised Trade Union rates of the districts, and the labourers there will get 22s.; yet we should call the Trade Union rate of the district 30s. per week for unskilled labour. If you went to work for a contractor on a building, he would pay you at the rate of 7d. per hour.

312. You do not suggest that 30s. is the current rate in the London district for unskilled labour, do you?—Yes, I do in the building trades, and that only is where we can take it from; and the docks.

313. I was coming to that. You would not extend it beyond the building trade, would you?—There is the dock work.

314. Is it 30s. a week there?—Yes; you can average 30s. per week in the docks when you get six days to the week.

315. On piece-work?—No, on day work. You can get 30s. a week for the corn porters.

316. Did you not say something about it being 6d. an hour?—Yes, but that is for the casual labour. Where the labour is permanent, it is 30s. per week.

317. (Mr. De la Bère.) I have with me a list of, I think, all the complaints we have had in the last few years, and the only one I notice from you is one received last February. You sent us in one last February about some pit sinking in the Royal Arsenal which is being carried out by a contractor?—Yes, I remember.

318. That is the only one of yours that I notice. That one we inquired into, and we found that no excavator or labourer was being paid less than 7d., and that three casual labourers who had been paid 6d. were raised to 7d.?—I remember.

319. There, practically, we did what you wanted?—I know you did in that one Department.

320. That is the only one I can find of yours that has been addressed to the War Office?—I can assure you I have addressed, I will not say one, but a score in the old times.

321. About outside contractors?—Yes, about painters and all that kind of thing up at the Royal Academy and the Artillery, and so on. We have complained about Messrs. ———, and also to the Post Office we have complained about the same firm.

322. With reference to the 31 firms you have mentioned as having Government contracts, do many of them do London County Council work, do you know?—Not many of them.

323. You do not happen to know what they are paying the unskilled people at on County Council work, do you?—If we did know that they were doing County Council work, we should be able to bring pressure to bear at once.

324. Your real difficulty is that the skilled labour is very highly organised, that the unskilled is not, and that the rate for unskilled labour differs in each trade?—Yes.

325. You want to assimilate the rates?—Yes.

326. Taking the buildings and the docks as a standard?—Yes. The unskilled labour in the docks and in the building trades is organised, and we are able to fix what we call a Trade Union rate; but in these engineers' and manufacturers' shops, and such like as that, they have been able to pay them what they like.

327. In the docks and building trade, surely rather a higher standard would be required than in the case, say, of a man who is doing unskilled work about a factory. He requires great physical strength for one thing in the docks and on a building?—So he would in a factory. Suppose you were a labourer in an iron foundry, where you have got to shift the stuff.

328. I quite agree there; but you go rather beyond that, do you not?—Yes.

329. You do not confine yourselves to the almost skilled labourer of that class, do you?—That is not skilled labour. These are men who are getting 22s. a week—labourers in iron foundries, labourers helping fitters, labourers helping plumbers, and all that class of people.

330. Of course, in the building trade there is more exposure to the weather?—There is that about it.

331. And there is greater wear and tear of clothes, and all that?—I do not know that there would be greater wear and tear of clothes than they would get in an iron foundry or anything of that sort.

332. (Chairman.) It is more a seasonal trade, and that might account for its being a little higher, might it not?—That might do.

333. (Mr. Westcott.) There will be more time lost in outdoor work?—Yes; but you work a large number of hours in the summer in the building trades.

334. In other trades they work all the year round?—Latterly they will not have overtime anywhere if it can be avoided.

335. The employment is regular, and they are not stopped by bad weather, or anything of that sort; whereas in outdoor work, for instance, all the men were off all day yesterday and they were not paid a cent, but if they were in a shop they would be paid full wages?—That is so. In the summer, sometimes, under a private contractor you work for 60, 70 and 80 hours a week. According to the working regulations, the hours in the building trades are shorter in the winter, and, taking the year round, they would average about 54 hours.

336. (Mr. De la Bère.) One question about the minimum wage; do you not think it is possible that if you were to fix a minimum wage, the tendency would be for wages to fall to that level—in other words, that the contractor would look upon the minimum wage as the standard wage?—In this case, it would be a rise for all these people; that is all the answer I can give to that question. It would be a very substantial increase in every case, except in the case of the Thames, Limited, even if it were fixed on the same basis as the Government now pay.

337. (Mr. Bailey.) Do I understand the building trades' labourers are organised?—Yes—well.

338. To that do you attribute the fact that they are getting higher wages than the unorganised labourers?—I would not say that, but I would say that is one of the things. We always find, generally speaking, that where the trades are organised, better wages follow.

339. You think that irrespective of the work that the labourers are engaged upon, there should be a minimum, or what may be called a living wage fixed?—Yes; you may call it a living wage. The reason why I ask for a minimum is that, looking over these lists, you find practically contractors who are doing the same class of work probably in the same area, and within a mile of each other, and yet there will be a difference of 4s. and 5s. a week in the wages paid to the labourers.

340. On precisely the same class of work?—On practically the same class of work.

341. (Mr. Black.) Would you mind explaining a little who are the men who are getting the 30s. per week; I think you said the permanent men are getting the 30s.?—Yes.

342. And the casual men are only making about 6d. per hour?—Yes; with a minimum of four hours in the docks.

343. What does the average casual dock labourer make per week at 6d. per hour?—The majority of them are on piece-work.

344. What would they earn on an average?—Supposing they are in the corn trade, they may earn half-a-crown an hour discharging grain in either the Millwall Docks or the Surrey Commercial Docks.

345. Taking it all the year round, what would such a man make?—You have got to take into account how many days he goes down, and there is nothing for him to do. Sometimes the Dock Companies would engage him, we will say, cleaning the quays up, or anything of that description, if they wanted it done, and then he would only get 6d. per hour. But if he works on this job of discharging grain it nearly always averages over 1s. an hour. The deal porters in a dock never work for less than 1s. an hour.

346. Take the men in a Government yard, earning 23s. a week; they are a good deal better off than the casual dock labourer, are they not?—You never get any applications from a docker to go into a Government place.

347. Nor from a man in a Government place to become a docker?—No, I do not think you would; the work would be a bit too casual, perhaps.

348. Does your Union touch the young men who are working with machinery as machine-minders?—Yes.

349. I do not know whether you are talking all the way through of adult labour above a certain age, are you?—Yes.

350. You are taking what age?—From 25 and 26, to 30 or 40 years of age.

351. Are there a great many young fellows between 18 and 20?—Yes. But we do not call them men.

352. You are hardly speaking of those?—No; I do not touch them really.

353. Are they in your Union?—No. We do not take them until they are 21. I want to emphasise the point that you raised a minute ago about the docks. You do not get the man who does the casual class of work at which he can earn a pound a day, and does not want to work to-morrow; because he could not stick at it. The discipline in the Government service would be entirely a new life to him.

354. Or in any other regular employment?—Yes.

355. It is the same with coal porters, is it not?—Yes.

356. (Mr. Westcott.) As for the labourers in the building trades, in all the trades they get 7d. an hour, do they not?—Yes; that is the recognised minimum.

357. You spoke just now of some of these labourers who were paid a lower rate helping the plumbers, but the plumbers' labourers would get as much as any of the others, would they not?—Yes.

358. Do you not think that some of the work these men are engaged in, such as making these electric lamps, and so on, is very light work, and there is not much labour in it?—I am not touching them, I am touching the outside labourers.

359. You are touching the outside labourer only?—The men in the yards.

360. Not those working in the shops?—No. They have every opportunity by piece-work, or what they call plus-work, to increase their weekly wages.

361. You are thinking of the class of men who handle the coal, are you?—Yes.

362. (Mr. De la Bère.) You are taking the men outside the shop?—Yes.

363. (Mr. Westcott.) Do you not think in what you call unskilled labour there may be more skill required in the case of a man who may have to run up a ladder with bricks, and put them down in the proper place for the bricklayer to handle them, and so on, than in the case of the man who just moves a lump of iron from one place to another?—I always say there is skill required in handling a broom.

364. I mean to say, there are degrees of skill even in unskilled labour?—Yes; I should admit that.

365. Therefore there should be degrees of pay?—No, not below the minimum.

366. Then you want a living wage, no matter what the man does really?—Yes; that is my great argument.

367. (Mr. Black.) You would admit there should be a discretion above the minimum, would you not?—Yes; you cannot fix a standard rate of wages for Government employees, but you can fix a minimum which all workmen can exist on.

368. (Mr. Westcott.) But you do not think all labourers should be as well paid as the men in the building trade, do you?—Yes, I do think so; because I do not reckon 7d. per hour is too much for any man.

369. Do you not think that immediately the inferior, unskilled labourer got 7d., there would be an agitation amongst the labourers of the more skilled type to get 8d. Do you not think that would be the tendency?—I do not think so.

370. You see there is a line where things do become prohibitive?—Yes; but still I do not think that there would be a tendency for the general labourers or the builders' labourers to ask for more.

371. Do you not think a builders' labourer considers himself superior to what you may call a lumber man about a yard?—No; because he is there too. When the building trade is slack, he competes with the docker. The builders' labourer is at the dock gates this morning, when there is no building possible.

372. That is a matter of necessity?—But that is the point.

373. Would he go back to the building trade if he could?—The building trade is somewhat altered now, through the use of these Scotch derricks and that kind of thing; so that you do not want the men running up the ladder to-day.

374. You are quite right, but at the same time there is a certain amount of skill wanted in dealing with the materials?—Yes; that is right.

375. There is the skilled man, and he has got an unskilled man assisting him, but he wants those things brought to him by a man who knows his way about. If you were to take a man out of an office and down at heel, what sort of a bricklayers' labourer would he make? Therefore there is a certain amount of skill wanted, I say, more so in the building trade than in any other industry I know?—I do not think so. I think there is more skill required in the docker's work than there is amongst the builders' labourers. Amongst the dockers you require both skill and physique, and I think the corn-porter is the hardest worked man in England.

376. There is not much skill required there, is there; it would be simply the power of lifting?—When you are getting grain from a ship's hold it is all skill in regard to the way of the rigging and all that kind of thing—rigging the purchase and knowing how to handle the machinery.

377. They have not much more to do than walking a plank, have they?—There is a lot of skill required amongst dock workers, and I say they have established a rate of wages which is 4s. and 5s. a week over those other men, if not 6s. and 8s.

378. Do you maintain that all labour should be as well paid as builders' labour?—It should be all paid on a basis of 30s. a week. In London, I do not think a man should be called upon to exist on less than 30s., speaking for myself personally.

379. (Chairman.) You do not deal, of course, with anything but the London district, but would you suggest that there should be a 6d. minimum all over the country?—I would suggest that a 6d. minimum all over the country should be recognised by the Government. I might say that the Trade Union Congress this year accepted a resolution that made exceptional treatment for London, taking into consideration the extra cost of fuel and light.

380. Do you think there is a case for a lower minimum than 6d. in other parts of the country?—I do not say lower than 6d., but I should say there would be a difference in the wages between the London market and the provincial market, because the standard of living is more costly in London. Take, for instance, house rent in London. I believe Mr. Haldane accepted it that there was a difference of 2s. there; and that is accepted all round. The Government themselves pay a minimum of 2s. more in London than they do in the provinces, both at the Admiralty and at the War Office.

381. Take Erith now; you are content with 5½d. in Erith, are you not?—No; I am not content with it. Erith is nearly as bad as London, but it is just outside—just on the verge, as it were.

382. (Mr. Westcott.) What do you call the London district?—The district within a twenty-miles radius from Charing Cross.

383. That is what you recognise?—Yes.

384. There is some difficulty in establishing what the London district is, is there not?—Yes.

385. I believe the London County Council regard a radius of 20 miles as the district?—Yes. And for the engineering trade I think it is about 12.

386. It is 12 miles for the building trade, is it not?—I think that is so.

387. (Chairman.) I want to get from you whether you think there is a case for a lower minimum elsewhere than in the London district?—I think that the Government have themselves recognised it, and also that that would be recognised in the schedule of wages presented by the skilled trades respecting which you will get evidence probably. You will find that Manchester has not got as high a rate of wages for the skilled trades as London has.

388. You will send the Secretary the particulars of the cases in which you have not got answers, will you?—Yes. I will look them up, but they are a long way back—about six or seven years probably.

389. You have got nothing very recent then?—No; except this instance which Mr. De la Bère quoted.

We have got tired of trying to raise these questions in the House of Commons, as we can get no satisfaction.

390. But you will give us a few of the last applications that you did make?—Yes. I will look them up.

391. Six or seven years ago, if you like?—I might say that I am expressing, I feel certain, the whole case of my comrades in the Trade Union movement, when I say there has been no satisfaction on this Fair Wages Resolution. There have been complaints made times enough about it, but there has been no alteration. There have been complaints made about ——— paying 4d. an hour, and even as little as 3½d. an hour, about five or six years ago—3½d. in the London district; I could easily tell you how that was altered. That was done through the head of the firm being opposed at a public meeting. I do not believe he knew it was as low as it was.

392. They were doing work for the Post Office, I suppose?—They have done work, I think, for the War Office, but I would not be certain.

393. When they were paying this 4d. rate, which Department did you complain to?—The Post Office.

394. What reply did you get?—The reply was that they would make inquiries into it, and then that they were paying the current rate of wages paid in the district.

395. Perhaps you will send us particulars of that case, will you?—Yes, I will.

The witness withdrew.

Mr. J. Charles Gordon, and

Mr. Charles Hickin, called; and examined.

396. (Chairman.) (To Mr. Gordon.) Do you wish to be examined together, or one after the other?—(Mr. Gordon.) One after the other. It is largely a question of corroboration, and probably that will save Mr. Hickin repeating something, which is what we are anxious to avoid, because repetition is useless.

397. You represent the National Amalgamated Tin and Iron Plate, Sheet and Metal Workers' and Braziers' Union, do you not?—Yes.

398. You are the General Secretary of that Union?—Yes.

399. You have had a good deal of experience of the working of the Fair Wages Clause in the country, I take it?—Yes; a very lengthy experience—ever since it was started, in fact.

400. On the whole, are you satisfied with it?—No; we are far from satisfied. That question could be replied to in two ways. From some standpoints we are satisfied, but, on the other hand, there is room for improvement.

401. It has done some good, has it not?—It has done some good decidedly.

402. Will you now come to the defects in it?—I shall speak generally. I am resident in London, and Mr. Hickin (our Vice-President) in Wolverhampton, and he has a thorough knowledge of the working of the Resolution in the Midland district. The opinions we are expressing here are shared by our members right through the country where the Resolution is operative—that is, where Government contracts from any Department are given. We find that the words of the Resolution, "current rate," are so liable to be over-ridden, especially by unscrupulous contractors—and unfortunately we have to meet unscrupulous contractors—who are prepared under any circumstances to get their work done at the very lowest rates possible, and are prepared to upset the conditions which employers, who are regarded as fair, accept. Our idea for many years has been that the only solution of the matter is that the wording of the Resolution should be so altered that, instead of the "current rates," it should read the "Trade Union rates and conditions." We hold that the Trade Union rates and conditions are the only fair conditions, because they are always arrived at after very often lengthy discussions between associations of employers and associations of workmen The general section of our trade is all piece-work, and we have piece-work rates. Those piece-work rates are agreed upon and arranged between workmen and employers and for the introduction of improved facilities, we make allowances: our prices are varied according to the facilities or additional facilities that are provided. We think that where a body of employers especially covering a large area, after discussion with their workmen or with the representatives of their workmen, come to agree upon either conditions or wages, those conditions should be regarded by the whole of the Government Departments as the fair rate of wages; and really, to be consistent, the only fair rate of wages.

403. That is, in effect, what the Resolution describes as the "current rate," is it not?—Hardly so.

404. I should have thought it was identical with the current rate where there was an organised Union?—My colleague will deal with several matters of that kind. We have had to lodge complaints with various Departments against certain firms, notwithstanding the fact that we have piece-work prices for practically all Government work, and we are always prepared to make any allowance for any new facilities. It is recognised amongst employers that the work is done by skilled men, but one firm will cut it up into a dozen operations and introduce unskilled labour. That cannot be described as Trade Union conditions or Trade Union rates.

405. In what respect can it not be so described?—My colleague has arranged to refer to various firms against which we have lodged complaints. We find, for instance, that one firm will indulge in sectionising the work up by introducing unskilled labour, and paying them on a lower standard than what we accept.

406. Why do you object to that?—Naturally the workmen after serving a long apprenticeship to their trade in order to become efficient mechanics, strongly object to the work being cut up and a portion done by unskilled labour, and then a skilled man doing another portion of it.

407. But if there is a portion of it which can be done, and properly done, by unskilled labour, why should the skilled man object?—The customs and the conditions which prevail throughout our trade are that the only time when work is allowed to be sectionised is when the machine intervenes. You will recognise, I am sure, that in every skilled trade there is perhaps a little section here and there which could be done by a partially skilled man—I will put it in that way. It is the universal custom of our trade that in making any article the workman should make it up and complete it right out, with the exception of where machines enter into the matter. We do not oppose machinery, and an unskilled man uses the machine when it is not a recognised tool of the sheet-metal worker.

408. But if you can divide the work into skilled sections and unskilled sections, what is the object of only a skilled man doing it?—It is only a matter of degree. There is no unskilled section in the work. Perhaps when I used the term unskilled it was hardly correct, and I ought to have said partially skilled. Presuming, for instance, that a man makes up his work in all the essentials, and then another man solders it together; there is a certain amount of skill required in soldering—everyone will admit that—but it is a grossly unfair thing for a man to make all his work up and then another person to solder it up. One or two firms have adopted that, and we strongly object to it.

409. That is rather a question of degree. Supposing, as I say, that it is possible to divide the work into skilled and unskilled, do you see any objection to an alteration in the practice so as to enable an unskilled man to do the unskilled work, leaving the skilled work for the skilled man to do?—It can only be brought into force during the period of manufacture, as the skilled man very often has to follow the unskilled man. It has this result, that the work in nine cases out of ten is not so efficient; and in addition to that, it practically means a reduction of wages; it means that a portion of the work which is regarded, and has been regarded, as skilled, is given up to the unskilled man at a lower rate of wages.

410. But that is quite reasonable, is it not, if it is unskilled work?—I say partially skilled.

411. We must assume that the rate of wages is proportioned to the skill required. If it is, do you see any objection to that being made a practice?—As a mechanic most decidedly I should see a great objection to it. Further than that, we do not tolerate it, and we do not allow of it in the trade amongst our own members, and it is never done.

412. What I wanted to get at is why you do not do it? Why does a skilled man insist upon doing unskilled work?—I say that it is not unskilled; I say that it is partly skilled. I have used the example of soldering. A man must have a certain amount of experience to become an efficient solderer of metals. That has always been regarded as part of a skilled man's trade. Just as a man who is a cabinet-maker can make his work up, but the putting of the material together does not require the same skill as the making of it up; but he would object, I take it, after making his work up, to seeing somebody else come along and put it together.

413. I cannot see why?—It kills everything in the shape of a desire on the part of a man to take a real interest in his work. A man likes to take his work and finish it and do it properly, and he takes, naturally, some pride in it too.

414. You would not require him to do the whole work, from beginning to end, skilled and unskilled, would you?—We say it is all skilled.

415. But if there is any work—that was my original assumption, you remember—which can be properly done by an unskilled man, do you see any objection to the skilled man surrendering that portion of the work?—No. If it comes to purely unskilled work, such as cleaning-off, or punching, or press-work, for instance, which is not skilled work—we at once admit that the unskilled man should do that.

416. I think you and I are agreed on that, then?—Before I leave this point may I be permitted to say that in my interviews with gentlemen connected with the various Departments I have been impressed with this idea, that they are of opinion that as a trade we are in collusion with our employers almost with the idea of keeping up a ring.

417. (Mr. Black.) You are certainly not with some of them?—While I am speaking of this, I would like to put it very clearly. There has been such an impression; and, in fact, I may say that Lord Tweedmouth intimated the idea, and he asked me the question whether there was any collusion between our employers and ourselves in the Midland district with a view to keeping things at a certain price. We have the greatest difficulty with our employers in the Midlands, and in all other districts, in keeping up our standard price. Naturally employers like to get their labour at the very cheapest rate possible—it is only their business to do so; and it is our business to get what we consider a fair price. We have an arrangement with employers in the Midlands that there should be no unfair competition amongst them. Directly a new job comes out, or any improved facility is brought out, we have an arrangement that we shall fix a price upon the work before the employer gives out his contract, and that we should send that price out to all the employers. To avoid any differences we often confer with the employers over these matters. We have a list which is signed, especially in the Midlands, by representatives of the employers and representatives of the workmen, and that has to be regarded as the current rate or the standard piece-work rate for this work, which is continually going into the district. But that, after all, is only an honourable understanding between us and the employers; we know absolutely nothing of their business and they know nothing of ours, and we are continually at war with them over matters. I want to state that very clearly, because I want to dispel at once that impression, though I do not say that it has got any deep root.

418. Certainly it has not?—There are many other subjects I should like to refer to, but I am thankful of the opportunity of pressing that point with a view of dispelling any opinions that may be held in that direction.

419. (Chairman.) Apart from what you call sectionising, have you any other objection to the operation of this clause? Do you know of any other form of evading it?—It all depends upon what are recognised as fair conditions. The Resolution speaks of the current rate of wages, but there is something else besides wages—there are the conditions. We have with our employers—and that is by way of seeing that no one employer shall take an unfair advantage of another—an arrangement with them in regard to the number of lads. The number of lads employed is always in proportion to the number of men. In the general trade, we always allow a larger proportion of lads than we do in trades such as the gas-meter section. But when an employer signs your form of contract, and yet employs an innumerable number of lads, we consider that is detrimental to us as a trade. Where our employers from their own standpoint, and from our standpoint as well, agree upon certain conditions in order that there should be no unfair competition amongst them as producers, those conditions should be recognised.

420. Is the restriction on the number of lads introduced as a means of preventing unfair competition between the different employers?—That is one feature of it; then, on the other hand, it is a generally understood thing with us in London that there should be one lad to every five men for the general trade. In the gas-meter trade, it is one lad for every 10. The object of that difference is this. In the gas-meter trade we hold as workmen that a lad cannot become an efficient sheet-metal worker by learning to manufacture gas-meters; he simply becomes a gas-meter maker only. Where he has an opportunity of having a basic knowledge of his trade in a general shop, then there is a larger proportion allowed. He can easily turn his hand to making gas-meters if he serves his apprenticeship in a good general shop, as he has got a good groundwork to enable him to become a thoroughly efficient mechanic. Take the motor industry, which is practically a new industry. We had 500 to 600 men in the Coventry district, but at the same time I do not suppose out of that 500 or 600 we have half a dozen men who have been brought up in a gas-meter factory, for the simple reason that they could not turn their hands to the class of work required. It is an arrangement with our employers, and where a lad has an opportunity of learning the trade in a good general shop, that is an advantage to the employer and also to us, inasmuch as there will be a larger proportion of the better class men.

421. Do you find in the case of Government contracts that these conditions are infringed?—Very often they are infringed.

422. Would you like the clause in the contract extended so as to cover all arrangements of that kind?—I think so. I think we should be the gainers, and the departments would be gainers too.

423. How would it affect the departments?—I think you would get a better class of work as a rule, instead of putting it out to some shops where it is done. Of course, I know that Mr. Black would reply to me—because I have used the argument to Mr. Black before—"We have got our inspectors."

424. (Mr. Black.) That is not what I should say there. I should ask you whether the machine-made goods are not sometimes as good as those where you employ a mechanic's labour?—Yes, sometimes they are.

425. That is an argument that would be used on that point?—I am not speaking of a machine-made article, though I am quite prepared to admit that some machine-made goods are better. On the other hand, it is detrimental. For instance, Mr. Maconochie's solderless tin was a curse from every standpoint. You could not possibly do anything with the tin; it was bad from the start, and it made the food in the interior putrid. Take those urns, those boilers that you get, they have a machine-made top, and it is better in many instances than a hand-made top.

426. (Chairman.) Is there any other point on which your trade is affected?—Take, for instance, the term "current rate." One of the representatives of the War Office was arguing the matter out with me one day in regard to the term "current rate." He argued that if a manufacturer introduced the least little thing into his method of construction or working, and there was no other firm who offered an analogy to that, you should regard his rate of wages as the current rate, inasmuch as there was nobody else to make a comparison with. I put this further point to him. Suppose a contract was given out to a firm in a little village or a small country town where there was no other manufacturer, and he paid a much lower rate of wages than anybody anywhere near him. Should we have any hold upon him, or would you regard the wages that he paid as the current rate? The argument was extended, and it was admitted and stated: "We should take it that his rate of wages was the current rate of the particular district." We object to that sort of thing, because it is a deliberate evasion of the terms of the contract.

427. How do you propose to meet that kind of case?—I should say that the wages of the nearest town should be a guide. I am quite prepared to admit that, if the cost of living 20 miles or 30 miles out, wherever it was, is very much lower, there would be some argument in it; but at the same time you certainly could not regard it as fair to set up business perhaps just outside, or it may be in a town of equal importance, where the cost of living and everything else ranged the same, and also to set up such conditions as he liked; and then call his rate the current rate, or recognise it as the current rate of the district.

428. Suppose he set up a hundred miles away from the nearest town; how would you deal with that?—If he set up a hundred miles away, it would be according to the state of the place he set up in. If it was a small country village you would find that the conditions would not vary so very much.

429. Suppose it was, as you say, a country village, and he set up his works there, would you still insist upon his paying the rate current in the nearest town which was doing the same work?—It is generally done, because, after all, they do not set up far apart from our branches. Our organisation goes as far north as Aberdeen. In the Lancashire and Yorkshire district we have about 20 branches, and then there are some which come down into the Midlands, and further south, and we go as far west as Exeter.

430. I suppose it is quite conceivable that a manufacturer might set up several miles away from one of your centres?—He could not obtain workmen in a place like that. They would have to be drawn into the centre with the result—there is no doubt about it—that there would be very little difference in the rate of pay, except he introduced conditions which were unknown in any other district in the country; and our people would object to those.

431. Do you not think there might be a case for reducing the pay if he did take his works out of a town, and plant them some distance off in a rural district?—That has been done sometimes.

432. And you do not object to that?—We have. I might say that in addition to our local lists, we ourselves have what we call our minimum list, which is the lowest price. We let every district fix its own price according to the conditions of its work, but we have a minimum list under which no district must work. We are simply covered by that list as far as we as a trade are concerned. We have list prices for Government work. All that we say to our members is, "You must not go below that list, but you can put what higher prices you like in accordance with the conditions of the district." London prices are always higher than the prices at Birmingham.

433. Then you have had no practical difficulty of this sort?—No. I only mention that as it came up. I know several trades that have had difficulties in that matter, and, as the argument came out with one of your inspectors one day, I thought I would briefly mention it.

434. It is not a complaint you are making as regards your own trade?—No, not as regards our own trade. Here is one other little matter. I should like to see thorough uniformity in all the departments. At present the Admiralty, the War Office and the Post Office supply us with tender forms, and I must say that we appreciate that, because it gives us some idea of when contracts are coming, and provides the opportunity of seeing samples. I feel sure everyone will recognise the advantage, when we state that we are a piece-work trade; and when there is any alteration in the work it is essential that our men should know it, because sometimes it means a reduction in our prices and sometimes an increase. The opportunity that we have of seeing the sample is an immense advantage to us But we still think that the advantages which the Departments agreed to could be further improved by letting us know the name of the successful contractor, not that we want to publish it, but because there are many contracts given out, and we do not know where they go to. There were two or three things came out the other day from the War Office. There was a new shaped colander, and a new shaped strainer. I went and saw the strainer, and I found there was an immense amount of work in it. We do not know where it has gone to. No doubt the order has been placed for some time. I made inquiries right throughout the Midlands, in London, and in Lancashire districts, whether they have seen this particular colander and no one has seen it.

435. Why do you want to know who has got it?—We want to know whether it is made under fair conditions; we want to know what the conditions are, and whether they are evading the conditions of the contract.

436. Whether, in fact, the piece-work rate for the article is properly fixed?—There may be a day-work rate for the article. We know very well that the War Office has ordered a certain number of these strainers, which are quite a new article with a lot of work in it. That order has been placed some two months or three months, and the strainer should be, in the ordinary course of affairs, being manufactured now; but it is not being manufactured, as far as we know, in the Midlands or London.

437. Do you know the names of the firms who were invited to tender for it?—No; in this case we do not. The Admiralty methods and the War Office methods differ a little. The War Office have supplied me with a list of the firms with whom they deal for sheet-metal wares. It is a very lengthy list, and is most complicated. There are, I should think, 50 pages of foolscap, closely written, with the names of firms. I must say I have not any knowledge of some of those firms as having been Government contractors. Some of them are not Government contractors in a large way, and it would be a stupendous work to make inquiries. We do not know who has that tender. The War Office supplied us with the tender, and we have the opportunity of looking at the sample. We would suggest that the Committee should recommend the supplying of the name to the chief representatives of every trade. We simply want the information to enable us to ascertain whether the work is being done under fair conditions. I am sure my colleague, Mr. Hickin, will bear me out in this, that it is a most essential thing for us to know where it goes. I would like to add that the Stationery Office purchase deed boxes and stationery trays. We have no communication from the Stationery Office with regard to the tenders when they are issued. The same applies to the India Office. The India Office has an immense amount of work. There are all the State Railways, and the Indian hospitals, the water-bottles for the infantry, hospital appliances, lamps and lanterns. We have no communication from the India Office when tenders go out, neither do we receive the tender forms.

438. What you want to know is the names of the successful tenderers in your trade?—Yes; that would be a great advantage.

439. Is there any other point you would like to mention?—No. I think my colleague, Mr. Hickin, probably will deal with one or two points following up what I have said.

440. I want to get from you a little more clearly than I have done what is the difference, in your opinion, between "Trade Union rates and conditions" and what you now have in the Fair Wages Clause. The clause as it stands deals with wages only, you would say?—That is so.

441. And you want conditions besides?—That is so.

442. Is that the difference?—The difference is this, that, owing to the wording of the Resolution, "the current rate of the district," it does not necessarily follow that the current rate is a fair rate or a generally accepted rate.

443. It is called the rate current in the district, and it refers to an agreement between the employers and the employed, does it not?—It does not state that—not definitely, at any rate.

444. Supposing in any district, or in any trade in any district, there are no Trade Union rates and conditions, how would you deal with that case?—I think that is almost an impossible thing.

445. Take the case we were speaking of just now of a firm moving away from the district where the work is done and where your branch is operating, and going into a district where you have no branch and where there is no other employer doing the same work. If the clause then said Trade Union rates and conditions were to apply you would have nothing to support you, would you?—It is universal in every trade in this country that Trade Unions exist—in every district where there is any population at all. The men's organisations go right throughout the country. I was down at Exeter this week; there is a large gas-meter factory, and that is the only factory in the town.

446. Suppose that factory moved out of Exeter and set up works in the middle of Dartmoor, what would you say to that?—That is an impossible situation, to have works in the middle of Dartmoor. This Exeter firm practically observes the same conditions and pays the provincial rates that are generally accepted right through the country in other districts. Take, for instance, such towns as Cardiff and Barrow, which are practically new towns. The conditions which govern those towns are practically the same, even at their inception and when they first commenced to develop as industrial centres. I am only using that one argument because it came out in discussion with one of your inspectors.

447. (Mr. King.) I think you said that the introduction of the Fair Wages Clause had done some good. Did you mean some good to the trade generally or only to the Government part of the work? In other words, have the wages of the trade generally improved?—No, I do not think so. I do not say wages have improved. In some districts they have, inasmuch as we have been able to bring to book employers in many instances when they have evaded our conditions.

448. Have you been able to do that as the result of the Fair Wages Clause?—When the Government introduced this Fair Wages Clause it gave the organised workmen an opportunity of approaching the Government and complaining of several firms' actions.

449. But only on Government work?—Yes. At the same time the firms that we have had to complain of have never been regarded as fair, with the result that many of them you do no business with now owing to our complaints. But these are still unfair firms, both for general trade and for Government work.

450. If they paid the current rate for Government work we could not touch them as regards other work. Were there no cases of that sort where the current rate was paid for Government work and a lower rate was paid for other work?—We have met with isolated cases of that sort, but at the same time they are very rare.

451. Have those cases decreased in number through the action of the Fair Wages Clause?—No, they have not. We have not had any cases this last year or two of that sort ourselves. Perhaps this is what you are thinking of. I know it has been mentioned, but if you will permit me, it is another phase of the matter. It has been stated that some of our men charge more for Government work than they do for general work.

452. I was going to ask you about that?—I thought that was the question. Now that is absolutely a fact in several instances I have in my mind. We make a water-pot, both for the Admiralty and for the War Department, and that water-pot is nearly double the price of the ordinary water-pot that goes on to the market to-day. I am not speaking of the galvanised one, but of the tin one.

453. Do you mean there is twice as much work on it?—The wages are twice as much, and it is twice as strong, and there is twice as much work in the article as far as the manufacture is concerned, and the men get a better living on the article that goes on to the general market than on the Government one.

454. Although they get the higher price?—Although they get the double price. In the majority of things where the article is similar to that on the general market the same rates are paid.

455. (Mr. Black.) The ordinary rates apply?—Where the article is the same, most decidedly. There is this to be said: that our men are always handicapped in making Government work because they have to run the rope of your inspectors. Greater care has to be exercised with Government work.

456. And we pay accordingly, do we not?—No. Mr. Black says with a smile "We pay accordingly," and that there is something behind it I feel convinced. But I am sure that the Government do not pay one iota more than what the general market does, when the extra work is considered.

457. (Mr. King.) You said that you went round and fixed the rates to be charged for Government work, I think?—You have mistaken me; I never said I went round.

458. Not you personally, but the Union. That is to say, as I understood you, the workmen when they know a contract is going to be given out tell their employers how much and at what rate they may tender for it as far as labour is concerned?—No. (To Mr. Hickin.) Can you recall to mind the most recent case of an alteration of facilities?—(Mr. Hickin.) I can call to mind the fixing of a price last week. We fix the price for all our work, either for the general articles, or for the motor trade, or for anything else. We fix the price of the making.

459. Do you tell the employers what your price is before they tender?—Yes. The men have a meeting of the shop, or of various shops (if it is an article that is made generally in the district), and the representatives of the firms, and they fix a fair price.

460. Are the employers consulted about that?—The employers have a right to send representatives to the men's meetings when prices are fixed. The prices are handed over to the manager or the foreman or to the employer, and they are agreed to. If exception is taken to a price because the employer finds out that it is higher than usual or that it is higher than is warranted, it is taken back and reconsidered. It is not enforced as a dictum.

461. What I really want to find out is whether this fixed price applies only to Government work, or whether it applies to all work?—To all work and to any new articles. It is in the rules of the Association that all new articles shall be priced by the men who are competent to make the article. You, gentlemen, perhaps know no more about our trade than another; but supposing, for instance, there was a man in the habit of making cups, and another cream jugs, and another sugar basins, and we have to make a new article of a similar character to either of those three. We call together, perhaps, a dozen of the men who have been in the habit of making these things and submit to them the article to fix a price. If the new article, for instance, is a bath, we get the men who make sitz baths, or sponge baths, or Oxford hip baths, and get them to price the new article. The same with the men who are in the habit of making cafétières, and tea pots, and coffee pots, and things of that sort.

462. Supposing the Government order an article that is in common use, do you ever go to the employers and fix the price for it, because it is a Government article?—That is done in every instance in which the Government order articles.

463. I put it if it is an article that is in common use or one that is generally made, and you get a contract for that very article, do you then fix a special price for the Government work?—If the Government adopt a new pattern.

464. No, I put it to you if it is just the same pattern?—If the Government adopt a pattern similar to what is on the market and if it is made of the same strength and of the same material, the price would be the same. In the Midland districts the piece prices are all subject to what is called the 15 per cent. The prices were very low many years ago, and as far back as 1875 there was a meeting for raising wages in Birmingham and Wolverhampton—in the Midland districts—and they called the small towns into line. At that time rather than that there should be a revision of the whole of the prices, a general rise was conceded of 10 per cent.; and since that time there has been another rise of 5 per cent. for the piecework rates for all articles. That is for the general trade. Therefore, if a standard article made in the district was ordered by the Government the committee would have to meet in order to revise the price, because prices are nett, and the conditions of Government work govern the whole of the country, and therefore the Midlands have not got the consent of the general National Union to deal with Government work. The price of Government work being all nett ——

465. Does that mean less or more?—By that addition of 15 per cent. on to the prices the nett price would be more.

466. It comes to this, then, that when you get a Government order for an article in ordinary use you do not fix a special price for the Government article?—(Mr. Gordon.) No.

(Mr. Hickin.) Do you mean that we should not fix it higher because it was made for the Government?

467. I am not speaking of a higher price; I am speaking of a special price?—It is special, inasmuch as it does not show the 15 per cent. bonus; but if you take the ordinary price for the article and add 15 per cent. to it, it will come out the same as the price for the Government work.

468. (Chairman.) In fact, you convert the original price plus the 15 per cent. into a new price?—That is so. (Mr. Gordon.) Into a nett price.

469. (Mr. Black.) With reference, Mr. Gordon, to what you have said about our stricter inspection, you do not admit that we pay for that, as I understand; and Mr. Hickin says if the articles are similar in material, and make, and so on, there is not a higher price fixed for the Government as compared with the trade article?—That is so.

470. In spite of our rigid inspection, which is not applied to the trade article?—(Mr. Hickin.) Very often the Government article does not turn out such a good job as the other, except that Government contracts usually run into larger numbers, and, therefore, in the firms that are able to get Government contracts there is more repetition work for the men who are making up the articles. Oftentimes more care has to be exercised not simply because the Government inspector inspects the article. I have made a lot of the work myself, and I can assure you the articles are most closely inspected by the foreman in the works before they are sent along for the inspectors to examine them; but, owing to the fact that there is repetition, the job perhaps turns out as good, because we are able to improve in the speed and we do not get changed about so much.

471. You may sum it up, shortly, by saying there are more rejections of Government work owing to the rigid inspection, but that the repetition of a large number of articles has a counter-balancing effect?—That is so. I do not speak about the rejections, because, as far as my experience goes—and I have had a very lengthy experience——

472. The foreman would turn it back?—He would not send it back; the man would take more care—in the Union shop, at any rate.

473. It comes to the same thing; there is more time put in to avoid rejections?—Yes. Then a man is able to increase his speed when, perhaps, he will be for three months at it.

474. (Mr. King.) I think, Mr. Gordon, you said Trade Union rates and conditions are generally accepted; but are they always agreed to? Are there not cases in which the Trade Union has put forward rather unreasonable claims and the employers have not agreed to them?—(Mr. Gordon.) Yes; sometimes there has been that, but that is generally arranged in conferences between the workmen and the employers.

475. But in some cases the employers and the Trade Union never come to terms; is that not so?—There are some employers that never come to terms with the Union.

476. And there are some Trade Unions that never come to terms with the employers?—A Trade Union is an organisation of the workmen, and when those workmen agree upon certain conditions, some firms never will observe those conditions; then we do not allow our members to work there.

477. Sometimes a Trade Union—I do not mean yours, but a smaller Union—will fix an unreasonable price altogether, and say that is the Union rate; but it is never paid by the employers. You would not have the Government accept that as the Trade Union rate, would you?—If a Union could not get a single firm to recognise a particular rate.

478. Then it is not a Trade Union rate?—It would be the opinion of the men, but it would not be a workable rate, I should think.

479. And the Government would not accept a Trade Union rate unless it were also accepted by all good employers?—I should say that a section of the employers certainly would accept the rate. I should think a Union would be able to come to some terms with some of the employers in any district; I should feel sure of that.

480. I have seen cases where they have not—where they have simply asked too much and have not got any employer to give it to them?—Sometimes, unfortunately, workmen's organisations are weak numerically. Perhaps there may be only 200 or 300 men engaged in the district, a very few of them comparatively in the organisation, with the result that they are not a power for good at all.

481. You would not wish the Government to accept as current in the district any Trade Union rate which had not been agreed to by the employer, would you?—I would not go so far as that, and I would rather not express an opinion upon that. I do not know what there is behind that question—excuse me putting it in that way. I have in my mind now an association closely akin to our own trade in the Midlands, which has been endeavouring for years to get their employers in the district to recognise a standard rate for Government work. They are about 200 or 300 men out of, perhaps, a thousand or more. Unfortunately, as I say, there is not a sufficient number of men in the Union to influence all the employers, and so they have to agree to what is not a fair price—it is a poor price at the best of it. Under these circumstances—and I think I am quite frank—if you applied it to a case like that, I should say that even under such conditions as that the merits of the price would be the best thing to judge from.

482. But you want us to accept Trade Union rates and conditions; if they are unreasonable, we could not do so?—I do not think in the case I have in mind that it would be unreasonable. I have never come across any unreasonable rates in a Trade Union.

483. If none of the employers will agree to certain rates, it is probable there is some want of reason about them, is it not?—If after having met the men and discussed the matter in every detail they fail to come to some terms, I should think there were something behind it which required some explanation.

484. In mentioning your Union just now, you said you wanted it to fix the standard rate for Government work, but you also said we want to be paid the standard rate for ordinary work?—Yes.

485. Do the Unions generally fix a standard rate for Government work?—I think there is at the War Office, and I know there is at the Admiralty——

486. Do the Unions fix a standard rate for Government work?—I want to clear that point up. Mr. Black put it too, and perhaps I can answer both. In the Birmingham and the Midland district, and in the London district too, we have a general price list governing the whole of the general trade.

487. That is the case with your own Union, but you were speaking of another Union just now; I think you said some other Union had not come to terms with their employers, but they had proposed a standard rate for Government work. Is it usual in other Unions to have a standard rate?—There is a price list for Government articles, because Government articles with very few exceptions, are all special articles. You do not buy the same articles as are on the general market.

488. As I understand, the price would vary or the rate paid for labour would vary?—The price varies, but not the day-work rate.

489. Not the day-work rate?—No, not by any means. Mr. Black thinks we have a different rate for Government work to the rate we have for the general work. In nearly all instances Government work has to go through a better scrutiny, and the men have to exercise more care. Take your articles—and I can name three or four right off the reel now. Take your baths, the hip baths and the sitz baths; every one of those baths—and there are about five of them—are identical with a bath that is put on the market. Our price for making them for the general market and for yourselves is identical. But there is one bath where you have four blocks underneath the foot which the bath put on the ordinary market has not. There is an extra for that, but otherwise every bath that you have is identical with that which is made for the general market, and in both departments the same price prevails. Then take the black iron scoop—you have got one down there—or else a Waterloo flat-bottomed coal scoop. That is identical in price in both departments where the material is the same, both for the general market and for your departments. The 17-inch scoop is practically the same. Then there are the boilers, or urns, as you call them. If anything, the Government article is lower as far as prices are concerned, considering the work put into it, because you have got a long sleeve. The urn that is made for the general market is a higher priced article, and the men earn better money on it than what they do on the one you have.

490. (Mr. Black.) They do on urn-making generally, do they not?—Yes, because it requires good men to do it. It is the same with many other things.

491. (Mr. Westcott.) You told the Chairman you did not think the wording of the Resolution of the House of Commons satisfactory, did you not, as it stands now?—That is so.

492. Each department has to interpret that Resolution and to make certain clauses to put into its own contracts, and it does not necessarily follow that they all observe the same wording. Just listen to this; I will read you what the Office of Works put in their contracts: "The wages paid by the contractor to the workmen employed by him in the execution of the work shall be those generally accepted in each trade by competent workmen in the district where they are employed." Is that satisfactory?—That is certainly more satisfactory than the words "current rate." The words "current rate" appear in the Resolution, do they not?

493. They do, but then the Resolution is made use of and interpreted by each Government Department in its own way, the wording adopted being much the same very likely. These words "current rate" are not in this clause at all. Does "the wages generally accepted" cover your point?—Hardly.

494. You would like "rates and conditions"?—Yes; the conditions, I think, are just as important as the wages.

495. Do you think if the "conditions" were added, it would be all right?—The words "Trade Union," I think, would make it clearer still.

496. There might be cases, as Mr. King was saying, when there would be no agreement with the Trade Union; where would you be then?—It is almost impossible; it is far-fetched, I think.

(Mr. King.) I have seen a case in which they mentioned a price that we found no employer thought of paying. It was a very small Union, and the price was shillings above the rate any employer was paying.

(Mr. Westcott.) It would make the Trade Unions masters of the situation if you introduced those words.

497. (Chairman.) So far as you can judge, the words Mr. Westcott has quoted do represent your idea?—They are certainly an improvement on "current rates." (Mr. Hickin.) Yes; but we want a definition of "district."

498. That is another point?—The clause would not cover all we would require even then, because when you have got the "district" put in, the employer can move from 18 or 20 miles away and endeavour to create a district wage there. When they have paid their workpeople wages for a time, they expect that to be regarded as the rate of the "district." That only goes to prove that the words as suggested would not cover the whole of the ground.

499. (Mr. Westcott.) If these words were adopted in the contract for putting up a new building in Birmingham, they would be perfectly fair then, would they not?—Yes. If the man puts up a building in Birmingham, or Wolverhampton, as far as that is concerned, the district is there already established.

500. That is exactly what I am coming to. It seems to me that it is the business of Trade Unionists to immediately establish districts and to say what is a district, because sometimes we have a difficulty in defining a district?—The Trade Union would soon be able to establish a district and to state what the district is; but would that be acceptable to the departments? You might as well insert the words "Trade Union."

501. Let me take a certain town in the neighbourhood of London—Croydon, for instance; is it not the fact there that the wages are a little less than in London, although it is within the 12-mile limit which has been fixed by agreement between masters and men?—That may be.

502. I am referring to the building trade?—(Mr. Gordon.) Mr. Hickin comes from Wolverhampton, and he would not be versed in that.

503. As a matter of fact, it is so, is it not?—I cannot answer that myself.

504. There is a case where the Trade Union is supposed to extend for 12 miles, and yet the men and the masters have agreed within that 12 miles to a less rate. If the words "Trade Union" were inserted in our contract, we could not allow the masters and the men to agree to a less rate?—(Mr. Hickin.) Do you say the Trade Unionists have agreed that that shall be the rate?

505. No; I do not say the Trade Unionists have agreed; in fact, it is the Trade Unions that are complaining of it?—I beg your pardon.

506. (Mr. Black.) In that case, supposing the Trade Union and the employers had both agreed, that would set up a current rate, would it not?—That would create a district.

507. Is it not your policy sometimes, when an employer moves out into a country district to attempt at once to set up a rate? Supposing you are strong enough, you try and set up the rate of the nearest town; but if you are not strong enough to do that, might you not establish something like a fair rate according to the conditions of the district—I mean by fighting the employer you might grind him down, or he might try to get the agricultural rate?—That is so, if we were strong enough to do it. But if we were strong enough to do it, there would be no occasion to have a fair wage inserted in the contract at all from the Trade Union point of view. It is not fair to the employers who recognise Trade Unionists that there should be just a few employers running loose who pay these low rates of wages.

508. I suppose some of the non-Union firms are, in a sense, fair houses as regards wages, are they not; but they find a difficulty in accepting your conditions of piece-work, perhaps? It is not always the case, is it, that they want to pay low wages or to sweat their workpeople? You sometimes fix, for instance, the number of pieces that may be turned out, say, in eight hours?—Do you mean that we restrict the amount of work?

509. Yes?—No, we do not.

510. You do not do that in your trade?—No.

511. It is so in some Trade Unions, I know, and in certain trades the employers stand right away from the Unions for that reason, because if they have an urgent order which must be completed in a certain time, it is the custom to do it on piece-work, and they go to their workpeople and say, "Can you turn out so much?" and they say, "No; you know the rule of the Union; we cannot." Very well, that trade will go elsewhere; that does not apply to your trade?—No. We fix the piece-rates, and a man can earn according to his ability.

512. You do not restrict him?—There has been no limit of the hours worked until recently—and there is not even any limit to-day; but on the 1st January next, after the 54 hours have been worked, the employers will have to pay extra—time and a quarter—for piece-work the same as is paid on day-work, and is, I suppose, recognised as being fair. That is with the object of preventing excessive overtime. For 54 hours the men get work at the ordinary rate. I state that, in order to prove that we do not restrict the output at all, nor the number of hours; more than that, we say to the man when he is called upon to work more that 54 hours, "On and after the 1st January next year, these rates will come into operation." Therefore, the employer, if he is paying 8d. per hour, will have to pay an extra 2d. per hour if the man goes on working beyond 54 hours. So with respect to the restriction of output. A man can turn out as much as it is possible for him to do as long as he receives these prices. (Mr. Gordon.) Of course, the extra for overtime applies in this instance to the piece-workers. We always do it for the day-workers, and now the piece-worker is to have extra for overtime just the same as the day-worker.

513. What excess do you expect piece-work to yield over time-work, on an average?—That is rather a difficult question to answer, because men's abilities vary so much. It is somewhat remarkable that we find men in some instances can get, I was going to say, 50 per cent. above their day-work rate; but then it generally happens that when you have a very smart fellow, his day-work rate is in proportion to his average earnings.

514. When you hold these meetings to revise or fix new rates, then you have to consider, I suppose, what is your basis?—We take the average. (Mr. Hickin.) 8d. per hour is taken as a day-work rate in the Midlands. It might be used as an argument that we fix the rate for Government work higher than the general rate, because we do permit 7d. per hour to be worked as a minimum for some work. I might point out the reason of it. We have 2,500 men belonging to our Union in the Midlands, and in some of the general shops there are certain very simple operations to be performed; they are light jobs, and they can be performed by an elderly man or by an indifferent workman, and we found that it is impossible to keep up the maximum rate in their case, and that we are bound to allow a certain lower rate.

515. But it is not all the Unions which take that line. When employers have advanced that argument, "Here is an old man not quite up to the standard of the others, and I have put him on inferior work at a lower price," we have sometimes been compelled to hold, under a strict reading of "competent workmen" and under the strong pressure of the Unions, that that was not always an allowable thing. Some Unions say that that tends to grind the wages down under certain conditions. I have had a case of that kind in connection with very similar work to that done by your Union?—With respect to our Union, we say the articles shall be made at piece-work rates, and the old men and the inferior men can take their chance. I have seen a lot of this work turned out, and I have seen men making a shilling an hour on Government work, and I have seen other men on the same class of work earning less than 5d. or 4d. an hour, thus showing the differences and the variations between the very worst, on the one hand, and the very best on the other. But, taking the work that is done, the piece-work rates come out as near as possible to the day-work rates. There is this to be considered in piece-work too—that if a man is at the place, and anything goes wrong, either they are short of material or they are waiting for any little thing, he has got to hang about, and he gets nothing for it. But if the man is on day-work, as long as he is on the ground, and as long as he has registered, he is paid all the time he is there. Everything taken into consideration, I should say the day man would have the best of the deal. You asked the question what is the percentage earned on piece-work over time-work just now.

516. Your Union, I take it, looks after the skilled men only, and you do not take in the machine-minder?—No.

517. Who looks after the machine-minder; can you tell me as a matter of general interest?—So far as our trade is concerned in the Midlands, none of the machine-minders are affiliated with any trade association. As far as our Trade Union is concerned, before members are admitted they generally serve a seven years' apprenticeship to the trade. That is requisite and necessary, and it is an old custom. It is, perhaps, dying out so far as the legal apprenticeship is concerned to-day, but at any rate the boys are put to the bench for a time on day-work, and then they are put on piece prices, but they have to allow the employer a percentage, in some instances 33 per cent., and in some instances 50 per cent., on their earnings in order to be taught their trade. So the men have become competent workmen before they can be admitted into the Union. I do not think we charge an excessive rate, because we have special rates charged for special work. In order to show that Government work is not charged for extra, I may say that the lowest rate for gear-case work in cycles and for motor work is 8½d. per hour.

518. In your schedule of rates, how do you allow for the difference between a firm which uses a great deal of machinery, and therefore employs a great deal of unskilled labour, and a firm in another district that employs almost entirely skilled labour? Mr. Gordon says that we have had this kind of case actually occurring. We will assume that the firm is paying a fair wage for its unskilled machine-minding labour—I am not assuming they are sweating that, but I am supposing that they are paying a fair wage, but they are making use of various up-to-date machines which largely take the place of the skilled workman. You have to fix a piece-rate schedule for work done under those conditions in one district, and in another district you have to fix a piece-rate schedule for work done almost entirely by men who have gone through their apprenticeship and are skilled workmen, the machines coming very little into it there?—That does not touch us to-day, because, so far as I know, the contractors who rely entirely on the hand-made work are getting no contracts to-day. In the Midlands practically the people who get the contracts to-day have got the most up-to-date machinery it is possible to have.

519. Even those firms you have mentioned, when compared with some London firms, use, I think, rather less machinery in the production of some of the tin articles?—I do not think that is so.

520. May I put the same question to you, Mr. Gordon? You know the London district; is that not the case?—(Mr. Gordon.) If you refer to Messrs. A——, they have some plant for the body of the Navy mess kettle, which is a little different to what they have in any of the firms that have been mentioned. On the other hand, we have always been prepared to deal with those firms if they pay the proper rate of wages. (Mr. Hickin.) Speaking of Messrs. A—— having more up-to-date machinery and better up-to-date plant, I should think they could not compare with the Midland firms I mentioned. Messrs. Z—— have the plant for stamping and pressing, and they have the plant for cutting out and wiring the bodies. I have known Z—— to supply A—— not only with the covers, but with the straps and the bails and the washers. But then, they could not compete with Messrs. A—— in the prices quoted for making Navy mess kettles. That is an absolute fact. Messrs. A—— have adopted the method of cutting up the work and introducing the piece-master system into the shop, whereby one man would be given the job and he could employ others to do the work for him. He is able in that way to get the work at a lower rate than what you may term a respectable employer could, who recognised fair wages, and where the whole of the men received the proper rate of wages for making the articles.

521. Is your organisation generally strong enough to secure that the whole of the tin-plate work of the country is done under fair labour conditions?—In the majority of cases it is.

522. If I go into a shop and buy a tin kettle, what are the chances that it is made under fair conditions of labour? You have got a certain amount of foreign stuff coming in, I take it?—Yes.

523. If I go into an ordinary ironmonger's shop and I buy a kettle similar to the pattern they use in the Government service, how can I be certain that it is made under fair conditions like those under which the Government kettle is made?—As far as I know I would say that the chances would be greatly in favour of its being made by the Trade Union.

524. The Union is strong enough, you think, pretty nearly, to take up some such position as that?—Taking approximate figures, 98 per cent. of the metal-workers in Wolverhampton are inside the Union. Those who are outside could not be regarded as very worthy persons. They usually are men who are outside because they do not care about the restrictions that are put on them in the Trade Union shops, and they want to be in a place where they can go in and out. These workpeople would not be inside a Union; they want to get into a shop where they can be more or less free agents to work for a day or two and to lose a few days in the same week. Those are the class of men who drift about from one job to the other, and follow certain of these Government contracts when they are given out to firms who cannot be regarded as fair.

(Mr. Gordon.) You have mentioned an article—a kettle—and I would not go quite so far as my friend, Mr. Hickin, in that case, because I know very well there are different kettles—in London especially. There is a large number of them made by many of the Poles in the East End of London—the Jews that come over. They have got that one article, but they are not able to make the stronger articles that you have. In many of the ironmongers' shops you will see a kettle marked up at 4½d. Common sense would dictate to anybody that it is a matter of impossibility to pay a fair wage and sell a kettle for 4½d. For making those kettles our price would be about 3s. 6d. a dozen. If we get 3½d. for making a 4-pint gas-kettle, these firms must get hold of the stuff for nothing if it is going to be sold for 4½d.

525. (Mr. Wilson Fox.) Did I understand you to say that you had a list practically with a minimum rate and a maximum?—We have a minimum list.

526. But you have not any definite maximum?—No; that is left entirely to the individual's abilities

527. If a contractor who got a contract from the Government went out into a remote country district, you would not necessarily always try and enforce that minimum, would you? Would you not be guided by the circumstances?—If there were any special circumstances, most decidedly; but such cases are almost impossible cases in our experience. I have never had such an experience.

528. You mean in your particular trade?—In our particular trade. I am only prepared to answer for my trade, and not for anybody else's.

529. You think it is unlikely that a firm in your particular trade should want to go out into a very remote country district?—It is hardly possible.

530. My whole point in asking you the question is to ascertain how far you would be prepared not to enforce your minimum if the conditions were exceptional?—Of course, I am speaking here of the way the members of our managing committee would view the thing. If there were any special and exceptional circumstances where the conditions of life were practically such that the cost of living was very much lower, they might take account of that; but we have never had a case that would cause me to express an opinion upon that.

531. If you had a case you would have to fall back upon some other district as a standard, either the nearest district where such works are being carried on, or some district in the neighbourhood where somewhat similar conditions prevailed, if you could get it?—If we could get it.

532. What would you consider Trade Union wages? You would not call a list a Trade Union list unless it was in active operation, and the rates were being paid by, at any rate, a certain number of employers, would you?—It would not become the list unless the rates were being paid by somebody, would it?—Unless the men were in a disorganised state. If their organisation did not comprise at lease 30 or 40 per cent. of those engaged in the trade, they would be unable to get any recognition from their employers at all, and consequently if an employer refused to recognise a list, it does not necessarily follow that the list would not be a fair one. To say the least of it, it depends entirely upon the circumstances; and, as I said just now, before I should care to give a definite answer to that question I should want to know the circumstances.

533. Supposing you drew up what you call a list of wages, if no employers adopted that list you would not call it, in ordinary language, a Trade Union list, would you?—We should call it a Trade Union list, but whether it was in operation or not would be a different thing. Fortunately, we have never been in that position.

534. On the supposition I am putting, it would be quite ineffective and would not represent the rates which, in fact, your people were being paid?—Any list under those conditions, though it would be a Trade Union list, would, it is true, not be in operation.

535. In ordinary language, I should not have thought you would have called it a Trade Union list. The lists that I have brought before me as a rule are lists that are in operation?—That is so, but at the same time it would mean, I should presume, that if the men were organised and had given the matter careful thought, that the list would express their views.

536. It would show what they hoped to get, but what they do not get? An ordinary list, as far as I am aware, is what the men are actually working to?—In the generally accepted sense of the words, that is so

537. You want to go a good deal further now in relation to the Fair Wages Clause. You not only want to get fair wages, but you want to put in "fair conditions," which would secure the general comfort of the workmen, and also secure what you consider to be the best organisation of labour according to Trade Union ideas?—And not only Trade Union ideas.

538. You want to promote the organisation of labour according to Trade Union ideas. Let me give you an example. I take the limitation of apprentices, the limitation of lads, and so on. Quite rightly, I have no doubt, according to your view, you want, by the Fair Wages Clause, to promote the organisation of your labour according to the ideas of the Trade Union, do you not?—We do not want to use that Resolution with any idea of improving our condition as a trade. We only want the Resolution so worded that our employers who observe the conditions and rates of wages which have been mutually agreed upon, should be regarded as fair employers, and the conditions which they recognise as fair should be regarded as fair by the various Departments. We do not want to use this Resolution with any object of assisting ourselves as a trade. We only want it worded in such a way that the conditions and wages which we agree to with our employers—and, mind you, not any infinitesimal number, but the majority of them practically in almost every district are with us—we want the wages and conditions which they accept as fair regarded by the Departments as the standard of wages and conditions as far as our trade is concerned.

539. It is comparatively easy to deal with wages; but "conditions" is a very wide word. When conditions include the limitation of apprentices, the limitation of lads, rules as to the employment of women and girls, and so on, it is going a considerable length. I was trying to get you to explain to me what limits you would put upon the word "conditions," because, as I point out, the restriction of apprentices, and the restriction of the proportion of lads to men, is practically securing for you the organisation of labour according to the ideas of your Trade Union?—We have it in existence now, and it is a condition of things which employers regard as beneficial to themselves, inasmuch as it enables them to produce a better class of mechanic than one who is practically evolved purely into a machine.

540. But you have put it forward in a way which does not make it quite clear that it is to be limited to the cases in which you have agreed upon these conditions with your employers?—That is so.

541. (Mr. Bailey.) I understood you to say just now that you desire to have the list of persons invited to tender made accessible to you?—I say that at the Post Office, the Admiralty, and the War Office we are able to obtain lists of those who tender, and I gave the instance of a colander. I do not know where those colanders are gone to, but they are quite a new article, and the form of manufacture is quite unique. I have had inquiries from our members to know who has got it.

542. In the case of the War Office and the Admiralty, I think I understood you to say that they furnish you with lists of the firms of manufacturers whom they might invite to tender?—The War Office have done so, and the Admiralty Departments send out the tender form, and with the tender form they tell us that the tender form admits us to the sample room, and that we can have from the officer in charge the names of the firms, if we apply for them, that is to say.

543. (Mr. Black.) In recent cases we have sent it to you direct?—Yes, and that is a great advantage. That brings a point to my mind. Our people would certainly like Mr. Black to extend the Admiralty principle a little; there are a lot of contracts going out that we know nothing about.

544. (Mr. Black.) The arrangement made at the House of Commons was that we should send it out for all the big supplies. Practically our supplies are covered by the big annual purchases, and the big supplementary purchases in the autumn; the other things being comparatively small.

545. (Mr. Bailey.) In the case of the Stationery Office contracts, are you aware that the name of the successful competitor, and the articles which he tendered for, are posted outside the office?—No, I am not.

546. (Mr. De la Bère.) They may not always have arrived at the conclusions you would have wished them to arrive at; but, speaking generally, I take it you have no cause of complaint against the Government Departments on the ground that they are slow to follow up any representation, or anything of that sort? You have found when you have made a complaint that they have inquired into it, as a rule, have you not?—They have inquired, most decidedly, but, at the same time, we do not always agree with their finding.

547. But you have no complaint to make that they have not paid any attention to it?—No. They might have gone further than they have done, and we may have thought they might have done it quicker; but we know there is a lot of procedure to be gone through.

548. (Mr. Black.) And other duties to be performed, as I explained to you?—Yes, I know. I have expressed the opinion to Mr. Black that I believe every effort is made to secure the conditions. I feel sure that the Departments are desirous of abiding by and following out the terms of the contract. We have sometimes thought we have had to wait a terribly long time before we have got the thing. We know it is difficult to do these things in a week or two, but sometimes we have thought that a very long period has elapsed since making the complaint and before the final decision has been arrived at.

549. It sometimes has to be taken with other business in a district, that is to say, when an Inspector goes down he may take a labour complaint to inquire into, and half-a-dozen other things at the same time?—We fully recognise that, but you will understand we cannot explain that to a man in every district where they lodge their complaints and express their opinions freely.

550. (Chairman.) Now, Mr. Hick'n, I understand you have got specific cases of evasion which you wish to mention. Of course, you will understand we cannot deal with your complaint, and we can only take it as an illustration of the methods of working the Clause. Will you give the cases that you have in your mind?—(Mr. Hickin.) I can understand that this is not a Commission to inquire or investigate into charges against any particular firm. The idea I had in my mind was that it might be accepted generally that certain firms had on occasions evaded the conditions laid down in the tenders according to this Fair Wages Resolution, and that it was perhaps not absolutely necessary to go into the details of each case. I might speak to the general principles that have been abided by or evaded in the carrying out of the contracts. There has been the question of sectionising the work, and one of the reasons why we object to the sectionising I might touch upon. Work has been sectionised to such a degree that boys and non-Unionists have been brought in to do certain work, and also girls and women have been introduced to do portions of this work, not with the object, I think, of providing them with better wages, but with the object of being able to cut out other employers whose works are in the district. We have found out that these people who do this sort of thing continually cater, as it were, for a class of men who will remain outside the Union, because, as I have said, they do not care about the restrictions that are enforced by the employers in the fair shops. They like to work spasmodically, as it were. They will follow these Government contracts about, and they will be prepared to work and accept almost any conditions for a time They will work excessive hours and they will work in conjunction with anyone else. We found that in a certain firm they were doing Navy kettle-covers, and that there was certain machinery introduced. I may say that this contract had been sublet by another firm, but they stated that they had certain machinery, which, I should say, was certainly in operation at other firms who can be regarded as fair firms. They were paying various rates—both piece-work and day-work—to suit themselves, the rates being fixed by the firm, and the men being expected to observe them. Also women were introduced for certain parts of the work—the soldering work, and it was claimed that this was women's work. We object to that sort of thing, because we know very well that women ought not to be employed doing this work. It has created a great deal of trouble.

551. Why?—Not only in cutting down the prices, but also—and this a matter of principle, as it were—we say that it does not fit the women for their positions in life to be at the soldering work. They cannot follow up the whole of the trade, and they can only do a section of the work. They could not make up the whole of the articles at any time. We believe that it is necessary that men should be used in making up the whole of the articles in order that they can supply any article that is required by the Government or anyone else at any time.

552. Do I understand you to object to the employment of women on principle?—Yes, on principle we object to it, and also to the fact that there is a tendency to reduce wages. It is to evade the paying of the proper rates to individuals.

553. On which ground is it that you object? Is it because you think it is work not suitable to women, or that the object of employing the women is to reduce wages?—We object on both grounds. The women necessarily, in performing one operation, have to work among the men, and that is not conducive to the best results, either for the men or for the women, as we have found out, and it is against the rules of our trade for women to be employed doing soldering work. We contend that the soldering in the major portion of our work is work on which practically the whole strength of the construction lies.

554. But your rules prohibit your members working with women, do they not?—Yes.

555. On any work?—On this work and on our own work.

556. On any work?—(Mr. Hickin.) On work on which we have our members employed. I do not say there are not things outside with which we have nothing to do, such as the japanning of the work, and the pressing of the work, the packing and the wrapping up, and all those sort of things. Of course, we come, more or less, into contact with the females if they do this work; but we have no control over that.

557. How long have you had that rule?—Perhaps it is three or four years since it was necessary to insert it. There has never been any occasion to do it before, because they have not been introduced in a great degree.

558. But latterly you have seen a tendency to introduce women?—There have been several firms who have done it. The men themselves, in their respective shops, have refused to work with them for years if they have been introduced; but there have been one or two shops where they have retained the services of the women, and it was necessary therefore to have a rule laid down in the book. That rule, I should say, speaking from memory, has been framed about three or four years.

559. Do you propose that the Fair Wages Clause and the contracts should be so worded as to enforce your rule against the employment of women?—No; I was merely illustrating that to show to what extent the contractors would go in order to get labour at a cheaper rate, or to have a condition which would give them an unfair advantage over their competitors. I do not suggest that the Committee should insert anything to the effect that females should not be employed on any work at all, because I understand that this Clause will cover all trades that do any work for the Government. Therefore I do not say that for a moment. Another instance I give is that of Messrs. ———, of Birmingham. Mr. Gordon has spoken of a flat-bottomed scoop, a zinc-lined scoop. That is a trade article, and has been made for many years, and a general price fixed. Certain of these were out some two years ago, and the price was fixed in Birmingham and Wolverhampton. This is a London-made article, and the committee had to meet in Birmingham and Wolverhampton in order to consider the rate and fix it. The article had not been made there, so we got the price along from London, and I might say there is an agreement between us that the rates for the Midlands should be a little lower in order to make up for the difference in the cost of living for the workpeople, which would scarcely be so high in the Midlands as it is here in London. Therefore the prices were arranged a little less than the London prices. These prices were sent out to the whole of the employers in a district, and yet one of the firms—Messrs. ——, of Birmingham—made terms with its own workpeople, and fixed the rate at something like 2s. or 3s. a dozen less than the price that would be paid by the other employers, and he has been able to secure the contract. It was contended that because the men had agreed to this price, there had been no breach of the contract, and our complaint was not upheld. We believe that the Trade Union price ought to have been applied, seeing that it was accepted by pretty well the whole of the employers in the Midlands and in London.

560. What is the date of your complaint about that?—(Mr. Gordon.) About three and a half years ago.

561. (Mr. De la Bère.) I think it was about the middle of 1905?—It was about that.

562. (Chairman.) (To Mr. Hickin.) Would you finish what you have to say upon that?—(Mr. Hickin.) Certain of the employers get men into their shops, and they will give out work to them, treating them as piece-masters, as it were, and allow them to pay the other men in the shops who are working for them, and also allowing them to employ, perhaps, a good few boys in the shops. The evils that have arisen through boys being brought up to do portions of a job have come to our notice, and they are most serious. We get some of these boys coming along, and they become members of the Union when they arrive at manhood; but we find that they are merely able to do one section of a job, and that they are not able to make one article throughout, much less turn their hand to the manufacture of any article that is required of them. The consequence is that when they get out of work there is the whole of our out-of-work pay that they are entitled to. We get applications for men to be sent to situations, and we have got these men walking about the streets and we cannot send them to the situations because the employers would refuse to retain their services. These men, when they come out of their time, and grow into manhood, probably get married and take on responsibilities; and then they find that the wages given by these employers, for whom they were formerly working, are not sufficient to maintain them, and the employers do not feel themselves inclined to make them sufficient wages, but they bring in boys and turn them off at a time when they require more wages to live with a sufficient degree of comfort. Consequently they are of no good or use to themselves, or to the nation, or to the employers. This is one of the great abuses that has arisen through a certain sectionising that is going on. It has caused us to set our faces against the fashion more than we possibly should have done. It is a great evil, and we get instances of it repeatedly. We therefore endeavour to stop the thing as much as possible. We believe that certain of the more or less unscrupulous employers would resort to almost any methods in order to get labour at a cheaper rate than the rest of their competitors, and we feel that if "Trade Union rates" were inserted into this Fair Wages Clause that would assist us materially, and would determine what the rate of the district is really meant to be. In our trade it is not so much that we are asking for, because we are so very well organised; but it is really painful to find just one or two instances where employers have set themselves out to evade the conditions merely with the object of getting the labour at a cheaper rate than their competitors are compelled to pay. I know in some instances that certain of these employers have put in at low rates for Government contracts because they found it advantageous to be able to print on their memos. that they are contractors to His Majesty's Government; and at the same time they have paid their work-people terribly low rates. As I say, the class of men they employ are very often those who would be prepared to say anything, and who do not always tell the truth, when they are questioned in connection with the wages paid. It has been more difficult, perhaps, to prove the complaints that we have alleged in these cases than it would have been if the men had been of a better moral character. Those are pretty well the points I wish to make.

563. Could you say whether the regulations which you tried to enforce against what you call sectionising are generally accepted by the employers?—Yes, they are. We have had no difficulty at all with the employers.

564. There is that rule, for instance, about the prohibition of women?—We have had no difficulty with any of the respectable employers about that—I mean with those who are regarded as fair employers, not only by the Trade Unions, but by the people in the district generally—men with reputations.

565. You do not see any tendency on the part of that class of employer to try and get that regulation modified, do you?—They have a complaint of what are known in our district as garret-masters introducing females to do work; they have complained about that, and ask us to assist in stopping them, and withdraw our members from the employ of these people.

566. You have mentioned in the course of your evidence an objection which you had to the employment of non-Unionists; would you wish to make that one of the Trade Union conditions under which these contracts should be worked?—No. I have stated that certain of those people were non-Unionists, and that they were assisting these employers of whom we complain. The reason which usually comes to my knowledge for their being non-Unionists is because they do not wish to observe the restrictions in operation in the better class of factories; they do not want to be timed in and out, and they do not want to be expected to keep the time regularly. Those are the usual class of men.

567. But you have no objection to them as long as they conform to the rates?—Just so.

568. (Mr. Wilson Fox.) You have given various reasons why you claim that men should make a whole article, but your primary object is, is it not, to keep up the rate of pay to the skilled men, so as to exclude partly skilled or unskilled men undertaking any component parts of an article, which they are, in fact, capable of making?—No. That has not been the reason. The reason, which I think I have pointed out, is the evil we have seen of sectionising. We want to see the standard of workmanship retained in order that men can accept situations.

569. I only wanted to put it to you, and to give you an opportunity of answering, that your primary object is to keep up the rate of wages to the skilled man?—That is not the primary object: it is one of the objects.

570. I am quite ready to accept your reply, only I did want to put the question to you?—(Mr. Gordon.) The gentleman wants to put the question pointedly to you: is it the primary cause of it? (Mr. Hickin.) No. (Mr. Gordon.) It is a cause, but not the primary cause. (Mr. Hickin.) It is not the primary cause, because the primary cause, as I have stated, is the fact that the sectionising causes men to lose their skill in the trade, and then the men are not able to accept situations. There are a lot of men walking about when there are situations open which they ought to be able to take up. This fact has caused us down in Wolverhampton only last week to apply to the Education Committee to found a class for technical education in order that our members will be able to retain that knowledge of the trade that they are losing, owing to the fact that so much of the work is becoming merely sectional work.

571. (Mr. Black.) You argue that this system manufactures loafers?—Yes.

572. The men are thrown out at a certain age, having only learned one part of the job, and then cheaper and younger men go in and take their places?—Quite so.

573. And they are thrown out to be casual labourers, or to swell the ranks of the unemployed?—Yes.

574. (Mr. Bailey.) I did not quite follow you, but I think you said there is a certain class of workmen—the less desirable class, perhaps—who follow the Government work from shop to shop?—I say they follow the Government contracts into these shops where they will not recognise the Trade Unions. I am speaking now about these undesirable men. They know that Trade Unionists will not work at these shops unless the proper rates are paid. The Trade Union creates an opening for these undesirables by keeping their men away.

The witnesses withdrew.

THIRD DAY.

Thursday, 5th December, 1907.

At 32, Great George Street, Westminster, S.W.

PRESENT:

SIR GEORGE H. MURRAY, K.C.B. (Chairman).

Mr. R. BAILEY, M.V.O.
Mr. F. W. BLACK.
Mr. H. DE LA BÈRE, C.B.
Mr. A. F. KING.
Mr. J. B. WESTCOTT, M.V.O.
Mr. J. J. WILLS (Secretary).

Mr. EDWARD JAMES RUDD, called and examined.

575. (Chairman.) You represent the United French Polishers London Society?—Yes, I am the General Secretary of it.

576. Is that confined to London?—Yes.

577. What is your membership?—Approximately 950.

578. Are you all of one class, or are there several branches of the trade?—You may say that the United French Polishers are, really speaking, only a section of the organised french polishers. There are other societies of french polishers also in London.

579. Do all your members do much the same class of work?—Yes, and all work under the same rates of pay.

580. All the same?—Yes, uniform conditions obtain.

581. Are you all about equally skilled?—Yes, that is so.

582. Are you satisfied with the Fair Wages Clause as contained in the contracts now?—No, I am not; far from it. The particular firm that I make reference to (Mr. A——, of Limehouse) has contracts largely from the War Office. The manager of that firm admitted to me, in the presence of Mr. James O'Grady, M.P., that his men were receiving 33 per cent. less than the recognised standard rate of wages.

583. What is the standard rate?—9d. per hour. He said that in all classes of work, whether it was cabinet-making or whether it was the polishers, whichever department it was, the men were receiving 33 per cent. less than the standard rate of wages. I communicated that fact to the War Office; but the bone of contention with them seems to be, what is the fair wage? They say, "If another firm in the immediate vicinity is only paying 6d. or 7d. per hour, they have a right to regard that 6d. or 7d. per hour as a fair wage." What we contend is that there should be inserted the words "Trade Union rates of wage." Then again, there is the London County Council; we have had serious complaints with that body. They have recently been buying a large amount of furniture from Messrs. B——, of Tottenham. This firm is known right throughout the whole of England as being a sweating den of the worst type. Boys and girls and children are exploited very badly there. I brought that to the notice of Mr. Gomme, of the London County Council, and he stated that they could not move in the matter, seeing that they had no contract with this particular firm, but had simply bought these articles for their Training College at Avery Hill. The same thing applies to the War Office in regard to Messrs. C——. That is also a firm that do not pay a fair rate of wage. They have been buying largely from that firm, and I received a letter from Mr. Gomme, to the effect, that seeing they have no contract with these firms they cannot move in the matter, as they have simply bought these articles from them.

584. Let us go back to the case of Mr. A—— for a moment. What is the clause in his contract relating to the wages that he has to pay?—It states in his contract "the current rate of wage of the district." We contend that "London" is the district, and that the conditions that obtain in London should apply at Limehouse, as they do at Shoreditch, or anywhere else in London.

585. What do you hold to be the current rate in London?—9d. per hour.

586. Is that paid by all employers, or only by some?—It is paid by, you may say, every respectable firm.

587. By a very large majority, would you say?—Yes.

588. What was Mr. A——'s defence?—Mr. A——'s defence was simply that he had to enter into competition very keenly with this firm of Messrs. B——. He was rather extravagant in his remarks, and he said, "How can we compete with a firm that have greeners or foreigners sleeping under their benches?"

589. Did he mean to admit that he was not paying the current rate?—He admitted it to Mr. James O'Grady and myself. He knew, as a matter of fact, that the men were receiving 33 per cent. less than the Trade Union rate of wage.

590. That was 6d. an hour, was it?—They work on a piece-work system, and they work at very high pressure. But even in spite of the very high pressure at which the men work, they can only earn 33 per cent. less than the standard rate of wages.

591. That is to say, the piece-work rate came out at 6d. an hour; is that so?—Yes, that would be so. From what I can gather from the men themselves, the french polishers that I have interviewed, they consider that they are rather fortunate if they get 30s. per week, and working 60 hours, that would be at the rate of 6d. per hour. They say they would be fortunate if they could manage to get hold of 30s.; but then they could only be the expert ones, the swift ones, who are well used to the work.

592. What was the end of your complaint against Mr. A——?—I submitted the matter to the Labour Group in Parliament, and I believe that at the present time Mr. James O'Grady has the matter in hand.

593. What did the War Office say?—The War Office simply contended that it devolved upon me to prove that they were not paying the fair rates. I took up the numbers of those War Office jobs, and I gave them the price being paid upon them and everything—I gave them every particular—but we never got any satisfaction from them.

594. Your suggestion as a remedy is, that instead of "the current rate" you should put into the contract "the Trade Union rate"?—That is so. That would be the way to obviate this trouble.

595. Do you mean the Trade Union rate, whether it was paid or whether it was not; in other words, whether it was only the rate that you demanded, or whether it was the rate that you actually got?—I mean the rate that was established, the rate that we got, the minimum rate that the Trade Union claim.

596. Would that be very different from the current rate. Are not the two things much the same?—They should be much the same, but, unfortunately, they dodge us so over that particular little clause. The clause says it is to be a fair wage, and of course, they can say that anything is fair. Only recently Mr. Haldane, when speaking upon the matter, made use of these words:—"Mr. Haldane, replying to a certain suggestion as to the payment of Trade Union or other rates of wages on Government contract work, said the only thing that they could do to judge in this matter was to take the Fair Wages Clause and interpret it in a fair spirit. If they looked at the case of a fair employer and judged other cases by that, there ought to be no difficulty. Not only had the War Office no objection to the men's representatives having information as to what firms were tendering for work, but they were prepared to give them every opportunity for getting such information. The War Office would endeavour to carry out in every way the aim that as the Government were, so to speak, to be model employers, it should deal with model employers."

597. What proportion of firms for which your members work are paying what you call a fair rate?—In the West-end of London I may say that they all pay the Trade Union rates, with very few exceptions, and in the East-end to a large extent.

598. Could you say, for instance, the number of firms that do not pay your rate?—Those that do not pay the rate are in a great minority.

599. You could not say the number, I suppose?—No, I could not say the number, but I know they are in the minority.

600. Over how many firms are your 900 members distributed?—Perhaps 100 or 200, or something like that. The 9d. per hour, I would like to remind you, is the lowest rate the men receive; in some cases they receive 10d., and in some cases 10½d.

601. Is that a day-work rate?—Yes, it is.

602. Are those men who are getting 10d. and 10½d. doing better work?—There are some employers who you may say are wiser than others, because they know that paying the men a larger amount of money, a larger wage, is an inducement for the best men to leave the shops they are in and go to this particular firm, and so the employer gets the highest ability for that extra payment. I know in one case a man named ——, of Hoxton, contracts for the firm of ——, of Old Street. That man has, we know for a positive fact, the finest french polishers that can be found in London, for the simple reason that he always pays more than anybody else pays. It is always an inducement to a french polisher, who knows he is a clever workman, to go to this particular man. I know myself, if I were an employer to-morrow, I would, as an inducement, offer the men 1s. or 2s. per week above what another employer would pay, because I know that I should get the best men for that money.

603. Supposing instead of "the Trade Union rate" we extend that expression a little, and say "the Trade Union rate as generally accepted by employers and employed," would that meet your view?—I myself would like to see those words inserted unconditionally, and simply have "the Trade Union rates of the particular district.'

604. But it is necessary for you to show that it is a rate which is being actually paid, and not only a rate which you put before yourselves as an ideal; you see that difficulty, do you not?—No, I cannot.

605. Supposing the Trade Union rate was not accepted by any employer in the district, you would not then ask for it, would you?—I quite follow, now. Of course, you could not ask for it then, because you could not call it the recognised, or standard rate of the district then.

606. But you could call it the Trade Union rate?—Yes, you could.

607. So we should have to qualify those words in some way, should we not?—You could qualify them in this manner—"the Trade Union rate of the district." When you get outside of London the rates of pay vary to some extent.

608. I am just pointing out to you that "the Trade Union rate of the district" would not answer the purpose, because it might be a rate which was not accepted by any employer, and therefore was not paid at all?—Take, for instance, this firm of Mr. A——, which is the largest firm in that particular locality, Limehouse. Supposing we were in a position to say: There is not another furnishing firm that we know of in the neighbourhood, then because this firm, which happens to be the one firm in the locality, pays a sweating rate of wage, you might call that sweating rate of wage the current rate of wage of the district.

609. I see that point, which is a little different from the one that I was on However, I think I understand your view. Is there any other suggestion about the Fair Wages Clause that you would like to make?—I should like to see it more stringently observed by the contractors for the War Office, the London County Council, and such bodies. It seems as though they can evade it with impunity.

610. What other kinds of evasion are there?—Here is another little evasion we make mention of: A firm named D——, of Wandsworth, have recently had a contract with the War Office to put up certain places at Woolwich. I know for a positive fact that he sublet his french polishing to a man named E——, a man who openly states he will not pay the Trade Union rate of wage. I brought this before Mr. D—— and also before the War Office. I believe Mr. D—— was impelled by a desire to do the best he could in the matter. He approached this man on the matter, and E—— assured him that he was paying the money. Mr. D——, to get full satisfaction, approached the men individually, and after questioning them they assured him that they were getting full Trade Union rates, travelling time and expenses, etc. The men, I suppose, were somewhat shielding their employer. We know as a positive fact that that man was not paying the Trade Union rates.

611. Your point is that the men sometimes say they are getting Trade Union rates when they are not?—Yes, that is so.

612. Do you see any means by which the Government could meet that difficulty?—Yes. I think myself that difficulty could always be met by giving the work, or subletting it, to a firm which is acknowledged to be fair. My experience is that the worst of the sweating firms in London seem to get hold of this War Office work. That is the part that staggers me. The fair firms do not seem to get hold of it, but these firms of —— and ——, which are vile dens, do.

613. Then you think that most of the Government contractors are not the best sort of employers?—That is my experience.

614. Have you any cases other than the War Office contracts?—No, I have never had any complaint to bring before the Admiralty. My complaints have been mostly with the War Office and the London County Council. Of course, it came as a great staggerer to my Committee when we had that reply from Mr. Gomme to the effect that "seeing we have no contract with this firm, we cannot move in the matter as we have simply bought articles from them."

615. I fear we cannot go into the question of the London County Council, because it does not concern us; we can only take their case as an illustration of the point you wish to lay before us?—I understand.

616. (Mr. De la Bère.) What is the customary method of payment for french polishers? Are they paid piece rates or time rates, as a rule?—The customary time rate of 9d. per hour.

617. But there are some firms which pay on a piece-work basis?—Yes, there are a very few—but they are very few and far between—that are on the piece-work system.

618. I suppose Mr. A—— mainly does his work on the piece-work system?—Yes. right throughout.

619. Do you object to piece-work as such?—We do not like piece-work as a system, and we object to it very much I can assure you; but still this particular firm, we know, does pay terrible piece-work prices for their work.

620. Apart from this particular firm, do you object to the piece-work system?—Yes, we do.

621. (Chairman.) But you allow it?—In a manner, we wink at it, if you know what I mean. If a man does go to work in a piece-work shop, the union does not recognise any grievance of the man, and if he were involved in any trouble with his employer the union would not take it up for him—it would be entirely a matter for his own responsibility.

622. (Mr. De la Bère.) Does Mr. A—— do very much work outside the Government contracts he holds?—From what I can gather from the men, and I have interviewed many of them with reference to the matter, they tell me that the firm is engaged, you might almost go so far as to say exclusively, on Government work. They tell me they can see the Government marks on every job they do.

623. You had some correspondence with the War Office on the subject rather more than a year ago, did you not?—Yes.

624. That correspondence, as between you and the War Office, so far as I know, ended in a letter to you from the War Office in October, 1906, twelve months ago, asking you if you could give particulars of any specific cases where less than 9d. per hour, or its equivalent was being paid?—Yes, that is so.

625. I do not think they have had any answer to that?—Yes. I sent them along the full particulars of more than one case, gave them the names of the jobs, and even the price that was being paid on them, and what should have been paid on them.

626. Did you do that after October, 1906?—Yes, I am almost sure I did.

627. I am not talking of October in this year, but of October, 1906?—I am quite sure I have corresponded with them since that date. I also used to make a practice of attending there personally to lodge my complaint.

628. Were you not informed in October, 1906, that, so far as we could see, Mr. A—— was not infringing the terms of his contract?—Yes, there was a letter that I received to that effect.

629. I do not know whether you were informed of this, but inquiries were made, and, as far as could be ascertained, the piece-work rates which Mr. A—— was paying enabled each man to earn certainly as much as he would have earned if he had been paid at the time rate of 9d. per hour?—It is just as well you have mentioned that particular matter, for the reason that there is a little explanation needed there. About four weeks back we had a man who went into work there. He is a member of our Union. Of course we were glad he got in there, because he knew he would be in a position to give us information. He sent a letter to me one night asking me to see him very particularly, as he left work at this firm of A——'s. He told me he was ready at any time to come before anybody to give evidence, and he said there are a sort of little gangers at this shop of A——'s. These men take out a large amount of work, and on it they employ boys and lads. But they justify the position by saying that the men who take this work out earn the Trade Union rates. Yes, it is perfectly true the ganger does. The ganger, who employs all these boys and all this cheap labour,, will be in a position to show the proper earnings, 9d. per hour; but there are all the others who, you may say, are working in these little compounds and who are not receiving it.

630. Do you mean to say that the work is sublet off the premises?—It is not taken from the premises, but it is given to these gangers by the firm, and then they have got their little rings of cheap labour. If ever the firm was challenged by the War Office officials, "Do your men earn the fair rate of wages?" they would say "Yes," because of these gangers. Of course, the firm of A——'s would have nothing to do with this ring of cheap labour; they would simply go to this man, the ganger who takes out the work, and show his paper: "Look; see what he has earned." As a matter of fact, he has been the only one out of twelve who has earned it.

631. What you are saying applies to french polishing only, and not to cabinet-making, I understand?—Yes, that is so. I am speaking with reference to french polishing.

632. (Chairman.) Is that an ordinary practice in the trade?—No. It would be very bad for us if it were so.

633. (Mr. De la Bère.) Are these boys apprentices?—No, they are not in the nature of apprentices at all. They are simply taken on for the purpose of bringing out the work cheap, and they are not bound for any time or anything like that.

634. They may not be bound, but are they learners; is that the customary way of learning the trade?—I think that you could hardly call them learners, because some of these fellows are fairly decent workmen and worth the full amount of money, only through depression of trade and one thing and another, they have to seek employment in such a place as that.

635. Are they competent polishers?—Yes, they would be competent polishers, and they are employed at this cheap rate.

636. Surely if that ganger is only earning at the rate of 9d. per hour, that would not enable him to pay these men any wages on which they could subsist?—That is it, exactly. The price allowed on the work could not allow him to do it; that is our point.

637. It would allow the competent polisher, who was given the work, to do it, but it would not enable him, I should imagine, to sublet it in any way, would it?—No, it would not allow him to sublet it. What I wish to convey is that a man dependent upon his own abilities and his own labour could not earn the money, and it is only by the employment of cheap labour to assist him, that he manages to come out with what we will call a fair week's wage.

638. It is unfortunate, but I am afraid any answer you sent to that request of October, 1906, must have been mislaid somewhere, because, so far as I can trace, no communication giving the specific cases which you are ready to give was received. The only thing that happened was that in the next month Mr. O'Grady mentioned the matter, and there was some little correspondence with him. Are you quite sure that you sent in the particulars of those specific cases?—Yes, I am positive of that. I mentioned the jobs, described them exactly what they were, what was being paid on it, and what should have been paid.

639. (Mr. Bailey.) As I understand you, your society rather discourages piece-work?—Yes.

640. But have you any recognised piece-work rates?—To give you a fair idea, supposing, for instance, that a man is working in a shop on day work, and his employer will say, as a particular day approaches, that in future he wishes him to do the work piece-work, then that employer and the man would see that the price estimated for that particular job was gauged to some extent by the number of hours that it took the man to do it on day work. Again, we always reckon that where a man does go to work piece-work, it is only quite natural that the man works harder with the idea of getting more money when he is on piece-work, and therefore a man usually reckons to earn at least 1s. per hour when he is working on piece-work.

641. That is, 33 per cent. more than when he is on day work?—Yes, because he would work at a much higher pressure. That is the reason why we discourage piece-work—because it encourages the scamping of the work.

642. I was not quite clear in regard to your meaning when you were referring to the class of cheap labour which this firm in Limehouse employs. I did not quite gather whether the boys you talk about were really learners or not?—I should not call them learners at all, because from what I gather from the man I mentioned, you could hardly regard them as boys, because they were young men, and men who were competent to go to work anywhere, who, of course, through a particular circumstance, are always exploited by such firms as those. The circumstance I am referring to is the slackness of trade.

643. What qualification do you exact from your members before they join your union?—The qualification is that they shall work for a certain length of time with one of our members.

644. What time is that?—A fortnight. If the man is satisfied that he seems a capable workman—and he gets another member who is also working in the shop to keep an eye on him as a workman—then at the end of the fortnight they propose him as a member.

645. (Mr. Black.) I suppose you have some system of training boys or apprentices, have you not? A young fellow does not come straight away to you as a man, does he?—No. We have a rule which stipulates there shall be one boy, or improver, allowed to every four men. That is the way we work it.

646. In reference to this ganger that you have referred to, does he work himself?—Yes, and there is no doubt he has to work very hard indeed.

647. How do you think the Government inspector could be deceived? He would not take the wages of just that one man, would he?—I have explained that there are more than this one ganger.

648. You mean that they would show the wages of the gangers?—Yes, that is so.

649. But not of the others?—Not of these men who were working with the gangers.

650. But the Government inspector would see the total that is paid, would he not; and would find out that it did not amount to very much?—I should think myself he could do so.

651. You spoke of buying from stock—at least, I take it, that is what you referred to. Do you mean that a Government department can never buy, say, an article of furniture in a shop? Supposing something is wanted in a hurry and you go to a shop, and supposing it to be kept by a fair, respectable firm, you cannot stop to inquire exactly where it is made, can you?—No, that is so. But this firm of B——'s is well-known throughout the furnishing trade, from one end of England to the other; in fact, I daresay every one of you gentlemen at this Committee this afternoon have heard of the firm. There was a bomb found there quite recently; I believe several of the Anarchists are there.

652. Does a firm like B——'s take contracts to manufacture, or do they only sell from stock?—They largely supply.

653. They take a contract to manufacture, you mean?—Yes.

654. It is a difficult question, is it not, when you buy from a shop, because you cannot always be certain under what conditions the article has been made?—That might be a difficulty, but of course there would not be any difficulty if they went to a firm that was acknowledged generally to be a fair firm.

655. Take this work that the firm of A——'s is doing; is it done direct for a Government department, or is it done for one of the big furniture houses?—I am under the impression that it is done direct.

656. I gather that they are only french polishers, and that they do not make the furniture?—Yes, they do. They employ a large number of cabinet-makers.

657. But you are only taking up one side of it?—Yes. I am only thinking of the french polishers, but I know Mr. O'Grady, who represents the Furnishing Trades Association and the cabinet-makers, has a great grievance against the firm.

658. That is on the cabinet-making side?—Yes.

659. But you are only taking the french-polishing side?—That is so.

660. And you say these people are not taking the work for some big furniture house?—No, they are dealing direct with the War Office.

661. Then it is not a question of the work being sublet to them?—No, it is not.

662. (Mr. Westcott.) You mentioned the case of Mr. D—— who went and inquired from the men whether they were paid the proper rates, and they said they were, when you had reason to believe they were not being paid those rates?—Yes, that is so.

663. Were those men members of your Union?—No, they were not.

664. Were they non-Union men?—Yes.

665. If a Union man adopted that course what steps would your union take?—If one of the members of the union went and worked for any firm under the recognised rate of wage, there would be a fine of a sovereign, or he would be suspended from benefit, or else expelled from the union.

666. It appears to me to be hopeless for the Government to attempt to help if the men deliberately work in collusion with their employers on this matter?—Yes.

667. I believe that is done in many trades. You frequently find a man, who perhaps cannot be called a competent workman and who may be a little slow, who agrees with the master for 1d. or ½d. an hour less; and I do not know that it is altogether desirable to prevent that, because the man may be just as good a workman as anyone else though not so quick; and the man might be thrown out of employment if you insist on your minimum rate, because he might not be worth the minimum rate though he may still be a competent workman?—Our contention is that these men are worth the minimum rate, and that the others who are clever are worth more.

668. I see what you mean, but then there is the point, who is to establish the minimum of competency in a man? When you get to a certain point, the men may be just above or below that?—I must admit that it is a very difficult matter to strike this line of demarcation between a skilled workman and a man who is not so highly skilled. It seems to me that the only way in which you can deal with it is to say "We will take your minimum rate as the lowest rate that shall be paid, but we will have no maximum; you can pay as much above that as you like, but what we say is that that shall be the minimum amount paid."

669. And the majority of the men therefore would get more than the minimum. The case you were speaking of was in connection with furniture people, cabinet-makers, and so on?—Yes.

670. Of course there are a great many french polishers employed by builders for staircase handrails, water-closet seats, and such things as that?—Yes.

671. Do you find there is any tendency among builders, or among what you may call high-class decorators, to pay less than the proper rate?—No. We find that they are very fair firms. For instance, there is the firm of Sage, in Gray's Inn Road; that is a splendid firm, and we never have any trouble there.

672. In short, you find that, speaking generally, builders and high-class decorators do pay the proper rates?—Yes.

673. And very often more, I expect, do they not?—Yes, that is a fact.

674. Do you know any case where the men are paid a rate which includes the material—so much an hour, for instance, including the material; do you know of any case of that sort?—I think there is a case of that sort. They paid a man there, I think, 1s. per hour, and he provided his own material.

675. Have you heard of any other cases?—No, I cannot say that I have.

676. Then you do not consider that is a general system?—No, it is not a general system.

677. Do you see any objection to it?—It works out rather profitably to the man, in many cases.

678. (Mr. De la Bère.) Mr. D——, of course, is a builder?—Yes, that is so.

679. With the exception of that particular complaint you have mentioned you have no complaint to make against him, have you? He is not a cabinet-maker; he is one of the builders you alluded to just now?—That is so. Truly speaking, I do not want to give any wrong impression about Mr. D——. I believe Mr. D—— himself wished to be thoroughly fair in the matter.

680. (Mr. Westcott.) Your evidence goes to show that he wished to be fair, but the men would not let him be fair?—It was the men themselves that would not let him be fair; that is just what it is.

The witness withdrew.

Mr. John William Clark, called and examined.

681. (Chairman.) You are the General Secretary of the Scientific Instrument Makers' Trade Society?—Yes.

682. What is the nature of the work that you do?—Our work embraces telegraph instrument making, and general work for the Admiralty and the War Office. Generally speaking, we make electrical instruments and other scientific instruments.

683. Is yours a large society?—No, it is not a large society; we have about 1,100 members.

684. Are they all doing pretty much the same kind of work, or are there various degrees of skill?—Our society covers a wide scope, from switch-making up to high-class scientific instrument making.

685. Have you got a rate for every kind of work?—We have a minimum district rate.

686. What is that rate?—The rate for London is 9d., but ours is essentially a piece-work trade, and that is why the minimum rate is low.

687. Most of your members, I suppose, really earn a great deal more than that?—Yes. Our average piece-work earnings in the telegraph shops would be about 1s. an hour.

688. What are your objections to the Fair Wages Clause as it is now worked?—Our principal objection to the Fair Wages Clause in the first onset, is that it says "the current rate of the district." We have instances where employers can easily evade that by shifting their works. In my proof, I think, I give an instance of an electric firm removing from London to Walsall. At that time there was no other firm in the Walsall district doing the same class of work, so they established their own rate, which became the current rate of the district, because there was no other rate to go by. We would suggest that "the Trade Union rate of the nearest district" be inserted in the Clause; that would meet our objection.

689. They moved from London, you say, to Walsall?—Yes.

690. And the rate in London was what?—8½d. and 9d.

691. What did they pay at Walsall?—They were paying any rate from 6d. down there.

692. And you claim?—We claim that as an evasion of the Fair Wages Clause.

693. Do you claim the London rate for Walsall?—No. Where there is a rate for the district, we acknowledge that rate.

694. But I understand that there was not a rate at Walsall?—There was no rate there, so you see it is possible for a firm to shift their works to a place outside London where there is no rate, and to say, "Now we are going to pay 7d. in this district;" and then when the Government Inspectors come down, and they want to know whether they are paying the current rate of the district, they can conscientiously say yes, because that is the only rate in the district.

695. What would you claim in the case of Walsall, for instance?—We should have claimed the rate paid in the nearest town.

696. What town would that be?—I suppose Birmingham.

697. What effect would that have had upon the rate?—Our rate at Birmingham is a minimum rate of 8d.

698. It is lower than London, then?—Yes, it is.

699. You think that a man who sets up at Walsall ought to pay the rate of the nearest town where your work is done?—Yes; that is what we suggest.

700. Without reference to its distance?—I do not suppose we should object to the distance. The employer could take the nearest town in which there was a rate recognised by the society.

701. Do you think that would always be a proper rate?—Yes.

702. It might be too high?—It would not be too high for us; it might be too high for the employer.

703. Why should he pay the rate of the nearest town? Suppose the town is 50 miles away, for instance?—Then where is the use of the Fair Wages Clause, if an employer can shift outside of a district and make his own rate?

704. I was asking you your remedy for that difficulty?—We suggest that it shall be the rate of the nearest town in which there is an established rate.

705. And on that I ask you why? It is quite conceivable, is it not, that the rate at the place at which he set up his works ought to be less than the rate of the nearest town? Supposing he had chosen a very cheap town, and the nearest town at which your men are at work was rather a dear one; would that not be a reason for his paying a lower rate?—I do not take it that it should be—that would not be within the meaning of the Clause.

706. Apart from the meaning of the Clause, you would not claim the same rate all over the country, would you?—Not all over the country, and we do not ask for that. We ask for the rate of the nearest town where a rate is established. I do not think he would have to go 50 miles, or anything like that, to find a town or a district where there was a recognised Trade Union rate.

707. In your trade, that is?—In our trade.

708. Are you spread so widely over the country as that?—We are at Newcastle, Manchester, Liverpool, Birmingham, Crewe, Rugby, and other places; so you would not be able to get a town where our men were working, and where there was not a recognised district rate within 10 or 15 miles.

709. You think a man could not select a town in England which would be more than 10 or 15 miles from some other town where your trade was at work?—I think he hardly could get a place which would be more than that distance away from any place where there was an established district rate. What we wish to do is to prevent a man going outside a place and establishing his own rate, and then arguing that that is within the meaning of the "current rate" in the Clause.

710. I quite see your point, but the difficulty of enforcing your remedy seems to be considerable?—That is the best suggestion we can offer.

711. Have you any other point which you would like to make?—One of our great complaints—I do not know whether it comes within the scope of this Committee—is a complaint that so much work is sent abroad, where we do not know under what conditions it is made.

712. We are only concerned with the contracts held from the Government?—And I mean Government contracts.

713. Are there any contracts sent abroad?—I take it they are contracted for, or they are orders placed with a firm, and that comes under the same heading I should think as a Government contract.

714. Very likely it would not. Suppose those goods were bought from abroad without any contract at all?—A good many of the Government orders at the present day are made without a contract, within the meaning of the word "contract." An order is simply lodged with the firms and they have the specifications, but it is not an open contract for firms to tender for. I think if the Government intend the Fair Wages Clause to act, there should be some restriction put on the conditions under which the articles are produced abroad as well as here, or else all the work should be done here. You send £50,000 worth of Post Office work away during the year, and our men are walking about doing nothing, and they are men used to this particular class of work. I think that clearly shows that something should be done in that direction.

715. Is that an actual fact, do you think?—They are the figures as published, and when I wrote about it there was no denial made of it.

716. Of course, it would be very difficult for the Government to follow a contract abroad and see what went on there?—There is a solution to it, and that is not to send the contract abroad.

717. Then they would have to do without the stuff very likely?—I do not know that there is any stuff they send abroad for that they could not produce themselves, especially in connection with telephone work, and I believe the bulk of this order was for telephone work. Although there may be a patent, the Government claim the right to send anybody's patent to be made where they like over here. For instance, if I have got a patent, that does not show that the Government are going to have it from me; they can send that patent anywhere they like to be made.

718. Leaving that for a moment, what is your next point?—One of my complaints is the lack of inspection that there is over Government contract work, and the time that elapses between your making a complaint and hearing anything more about it. For instance, I made a complaint to the Admiralty on June 7th of this year in connection with sub-letting contracts. I simply wrote and asked if a certain firm had got written permission, according to the contract forms, to sub-let part of their contract. They formally acknowledged the letter, but from that day to this I have heard nothing of it, and the order is complete and gone out now. The whole of the inquiry right through of the Government Inspectors is not efficient. Then in regard to testing instrument work, I reported to the War Office another firm where the district rate was 9d., and that firm did not pay the recognised minimum rate of the district; but by introducing piece-work the men earned just a trifle over the rate of the district, and in that way the firm were able to evade the Fair Wages Clause. They do not guarantee a man a weekly wage, or an hourly wage, but by premium bonus systems and piece-work rates a man can earn just over the district rate, and they say that complies with the Fair Wages Clause, although all union men are kept out of the shop because they cannot start for the money they offer them.

719. Is it an evasion of the Clause if a man gets more than the rate?—No, not if he gets more than the rate, but we contend that the rate is not earned on ordinary conditions. We contend that a firm should pay the district rate, independently of any other conditions which he has got in his shop, such as piece-work conditions or premium bonus systems.

720. If a man succeeded in getting, at a piece-work rate, more than he would get at the day-work rate, would you still say the employer was evading the Clause?—Yes, because he keeps other men out in that way. If our rate in a district is 9d. per hour at day-work, if we are wanted to work piece-work we should expect to earn 1s. an hour as the recognised piece-work rate; that is where the day-work rate is 9d. we generally calculate it as a quarter more for the piece-work. But they take on a man at 6d., and they allow him, by piece-work, to earn 9d. Then they say to the Inspector that the man is earning 9d., which is the rate of the district; but there is no inquiry how the man does make it. The man might be making that 9d. an hour by the aid of two or three boys helping him on the piece-master system. We contend that that is a deliberate evasion of the Fair Wages Clause.

721. Except that the man is getting the amount?—The man is getting it, but not under fair conditions, and he is keeping society men out; they cannot start in that shop, because the day-work rate is so low. In this particular shop also, I reported that they were buying work in from abroad—buying the parts of the War Office instruments.

722. They buy them made up?—Yes.

723. And then they put them together?—They simply put them together by boy labour. The instruments there were testing bridges for the War Office, and they were not touched by a full-priced man. The ebonite tops were brought in from Germany, and all the work, we claim, is skilled men's work.

724. But you would not go so far as to say that they ought not to get in the pieces from abroad and have them made up here, would you?—We do say so. The Government contract distinctly says the work shall not be sub-contracted for.

725. Would you call buying the pieces sub-letting?—I should say if a man bought parts in that way that would be equal to sub-letting it.

726. It would not be technically called sub-letting, would it?—Whether you can call it so technically or not I do not know, but it is so. In the one case work is given out to a man, asking him to supply it, and in the other they go to a firm and buy it. What is the difference? I wrote complaining about that, and I simply got a reply back that they had seen this man's books and found that he did pay over the rate of the district; and that was an end of the inquiry, although had they asked for further proof, or had they called me, or one of our members, or somebody appointed, in front of the inspector who had been there, we could have proved that the figures were wrong that he saw, and that this contracting-out and cheap labour did take place.

727. Or rather, you could prove that he was getting the rate under conditions which you did not approve of?—That is so.

728. Your general complaint is that the inspection is not close enough?—That is one serious complaint. Another complaint that we have had to suffer very much under is that the inspectors, when they go to a firm, deliberately tell them where they received their information from, and we think that is a thing which should be avoided.

729. I do not quite follow?—The contract lays down that the books shall always be open to the inspection of the Government inspectors. When we write to the various departments they hand the evidence to an Inspector of Contracts, or somebody who is appointed to go and make the inquiry, and invariably the first thing they say to a firm is where they have got their information from, with the consequence that our men are barred in those shops. There are firms in London at the present time who will not employ one of our men, and they give as their reason that we make complaints to the War Office and the Admiralty.

730. Do you think you could expect a contractor to go into these complaints without telling him where they came from?—Yes. The inspector certainly need not mention the name of the person who has given him the information. He could say that he had had complaints, and he wished to go into it and see their books, without saying that he had a letter from Mr. Clark, the secretary of the Scientific Instrument Makers' Trade Society, and he says so-and-so and so-and-so. I wanted to have an interview with an employer of electrical instrument makers, and I asked for an interview with him, and the first thing he told me was he could not give me an interview because I had reported him to the War Office for buying stuff from abroad. We think the inspectors might go about their work in a different way, instead of deliberately going and saying from whom they have had their information. Then there is a system which is worked right through the Birmingham firms, who are large contractors for Government work; it does not hit me, but it may hit some of the other societies. That system is the piece-master system.

731. What is that system?—Under that system one man takes the job out from the employer, and he employs any amount of boys to do it, and he is allowed to pay them exactly what he likes. There is no control over that man.

732. Does he do the work in the shop?—Yes.

733. And employs boys there?—Boys, and men too. The firm relieve themselves of all the responsibility of producing the work, the man sub-contracts it out from the firm and employs his own labour under what conditions he chooses, and he makes money out of it.

734. Have you ever made a complaint of that?—Have I personally?

735. Yes, for your society?—We have had complaints, but it does not affect us to the extent that it affects a good many other societies, for the simple reason that we will not allow any of our men to work under that system.

736. You prohibit it?—Yes.

736A. Do you allow any improvers, or learners, or apprentices?—Yes, we recognise the improver.

737. How many do you allow?—We lay down no proportion, because we find it is rather difficult to make a binding rule which is going to meet all cases. If we consider there are too many boys in a shop, then we take steps to alter it. We find it is rather a difficult task to say what shall be the proportion of boys.

738. Have you any principles on which you go? What guides you in fixing the amount?—We simply take the work in the shop and divide it into what we consider men's work and what we consider boys' work, and if we find the boys encroaching on our work we very soon make a complaint.

739. Is not the boy's work anything that a boy can do?—No, I take it not. There is certain work which is recognised as boy's work in the instrument line, and we certainly object to a boy being put on man's work.

740. Why, if he does it as well as a man?—For the simple reason that the man should be having his 9d. or 10d. for what the boy is content to do for about 1½d. Then we contend that it is against any high-class work; it sectionises the work too much.

741. You object to it?—We object to it as far as we can.

742. On what ground do you object to it?—Because it is doing away with labour and cheapening work.

743. But if the result, on the whole, is equally good as far as the production of the work is concerned, why should you object to it?—For the reason that it displaces men's labour. Then again, when instruments are tendered for, the price is very often based on men's wages, and the tender is got on men's wages, but directly they succeed in getting a contract, then, by the help of one or two full-price men machine boys are put on to do men's work. You can very soon tutor a boy into doing just one particular operation on a job.

744. Do you object to the sub-division of labour generally?—No, not generally. We recognise the fact that it cannot be avoided. But what we do object to is that too many boys should be allowed in a shop to do this instrument work. There is one firm now doing the highest class work that the Government put out. We know what is the price got for the work, and that the proper rate of wages can be paid on it; yet we are continually having difficulties with boys being put on to that work.

745. Have you any women employed in your trade?—No, we have no women.

746. Has anybody ever attempted to employ them?—Yes, we have had one or two firms who started it, but they have dropped it. When I say no women are employed in the business, I mean not in the mechanical part of it, because there are women employed on coil winding and lacquering, but not in London. It does not apply to London, anyhow.

747. Do you object to the employment of women on principle?—Yes, on principle I do.

748. As lowering the men's wages?—I object to women being employed in any industry.

749. In any industry?—In any mechanical industry, anyhow—in any workshop where there are females and men all mixed together. If some of you gentlemen were to see some of the shops in Birmingham where males and females work together, I know you would agree with that.

750. I think we have been over all your complaints?—Yes. Boy labour is the great difficulty with us—the over-amount of what we consider to be a fair proportion of boys and men. We do not object to the ordinary boys being in the shop, as we recognise the fact that a boy has got to learn his trade. But when you see shops doing Government work, and you go there at meal times, you will see it looks like an infants' school. You will see the boys coming out even in knickerbockers, and there are only two or three men among them. That makes you think how is a man going to get his living at all directly. When we know the work is paid a fair price for, and we have these firms continually under-cutting by the aid of boy labour, it is time something was done to prevent it. We are not saying for a moment that we are going to keep boys out of the trade, or that we are not going to teach them when they come into it. It is to our interest to teach them and to bring them up as mechanics.

751. Do you think they ought only to be there as learners?—Yes.

752. And so there ought to be no more than can be used in that capacity?—In the shop. I should think it might be laid down as a rule that there should be about one boy to three men. That, I should say, would be a fair estimate for our particular trade, but I am afraid that in a good many shops at the present time it is about six boys to one man.

753. Is there no part of the work that might be done entirely by boys?—Yes. This screw cleaning, terminal work, and all that sort of thing, we recognise as boy's work. Take the War Office work: that work has been done for years by a man receiving 1s. an hour for it, but a firm will bring two or three boys in and coach them up in the same work, and then the man has to go out because there is no work for him, and the boy never turns out a good mechanic through it. They simply get him into the shop for one particular operation and keep him at it. We also contend that too much sectionising lowers the standard of the work. A man has no interest in his work, and he simply becomes a machine which puts the pieces together. We would suggest that some sort of scheme should be devised by which there could be an expert committee of the various departments to decide what should be recognised as the work on which fair wages should be paid. That seems the great bother now, inspectors. I do not know whether they are practical men. I have met one or two that are, and I have met one or two that are not—do not seem to recognise that there is any difference. As long as the work can be done they do not seem to think it matters who does it, whether it is a man, boy, or girl.

754. On the supposition that it is equally well done by all three?—Yes. I take it that it is not the Government's intention to cut work down to such a low ebb that it has all got to be produced by boys, and that is what it is fast coming to unless something is done.

755. In your trade is boy labour increasing?—It is increasing at an alarming rate. The shop where I worked when I was about 21, had at that time about 40 men and about three boys—a couple of errand boys and a boy to clean up the screws. I suppose that firm now has got six full-price hands on and about 120 improvers, apprentices and boys; still they do Government work.

756. Where would those 120 all go to?—They drift out into different things, and a lot of them never stick to the line at all.

757. Do they go into another trade?—They go into other trades, and they go into their parents' business. A good many of them, I think, are sent there by their parents just to fill in their time. Publicans' sons seem to make a dash at the electrical line; they seem to think that there is a gold mine in it. Then various other businesses send their sons out to it, and they do not work at it afterwards.

758. Do you think there ought to be some provision in the Government contracts to limit the amount of boy or apprentice labour?—I should think there could be some scheme devised for it, though I recognise the difficulty in laying down in the Government contracts any definite proportion of boys to the men. But I think if we complained to the Government department that the contracts came from, and said that a certain firm was employing more boys than we recognised should be employed, they should at least give us an opportunity to come before them and prove what we claim as our work, and what we recognise as boys' work.

759. Are those conditions of yours that you make about the number of boys generally accepted by the employers?—They are fairly well accepted; sometimes we have a bit of a fight to get them.

760. They are not as widely accepted as your minimum rate, for instance?—No; I should not think it is as widely accepted as the minimum rate by a long way.

761. The Fair Wages Resolution can hardly go beyond what is generally accepted among all the employers, or among the best employers in the trade. I was wondering whether you would have any chance of getting your conditions about other matters than wages generally accepted?—It is proposed, I believe, in the coming Session, to make an amendment to the Fair Wages Clause, by inserting "Trade Union rate and conditions." It is no use an employer recognising the rate of the district, if he does not recognise the conditions as well under which the rate is to be framed.

762. You mean the conditions that are generally accepted?—By the Trade Union in the district.

763. And by the employers?—Yes, by the employers. Some of the employers accept the rate.

764. You do not wish to enforce any conditions that are not generally accepted by the employers, do you?—No. There are certain firms in the district, for instance, who recognise the Trade Union rate. It is very unfair that another firm who will not recognise those conditions should be allowed to underbid the firm that adopt the fair conditions; and that is what is continually happening.

765. The question arises, how widely the conditions are accepted; whether you have practical unanimity, or a large majority, or only a minority of employers who accept them?—I suppose in London seven-eighths of the shops accept the Trade Union conditions.

766. Seven-eighths of them?—Yes. Of course, I am not speaking about the poky little firms, but of the recognised ones.

767. Have they accepted such conditions as you make about boy-labour?—As the evil comes along we raise the question of the remuneration of boy-labour, and there is a little bit of a bother over it, but then it is settled for a time. Generally speaking, however, they have not accepted any proportion of boys to men.

768. That being so, how could you expect the Government to interfere in the matter, and enforce it in their contracts?—We do not ask the Government to put it in their contract. All we ask is that when we make a complaint some inquiries should be made.

769. I thought you were proposing to put in "Trade Union rates and conditions"?—I would propose to put all that in, but then, I know very well the futility of it. We contend that at present, as the Fair Wages Clause is used, "current rate" does not cover enough ground. It is too easy to evade it.

770. Your remedy for that is to put in "Trade Union rates and conditions"?—As recognised between the Employers' Federation and the Trade Union. We have a recognised rate in the London district which the Employers' Federation recognise, and if they give an increase of wages to one section you do not even have to ask for it, it comes along automatically.

771. But then you say they do not accept your other conditions?—Not as regards boy-labour, but we always have the opportunity to interview the firm. Take the new conditions of the engineering trade just now. The new condition is that they have abolished the proportion of boy-labour, and left it to the societies to always deputise the Masters' Federation when there is any grievance of that kind, and they would adjust it So really we are in a better position than we were in when we laid down the hard-and-fast line, because what might be a large proportion of boys in one shop perhaps in another shop would be a small proportion. It all depends on the work. What we would strongly recommend, if the Committee could see their way clear to do it, is that some sort of body of experts should be appointed to deal with the Government contracts more than they have done in the past. That is the great evil. I daresay the inspectors do the best they can, but it is impossible for a man who is not a practical man to go to a firm and talk to them about what should be done and what should not.

772. More practical inspectors is what you desire?—Yes, more practical inspectors. It is so easy when a man has not had any practical knowledge, for the employers simply to show him a book stating that the men do receive 10d. an hour or 20 per cent. over the recognised rate of the district. He cannot confute it at all, because he does not know anything about it. Then he does not know whether the men have been working 12 or 14 hours a day to earn that money, or whether they have worked the recognised hours of the district. One of the largest firms—or rather not now, but a firm which will be one of the largest firms—when they did Government work here in the City paid 9d. an hour; but they moved out to Rugby, and then they soon established a "current rate of the district" there of about 6d. They can get any amount of labour in that district for it while that is the rate. They do the same class of work, and they get the same price for their instruments. Had our suggestion been in vogue, that is, that they should take the nearest rate of the district, they would have had to take the Birmingham rate.

773. That would have involved 8d. I think you have said?—That would have been 8d. The same at Worcester. A firm of railway contractors shifted down to Worcester and established there a rate of 32s. per week. The rate of the nearest town, which would have been Birmingham again, would have been 36s. for that particular class of work; but there not being another factory in Worcester in that line, they could say that theirs was the current rate of the district.

774. But on what ground would you enforce in Worcester a rate which is suitable in Birmingham?—Living is exactly the same in Worcester as it is in Birmingham.

775. Is it?—In fact a man that we had to work down there told me it cost more to live in Worcester than it did in Birmingham. But rents were the same, and the employer does not contract any cheaper. If it is cheaper for the men to live there, it is much cheaper for the employer to have his land there. The employer gets it both ways. He goes there in the first place because he will get coal cheaper and land cheaper on which to build his factory; that enables him to produce his work cheaper, and then he also wants his men to work cheaper. On the other hand, I think you might say that because he got his coal and his ground cheaper he ought to pay a bit more.

776. It is quite conceivable, is it not, that the cost of living at Worcester might be a good deal less than the cost of living at Birmingham?—It is not so.

777. No, but I am putting to you a hypothetical case. Supposing that was so, would it still be right to enforce the rate of the nearest town?—I should say so.

778. Although the conditions are quite different?—I should say so.

779. (Mr. King.) I think you said you do not fix the proportion of boys to men, as you have found it too difficult?—We have never attempted to lay down a definite number of boys to men, but we have generally worked on the principle of about one boy to three men.

780. But you have not applied that rule universally?—We have not that embodied in our rules.

781. Would you like the Government to interfere whenever you complain that there are too many boys?—Whenever we complain that there is too much boy-labour, we should like the Government to hold an inquiry.

782. If you cannot tell us what is the proper proportion, do you expect the Government departments to work out the proportion and fix it?—No. We think it would be almost impossible to lay down the proportion, but if we could prove to the Government that the bulk of their work was being done by boy-labour, we think it would be their place to interfere.

783. It is possible that it might be boy's work?—Then we should not interfere if it were boy's work.

784. Would you wish the Government Inspector to be able to go into a workshop and say, This is man's work and this is boy's work?—He should be in that position.

785. I rather think the Government Inspector would be content with the results. If a boy turns out as good an article as a man, would he not probably say, This is boy's work?—Do you contend that a boy shall be allowed to produce everything the Government want?

786. No; but if we find that the work is proper to boys, why should we turn boys off?—Because we contend that it is displacing men's labour.

787. It was done by men once, and everything that has been done by men should remain with the men; is that it?—No, we do not stretch it so far as that. We say that when an instrument is made which has always been recognised as men's work, we do not think the Government should allow the whole of that to be produced by boy-labour at 2d. or 3d. an hour.

788. I was not looking at the amount of the wages for the moment?—The wages must enter largely into it.

789. I was rather wondering how we in a Government department are to decide what is the proper test. If we find boys can do it, and do it well, on what ground can we say it is not proper to boys—on the ground that it was formerly done by men?—On the ground that they are not receiving the rate of the district. If the firms were to pay those boys the recognised rate of the district we do not object to boys doing it.

790. But you have not any boys in your union; it is a men's union?—That is so, but I say if the boys receive the current rate of the district, we should not object.

791. A boys' rate?—No, the recognised rate of the district. Then we should not object to their doing it; but we certainly do object to the work being taken away from men and being given to the boys at 1½d. and 1¾d. per hour.

792. When you bring forward a case of this kind, how would you expect the Government department to proceed? You say a certain firm are employing too many boys; but we have no proportion to work on, so what are we to do?—If we could show to you that the custom of the trade was for that to be men's work, and that that particular shop was getting it done by boy-labour, we should think we had made out a case.

793. We should have to consider each particular item of work by itself, then?—Yes.

794. Now in reference to the piece-masters to which you have referred, how are the wages of the boys they employ shown on the wages-sheets?—I am afraid they are not shown at all, and that only what the piece-master himself gets is shown.

795. The boys do not appear on the wages-sheet, then?—The man simply contracts to do the job; he takes the job for a certain price from the firm. He employs these young men and pays them what he thinks proper.

796. Then those young men are not employed by the firm?—No, they are employed by the piece-master, and the firm has nothing to do with them at all.

797. The firm do not employ them and do not pay them?— The firm do not pay them, and are not responsible for them. They simply have to do with the piece-master.

798. Could the firm discharge them?—No.

799. Then if they made themselves a nuisance, what would happen?—I take it they would speak to the piece-master, and then the boys would be discharged. The firm would have control over them so far.

800. I gather then that our inspection of the wages-sheet would not show this sweating at all?—It would not show this sweating which goes on to a tremendous extent. One of the largest firms in Birmingham has 16 departments, and I know that 15 departments are under the piece-master system, the only department which is not being the department where our men work.

801. Then you have objected to the purchase of necessary parts, on the ground that it amounted to sub-letting. Supposing that we are building a house and we give the contract to a builder, is he to make his bricks or to buy his bricks?—You cover that in your contract.

802. No, we do not?—You say in your Government contract that the work shall not be sub-let without a written permission.

803. That would not be sub-letting, would it? Take another case: We give an order to a carpenter, and he uses a lot of nails; you surely would not say he was sub-letting it when he bought the nails, would you?—In the ordinary sense of the word certainly not; we should not be so foolish as to make such an observation as that. We say that when a man receives a Government contract for any instrument, he is, according to the contract, supposed to produce that himself or in his works.

804. How far would you go?—It is subject to the ordinary work that is brought in; we recognise that. We do not expect a man to make his brass, and we do not expect a man to dig up his own iron; we expect he is going to buy that in. But we do object to the man taking the instrument to pieces, and taking a part of it to one firm and getting a price for it, and taking another part to another firm and saying: What can you do this for? In that way he gets the various parts of the instrument cheaper than he can get them made inside his works, and he can do that by going to the different shops which do not pay the recognised rate of the district.

805. How do you think we can prevent that by the wording of the contract. "Sub-letting" does not cover it?—It is sub-letting.

806. I do not think that can be called sub-letting?—If it is not sub-letting, what is it?

807. If he buys the thing ready made, he does not sub-let it?—It is splitting straws, saying it is not sub-letting.

808. I do not think we can say that it is sub-letting?—If a contractor takes a contract for boots for the Army, and directly he gets the contract he goes round to different firms in Northampton and says, What can you produce these uppers for? and he takes the one that can produce the uppers cheapest, and so on with the rest of the boot——

809. That would be sub-letting if he gave them an order?—But according to you when you come to instrument work, you say it is not sub-letting. This man has only bought the uppers, and he has only bought the bottoms—parts of the boot.

810. It is all a question of degree. If the man buys certain parts that are recognised as being for sale ready-made, where is the sub-letting?—But they are not recognised as ready-made things, and that is what we complain about.

811. I thought these were recognised parts that he bought?—No. We do not object to a man buying screws, because we know it is a recognised thing in the trade for a man to purchase his screws, and we know also that it is a recognised thing for a man to buy the terminals. But we do object to a man taking the instrument to pieces and taking it round piecemeal to different little sweating places, and getting it made there, then taking the parts to his factory and putting it together there.

812. I did not understand that that was your complaint?—That is our complaint. Even if he went to a firm that paid the recognised rate of the district, we should not object, and if he had written permission to sub-let, we do not object to it, because then we should find out where he was getting it done, and we should see whether the Trade Union conditions were followed.

813. Going now to this firm that went to Rugby, you say that they ought to pay the rate of the nearest town; have you any district between Rugby and London?—Yes, Birmingham; that would be the nearest district.

814. But supposing that instead of removing to Rugby, that firm had gone, say, to Chesham, or Amersham, would you then be insisting that he must pay the London rate, London being the nearest town?—He should pay the rate of the nearest district.

815. Would not London extend half-way to Birmingham on your principles?—No.

816. Birmingham, you say, is the nearest district on the other side?—It is the nearest to Rugby.

817. I am leaving out Rugby for the moment?—There are towns between this and Rugby.

818. Where you have a recognised rate?—Where there are recognised rates.

819. I thought you had nothing between London and Birmingham?—We may not have a branch, but we have a recognised rate of the district.

820. It would, of course, be possible to choose a place which is nearer London than anywhere else?—It might not even be our Society rate. We ask for the recognised rate of the district where there is a recognised rate.

821. But I am assuming a man goes to a country place near London where there is no recognised rate, but it is a place which is much cheaper to live in than London. Do you expect the London rate to be paid there?—If it is near London, certainly.

822. If it is 20 miles from London?—Yes.

822*a*. And there is no other place nearer where you have a recognised rate?—If there is no other place nearer than London, we should insist on the London rate, as being the nearest place where we have a recognised rate.

823. Assuming London to be the nearest, do you think it is reasonable to expect the London rate to be paid in a cheap country place?—Why not? Can you give me any reason why it should not be?

824. Wages are not so high there, generally?—Why should they not be?

825. I do not know; I am only reminding you of the fact that they are not?—We want to make them so.

826. Do you want a universal rate?—I should like a universal rate, and I should like to make it as high as London, but I know we cannot get that.

827. Would you like it for every trade, or only for your own trade?—I am only dealing with our own trade. But look how the term "current rate" works.

828. I was not talking of the current rate. I was only wondering how your system would work. It seems to me it would result in a universal rate?—No. If a firm were to move outside Manchester they would take the Manchester rate with them; but if a firm were to move outside Birmingham they would take the Birmingham rate with them.

829. And assuming the firm were to move a little way out of London they would take the London rate?—Yes.

830. Then another firm which moved a little way further out would also take the London rate, because it would be nearer to the locality to which the first firm had moved than to any other place, and so the London rate would gradually cover the whole country?—I do not see how it can do that, when we are ready to accept the nearest district where there is a rate. You could not very well say that Preston was nearer to London than to Manchester.

831. Now about these orders that are given abroad, would you contend that a Government department would be right in spending 40 per cent. more in getting the stuff made in this country; say, that we can get the stuff abroad at £60, and the lowest tender in Great Britain is £100?—I should say that if that work was made abroad under unfair conditions the Government would be justified in spending the 40 per cent. more.

832. Then you would go in for Protection?—Protection? I do not know whether the discussion is going to develop into Free Trade and Protection.

833. I was wondering what you meant by your answer?—I say it is manifestly unfair, and it makes the whole Fair Wages Clause a farce, if the Government are going to say to us, We will send you the contract, so that you shall know what work is being tendered for; we will also send you a confidential list of the firms who are going to do this work; and then you send the work abroad.

834. I think you do not know the real reason why that work has gone abroad. One reason is cheapness, I admit; the other reason is that nearly the whole of the articles are covered by patents, and we cannot get British makers to make them?—Then why not make them yourselves? Our men are being discharged here on that very work at the Post Office stores—exactly the same thing that has been sent abroad.

835. No, it is not?—I beg your pardon, I know that.

836. So do I. I will tell you what it is. The stuff we have ordered abroad largely is switch-boards and the necessary apparatus, including the connecting subscribers' apparatus, all of which is covered by patents held by the Western Electric Company; nobody in this country can make those things except the Western Electric Company themselves, and they are starting a factory of their own. That covers the bulk of the £50,000 that you quoted?—There again, if an Englishman is in that position, why do you not extend the same facilities to the Englishman who has got the same patent?

837. He has not got it, the other people have got it?—On any other work, if an English firm holds the patent, the Government can give the order to whom they like, although it is your patent.

838. But they have to pay a royalty?—And they fix that themselves.

839. Not if some one else makes it?—Why cannot they make that work and pay the American Company a royalty upon it.

840. Why cannot the Government make it?—Yes.

841. They have already too much to do, I think?—Yet they have got that machinery standing idle in the Post Office.

842. There is no machinery standing idle. We should want to build an enormous factory to do the work?—How many men have they at work at present at Holloway for the Post Office?

843. I can give the exact number if necessary?—How many is there room for there?

844. We are employing at Holloway now more men than we were employing three or four years ago?—I cannot go into it to contradict your figures, but I have Mr. Willmot's word.

845. Now about this piece-rate; as I understand it, the piece-work rate must be something quite apart from the day-rate, but you want a day-rate in every case?—We contend that the day-work rate should be guaranteed, irrespective of every other condition.

846. And that the piece-work rate should be in some way connected with the day-rate?—If the man likes to work piece-work, let him; that is no concern of ours. The current rate of the district should be the day-work rate, irrespective of any other conditions under which he works.

847. You do not have a certain proportion, do you? You do not say it must be 40 per cent. or 33 per cent., say, over the day-rate?—No. We do not fix any proportion; we only take the custom of the trade.

848. Is it not usual that the piece-rates should be agreed on between the employer and the men?—With some firms that is so, but the men generally fix it themselves. There is the recognised rate to test the price on, and the work is generally priced on that. We have that system at present at work in the shops.

849. (Mr. Westcott.) This question of the district-rate seems to be rather a difficult one. I think you told the Chairman it was not possible for anyone to go out 50 miles from the headquarters of your Union, or from a district where there was a rate established?—Yes, I did say that.

850. How far west have you got a district?—Weymouth.

851. Cannot you go 50 miles from Weymouth and establish yourself in many places?—Where would you go to?

852. Exeter, Plymouth, Truro?—There is a rate established in Exeter.

853. I thought you meant that Weymouth was the furthest west that you went?—It is the furthest west where we have a branch, but there are recognised rates further west than that. We have men at work in Exeter.

854. Then you really have a rate in Exeter?—Yes.

855. Is that the furthest west?—No. There are Cheltenham and Truro.

856. Have you a rate at Plymouth?—We have no one at Plymouth.

857. Then between Exeter and Truro you could establish a place 50 miles away from a recognised rate, and the conditions might be very different from those at Exeter and Truro?—Still they could take the nearest place where there is a district.

858. I am taking Exeter as the nearest place. Exeter is a fairly populous place, and fairly good wages are earned there; you may take a place 50 miles away from Exeter, somewhere in the neighbourhood of North Devon, and establish a works where the rates of pay generally are very much less than they are at Exeter?—We have men working in Gloucester.

859. But that is a long way off?—Where would you take the radius of 50 miles from?

860. From Exeter. You will get plenty of places where factories might be established, where the general rate of wages all round is very much less than at Exeter. I only give that as an example, but there must be plenty of other places?—Then according to that, you are going to allow a firm to move out into one of these places and establish their own rate.

861. The men probably will live a little cheaper there, and it might pay them better to work at a little less rate there?—Perhaps if that were so, we should recognise that as the rate of the district; but as long as it is a rate recognised by us—that is the point.

862. But supposing there is only one firm there?—That firm could make the recognised rate of the district.

863. But you said before that they must pay the rate of the nearest town, irrespective of distance?—That is what we suggest.

864. I have just shown you it will not be right in that case?—It may work hard in one or two cases, but I say that if you were to take England right through, you would find it work out fair.

865. Mr. King asked you about going to Amersham and Chesham. You would not expect to pay the London rate at Amersham and Chesham, would you?—We do not ask for the London rate.

866. But you did most distinctly?—We want the Trade Union rate recognised; that is the main principle.

867. You distinctly told Mr. King, in the case of Amersham and Chesham, you would expect the London rate paid, because it was nearest to London?—And it would be nearest to London.

868. Very well?—I say we have places in between where there is a rate recognised; but under the present Clause there is nothing recognised as the rate except "the current rate of the district," and that could be what the employer lays down himself.

869. By agreement with his men; they can say they will not work at that rate?—You can generally get some men to work at that rate, anyhow. If a man makes the rate for his shop 6d. an hour, that becomes the current rate of the district, and we do not think it was ever intended by the movers of the Clause that it should work like that.

870. There must be two to every bargain; nobody could make me work for 6d. a hour if I wanted 8d.?—If you could not get more than 6d. anywhere else, and you had nothing else to do, the force of circumstance would make you work for that. It is all very well to say, "We will not do this, and we will not do that"; but when a man is hungry he does not look at the rate so much.

871. (Mr. Black.) I suppose your union has to face the question of setting up new rates?—Yes, certainly.

872. The fact that there is a difference between London and Birmingham, and Weymouth and Truro, and various other places shows that you cannot get anything like a uniform rate?—We cannot get a uniform rate, and we do not ask for a uniform rate.

873. Taking the case that has been so often put to you about a firm moving to Amersham, would not your union go to work there to get an Amersham rate?—What we should do in a case like that, it there was a firm starting in Amersham, would be that we should have a meeting down there, and possibly see the employer and establish a rate for that district, and then that would become the recognised rate of the district. We might not say that it should be the same as London.

874. But you would establish a rate with the employer, according to the conditions of the district?—Yes, we should have to do that in all new districts; but that is very different to the "current rate."

875. That is not quite the same position as you took up at first. You began by advocating taking necessarily the rate of the nearest town, and in an arbitrary way insisting on that?—The suggestion that was put to me was, I think, where no rate existed in a town would the nearest rate be taken? That was an amendment of "the current rate."

876. But such a suggestion would relieve your organisation, would it not, of all attempts to fix new rates according to new conditions?—We should still have the same rights of making a rate for a district.

877. Referring now to the case at the Admiralty which you mentioned, have you got any note of it here, or could you let me have a note?—Which one was that?

878. I think you began by saying you wrote last June to the Admiralty and had an acknowledgment, but nothing further?—The case was a contract that went to Chelmsford. I think it was for motor-starter work. That was sub-let to a firm at Shepherd's Bush, or we believe it was. I am not able to say it was, but we have reasons to believe it was so. I wrote to the Admiralty, and I got a formal acknowledgment last June that the case was being inquired into. I wrote on the 6th of June, I think, and I got an acknowledgment on the 10th, and since then I have heard nothing more about it. I suppose it is put away into one of the pigeon-holes.

879. I have got nothing from your society later than 1903?—If you will refer to, I think it is, June 6, of this year, you will find there is a complaint.

880. You spoke once or twice about the custom of the trade, and you said if you were able to show a Government department—speaking of the proportion of boys—that so-and-so was not according to the custom of the trade you would have established your case?—Yes; we should.

881. Then I think you admitted that the employers do not follow your rules about the proportion of boys; so you could not really establish a custom of the trade in that case, could you?—No, I am afraid we could not as regards boy-labour; but we could make out a case that the work was being done under unfair conditions, I take it.

882. But you could not establish a custom?—We could not say that that was breaking a rule that there shall be a proportion of one boy to so many men. We could not say that.

883. I think you said you would put it at one boy to three men?—That is generally accepted as the understanding.

884. But the custom of the trade is more like six boys to one man?—It is getting that way.

885. So you really could not establish a custom of the trade in favour of your rule?—It would be difficult to establish. Even the engineers have had to abandon that hard-and-fast rule.

886. Then the Government could not help you much there?—Only so far that they could decide whether the work under the contract was being done under fair conditions.

887. Suppose we found in a very large number of firms that six to one was about the actual condition of things, we could not go much behind that, could we, however we might sympathise with your views?—I think if that became the established thing, six boys to one man, something would have to be done to stop it.

888. I rather understood from you that such a condition of things exists at the present day?—No. I do not want you to run away with that idea. I said it was getting to be the idea, and I quoted a shop where the proportion of boys to men had grown up enormously in a few years.

889. No Government department can get very far away from what is the actual condition of the trade, can it?—No; but we think when a complaint is lodged more close inquiry should be made into it.

890. That is rather a different matter?—We know a good bit of Government work is being produced almost entirely by boys, though a few years ago it was recognised as men's work.

891. Turning now to the question of sub-letting parts, I suppose there is a real difficulty sometimes in distinguishing between the purchase of material that must be bought and the purchase of parts?—No, there is no difficulty in distinguishing between them. As I say we recognise that such things as screws and terminals—little copper strips—which are generally accepted in the trade as bought parts, should be bought. What we object to is a man taking an instrument to pieces and taking it round piecemeal to different shops, and getting a bit done at this shop and a bit done at that.

892. That is, getting a particular portion which is not a recognised standard part?—Yes.

893. There is a large amount of standardising parts in various trades, is there not?—Yes.

894. That would work against what you advocate, would it not?—They will never be able to standardise instrument work, I think.

895. Still, the standardising is done in many trades, in the bicycle trade, for instance?—Yes; anything like that can be standardised.

896. Does the question of machinery come into your trade very much as adding to the number of boys? Is the increased number of boys due to machines coming in at all?—Yes. The introduction of machinery—capstan-lathes and various other machines—has naturally brought the boy into it.

897–8. But you could not say an employer must not use machines?—No, we cannot turn round on the employer and tell him he must not buy up-to-date machinery. We recognise that.

899. (Mr. De la Bère.) With regard to your first point as to the contracts and orders given to Continental and American firms, I take it you would not go so far as to say that work done abroad was necessarily done under unfair conditions as regards wages?—I could not say that in all cases.

900. But do you think in most perhaps it would be?—We say there should be some control over it.

901. If you knew that the conditions of labour were fair, you would have no objection to the order going abroad, would you?—No. As a Free Trader I should not.

902. As to sub-letting—it seems to be pretty prevalent—is that not so?—No; I would not say it is prevalent.

903. Is it more prevalent in Government orders than in others?—I would not say it was prevalent, but it is a thing that is spreading. I had a case with the War Office some time ago, and I believe they did make some inquiries. The employer sent for me, and we talked the matter over. He decided that in any future case, before he got any work done, he would find out whether it was a fair shop he was sending it to. We do not even go so far as to say that the man who takes a contract has to make every bit of it himself. But then, again, if some supervision is not exercised over a man's sending it out, the Fair Wages Clause becomes ineffective.

904. Is that the only case you have recently had in connection with War Office work?—We have had two cases, I think, in connection with the War Office work.

905. Recently?—No; but that was the latest one.

906. I think the case you were alluding to was early last year, was it not?—Yes.

907. That case, apparently, was settled pretty satisfactorily from your point of view?—Yes.

908. The firm of whom complaint was made satisfied you?—Yes. We had a friendly settlement over it, and agreed when any more work was given out that they would get information from us whether it was given out to a fair firm or not.

909. That is the last case, so far as I have been able to trace, in which you have raised a complaint as to War Office work?—I think it is.

910. Then as to the Birmingham piece-master system, of course, that is a very difficult question; but is it not the case that that system is customary in Birmingham?—Yes; it is very customary.

911. It may be an objectionable custom from your point of view, but it is an established trade custom?—Yes; it is an established custom of Birmingham.

912. It is not contrary to any law or any practice, and it is the recognised system in Birmingham?—It is contrary to the spirit of what was intended by the Fair Wages Clause.

913. The Clause in the contract is "sub-letting other than that which may be customary in the trades concerned"?—According to that, then, however bad the conditions were in the trade, they would be all right. Even if the men that were producing the work were starving, as long as it was customary for the men who were producing it to starve, it would be all right.

914. We need not go into those hypothetical cases; we know that that is not customary?—We want this altered.

915. At any rate, you do not dispute the fact that in Birmingham the piece-master system is an established and recognised practice?—That is so.

916. You think there might be more stringency in the inspection of Government work, but that does not apply to the quality of the work, does it; you are speaking solely as to the wages difficulty?—Yes.

917. You have no reason to suppose that the inspection of the articles otherwise is not satisfactory?—I suppose that the employer would say that it was not. I think that the inspection of the finished article is fairly satisfactory.

918. But you would like to see a more searching inspection of the wages paid to the men?—Into the ways that the Clause is carried out.

919. (Chairman.) Is there anything more you would like to add?—No, I do not think there is.

The witness withdrew.

Mr. Thomas Whatley and Mr. Henry Kail, called and examined.

920. (Chairman.) (To Mr. Whatley.) You represent the London Clothiers' Cutters' Trade Union?—(Mr. Whatley). That is so.

921. And your colleague too?—We have a contract committee formed to deal with the question of contracts and various things that happen from time to time. I am the Secretary of that committee, and Mr. Kail is a member of that committee. That is our position.

922. You deal with any question that arises under contracts?—That is so.

923. Government contracts only, or others?—Government contracts and municipal contracts. We deal with the contract branch of the clothing trade, as distinguished from the ordinary civilian branch.

924. Are you a London Union only?—Yes.

925. How many members have you got?—About 325.

926. All men?—All men; we take only men.

927. What have you to say on the working of the Fair Wages Clause in those contracts?—With reference to the Fair Wages Clause, if I am in order I would like to hand to the Committee through you a list of the fair houses which we have published. (Handing in same.)

928. Have you published this, do you say?—Yes, for the use of our members; not, of course, for the public. We find that every one of those firms represented upon that list is affected by the present wording of the Clause. They pay the Trade Union rate of £2 per week of 50 hours, and they pay for all public holidays; and, in fact, they observe fair conditions of labour. But they have to meet with the competition of another contractor, probably in the provinces or in London, who signs the contract in which the Clause is inserted, and when we go we find that they apply "the current rate of the district," and that will mean anything or nothing. We think that the Trade Union rate should be made universal. Of course, you could not expect in the country as much as you would in London, but the country might be made 36s. or 38s. per week, at all events. That would do away with a good deal of the trouble that goes on concerning the working of the Clause.

929. Are there only these 12 houses in London that you recognise as fair?—Those 12 houses whose names we print are under agreement with us to observe those conditions. I do not know of any other house in the contract trade in London in which, by some means or other, they do not break those conditions. Some houses will get a Government contract and they will work piece-work rates; another house will get it and they will exceed the proportion of boy-labour. We acknowledge one lad to every five men, and we work upon that scale with the employers—one apprentice or one learner of the business to every five men. In some cases they may have two or three men, and possibly 18 or 20 boys, and they are still doing Government work, and if we go to them they say: "We pay the current rate."

930. Are you talking of other firms in London or of firms in the country?—I am talking of the firms in London.

931. Are the houses that you complain of paying the fair rate in London?—Yes.

932. But they say they are paying the rate of the district?—They say they are paying the current rate of the district.

933. Do they divide London into districts for their purposes?—No; but they employ under-priced labour.

934. When they say they are paying the current rate of the district, do they mean a smaller district than the whole of London?—No. They say that they pay the London rate; so they may, for instance, to a couple or three men to do the most important of the business; but then they exceed the proportion of boy labour altogether, and they, practically speaking, run the whole thing on as cheap a line as they possibly can.

935. Your point is, that while they pay some of their men the proper rate, they pay less to the others?—That is so.

936. Have you made a complaint of that fact?—From time to time, yes. We have approached the Post Office on the question, and we have approached the War Office on the question, and some time ago there was a controversy with reference to the Board of Trade.

937. What was the result of your complaints?—After a good deal of trouble, during which time the contract was finished, the complaint was certainly remedied; but when the contracts went out again into the open market this firm that the row was with got some more work, and the consequence was we had to go over the whole ground again.

938. What was the result then?—I may say that at the moment the matter is at rest. The Post Office, through the Postmaster-General, have appointed someone to go into the matter, and the matter is with him at present, from the Post Office point of view.

939. Your particular complaint there was the same as before, namely, that some of the men where paid a proper rate, and some were not; was that it?—The Post Office contracts as a whole have a most deplorable name, and they are absolutely paid at the worst rate of any, and have been for years. There is no party question about it, if I may use the term. It was done through a simple free competition, and the lowest firms, of course, got the tender, and the rest, as it were, was left to chance, the Fair Wages Clause being in no ways adhered to. My colleague here, Mr. Kail, has worked upon it, and he can say the conditions as to labour have been shocking.

940. In what respect?—A particular contractor signs a contract, in which he engages to pay the current rate of £2 per week in London, but when we approach him and ask him about it, he says, "Yes, I am paying the current rate"; but there may be lots of boys employed at possibly 5s. or 10s., and the consequence is that men with families cannot get work there. The same principle prevails in other directions, and girls are indiscriminately employed. The whole conditions in the firm are deplorable, and, above everything else, the lowest class of labour has been introduced—what we term "greener" labour.

941. Your complaint is that the boys and the women are employed where men ought to be employed, is that it?—I would hardly go as far as that. I would say that boys and girls have a right to be employed, but it should be under proper conditions, as it were. They have to live, and it is necessary for the purposes of the trade that they should be employed. But when a particular work is Government work, it is particular, and a high standard of efficiency is expected from the contractor; the garments are supposed to come out accurate to measure, and so on, and we claim that there is a great waste of time in rejections. Whole bundles of work are rejected and sent back by the viewers and other officials, and the whole thing is turned upside down. We claim that if the proper proportion of men knowing their business was employed, the better would it be for the interests of everybody concerned—the public would benefit by having proper work put into their garments, and labour would be satisfied by working under fair conditions.

942. Then, as I say, your complaint is that too many boys and women are employed?—They are, as a fact.

943. Have you any proportion fixed by the rules of your Society?—Yes, one boy to five men. That is the proportion agreed to by the firms upon that list, and every firm upon that list is a good class London firm.

944. How many firms are there outside the list?—I could answer that question, but I could not very well do it off-hand.

945. Does the list include the majority of the London firms?—Yes; there is a majority of the firms upon the fair list.

946. Then there are less than 24 firms in London doing this work?—Yes. I should think that our trouble in London is mainly comprised with about four. (Mr. Kail.) There are four firms that our greatest trouble is with. Then there are smaller, what we term insignificant, firms. We call them "drums"; we do not call them firms. There are one or two firms that call themselves "Army houses," and they will make trimmings for the master tailor of a regiment.

947. But they have not a contract with the Government?—No. During the late war they were allotted contracts from the War Office, and whether they are still on the list or not I do not know now. I should say, taking all those smaller firms, there are probably 24 to 28 contractors that I know of in London, and some of them are not at all successful in their Government work, and so they rely more upon municipal and workhouse clothing. (Mr. Whatley.) They take the low class workhouse clothing and municipal contracts. Then, by-and-bye, they manage to get upon the contractors' list. There is no standard of qualification, I take it, as to the manner in which a firm treats its employees; and if a firm writes in to get upon the contractors' list, so far as my knowledge goes—I may be wrong—we are under the impression, and, in fact, we always think that, subject to financial references and so on being accurate, the rest is left to chance, and a man is put on the list and tenders are sent out to him in due course. If he signed a Trade Union Clause, he would not carry out at all the intentions of the Government of the day who passed that Clause with a view to doing away with a vast amount of unskilled and badly paid labour.

948. What is your remedy for this difficulty of the over-employment of boys and women?—With regard to the over-employment of boys and women, if the Trade Union Clause is signed, or if it were inserted in the contract, the Unions would, of course, see that a certain proportion was allowed of boy labour.

949. What do you call the Trade Union Clause?—The same that exists in many of the municipalities, in which the contractor engages to pay the Trade Union rate of the district.

950. Is that a common clause in municipal contracts?—(Mr. Kail.) Yes. (Mr. Whatley.) In London I should think about seven or eight municipalities have that clause. It is simply inserting "Trade Union" instead of "current"; that is where the whole thing begins and ends. (Mr. Kail.) It is more so in the provinces than it is in London. You see, they advertise in the "Contract Journal" week by week, putting up tenders which always have a clause to the effect that the Trade Union rate of wages shall be strictly observed. There are some that have a scheduled rate. For instance, the London County Council have a scheduled rate; also West Ham have a scheduled rate of prices that should be paid to each work hand, where the labour is subdivided for the cutting, the machining, the felling, and the pressing.

951. Do they put that in the contract?—(Mr. Whatley.) Yes. (Mr. Kail.) They have a schedule of prices which they consider fair, and the contractor has got to work by that, and he has to have it stuck up in the workshop, so that the inspector, when he visits the firm, can see that it is hanging there, and all the work hands can see what they have got to be paid for for the various parts of the garment. The inspector is at liberty to inspect the books and see that that is so.

952. Is that quite a common condition in municipal contracts?—It is with two in London that I know of, and with various other contracts. Take Bolton, for instance. (Mr Whatley.) Glasgow and Leeds. (Mr. Kail.) And Manchester. They all have a clause in the contract that the Union rates of hours and wages shall be strictly adhered to. (Mr. Whatley.) And the conditions, including the payment for the holidays during the year.

953. But a schedule of prices is not so common, do you say?—(Mr. Kail.) I do not know about the various contracts in the country, but I know of two in London, as I have worked on both of them.

954. You know that the contract there contains a schedule of prices?—Yes. There is a printed list of prices, and it has to be hung up in the various workrooms, so that the work hand can see what he has to receive for the garment. Say, for instance, it is a hall-porter's frock coat. Probably that would pass through five or six different hands before it reaches the hall-porter. The cutter is the first man, he will cut it; then it will go to the fixer, and from him to the baster, and from the baster to the machinist. The labour on the different parts is specified, and there is a list of what the baster shall receive, what the machinist shall receive, and what the fixer. The cutter's wages, being weekly, are at the bottom.

955. Does your Union cover all kinds of labour in this trade? You call yourselves the Cutter's Union, I see, but are all your men only engaged in cutting?—That is all. (Mr. Whatley.) We are only engaged in cutting.

956. Then you have nothing to do with the boys' and women's labour?—(Mr. Kail.) No.

957. They do not cut, do they?—I was working for a firm at this time last year where what they had been paying £2 a week for in other firms on the same contract they have girls for. That is to say, it comes away from the cutter and they put the proper fittings in them, and stick the tickets on them, and roll them up. I have worked on that same contract in other firms and had the same money, my £2 a week, and now girls are employed on it. This firm is absolutely one of the worst firms that I have worked in, and I have worked in, I daresay, eight or nine under the contract. There were, I think, three full-priced men in the cutting room, and somewhere about eight or nine boys, whose highest wage was somewhere about 16s. per week. We had to do the marking-in; that is the critical part, the most important, and we had to pass it over to these lads to lay up and pile the pieces of cloth on top of one another to be put under the machine. We appealed to the Post Office, and Mr. Fugeman came and saw the firm, and subsequently they discharged three boys and took one man on. I think the wages came to somewhere about 10s. or 12s. a week more, and the conditions of labour being altered, that made about a sovereign a week extra in the cutting-room expenses. Everything went on all right for a fortnight. One day there was a strike upstairs in the manufacturing department. The machinists had gone out on strike. One of the chaps in the office told me that the governor was going to reduce the price of the machining. He said "They are only going to reduce it 6d. a dozen, but they have told them they are going to reduce it 1s." The machinists went out on strike, half of them being greeners who could not speak English. They came back in the afternoon, and then the manager said: "Well, Mr. —— has just got on to the telephone, and he will see you in the morning." They went away, and when they went away he came downstairs. We all had a bundle of work to be done. I think there were two dozen girls. They came in the morning, and he got at the serang over them, and matters came out. "Mr. —— is very sorry he has had to reduce your money, but he does not want it all to fall upon you. He will meet you half way, and he will only reduce it 6d. per dozen." That was what they went away for in the first onset—they thought it was to be reduced a shilling, but the firm said: "By-the-by, we will be a little bit philanthropic and meet you half way, and reduce it 6d. a dozen. There is plenty to start on." The poor things could see a couple of dozen bundles of garments there, and they would say to themselves, "It will take me a day and a half to do that, and I shall get hold of 8s. or 9s." Then the serang says, "I think you had better accept it." Consequently they went back for 6d. per dozen less, and that was only done to counteract the extra expense in the cutting. (Mr. Whatley.) The contractor who does that sort of business has signed the tender form agreeing to pay the current rate, and that is the way he goes on to pay it.

958. To go back to the employment of those boys, I did not quite gather what it was in their work that you objected to?—(Mr. Kail.) We object because they work for about 10s. or 12s. a week, and men with wives and families, who ought to be doing that, are walking about the street doing nothing, whereas they ought to be receiving £2 a week, and every firm on that list is paying £2 a week for that.

959. What kind of work is it that you are referring to?—Laying up and dissecting.

960. What is that?—Take the Post Office or Pimlico garments. They are in sizes 1, 2, 3, 4, and so on, right up to 36. You get 200 of them of one size, and you do not cut them out with the shears singly, but you mark them and lay them ten thick one on top of the other, and then they go under the knife.

961. Is that work that a boy can do?—He can do it, most decidedly; but, then, it is a man's work.

962. You mean that he could not do it as well?—He could not do it as well as a man.

963. Not putting it under the machine?—(Mr. Whatley.) No, because a man has the technical knowledge. Further, more than that, a certain scale of sizes is given by the Post Office for the man to work to, and they have gone so far before now as for the viewers to reject a garment, because it is possibly a quarter or half-an-inch out of measurement. If a man was laying the work out he would see that each piece was laid accurately on the top of the other, and that the edges all fitted together. Those are all technical points that make for efficiency. A boy knows nothing about these technical points at his age; he may in years to come, but for the time being boy-labour is cheap labour, and it is bad work. If I may say so, to use an old phrase, the interests of the public suffer.

964. You are dealing with them now, not with your interests as a workman?—So far as that is concerned, as I have said already, we do not object to boy-labour. We believe that a proportion of boys should be employed. But if one firm signs this current wage Clause, and they employ men at the current rate; and if another firm employs boys, we honestly think, in all common fairness, that the work should go to the firm employing the men. It is not so much the difference in the price, but it is a question where the unfair firm gets its profits. The intentions of the Government, I take it, or the intentions anyway of the promoters of the Clause, were to ensure that the workpeople should have proper treatment; but they dodge that. A Trade Union clause they could not dodge, as they would be subject to the penalty; but this current wage Clause, although it is very good possibly in its intentions, yet, when it comes out in theory, it means nothing, and it is evaded every day, every hour, and in every industry. The unscrupulous class of contractors, although it is a somewhat sweeping statement to make, lay themselves out to dodge it, and they have brought that dodging to a fine art.

965. The particular form of evasion of which you are complaining is that they employ boys and women to do work which you consider is a man's work?—Which we consider is technically work which should be done by the men. (Mr. Kail.) I myself know of these said firms obtaining contracts. I was at one firm employed regularly for eight years. They have always adhered to the Trade Union rules, and they, in fact, had a matter of about 30 cutters and only two boys, and would not take a boy on, because they wanted a tradesman. They never used to have any rejections. When the contracts came out again these other firms under-cut them, and I myself was walking about half the winter. I have a wife and a small family to keep, and on two occasions since I have had even to go and become a Christmas postman, an extra-pressure man. It was very degrading to me, and to a lot of people, but I could not earn my living at my trade and I had to do something. That is where I suffered, and a lot of others, who, I can assure you, have had to do the same thing. I may mention that I know personally seven or eight families that have emigrated to Canada all through the same thing. This firm that we complain of, that took the contract when the contracts were allotted again for three years, they got more than any of the others, and the fair firms were stinted and had not a garment. Eventually I got employment in this firm. The firm that I had been with used to employ somewhere between 15 and 16 men on this said contract alone; and this other firm that had obtained it had got more than the previous firm I used to work with, but they only had three full-priced men upon it, and all the rest were boys. Their methods in every respect were conducive to sweating in its worst form. (Mr. Whatley.) Take the case of these boys in regard to another custom. They say to the lads: "We will give you 10s. a week, but if you can show us an extra 10s. worth of work done at the end of the week we will give you 2s. for it." Do you follow what I mean? The price for making is reduced ½d. per garment, or 1d. per garment, or whatever it is reduced to, and at the end of the week, if the boy shows £1 worth of work done, the firm pays him 12s. That sort of thing they can do with a boy, but they could not do it with a man.

966. Why could they not do it with a man?—Because the man would protect himself. No man at all, if he was a man, unless he was I do not know what, would take 12s. for 20s. But it is an inducement to these small lads—the Jewish lads. It gives them a chance of going to a music-hall on Saturday, or of doing something in that way, and as long as they get an extra 2s. or 3s. to spend, that is all they care about. We do not make that a charge, but we say it is a very great inducement which is offered to these boys. They call it working for over-money.

967. Have you got a fixed proportion of boys to men in your Union?—One boy to five men. (Mr. Kail.) A boy or an apprentice or an improver.

968. Is there any rule about the women?—(Mr. Whatley.) No, not at all; we do not deal with the women.

969. Do you object to women being employed?—As cutters?

970. Yes?—If there was any tendency that way I may say we should rather welcome it, because it would not last a week.

971. Are there no women employed at all?—They could not be, or if they are it would be an isolated instance. You might as well expect, almost, to make the girls who do odd jobs about the place pull about pieces of stuff weighing 60 or 70 lbs. in the general ins-and-outs of the business in the shop. They could not do it. They have tried it in some of the provincial firms, but they have abandoned it. They find that up to a certain point the women can do it, but still they cannot carry the thing through. In fact, they would never think about it; we are not like the bookbinders. (Mr. Kail.) I know one firm which is not a firm, but which is a kind of charitable institution, and it is situated at Hackney Wick, I think it is. They have the Post Office vests. We do not altogether complain of it, because it is supposed to be more of a charitable institution—though I myself cannot see where it comes in. They have travellers out travelling for business, and, therefore, it cannot be such a charitable institution; it is more like a firm. That is the only firm I know of that employ women practically on the cutting-out. Those others that I complain of have girls. They ask for apprentices, and you see notices all over the windows of this firm: "Apprentices Wanted." They go in and start at brushing the floor and making the manager's tea, and pulling out the bastings of cotton with a bodkin. Eventually they get to putting tickets on the garments and rolling them up. You get about six of these girls there, and the money they start with is 2s. to 2s. 6d. a week. When they have learnt to sweep the floor they get 3s.; and eventually when they get upon this work of placing tickets on the garments and putting trimmings inside and rolling them up, they get about 4s. a week. If you take six of these girls their money comes altogether to, say, 24s. a week, and they are taking the place of one man who ought to be receiving £2, and the firm do not get the work done half or any way half so good. Eventually the girls get so efficient at that that they want to be transferred upstairs into the making department. Then there is some fault found with them, and they go outside and the firm get some more in. Consequently they never pay more than 4s. or 5s. a week for this. (Mr. Whatley.) And yet they are always paying the current rates for that kind of labour—the 2s. or 3s. or 4s. a week. If you want to make a complaint about it they say "It is 4s. a week in the clothing trade; and they will get 2s., 3s., or 4s., if you like in the underclothing trade; and that is the kind of rate we pay, and you have got no cause of complaint. Good morning!"

972. Your complaint is chiefly that boys are employed?—(Mr. Kail.) I think myself that if "the Trade Union rate" was inserted instead of this "fair rate" or "current rate" it would obviate all this so-called sweating.

973. How would it obviate the employment of boys?—If there was a Trade Union clause there they would not be able to employ the boys, otherwise they would not be adhering to the Trade Union clause, because the Trade Union clause says one boy to five full-priced men.

974. So that you include in "Trade Union rates" "Trade Union conditions"?—(Mr. Whatley.) That is precisely the wording of the clause. It is done in Glasgow, and it is done in Leeds. (Mr. Kail.) And it is done in London.

975. It is the wording of the Fair Wages Resolution you want altered, not the wording of the Government Contract Clause?—No; that is what we want.

976. "Trade Union rates and conditions" is what you think it ought to be?—(Mr. Whatley.) That is what we think it ought to be. That is the remedy we suggest, and we say, from the labour point of view, the whole of the contractors who are tendering should be put upon the same basis, so that there would be no chance of one firm by sharp practice evading the spirit, as against those who are willing, at all events, to bring about a better state of things in the industry. (Mr. Kail.) This firm, again, works longer hours than any one of those firms on the fair list. When I was there they said to me, "I want you to stay a bit late to-night, Kail." I said "Very good." I said to the head man in the room, "I suppose you get the usual rate of overtime." He says, "I don't know; we never get anything." I said, "There is no taste in it, doing it for nothing. I can always play for nothing, and I don't want to work for nothing." They said, "We will make it up to you." I put in, I dare say, four or five hours over the week, and there was nothing forthcoming at the end of the week. He said, "I don't know what they don't have here; we always close for the holidays." I said, "Excuse me, I don't care for a thing of that sort. I would sooner be paid for my labour, and when I am not present I hope you will deduct my labour from my wage." These lads work here till 8 or 9 o'clock at night, and now and again he will give them a sweetener. They will put in about 10 or 12 hours a week extra, and he will give them a shilling for themselves on Saturday. To the lads it is all right, it is an extra shilling into their pockets; but I did not see my wife and family getting any fatter through it, so I did not see why I should do it. Those are the people you have got to contend with, but we think "Trade Union rate" would obviate that.

977. (Mr. De la Bère.) You represent, I suppose, the Cutters and the Cutters' Assistants only?—(Mr. Whatley.) We represent the Cutters and the Cutters' Assistants; we have at least about 20 trimmers at the outside.

978. Of course, cutting is only one portion; it is a very important portion, I grant; but still it is only one?—That is so.

979. And the vast majority of persons who are engaged in making up a garment are other than cutters?—Yes, that is so.

980. With them you have nothing to do, and you do not concern yourselves with them?—We have no authority to represent them in any way. There is an organisation which deals with that section of the trade. I do not know that they have expressed a willingness to come forward, but we have no authority to speak for them.

981. As regards the fair firms, are they fair as regards the cutting only, or as regards all branches of clothing work?—The firms, as a rule, that are fair in one department are fair in all the others.

982. Does that certificate, if I may call it so, which you have given them in that list, apply only to their cutting work, or does it apply to all their work?—It applies to their cutting work—to us as a Trade Union.

983. Then it is conceivable that some of them, in regard, for instance, to the machinists or the trimmers or anything of that sort, might not be satisfactory and yet you might not know it?—That is so. Of course, if the machinists came along and went to their organisation——

984. That would be a different thing; they would not come to you?—No; but that state of things is conceivable.

985. I see there is one firm on the list, and it is not so very long ago since we had a complaint from you about it?—Would you kindly give me the name?

986. Mr. A——; you complained to the War Office about him?—That is so.

987. Is this a recent list or an old list?—We compiled that list about 18 months ago, I think. (Mr. Kail.) That was published in the fore part of the year. (Mr. Whatley.) At all events, that list has been compiled since the complaint.

988. And Mr. A—— has mended his ways since then?—Greatly. (Mr. Kail.) We could not get much done with him practically through the Government.

989. How do you mean that you could not get much done with him through the Government?—We got on fairly well, but it was not only thought he was evading that. Later on he went in for some municipal contracts, and he found that his tenders were returned because he was unfair; consequently he has come round. I must say there is no fault to find with the firm in regard to anything—though it is a Jewish firm; it is superior to some of them.

990. He is not doing much Government work now, is he?—Yes.

991. Do you happen to know for what department?—They have about 30,000 garments from the General Post Office—postmen's trousers and postmen's great-coats.

992. Have they any War Office work?—No, not now.

993. As regards these boys who are employed in the cutting department, I take it they do the laying-out of these thicknesses of cloth—they divide it up and lay it out into 10 or 12 thicknesses?—Yes.

994. Do they chalk the pattern on the top?—No.

995. That is done by men?—(Mr. Kail.) A man may lay up a lay and send it to the machine, and owing to cutting the pattern down as close as he can in order to save the material he may leave a piece for the fittings. A lad will not be able to do that.

996. Generally speaking, the boy does not mark the pattern on the top?—No.

997. A boy does not put it under the knife, of course?—I know one place where a boy has put it under the knife—in this firm I was working at.

998. You may know one instance, but, as a rule, the boy does not put the lay under the knife, does he?—No.

999. After the cloth has been cut up into little sections representing a sleeve or a waistband or a collar, or something of that sort, who do you contend ought to clear it away from the knife—the man?—Yes, most decidedly; it is a part of the cutter's work.

1000. The cutter would push it aside from the knife; that, I take it, he would do in any case, because he has to clear the knife for the next cut; but who would take it away and roll it up with the various bits of lining and so on?—(Mr. Whatley.) And put it together?

1001. Yes?—I should say myself that in the interests of the firm they would put a man to do that, because a man would know the various parts required to make a garment, and he would put in the trimmings of the proper length and the right sort—the linings and all the rest of it. In fact, that is rather a technical part. It is perfectly easy to say to a girl: "You put that on there, and you put this on that"; and she may be able to do it automatically; but to do it efficiently, no.

1002. The cutter—the man who works the knife—does not mark the pattern as a rule, does he?—No. As a general rule the knife-cutter does nothing but take the cloth and run it through the machine, that is, he takes it and pulls it up against the knife as it is running. (Mr. Kail.) We get various kinds of work, and I have been employed on railway work. The week before last I was given a line of 300 great-coats for the North-Eastern Railway, a pile of 150 of each sort for fogmen, and so on. They give them what they call a strong overcoat; it is all off the same material, and they make them of a proportionate size. I prepared them with the lining, and they were taken up to the machine, and the knife-cutter cut them; then I took them away, stuck my own tickets on them, put my own trimmings in them, and tied my own string round them.

1003. There is no reason in the nature of things why that should not be done by a girl, is there? it is all light work?—But still we have to look after our interests in money. Eventually they will get a boy to do every part of it; he does half of it now, and consequently keeps me and a lot of my fellow-workers out of the trade. I have got to study my wife and child, and not the boy. If they apprentice him in the proper manner I should not mind, but it is these lads that over-run the market. Again, take a piece-work firm, and you will see why we do not recognise piece-work. There is one particular firm of Government contractors working piece-work, and when they are busy they do not take a lot of other men on, but they work in a syndicate, or in a gang I have worked at that firm and been in a gang, and I have taken very good wages; but I would sooner see some other men come in. You start at 7 in the morning, and work till 9 at night, and you take £3 to £4 or £3 10s. They will not employ other men, but let their men work all hours; goodness knows how long they would work them if one was not to knock off; and they come out of there with £4 a week. If that was not piece-work and the "Trade Union rates and conditions" was in the contract, instead of their men coming out with £4 a week they would have doubled the men in there, so taking the men off the streets and giving them a living wage of £2 a week. Piece-work is the evil.

1004. (Mr. Bailey.) We have heard something about Trade Union conditions; would it be possible to give us just shortly anything like a definition of what these Trade Union conditions would be composed?—(Mr. Whatley.) Yes; one boy to every five men——

1005. That is a limitation of the number of boys employed?—Yes. Then all public holidays to be paid for, and 50 hours per week. Those are our Trade Union conditions.

1006. Do you think it would be possible for a dispute to arise at some future time as to whether something else entirely outside was a Trade Union condition?—I would not like to say it would not, but in the event of a dispute arising the contractor would have a right to appeal to the authority placing the contract, and if the contract was carried out, then in all common fairness I would submit that the case should go against the Union, or it ought to, honestly.

1007. Speaking generally, those are all the conditions included under what you call Trade Union conditions, is that so?—As regards our trade.

1008. (Mr. King.) Have these women any Union, do you know?—There are various organisations; and in the Jewish section of the trade they have over and over again formed themselves, or tried to form themselves, into a Union.

1009. Have they a Union rate which is accepted by the good employers?—(Mr. Kail.) That has to do with the A.S.T. (Mr. Whatley.) With reference to the Amalgamated Society of Tailors, yes, they have a rate.

1010. Have they a Union rate?—Yes. With reference to what they term the Amalgamated Society of Clothiers' Operatives, which is essentially a provincial one, I prefer that they should give evidence themselves.

1011. Have the London women a Union rate?—No. The London women are in a very bad condition, I regret to say.

1012. So the women would not be affected by the introduction of that phrase into the contracts?—I think, as a matter of fact, if the women found there were better conditions to be got by becoming Trade Unionists, they would.

1013. They would form a Union?—I believe so. As it stands at present it is dead and cut-throat competition to live in the whole industry. I may tell you that Post Office trousers are being made by these women at the rate of 6¾d. per pair; waistcoats are made at about the same price—5s. 9d. per dozen, and coats are being made at, I was going to say, 1s. 6d. That is a reason why women would willingly form a Union. Then, on the other hand, this work goes to a class of firms who have largely in the past made their profit entirely out of this cheap labour that is on the market.

1014. Have you any case of a firm paying a cutter less than the Union rate?—Yes.

1015. Is that one of the firms holding Government contracts?—(Mr. Kail.) Yes. (Mr. Whatley.) If I may say so, we think that some change might be made in the constitution of the contractors' lists by the various Departments. You have inspectors—the War Office have inspectors, the Board of Trade have inspectors, and so on—but I have never yet heard that the qualifications of a firm with regard to the manner in which they treat their employees are made a test in allotting the contract. I was in the Ordnance Department at Woolwich myself some years ago; I was in what is termed the Provision Office—possibly some of you gentlemen may know it, in the Royal Arsenal. I myself, as a private soldier, filled up a number of forms that we sent out to the contractors as specifications for the Royal Dockyard, Woolwich, and so on. Assuming, if you like, it was for dishes; I just went to the list marked "dishes," and whatever contractor was there, so I sent to him; and we have every reason to think that the same system probably prevails to-day. When the tenders came back from the contractors it was simply the lowest tender that was the qualification they minded—nothing more, nothing less. It did not matter who they were, or where they were, if they were upon the contractors' list. We think that Government work might be treated as other people treat contracts. It is not always the lowest tender that is absolutely the one that is selected, and we think it would be far better, if it was only a question of £100 on a big contract, involving thousands of pounds of money, assuming that the house was favourably reported on by the inspectors—not particularly by the Trade Union, if you like—that, at all events, the work might go to them.

1016. (Mr. Westcott.) It is assumed that a firm is satisfactory if it gets on the list at all?—From a labour point of view?

1017. From every point of view?—From a financial one, I expect it is.

1018. If you select a trade and say, "This is our list for certain work," that assumes that you are satisfied with all the contractors on that list, and then naturally you would accept the lowest tender; but if it were a case of public tendering, you would make inquiries into the position of the firms?—It would be public tendering, I suppose, if it was sent out to every firm.

1019. If they were selected firms it would not be public tendering?—At all events, I am merely requested to bring before you that some care might be taken in the allotment, and so on. Of course, it is in your hands.

The witnesses withdrew.

FOURTH DAY.

Thursday, 12th December, 1907.

At 32, Great George Street, Westminster, S.W.

PRESENT:

Sir GEORGE H. MURRAY, K.C.B. (Chairman).

Mr. R. Bailey, M.V.O.
Mr. F. W. Black.
Mr. H. De la Bère, C.B.
Mr. A. Wilson Fox, C.B.
Mr. A. F. King.
Mr. J. B. Westcott, M.V.O.
Mr. J. J. Wills (Secretary).

Mr. Frederick William Welch and Mr. Edward Friend, called and examined.

1020. (Chairman.) (To Mr. Welch.) You are the President of the Vellum (Account Book) Binders' Trade Society?—(Mr. Welch.) Yes.

1021. And you, Mr. Friend, are a member of the Executive Council of that Society?—(Mr. Friend.) Yes.

1022. Is yours a London society?—(Mr. Welch.) Yes; it is almost entirely confined to London.

1023. How many members have you?—About 650, roughly.

1024. Perhaps you would tell us, in the first place, what vellum-binding is? I daresay some members of the Committee do not know all the branches of the trade you cover?—The title of "Vellum-Binding" itself is, perhaps, a misleading one. The vellum-binder is one who practically does all classes of stationery binding—account-book binding.

1025. As distinct from the ordinary bookbinding?—Yes.

1026. Would you say that your work was confined to account books and books of that kind?—Yes; books that are used for stationery purposes. Our members do the ordinary kind of bookbinding at times, but most of our members are employed in doing stationery binding.

1027. A book like that (pointing to a bound volume of Parliamentary Papers), for instance, would not come within your province, I suppose?—Our members might do it, but it would probably be done by letter-press binders. The conditions are pretty much the same in both branches of the trade.

1028. Do you include many different grades of skill among your members, or are they all pretty much the same?—We include among our members different grades of workmen; but we insist on a minimum rate. We insist that our men must not work for less than 34s. per week of 54 hours.

1029. What does that work out to per hour?—Between 7d. and 8d. per hour, I should think.

1030. Have you no hourly rate?—No. The binders, I should say, are men who are doing the binding only. Then there are finishers and marblers who get a minimum rate of 38s.

1031. But nobody works for less than 34s.?—That is so.

1032. And they run up to how much?—what is your highest rate?—We have men who are getting as much as £2 5s. per week.

1033. (Mr. Bailey.) Would they be marblers and finishers?—They would. We have binders who are getting as much as £2 and £2 2s.; but they are doing a better class of work.

1034. (Chairman.) As regards the rates that are fixed by your society, are they confined to the minimum rate, or do they include some of those others you have mentioned?—We have got no members who are receiving less than the minimum rate.

1035. But have you fixed rates for any work above the minimum?—No. All we insist on is that our members must receive the minimum rate; of course, if they can get more, so much the better.

1036. But that is your only rule—That they must not go below the minimum of 34s.?—No, except, as I have said in the case of the finishers and the marblers, and they must not accept less than 38s.

1037. Is that a rule too?—Yes. What we call finishers are those who do the lettering on the books, the gold work; and what we call marblers are those who marble the edges of the books.

1038. Do your members work mostly at piece-work rates, or at time-work rates?—We do not recognise piece-work. They are mostly on time-work.

1039. Do you prohibit piece-work rates?—We do not absolutely prohibit them. We say that a man must earn at least time-and-a-quarter, or, roughly speaking, 1s. per hour.

1040. Will you now tell us what are your principal criticisms on the Fair Wages Clause in the Government contracts?—Perhaps it would be as well if you would allow me to give you a list of the complaints we have made with regard to what we consider the breaking of the Fair Wages Resolution of the House of Commons, and the reasons for giving those complaints, if that would not be taking up too much of your time.

1041. Certainly; we should be glad to hear that?—Our list of complaints goes back as far as April 9th, 1903. I do not know whether you require in my evidence the names of the particular houses that we objected to?

1042. I think that would depend a good deal on the nature of the complaint; we will wait and see what that is?—In April, 1903, we made a complaint to the late Controller of the Stationery Office, Mr. Pigott, on the question of a large contract of 30,000 foolscap Army books. A portion of the work was being done by females—that was what we term the backing of the indexes. This had always been, and is still, done in a very large number of houses by the binders—that is, by our members; and we considered this an infringement of the House of Commons Resolution. Therefore, our executive lodged a complaint with the Controller, asking him to interfere and stop the practice. On May 1st we received a reply, in which he stated that the backing of indexes was of a light character, not unsuitable for execution by women, and he did not feel called upon to interfere. The executive of our society protested at this, because we thought this was a very serious thing for our members, and we contended that it was completely setting aside the protection which the Fair Wages Clause afforded us. We further contended that it was not the custom of the trade, and we thought it was opening the way to further encroachments, because in the other houses in the trade the work was being done by men and by our members, and we thought that to successfully compete with this particular firm they would have to resort to the same methods. However, on that occasion the complaint had no effect, and the Controller said he did not feel called upon to interfere. A little bit later than that, in June, 1903, we made a complaint about another firm. Our complaint in this particular case was not of female labour, but of cheap male labour. At this house we were informed by a witness, who is now a member of our society, that one man was employed at 31s. per week—that was 3s. below our minimum; another one at 22s., and another one at 18s. only. In this particular house it was all cheap labour, and there was not one full-priced man employed. We considered that this was a very flagrant case, and we did hope that the Controller in this case would strike the house off the list. It was entirely denied by the firm. The wages book was shown to the Controller, stating that no man in their employ in the binding department was receiving less than the minimum rate of 34s. This led to a good deal of correspondence, and the Controller was asked to receive a deputation, which I will tell you more about later; but nothing was done. Our impression was that a false wages book had been shown to the Controller. I think our action was justified by the result of a complaint about the same firm to the present Controller—I think it was about two years ago—regarding the wages that were then being paid on a later contract which that particular firm had. We found out that two men were working on piece-work; these two men made 575 cases in 2½ days, and they were paid at the rate of 2s. per hundred, so they were able to earn 11s. 6d. only, which worked out at 5s. 9d. each for 2½ days' work. I think that practically justified the statement we had made previously about this particular house. We still think that the Controller was misinformed in the first case, and we know that our statement was true in the second case, because the present Controller made inquiries and the house was struck off. I am glad to say that in that case our application was successful. We made a further complaint in June, 1903, respecting another firm. This again was on the question of cheap labour. This particular house had one finisher, one marbler, and three binders, who were in receipt of the full rate. One binder was in receipt of 28s. per week only; about six were receiving considerably less, and there were four apprentices; that is to say, two-thirds of the labour was being paid at less than the recognised fair rate. On August 4th, 1903, we received what I can only call the astounding and astonishing reply that no breach of the Fair Wages Clause had been made by that particular firm, and the Controller saw no cause to interfere. This came rather as a blow to us. We did think that in this particular case our statements were proved—in fact, we know they were proved, and we were rather surprised when the Controller said this was a case in which he saw no cause to interfere. On October 8th, 1903, we made a complaint against a house where work was being conducted at some distance outside London—at Hemel Hempstead. This house was one which had taken its works into the country and had created a rate of its own. There were three men only in receipt of anything like full wages, and seven men were in receipt of from 17s. to 29s. per week, none of those men, by-the-bye, were employed on the Government work, which was done entirely by boys. These boys were on piece-work, and they earned about 15s. per week; when they were not working on piece-work they were placed on time, and then they received the magnificent salary of 8s.! We wrote again to the late Controller, and we were surprised to receive the usual reply: "The Controller is satisfied, and does not feel called upon to interfere." This was a very flagrant case. The firm had moved their works outside London, and we were told they were paying the current rate; the current rate in that case meant the rate which that particular firm themselves had made for that particular district.

1043. Is your complaint there against the employment of boy labour?—Largely.

1044. Or against the fixing of a "current" rate when there was no other employer in that district?—Against the employment of boy labour in that particular instance, and against the Controller's interpretation of what he considered the current rate.

1045. The question of the current rate would not arise if it was boy's labour, would it? or was it the current rate for boys?—We contend, and have always contended, that the current rate as far as we are concerned means 34s. for a week of 54 hours.

1046. For man, woman, or boy?—Yes. In another case there were about eight full-priced men and a portion of female labour being employed on Government work which, again, in most cases is usually done by men.

1047. (Mr. Bailey.) What was the date of this complaint?—It was quite recent—September, 1907. In this case our application was successful. The Controller saw the justice, no doubt, of our complaint, and the house was struck off. Just after that we made a further complaint against a house employing all cheap labour—one at the full rate, the remainder being all cheap. In this particular case, again, the Controller saw the justice of our complaint, and the house was struck off.

1048. (Chairman.) I think you may confine yourself to the cases where you were not satisfied, and leave out those where you were?—I will just mention two recent cases, then, where our complaints were not successful. We lodged a complaint against a house which does a large quantity of Government work, on the question of employing cheap labour, and not only cheap labour but female labour. We were told that the Controller could not take action on this particular question of female labour pending the result of the decision of this Committee. We thought this was rather begging the question, and further, we thought it was anticipating the result of the deliberations of this Committee, and we protested, because we consider that it is a breach, and that we have nothing to do at present with the result of this inquiry, and that the house should be struck off. We received a further reply on December 6th, saying that this particular firm in question had been warned that they must employ no more females on this certain binding work, and that the work in future should be done by flush hands. This we contend is also a breach.

Certain employers for their own particular purposes have sub-divided the work. We, as binders, have no objection to this sub-division provided the minimum rate is paid, no more than we have an objection to the use of machinery provided the work of that machinery is paid for at full rates. Although the Controller has informed us that females will not be employed again on this particular class of work, we do not think the question is settled, because we know that in these particular houses large departments are kept entirely going on Government work by cheap labour. We also know of other houses where Government work is being done where the same class of labour is being paid for at full rates—I mean where the same class of work is being done by fully-priced labour. We made complaint about another particular house, and we received the same reply:—"I am directed to state that the work in question is of a kind which is ordinarily executed by flush hands, and that the Stationery Office does not consider this as a case of infringement of the Fair Wages Resolution."

1049. What is a flush hand?—I can describe to you what flush binding is. Flush binding is simply a common sort of binding, which is described as flush work. For instance, with memorandum books or duplicate books, where a portion is torn off, usually a piece of leather is put round the outside and instead of being turned in, it is cut off flush, and that is described as flush binding. That in most fair houses is usually done by apprentices in their first or second year.

1050. It is a lower class of work than the rest then?—It is certainly a lower class of work, but at the same time it is, we contend, a portion of our trade. We having served our apprenticeship to our trade, object to certain classes of work being taken away from us by certain classes of employers. But we have a very large number of houses on our fair-house list where this particular class of work, although being of a cheaper character, is being done by our men, and these particular houses which are fair have no earthly chance in competing for Government contracts if the unfair houses are allowed to use this particular class of labour on these contracts.

1051. Is there anything primâ facie unfair in their using a less skilled class of labour for the less skilled work?—Our contention is, and always has been, that this less skilled work is a portion of our trade, and should be done by our men. We do not recognise anything in our trade as unskilled.

1052. I put it as less skilled?—No, nor less skilled. It is simply a portion of our trade for which we have served our apprenticeship. As I have tried to show you, in a large number of houses, in fact, in the larger proportion of the houses, it is being done by our men, and even in some houses—I might mention the house of Messrs. Truscott's, which is doing a large proportion of Government work—it is being done by our members. The point is this: If you allow it to go on in any one shop, it will not be long before Messrs. Truscott will say, "We have to compete against these houses; why should we not be allowed to do the same?" I think those are the whole of the complaints I have to lay before you. In five cases we were unsuccessful, and in five cases we were successful. We are surprised that two of the last houses I mentioned have not been warned or struck off, because in some of the previous instances smaller houses were struck off for the same offence, and we say that the larger houses should be dealt with in the same way that the smaller houses are. I may say that two or three of the larger houses, so far as this class of cheap labour is concerned, have been the instigators of it, and it has been practically done, or very largely done, on Government work only. As I said previously, one house in particular has a large department for this class of labour entirely working on Government contracts and nothing else. I do not think I have anything more to say in the nature of complaints, unless either you or any gentleman on the Committee has any question he would like to ask. I do not know whether you would like to hear anything of the reception we received on the different occasions that deputations waited upon the Controller of the Stationery Office, and also upon the Treasury?

1053. No, I think we need not go into that. I gather that the gist of your complaint really depends upon the employment of what you call cheap labour, which is generally either women or boys, instead of your members?—That is it. We do not say that our own members particularly shall be employed upon this work. What we do say is that the men shall receive our minimum rate. We are not complaining that these firms have employed non-union men.

1054. Do you object to the employment of women at all?—We do not object to the employment of women as women; we only object to the employment of women as cheap labour. If an employer likes to employ a woman on binding, and he pays her at the same rate as he would the men, then we should have no objection.

1055. But you do object to women being employed at lower wages than men?—Decidedly.

1056. Is there no class of work in your trade that you would allow to women at lower rates than men?—The only portion of work in our trade done by women is that of folding and sewing. There are very few instances of firms in London which are employing women on binding, and in fact those instances I could almost count on my fingers.

1057. Do you ask that the women who are employed in folding and sewing should be paid 34s. per week?—No. That portion of the work is recognised as the work of females.

1058. Where do you draw the line between work that is proper to females and work that is proper to men?—We contend that when the book leaves the book-sewer, immediately, every portion of the work then should be performed by men.

1059. Why? If it is not work that is unsuitable to women?—We have nothing to do with what is suitable and what is unsuitable. As I say, we have no objection to the employment of women provided they are paid the same rate.

1060. But you object altogether to the employment of women at lower rates than men?—Yes; that we say is cheap labour.

1061. I want to get at the ground of your objection to that?—The ground of our objection is that we have served an apprenticeship to our trade, and if we are going to allow employers to introduce women on our work at less rates than what we get, the time will come when we shall be required no longer.

1062. Will you not always have the better class of work to do?—Then one might argue that the better classes of work, although perhaps a little more skilled, could be just as easily done by women if we allowed it to be done by them, except in one or two instances, which we might almost term the heaviest kinds of work.

1063. You mean that men might be ousted from your trade altogether?—Entirely; that is our contention.

1064. I understand your position as regards women; now as to the boys: what do you say?—We do recognise boys to a certain extent, because on our fair-house list we allow one apprentice to three journeymen; but, apart from that, we recognise no form of cheap labour.

1065. In fact, you only admit boys in order that they may be educated to become workmen?—To become competent binders.

1066. You think that boys ought not to be employed at all except for that purpose?—Yes.

1067. There again, why do you take up that position?—Simply for our own protection.

1068. But there must be a great deal more work that could be done by boys, I suppose, than is done under your rule of one boy to three journeymen?—The same may be applied to any portion of our trade so far as that goes.

1069. Could it all be done by boys?—If a boy was kept there long enough.

1070. Then he would become a man, I suppose?—Yes, finally.

1071. Is there much difference of opinion in the principal houses about the employment of women?—I may say that in our trade a very small percentage of the women are employed at binding; as I said, it is only in one or two houses, and in one house against which we have lodged a complaint it was quite a recent innovation. We have received a reply now from the Controller stating that the employment of females in that class of work has been stopped.

1072. (Mr. Bailey.) Would you mind quoting the exact words of that letter?—"In reply, I am to inform you that on the 25th September last the firm in question gave an undertaking that in the future all quarter-bound work entrusted to it by this Department would be done by flush hands. No further contract up to the present has been entrusted to the firm."

1073. (Chairman.) Do the flush hands get full wages?—No. That is one class of labour that we object to. So far as we are concerned, we do not recognise the term of "flush hands." I may say that this house against which we lodged this particular complaint is one of the houses I made reference to, where this particular class of labour, flush hands, in this particular shop is kept almost entirely going for Government work.

1074. To return to the women for a moment. You do not think the employment of women is extending in the London vellum-binding trade, do you?—No, I think not.

1075. The employers show no signs of wishing to employ more?—Not as a body.

1076. Is that part of an understanding with your Society?—We have an agreement with the Employers' Association—I think it was signed in 1890—by which the minimum rate was raised from 32s. to 34s., and we came to an understanding with the Employers' Association at that date that we should receive the 34s. for 54 hours.

1077. I think my question was: Is it part of your understanding with the employers that they should not employ women?—I do not know that we have any definite understanding with the employers that they should not employ women, but if there should be any attempt to employ women on our work, we should simply have to fight them. So far, there has been no attempt on the part of the large body of employers to introduce women on binding.

1078. It looks as if it was just beginning, does it not?—It looks to me that one or two houses, what I might almost call unscrupulous employers, are determined to get cheap labour by hook or by crook, and if they cannot get it by male labour they will get it by female labour. The long list of employers who are on our fair-house list show no wish to try to introduce female labour, and I do not think they wish to do so. If they do do so, they will have been practically compelled by having to compete with these particular houses that I am referring to. Our contention is that the Government should show a good example to other employers, and that at any rate Government work should be done under the best of conditions. In many instances now our contention is that Government work is not done under the best of conditions—not even up to the average moderate conditions that exist in our trade. These particular houses that I am referring to have been the greatest sinners in this respect. One reason why a large number of the employers on our fair-house list do not receive Government contracts is because they cannot compete with these firms.

1079. (Mr. Bailey.) Do your London rates apply as far out as Hemel Hempstead?—No, but there we contend that where no Trade Unions exist the firm should be compelled to pay the rates of the nearest town.

1080. Which in this case would be London?—In this case it would be either London or Norwich.

1081. Are the Norwich rates the same as the London rates?—I think the Norwich rates would be slightly below, but as you say, London being the nearest town, the London rates should be in force.

1082. I think I understood you to say that flush hands were not recognised by your Society, is that so?—We do not recognise any one outside who is not receiving the rate. I think, if this Fair Wage Clause was enforced, we should be benefiting those particular flush hands, because before an employer employed them on Government work, he would be compelled to pay them the full rate if the Trade Union rate was enforced.

1083. At all events in what you style fair houses—of course I understand the technical meaning of "fair house"—no flush hands are allowed at rates below your Trade Union?—That is so; there is only a percentage of apprentices allowed.

1084. Do I understand you rightly also that the cheap labour is employed chiefly for Government work throughout the houses?—I think I might safely say, taking it right round the trade, that cheap labour is principally employed on Government contracts.

1085. (Chairman.) Have you any idea why that is so?—I have no idea why it is so, unless it is that the employer is taking large contracts, and he is endeavouring to get his work done as cheaply as possible.

1086. That would apply to his other work as well, I suppose?—I do not know why it is so, but that is the case.

1087. (Mr. Wilson Fox.) I understood you to say to the Chairman that this bookbinding work is work which women can do—I mean that it is physically possible for them to do it?—Yes. There are many classes of work which women are physically capable of doing.

1088. You are in a different position in your trade to the boilermakers, whose work is work that women could not do; in your trade women could undertake the work?—I think that the whole question was threshed out in the recent bookbinding dispute, when the arbitrator laid it down that the work of women should be confined to that of folding and sewing, and, in bookbinding, making end papers. The same question was raised by the employers, who urged that the light and easy portions of the trade could be done by women.

1089. I am only putting the point now that it is work which, if it were taught to them, women could undertake; I do not say they ought to undertake it, but that they could undertake it?—It is quite possible, if women were taught, that they could do it.

1090. I am going to refer to your rules, one of which says that no member of the Society shall be allowed to accept Government work for less than the rate of 34s. for 54 hours. Although it is not specifically stated in the rule, you say that you would take your stand upon that, and include women as coming within the operation of that rule?—I did not say that our rule would permit of our admitting women as members.

1091. All I meant to convey was that in carrying out that rule you would insist upon 34s. as the minimum for men, and in that you would also include women?—Yes.

1092. Therefore, may I put it to you that you put that interpretation on the rule in order to protect yourself against the employment of women in your trade?—Against the employment of women at lower rates.

1093. Do you consider that a woman's output in a year would be as great as that of a man in a year?—That is impossible for me to say. That is a question I could not answer.

1094. You could not?—No, I could not, because we have endeavoured so far to prevent women being introduced into our trade. Our reason is that wherever the employers have endeavoured to introduce women, they have done so for the purpose of employing them at lower rates. Therefore we have had no opportunity of saying whether women will be able to turn out the same quantity of work as men.

1095. You cannot, therefore, express any opinion whether, if you paid a man and a woman each 34s. a week, they would each turn out the same quantity through the year or per week?—No, I cannot express any opinion on that, because we have have had no experience.

1096. You have no opinion at all to express on it?—No, I have not, because, as I say, we have had no experience.

1097. Apart from definite experience, have you no view at all upon the question whether a man could turn out more work in a year than a woman?—Possibly a woman might be able to turn out as much. It is an open question at present, because, as I say, we have had no experience.

1098. I will put it to you quite directly in this way, because I do not want to beat about the bush: Is putting a rate of 34s. per week for time work as the wages for women practically a prohibitory rate, 34s. being also the wages for a man? Would that rate stop employers from employing women at all if they had to pay them, at a time rate, the same wages as they would pay the men?—Possibly.

1099. (Mr. Bailey.) As a matter of fact, are there any women employed at 34s. a week, so far as you know?—No, not that I know of.

1100. (Mr. Wilson Fox.) I do not want to press you unfairly, and therefore I do not ask you to make this assumption, but I will make the assumption myself: Assuming a woman can do less work than a man in a year or in a week, if the employer were permitted—which he is not by your rules—to pay women on piece-work, he would then be paying the woman according to her output, and the man according to his output?—Assuming—which I do not think for a moment employers are likely to do—that an employer was employing women and men on piece-work, if our rules allowed those men to work on piece-work and if our rules allowed the employment of women on piece-work, we should insist that the man and the woman should get the same rate.

1101. If they were both paid the same rate, and if the woman were the weaker vessel and her output was less, the employer who employed a woman on piece-rates would not be handicapped as he would be handicapped if he had to pay the time-rate to them, both being paid the same rate for time-work?—That is all assumption. We are assuming something that is probably never likely to happen. I cannot say what would happen if men and women were employed on the same class of work. Personally, I do not think an employer is likely to employ women if he is compelled to pay them the same rate as men.

1103. That is what I wanted to put to you. If you make up your minds that you are going to ask the employers to pay 34s. to men and 34s. to women, I want to know whether you could give us any idea as to how it would, in practice, work, and you have answered me quite fairly, and I, of course, accept what you say?—We do not ask the employer to employ a woman; we prefer him to employ our men.

1104. Of course, you do; and I can quite understand that. I can quite see from your point of view, as a Trade Union for men, that you want to have your men employed. You have answered me quite fairly, and I am much obliged to you?—Our only objection to the employment of women is the employment of women as cheap labour. In the same way, we object to the employment of men who are receiving less than our Trade Union rate on Government work.

1105. On the other hand, it might be very expensive to the employer if the woman who did not do as much as the man was paid at the same rate. To go to another point, you mentioned Hemel Hempstead as a district where perhaps the London rate should be taken, I think?—Yes.

1106. A man living in Hemel Hempstead and paid the London rate would, on the balance, be better off than the London man, would he not?—I do not know.

1107. His rent would be less in Hemel Hempstead, would it not?—His rent might be less, but the possibility would be that if he was a single man the expenses of living would be quite as much at Hemel Hempstead as they would be in London.

1108. The main factor for a married man would be the rent, and in that respect there is a difference between London and Hemel Hempstead, is there not?—Possibly so; but then in this particular case you allow the employer to take his works into the country where he knows no union is existing, and he is allowed to make what rate he likes, and the Controller's interpretation is that this is the current rate. He practically makes his own current rate, and that is what we object to.

1109. I can quite understand that, from your point of view, you do not think it right for an employer to go into the country and to set up what you call an unfair rate?—That is so.

1110. But the difficulty is to find a standard, is it not?—There is no difficulty in finding a standard for a works which is going into the country, because there are a large number of printing and binding works in the country towns. I daresay the Controller has seen a copy of the rules of the country society—the Book Binders and Machine Rulers' Union. You will find that their rates do not vary much up and down the country; in some cases they are slightly less than those existing in London; but the comparison between the rates is nothing like the difference there is between the rate in London and the rate paid by the particular firm I have mentioned at Hemel Hempstead.

1111. Might it not be just as well in certain circumstances to take, not necessarily the nearest town, but the town or district where the conditions are the most similar?—I have mentioned Norwich, and I may say that the rate at Hemel Hempstead was very much below that of Norwich. I do not suppose for a moment the cost of living in Hemel Hempstead was any lower than that at Norwich.

1112. That I could not say off-hand one way or the other?—So far as we are concerned, we say fairly and squarely that the rates paid at Hemel Hempstead simply amounted to sweating rates.

1113. I was not on that particular question; I was merely on the principle of what you thought should be adopted as the standard?—Of course, we cannot claim for a moment that Government work should be confined to London, because it is national work; but what we do say is that wherever the Government work goes it should be done under fair conditions, whether in London or in any of the provincial towns.

1114. Cannot you settle these things with the Employers' Association in a case of that sort? Could you not bring a question like the Hemel Hempstead case up before the Employers' Association?—We do bring cases before the Employers' Association, and, as a rule, where the firm is working under fair conditions the case is settled. But it seems to me, so far as concerns those employers who employ unfair labour, the Employers' Association seems to have no control over them; in fact, they go so far as to admit they have no control. The employers are simply combined together in their own interests for the purpose of looking after their own interests.

1115. Will not the Employers' Association deal with that particular point?—It will not deal with a particular house unless the men are organised in that particular district, and are able to enforce their claims. That is what it amounts to.

1116. Have you tried to get the Employers' Association to deal on principle with this country work which is growing, and to deal with your Trade Union, with a view to settling these disputed rates in Suffolk or Hertfordshire, or wherever they may be?—I do not think our particular Union has done so, but then all the Unions in the printing trades are federated, that Federation being known as the Printing and Kindred Trades Federation. The Printing and Kindred Trades Federation have made overtures to the employers to settle those questions, but I think in most cases the employers have refused to meet them in conference to talk over those particular questions.

1117. (Chairman.) (To Mr. Friend.) Have you anything you would like to add?—(Mr. Friend.) I have nothing to add to what my colleague has told you, but my Society has instructed me to ask you to consider some practical suggestions. I believe that we sent in to Mr. Wills, on a form similar to the one I have here, a list of suggestions, and to save the time of the Committee and ourselves, I would like to follow the order in which they ran.

1118. Please do?—The first one is as to the qualifications of firms tendering to work. I perhaps might have occasionally to repeat one or two criticisms which my colleague has made; I apologise for that. It seems to our Society that it would save a good deal of the Controller's time, and lead to a better understanding, and also that it would save a good deal of friction between the employer and the Trade Union, if the Controller had a list of fair houses, and the Government work was only to be allowed to be given to those fair houses which are on that list. That list is to be obtained from the National Printing and Kindred Trades Federation. That list comprises not only one department—it is not concerned with one department only of printing or stationery—but it comprises a list of fair houses which are fair in every department of stationery or binding.

1119. Is that list drawn up by the employers and the men in conference?—That list is drawn up by the National Printing and Kindred Trades Federation, which is composed of all the Trade Unions in the printing trade, but it is not, I think, yet mutually agreed upon—that is, the exact definition of what is fair is not yet agreed upon with the employers, I think. But it is generally understood that if any houses need workmen, this list is always looked up to see if the house is a fair house, on the fair-house basis recognised between the employers and the Trade Unions.

1120. (Mr. Bailey.) By whom is it looked up?—By the Trade Union affected. For instance, say you wanted a binder, the Bookbinders' Union would look it up to see if the house was on their list, and if we wanted to see whether a printing house was fair right through, we should send to the Central Printing Trade Federation to see if the house was fair throughout.

1121. (Chairman.) Your plan would leave it to the Federation to decide what houses could be employed and what could not?—Yes. That is the only method and machinery we have at the present time. We should be willing to consult with the employers at a conference, and to mutually decide upon the basis of the fair houses, but at present we have not had that opportunity.

1122. Do you think your suggestion is a practicable one until you have arrived at that settlement?—Yes. I believe that if we could get you to adopt that plan, there would be a lessening of unfair competition between the employers, and that it would lead to some advantage on their side as well as ours, as my colleague has pointed out. A man has got a thousand books to bind from the Stationery Office; how can I find out that he is complying with the Fair Wage Clause? We send to our Society to know what wages are being paid, but we want to know why we cannot bring them all into line, and we want to know where the cheap hands have been allowed to go into the different shops. I would like to make a point of calling your attention to this suggestion, and to ask your consideration for it, because I believe it is being adopted by public bodies and borough councils. They are mostly making inquiries when contracts go out to see whether the houses tendering are on the fair house list. I believe if such a list were adopted, that would lead to a much better understanding. It is a noticeable fact that the worst houses in the trade get hold of Government work. That is our experience, and not only is it our experience, but it is the experience in most trades, not only in London but in the country. Curious thing as it is, the worst houses in the trade get hold of Government work. We think that by adopting No. 1 of our suggestions, that is, that the qualification for firms tendering for Government stationery work should be those firms which are included in the fair house list of the National Printing and Kindred Trades Federation—you would be getting over this difficulty.

1123. I asked Mr. Welch if he could account for the fact, which you state, that the worst houses get hold of Government work. Can you throw any light upon that?—In what particular way?

1124. I am referring to your statement that all the Government work goes to what you call the worst houses?—No, I cannot exactly account for that, with the exception of the fact that contracts are not watched enough by the Government, in view of the Fair Wages Clause.

1125. Do other people watch them more closely?—We are watching them very closely.

1126. I mean, do the other people who do business with these firms watch them?—Of course, I cannot answer that. We are only dealing with the Government work, and our experience on Government contracts. We adopt the same method with regard to private work.

1127. How do you account for the fact that private employers or private people who want work done, get it under what you call fairer conditions than the Government?—Because, for one reason, I believe that the competition in tendering for Government work is rather keen. Then the large quantities of work which are under Government control seem to lead to the employment of sub-division of labour, which is an incentive to cheap labour.

1128. Do you think it is due to the sub-division of labour?—Yes.

1129. Do you object to that?—No, not if it is paid at the same rate.

1130. At the same rate?—Yes. We take an account-book, and we claim that book as our craft. We have served our time to it. I have served my time as an apprentice. I had to serve seven years, and I accepted indentures for that period. When I am out of my time I expect to have what rightly belongs to me—a journeyman's wage, and, to take that book I claim it as my craft. I find there is the excessive cheap labour of lads or boys or young men who have not been apprenticed to the work, as I have had to be. They are not taught my trade completely, and the employer comes along and pays them less than my rate. That is going to be undue competition with me, and with the men who have served their time, in the very near future; so we have to take measures to protect ourselves.

1131. And you protect yourselves in this way. You say that the work shall not be divided into skillel work and less skilled work, but that everybody shall be paid alike for all work?—No, we do not say that. The work can be divided and sub-divided as often as you like, but it is part of our craft, and as such should be paid not lower wages, and only those apprentices duly recognised to learn the craft throughout should be paid less than the recognised rate of wages.

1132. If some of them are doing less valuable and less skilled work than others, why should they all be paid the same?—The question of value does not enter into our consideration as workmen, and has entirely to do with the employer.

1133. It has a great deal to do with him?—With him, yes, but I am only speaking on behalf of the employees.

1134. But, of course, that affects him?—Very likely.

1135. Because he may not be able to employ his labour to the best advantage?—What I contend is that it affects us as working men. It is bread and butter to us, while it is merely profit to the employer.

1136. Do you not think you might all be better off in the end if the most skilled man was put to the most skilled work, and paid what he was worth, and the less skilled man was put to the less skilled work and paid what he was worth?—No. I believe that the present system is the best. Competition regulates and determines wages, and if there is an undue pressure of competition in a certain trade, then wages will be lowered; so it is our duty to see that no excessive competition encroaches upon our trade, because if it does, it lowers our wages to that extent. We are bound to take that measure to protect ourselves.

1137. Will you go to your next point?—That is as to better facilities for obtaining information as to contracts. We have to complain rather keenly on the question of the method of obtaining the names of contractors and the amount of their work. I believe, on the proposition of our Society some years ago, we were successful in obtaining that a schedule should be hung outside the Stationery Office. I believe that has been done, and that has helped us considerably, but we would like to go a step further. The list says "Army Book," and the number, and the firm it has gone to; but it does not say whether it is a half-bound book, a whole-bound book, or a quarter-flush book. We have a difficulty in finding out, unless we can get information, which it is very dangerous for us to get sometimes, what the particulars of the book are so far as the binders are concerned.

1138. You want more details?—Yes. We suggest that an official detailed schedule of the successful contractors, with the dates and the times of the expiration of the contracts and the cash amount, should be published. In the experience of the tin and iron-plate workers, when they asked for the names of the contractors, they were supplied with a hundred different names, and they had to pick out the successful one amongst that hundred, and of course they did not know which it was. We respectfully suggest to you in this connection that the "Board of Trade Labour Gazette" should be used, or that a "Weekly Contract Gazette" should be issued from the Treasury or by the Controller; or that a list could be sent to the Secretary of the National Printing and Kindred Trades Federation, or to the London Branch, or to the Secretary of the Parliamentary Committee of the Trade Union Congress. I believe the War Office and the Admiralty have adopted that plan, and send a list of the contractors showing the successful and the unsuccessful contractors, to the Secretary of the Parliamentary Committee of the Trade Union Congress.

1139. (Mr. Black.) Not showing the unsuccessful contractors?—I am sorry. We ask for it. If I want to know what the London County Council are doing, I simply go to a public library, turn up the "L.C.C. Gazette," and there I see the names of the firms and the amount of each tender, and the name of the successful firm is printed in italics in order that one can readily distinguish it from the others.

1140. (Chairman.) Do you find the amount of each tender?—Yes. The amount of the tender that each contractor has sent in appears in the "L.C.C. Gazette."

1141. (Mr. De la Bère.) Its price, do you mean?—Its price, and the successful one is in italics. There is a description of the number of articles as well, and of the particular work that the contractor tendered on. We suggest, therefore, that better facilities of information respecting contracts of tenders and acceptation—such as quantity, date, and amount—should be afforded to Trade Unions, and that such detailed list should be published in the "Board of Trade Labour Gazette," or in a weekly circular issued by the Treasury.

1142. (Chairman.) Is that information given by anybody except by the London County Council?—I believe it is to be obtained at the public offices of all public bodies, such as district councils. Provided you are a ratepayer, you can go and see. I do not say it is officially adopted, or that such publicity is given, except in the case of those that appear in the "L.C.C. Gazette," which, I believe, is the most official and public list you can get.

1143. Now, will you take your third point?—I ask your indulgence to take No. 3 and No. 5 together to save time, as I believe they are in the same connection. We would suggest that an official visit should precede any correspondence concerning unfair conditions with the contracting firm in question. I would like to supplement that by saying that, of course, we are not makng any charge against the Controller in any way, but we are not sure of the methods that are adopted by the inspector who pays these visits to the different firms. If the plan is adopted of sending a letter before the inspector visits, that may, we consider, put the contractor on his guard. I will give, as an example, an instance which my colleague mentioned, in the case of one firm which was visited by Mr. Pigott, the late Controller. We made a complaint, and it was proved in that case by the wages-book, that every man was getting the full wages. It was said that we were not correct in our figures. That proves that something had happened—either the contractor had got wind of the inspector's visit, or something had occurred. Mr. Pigott made a personal visit himself, and inspected the wages-book, and found everybody was receiving the wages. But we had a man there who was not receiving the Trade Union rate of wages at all, and we could have produced that man in evidence if necessary. Not a man in the shop was on full wages. It is very difficult to prove it, but I have no doubt there must have been two wages-books knocking about in that particular instance. I had a man who, it was actually known to us, was receiving less; he never received the full wage at all while working there. Then we also suggest that the visiting inspector should not only have access to the wages-book, but should question those engaged on Government work as to wages before the starting of the contract and while engaged upon any part thereof. That follows upon the last question that I raised. If the inspector had questioned the individual as to how much wages he had been receiving since starting the contract, then the workman himself would have had to prove to the inspector that he had not been receiving right along the full rate of wages. We think the worker himself should be questioned as to the rate of wages he receives, as well as inspecting the wages-book, in order to find out whether a knowledge of the intended visit has led to any alteration, or if the proper wage has been paid since the commencement of the contract. We have reason to believe that after that same complaint had been made to the Controller, somehow the information got round to the contractor, and conditions were framed which put us in a wrong position apparently, showing that our charges were baseless, or something of that sort. That is mainly what we should like to suggest in that connection.

1144. Now will you take No. 4?—Yes. That deals with the question of piece-work. It is a curious fact that the firms who get contracts are the largest firms, so far as we are concerned in this particular trade. Those large firms, in my opinion, and in my Society's opinion, seek to evade the Clause by adopting piece-work methods. I speak from practical experience, because I have been on Government contract work on piece-work myself. We find that the worst houses in the trade are the piece-work houses.

1145. (Mr. De la Bère.) And the worst are the largest?—The worst are the largest on Government work. We know that our men in one large house are on time-work, but the Government work is given to cheaper hands on piece-work. That is the case in one large firm which gets a good many of the contracts. My experience of piece-work is that piece-work itself as a system means a fearful rush for a man to earn his wages.

1146. (Mr. Bailey.) When you speak of wages do you mean his wages plus the 25 per cent., or do you mean his wages at the time rate?—I mean at the time rate. Even then it is an unfair condition, under the system prevailing when I was on it. I have to go back to five or six years ago when I was on it, and I was glad to get off the Government work; I had to do it cheaper than private work. We contend that it should be 1s. per hour for piece-work, and we contend that a result of the piece-work is that the Government get very bad work as a consequence of that system. Then take the case of the firm at Hemel Hempstead. You have no other firm in that town, yet this firm is allowed to employ boys at piece-work rates, which is worse than any London house would do; and yet that is supposed to be the current rate of wages. In regard to the interpretation of the Clause, we entirely differ with the interpretation put upon it. We are told in that particular case it is the custom of the trade, and even just now the Controller has told us in a similar instance that it is the custom in the trade. In another very large firm which is on piece-work, the flush hands are allowed to be on Government work, and because they are on piece-work they are supposed to earn the minimum rate of wages. We say they do not even, though they are flush hands, earn the minimum wage on the work which they do, which is contract work. We consider piece-work is detrimental to our trade. It is caused by the employers who have refused to apprentice, because they think they can pick up more by piece-work and by sub-dividing the labour than by apprenticing the lads. No really fair wage can be devised for piece-work. A City firm—the same firm which had the two wages books—was struck off the list, because two of our men in two and a half days only earned 5s. 9d. each making cases. If the principle on which that firm was struck off the list applied all round, then how is it that the same methods, under the same conditions, are allowed to exist now in the bigger establishments? That is our contention.

1147. Did you say that a fair wage could not be fixed on a piece-work rate?—Yes.

1148. Would you explain that a little more?—I believe that in working piece-work there is a danger of fixing a minimum rate. It is competition between man and man, we contend, in its worst form. It leads to bad work, and the question of ability is altogether confined and hampered by the different system there is in each shop. We could not fix a rate for piece-work, because there may be different systems prevailing in different shops; so no real fair wage or fixed minimum rate can be fixed on a piece-work system; it is all for the individual to earn as much as he possibly can.

1149. (Mr. Wilson Fox.) It could not be fixed by the Union, you mean, to cover all shops?—Yes.

1150. (Chairman.) But suppose you find a man working on a piece-work job, and earning either as much, or rather more than your minimum wage at time-work, would you say that that was an evasion of the Fair Wages Resolution?—If he was earning more than the minimum wage on time-work?

1151. Supposing he was earning 31s. a week on piece-work, would that not be a fair wage?—No. We consider time and a quarter is the rate for piece-work.

1153. Why would it not be a fair wage?—Because we say that the employer argues with me, when I go into his employ: "I want you to go on piece-work; it is better for you as you can earn more by your own exertion, and it is better for me as I get a larger quantity of work turned out; therefore, you can go on piece-work, and it is better for both of us." I contend that if I am not able to earn more for a given number of hours than the ordinary exertion of a man on time-work would, it does not pay me to be on piece-work, and it is not fair.

1154. An extra shilling a week would not pay you?—No.

1155. (Mr. Bailey.) You contend that it takes more out of a man to be put on piece-work?—Yes.

1156. To the extent of at least 25 per cent?—Yes. In that connection I would like to suggest that where piece-work, or any other system of work other than time, is the method in operation the minimum rate of wage should be guaranteed, or its equivalent per hour. I should like to explain that by one illustration. Supposing a man is employed on piece-work, and the inspector goes to the shop and he wants to know whether the wages are fair that are being paid to those piece-workers, we contend that the wages that the piece-workers should receive for 54 hours should be at the rate of time and a quarter—that would be about 1s. per hour roughly, and that we consider the fair wage on piece-work for 54 hours. Its equivalent should be guaranteed to the man in order to make sure that no man was working under unfair conditions at all. We say it is perfectly fair that there should be this higher rate, because the employer says, when he puts us on piece-work, that we can earn more for ourselves. We say that to carry out the Fair Wage Clause where piece-work is in operation the minimum rate should be guaranteed for piece-work.

1157. I do not want to interrupt you, but your suggested rate of 1s. per hour for piece-work works out at a great deal more than 25 per cent. on your time-work rate?—Yes, I believe it does.

1158. Indeed, it is more than 50 per cent?—The 1s. an hour has been awarded by the arbitrator in the bookbinding dispute.

1159. (Mr. Wilson Fox.) You are in favour of piece-work under certain conditions, I think?—We do accept it; but it is a system which has encroached upon our trade, and we cannot run our heads against a stone wall, and say we are absolutely opposed to it because we think it is detrimental to our trade. It is antagonistic to Trade Unionism we believe as a system.

1160. But you would take it under conditions?—We would allow it; but what we have adopted in our rules is to allow no more time-workers to go on piece-work. Where it is already in existence, of course, we have to put up with it, and do the piece-work.

1161. (Chairman.) Now as to your sixth suggestion?—We contend that a copy of the Fair Wage Clause should be printed and hung up in every department of a shop or factory where Government work is being done, and also that a schedule of the recognised Trade Union rate of wages and conditions should be hung up. I will just give an illustration of what we contend in this connection. I was a member of a deputation that waited upon Mr. Pigott about three or four years ago when he made this statement: He said that if a man came to him and said that he was not being paid a fair rate of wage on the work that he was doing for the Government he would take very serious steps to see that the contractor was dealt with. We would like to place before you the difficulty of an individual's position in attempting to carry out such a thing. I do not believe in the whole history of the Fair Wage Clause it has been done. No individual has gone to him personally and said he was not receiving the fair rate of wage. We consider that every worker, as a taxpayer and as an employee who is being employed on Government work which he has some indirect interest in, should have a right to know whether he is on Government work, and that he should also be entited to know what is the fair rate of wages which is supposed to be paid for the work which he is engaged upon. I know for a fact that a large number of employees do not even know that they are on Government work. Binders should know what is the fair rate of wages for the particular work on which they are engaged for the Government; yet they do not even know the particular fair rate which is fair for them on that work, and they do not even know that the Government work is in operation in the firm in which they are employed. We have the Factory Acts for regulating the rooms of a factory, the hours for meals and the employees; and that is hung up in the factory. We contend that if it is necessary to define the hours of meals and the conditions of the room where the employees are concerned, it is just as necessary for the Government to be advised of the rates of wages and the work that is being done in these firms.

1162. What is it exactly that you want to put up, the Fair Wages Clause itself?—Yes, a copy of the Fair Wages Clause should be printed and hung up in every department of shop or factory where Government work is being done; also a schedule of the recognised trade society rate of wages and conditions. I have to apologise perhaps to the Board of Trade for pressing upon them to widen their work; but the Board of Trade, it seems to me, could ascertain the wages for nearly every trade and every branch of a trade that is in existence, and also the conditions of all Trade Unions for their respective trades in which the contracts are concerned.

1163. Now, will you go to your seventh point?—That deals with the interpretation of the Clause, and I have to ask you to consider the following suggestion: that the wording of the Fair Wage Clause is too vague; so many interpretations can be made from it that its intention is frustrated; therefore, that the words "current rate of wage" be deleted, and the words "Trade Union" be inserted in its stead. I would like to say in extenuation of that, that our desire when we first began to notice that the Government was getting into the worst houses in the trade, and was getting into some with the worst conditions, was to endeavour to get from Mr. Sydney Buxton personally an interpretation of the Fair Wage Clause. But I might say that we were not successful in that. We could not get a definite idea as to what the Fair Wage Clause meant, so as to be useful to the number of trades which were interested. We were told that the current rate means the custom, it means standard, it means usually paid at the time. Taking a contractor who employs the whole of a town, what would you say is the fair rate there? Would you say the current rate for the boy is 8s., for the woman 20s., and for the man 25s. or 35s.? Mr. Leonard Courtney, in his Committee of Inquiry on the Fair Wage Clause, I believe, definitely stated that the fair rate should be interpreted to mean the fair rate, the current rate of wage to men, and not to boys or women; yet we have a firm employed on Government contract paying 8s. and 15s. a week to boys. I am going to ask the Committee: What do you define the current rate as? We want you to consider this question of the difficulty we are placed in as regards the interpretation of the Clause. Since moving in the matter, we find that the large contractors know very well that we must have some case behind us, and they have started sending their work into the country in order to avoid the Trade Union conditions and rates of wages. Even up to recently we find that a contractor in London gets this work; he may compete at any price he likes, but immediately he gets the contract it goes down into the country to be performed not only by boys, but by female labour, which we consider is absolutely unfair, and in violation of the Fair Wages Clause of the House of Commons. I would like just to say that the Trade Union rate, it seems to me, is not one-sided entirely. The rates of wages are now generally agreed upon between the employers and the employed at conferences of the federations and the Trade Union representatives; so that it seems to me that now we are not entirely asking for a one-sided agreement.

1164. Do you mean by "Trade Union rate" the rate that has been so agreed upon by the employers and the workmen, or do you mean some other rate?—I mean the rate that has been agreed upon. It generally has, with very few exceptions now, at the present time been agreed upon between the employers and the employees. We consider that this not only means unfair competition with our wages, but it means unfair competition with the employers. As I previously mentioned, the employers say to us, "Will you do this?" Just recently in my own shop our firm were successful in getting a tender for a Crown Colony job. We were well organised in that shop, and we were strong enough to look after our interests. A flush-book was given to the boys, and the half-bound or better class of work was given to the journeymen. We insisted that as Government work, it was all man's work, and should be paid for at the fair rate of wages recognised by the trade. The firm agreed and readily assented to that proposition, but that was only because we were strong enough in the shop. In another shop the men might have had to go out. This means unfair competition between the employers themselves, and we are continually told, when we ask for our rate of wages, "Competition is very keen. I tender for Government work on your Trade Union rate basis, and another firm tenders at an unfair rate, which makes it difficult for me to pay the Trade Union rate, and I cannot do it." And so he either will not pay the Trade Union rate, or he adopts piece-work in order to avoid it. That seems general, in my experience, and that has arisen from the words "current rate of wages," as it seems to our Society, and there is really no basis in it to be fair to the industry or to the present development of the Trade Unions.

1165. Would it meet your view if instead of "the current rate" you substitute "Trade Union rate as agreed upon by employers and workmen"?—Yes, I would be willing, as an alternative, to agree to that. I have been instructed to definitely state to this Committee that our members will not in any way be satisfied with the Clause unless it has inserted "the Trade Union rate of wages." We have spent pounds in following contract work and in conference with employers, and when we come to a question of contract work all our efforts are put on one side by the fact of a wrong interpretation of the Clause.

1166. Do you see the difference which the words that I propose to add to your formula make? There is a difference between "the Trade Union rate" and "the Trade Union rate as agreed upon by employers and workmen," is there not?—Yes; but can you tell me any other rate that is agreed upon, apart from that? What other rate of wages is there?

1167. That is a question I was going to ask you?—Only that is recognised and agreed upon between the employers and employees.

1168. Is that what you mean by Trade Union rate?—I mean by it what the Trade Union can get by its effort. That is what I mean by Trade Union rate.

1169. (Mr. Wilson Fox.) That would not necessarily be what they had agreed on?—No, I accept that. It does not necessarily mean what is agreed upon, but whatever the Trade Unions are able to raise—either conditions of work or wages—that is what I mean.

1170. (Chairman.) What they are able to obtain from the employers?—I do not care whether you put that in or not. I want the Trade Union rate inserted.

1171. (Mr. Westcott.) But it must be an agreed rate between the parties?—Not necessarily.

1172. Then you are to tell one side they are to pay so much—what the other side think is due—whether it is right or wrong?—It is not a question of right or wrong.

1173. (Chairman.) The difference between the two is this—that the "Trade Union rate" may mean the rate that you demand, but "the Trade Union rate as agreed upon between the employers and the workmen" is the rate which you get, and there may be a difference between those two?—Yes, there might be.

1174. Is what you mean by the Trade Union rate—the rate that is agreed upon?—Yes, by the Trade Unions.

1175. And by the employers?—No, I do not say by the employers; I say the Trade Union rate, not the employers' rate.

1176. What do you mean by the Trade Union rate? Do you mean the rate agreed upon by the Trade Union and the employer, or the rate demanded by the Trade Union?—That all depends. If the Union is able to raise its wages by its own effort without any agreement with the employers, and that becomes prevalent in the trade, then I say that that is the rate of wages to be accepted.

1177. That is practically the agreed rate then, is it not?—Yes, you may take it so.

1178. (Mr. Bailey.) It would not be possible, would it, for your Union to meet and pass a resolution that the rate of wages hereafter should be, say, 38s. a week instead of 34s., and then call upon all people doing Government work to pay that rate?—It would be quite possible if they were strong enough to do it.

1179. (Chairman.) Would you call that the Trade Union rate?—Yes, certainly.

1180. Even if they were not getting it?—They would be getting it if they were strong enough to get it.

1181. (Mr. Westcott.) You mean to say you would force the employers' hands by the strength of your Society?—Yes.

1182. (Mr. Wilson Fox.) What would be done in the case of a weak Union with a comparatively small number of men in it, the majority of the men engaged in that trade being outside? Would you call that rate the Trade Union rate, which is being paid to the comparatively small number of men who happen to be in the Union?—Certainly. If a number of men organise themselves, and are ready to protect their trade and to get a rate for it, I say that their efforts to protect their trade and interests should be recognised.

1183. Although 10 per cent. of the men in the trade were in the Union and 90 per cent. of them outside, you would say that the Trade Union rate should govern the Government contracts?—Certainly. That is the only rate of wages as a basis that you can get.

1184. (Chairman.) I think we will not take you into your eighth point—the establishment of State binding works, for that is hardly our business?—I beg your pardon, but I have not finished with Clause 7. I would like to say further, in reference to the question of the Trade Union rate, that we have just recently complained to the Controller of Messrs. ——. We were told in that particular instance that females were engaged upon the work; we considered that unfair, and we wrote to the Controller to that effect. We were told that he saw no reason to interfere with that; and yet we have instances, where females are employed, of firms being struck off the contract list.

1185. (Mr. Bailey.) I asked just now that the exact words of the letter should be quoted, and I do not think it said—in fact, I know it did not say—that there was no reason to interfere?—There were words to that effect—no action was taken.

1186. No action was taken because we obtained from the firm an undertaking that they would not continue that pending a certain decision?—That is just the point I am going to complain of. Is it fair that after we have proved a grievance with the firm, and it has been struck off in similar conditions, that a larger establishment should be allowed to continue uninterrupted? We were told in the reply to that letter that the firm had promised the Controller that the females should be taken off and flush binders put upon the work; but after all we say that is a violation also. You take females off the work as you say that is unfair; that is an interpretation of the Clause. Then as to the flush binders, we have had firms struck off for them, but you think that is fair, and pending the decision of this Committee no further action can be taken. We say that the Clause is still in operation while this Committee sits. Not only has tt been unfair in regard to the labour, but it has been unfair in regard to the material, too. Yet it is allowed to continue pending the decision of this Committee. This Committee might not report for two or three years, as far as I know. It is the nature of the system we complain about. The interpretation of the Fair Wages Clause is wrong. Anyhow, I would like to add that we do protest very strongly against this inaction; it means to say that we have got to stop taking any action until this Committee reports its decision. I say we cannot do that.

1187. (Chairman.) It seems to me that you have got what you wanted. This firm does not employ women any longer on that work?—Very likely, but then we say that for the same reason you struck a small shop off, but you are allowing the big shop to continue.

1188. Do you wish that firm struck off the list; is that it?—We do not wish any firm to be struck off. What we ask is that a fair wage shall be paid to the people.

1189. (Mr. Bailey.) You are assuming, are you not, that exactly the same conditions exist in the case of the firm last mentioned as in the case of the other firms that were struck off?—Yes. Because of the cheap labour that is being employed on Government work and not being paid the full rate of wage, in the opinion of the Controller that house has not been allowed to tender again; yet, in similar circumstances, on a similar kind of work and with the same kind of wages, but going on in a larger shop, you allow it to continue.

1190. (Chairman.) I thought it had been put an end to, as I understood the letter which was read?—No. (Mr. Welch.) Would it be intruding on the Committee if I were to read the two letters? The first letter was dated November 16th: "Sir, I am directed by the Controller to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 14th instant, stating that in the opinion of your Committee the practice of Messrs. ——, of employing females on certain work to which exception is taken by your Society should be discontinued pending the result of the inquiry of the Fair Wages Committee. In reply, I am to state that it is not possible to anticipate the judgment of the Committee in the way it is suggested." That was signed by the Assistant Controller. As my colleague has said, we objected to that, as we thought it was anticipating the decision of this Committee, and we wrote to the Controller again. On December 6th we received this repy: "Sir, I am directed by the Controller to acknowledge the receipt of your letter further with reference to the practice of Messrs. ——, in employing females on certain binding work. In reply, I am to inform you that on the 25th September last the firm in question gave an undertaking that in the future all quarter-bound work entrusted to it by this Department would be done by flush hands. No further contract up to the present has been entrusted to that firm." We had been told that was stopped on the 25th September, but that must have been a misunderstanding, because on the 16th November the first letter came saying that no action could be taken.

1191. Anyhow, it seems to me you got what you wanted as far back as the 25th September?—Only with regard to the stopping of the females, not with regard to the question of employing flush binders—that is cheap labour.

1192. (Mr. Bailey.) But you have not made any representation about the employment of flush hands in this particular case, have you?—Perhaps not; but we did make a statement about the same time with regard to another firm which was employing flush labour, and we received a reply to that on 28th November.

1193. The practice which you complain of was suspended at once, but the question of the principle of the thing stood over; so that, as the Chairman has pointed out, you got practically what you contended for?—(Mr. Friend.) My point is this, that if the contractors are to take the word of the Controller that it is quite in order, and a just interpretation of the Fair Wage Clause, to allow flush binders to be engaged on Government work, they have entirely cut the ground under our feet; but we have already been successful in three or four complaints to you in very similar circumstances, and have had those firms knocked off.

1194. No; the circumstances are not similar; that is the whole point of it?—The circumstances are similar, in our opinion.

1195. There are other circumstances, of which you are not aware, and of which it was not necessary to inform you. That is the whole principle of it. With regard to the flush hands, if you choose to write about that, I need not say the matter shall be gone into. If you say that is not a practice of the trade, that will be a question to be seen to?—I apologise for having misunderstood the Controller; I did not in any way want to do that. But I should like to support No. 7 by saying that the experience of the Trade Union branches in connection with Government work is that Government contracts have been made entirely a byword because of the cheap labour, and what they consider to be under-priced labour employed upon them. We have had the Trade Union Congress dealing with the matter every year for the last five or six years. Every branch in the Trade Unions has had the same experience, and they have all insisted that the only satisfactory, and the only fair way they can see to finally carry out the proper interpretation of the Clause, which will allow of no other meaning, will be to insert "the Trade Union rate of wages" instead of "the current rate." You can deal with material, and you can decide by sub-clauses, or separate clauses, in the contract the kind of material, the quantity of material, and the quality of the material, and surely the labour of the worker is just as important as the material of the book. His labour is more important to him than the material of the book. It seems to me that the Government should define better what they mean by the Fair Wage Clause, in order to save a good deal of this friction. Those are our instructions from our members.

1196. (Mr. Westcott.) The accepted rate between the masters and the men is the Trade Union rate, is it not?—That may be your interpretation; I have my own opinion, of course.

1197. Is that not the rule?—I would not like to say.

1198. If the employers and the employed agree, what more do you want?—I should go a great deal further than any employer would. I should claim that labour has a right to all it produces.

1199. If labour agrees with capital there is an end of it?—The labourer does agree with capital because he has got no alternative. If I have to work on a job, whoever likes to employ me, I have got no alternative. But I could go much further than "the Trade Union rate."

1200. Have you not got the market value?—Wages are not paid for value.

1201. If there is a scarcity of men in one trade, then they can demand higher wages?—Competition would operate before long. I should like to say that a Special Committee of Liverpool have decided on the question of the interpretation of the Fair Wage Clause in their contracts. They have decided to adopt the Liverpool Trade Council resolution that they should not only pay the recognised Trade Union rate, which they have inserted in their contract, but that the contractor shall be responsible for the wages paid by the sub-contractors.

1202. (Mr. Bailey.) Is this the Corporation of Liverpool you are speaking of?—The Liverpool Corporation have just recently adopted the Trade Union rate of wage, instead of the current or standard rate of wage, in their resolution dealing with contracts. Of course, I have to abide by the Chairman's decision, but I claim that my last suggestion, No. 8, should be considered, because, having regard to the terms of your reference, I say where there is an entire evasion of the Fair Wages Clause, this comes in as one of the steps to frustrate that. My suggestion No. 8 about direct labour is the only real alternative, it seems to me.

1203. (Chairman.) You would abolish contracts altogether?—Absolutely.

1204. (Mr. Westcott.) In all trades?—In all trades; but, of course, we are speaking of our own trade here, and we have no experience except in our own.

1205. Then the contractor would cease to exist as far as the Government work is concerned?—Quite right, too; it would be a very good thing.

1206. (Mr. Bailey.) You are speaking now for your own trade only?—For my own trade only.

1207. (Mr. King.) In regard to the Liverpool resolution, I think in reading it out you said "the recognised Trade Union rate," and then afterwards you left out the word "recognised"; is "recognised" in or not?—Yes, I believe it is. I got my information from the "Municipal Journal."

1208. There is, of course, a difference between a "recognised Trade Union rate" and a "Trade Union rate"?—Yes, undoubtedly. That is the whole point, is it not?

1209. About your first point, are there any non-Union houses which are fair houses?—Not to our idea.

1210. I do not mean to your idea; but are there any which pay proper wages and under proper conditions?—Yes.

1211. Some of them do?—Yes.

1212. Would they be on your list of fair houses?—Yes. Our trade has a separate list of its own, and the National Printing and Kindred Trades Federation, which is a central organisation, compiles a list of houses that are fair in most departments.

1213. Whether they are Union houses or non-Union houses?—When we take the basis of a fair house, we take the number of journeymen employed and the number of apprentices, and then if the journeymen, whether Unionists or not, are getting the fair rate of wage, that house is reckoned as a fair house.

1214. (Mr. Bailey.) And is it put on your list as a fair house?—Yes, it is. (Mr. Welch.) We have never objected to a house as unfair because our men were not employed there. Our only objection has been to a house that was employing cheap labour.

1215. (Mr. King.) In regard to your fifth point, do you think that the Government inspector ought to have access to all the wages books or only to the book showing wages paid on Government work?—(Mr. Friend.) If he wants to go to the wages book, he would have to do it.

1216. Some contractors object to showing the wages paid on other work?—Yes; I dare say they would—they would object to anything.

1217. Do you think the Government inspector should have the right to demand any book?—He should have the right to demand any book.

1218. Any wages book, whether for Government work or not?—Any wages book for the employees, whether on Government work or not.

1219. (Mr. Westcott.) Your first point seems rather an arbitrary one, that you, the Trade Union, should form a list of the firms, and suggest that a Government department should take your list, and that that should be the list and no other. If it is a list which is agreed to in some way it would be a different thing, but as I understand your suggestion, we are to take your list and regard every firm outside it as being an unfair firm?—Yes. We insist upon that.

1220. Do you seriously say that is the right course?—Yes. We insist upon that.

1221. You insist upon it that any firm which has got in your bad books in some way, hereafter shall be banned for ever from Government work?—No, not at all. We do not say any firm should be debarred from Government work, whether it is fair or unfair. We say that if it receives Government work, it should pay the recognised Trade Union rate of wages.

1222. If that is so, I do not say anything about that?—We are not here to knock any firm off the list.

1223. The contention certainly was that we should only invite such firms as you gave us on an arbitrary list or a Union list?—We insist on that, but we do not say that because a firm not on the list does get Government work, it should be struck off. We say it is our duty, then, to see they pay the fair rate of wages.

1224. The firms are to be at your mercy to put them on your list as you think fit?—No; it is the employees who are at the mercy of the firms, or we should never have to come here.

1225. We will leave that. You say you wish this Fair Wages Clause to be hung up in the shops?—Yes.

1226. But you do not agree that the Fair Wages Clause is sufficient?—I certainly meant as amended.

1227. As to this current rate—it is the old theory, which we have gone over before, but do you not think "accepted" is quite sufficient? Why should we bring in the words "Trade Union"? If it is accepted in the district by the employers and the workmen, it does not matter whether it is a Trade Union rate or anything else, does it?—I have never heard in any district of an employers' Trade Union rate of wages.

1228. I know that in some trades there is a Trade Union covering a certain district, and within the limits of that district there is another rate altogether—I do not mean in your trade—agreed to between the employers and the workmen to their mutual benefit. If we put in the words "Trade Union rate," we should be debarred from going to those firms; in fact, from going to anything but a Trade Union?—Not at all; that is just the mistake. The Trade Union rate should not be taken as the maximum; it is only the minimum.

1229. But then the minimum is below the Trade Union rate in this district?—The minimum is the Trade Union rate; that is our contention.

1230. You do not follow me. There is a radius 12 miles from London, and 11 miles from London there is a little town. These men in the ordinary course would come to London to work, and they would then get the London rate, but they have this work in their own district, and they save their railway fare, they save their time in travelling, they live in a better degree of comfort, and so they agree to work for a less rate than the Trade Union rate which governs that whole district. Do you think that is a reasonable arrangement?—Yes. We do not contend that the Trade Union rate is the same in every town. I have got a list here of 61 districts, where all the minimum rates are different. If a man gets into the cheaper district he gets cheaper wages.

1231. But this is a different rate in the same district, and therefore the words "Trade Union rate" would not do, if substituted for "the current rate of the district"?—We are simply going over the old ground and the old trouble. We only want to avoid friction, and the only logical way in which we see friction could be avoided would be by a fair and satisfactory interpretation being placed on the Clause.

1232. (Chairman.) How would you deal with that case which Mr. Westcott put as to a modification of the Trade Union rate, which applied to a whole district, in a particular part of that district?—I should say then that the rate would apply to the nearest town; that is the only simple way I suggest. Within London, I believe, the London County Council stipulate that for a radius of 20 miles the London rate shall prevail, and so it would be with every town.

1233. Would you prevent a modification of that rate by agreement between the employers and the workmen in any part of that district?—It is not my business to prevent anything. If the rate of wages is agreed upon between themselves mutually, it will not be the Trade Union rate, but it will be the prevailing rate.

1234. (Mr. Westcott.) Would you insist on these workmen on the verge of this district getting more than the rate which they are willing to receive?—I have never yet seen a man refuse money as wages. He will be willing to receive it.

1235. Would you insist upon the contractors paying more, when the workmen would be satisfied with a smaller amount?—We should let the workman get as much as he could.

1236. In this little corner of a big district, there are certain men who have agreed with their employers to take a half-penny an hour less. On private work they would proceed at a half-penny an hour less to do the work, but directly the Government steps in, you say they are to put up the rate?—Yes, and quite right, too, because the contractors are told of it. It is not in any way unfair. The contractors have to estimate upon the basis of the fair rate of wage. There is nothing unfair about it; they know beforehand. It is not like the ordinary competition, where they do not know what they have to contend with. It is stipulated with the Government, it is public work, and it is the duty of the Government to see that no unfair conditions are likely to happen on their work.

1237. Is it the duty of the Government to say to a man engaged on their work, you shall pay a half-penny more than those engaged on similar work next door?—Quite so.

1238. (Mr. Black.) In regard to getting at the wages of the individual worker, how do you suggest that the inspectors should go to work? In many cases you would not care to give the name of that worker, or you would not care that it should be known to an employer that a particular man had made a complaint?—That is so.

1239. Then how do you suggest the Government inspector should go to work in that case?—I would suggest that he should go to work on the same lines that the Home Office have adopted with their inspectors. They have a perfect right to question any man as to what hours he works, his time, etc.

1240. Would you give the name confidentially to the Government, and not mention it to the firm?—I say it is the duty of the inspector to visit firms, and it should be part of his business to question workers, if the inspector has any suspicion as to the work being done, or the wages paid for the labour. He should have that as a right.

1241. Do you mean that he should ask questions at random, or that he should ask questions of particular men that your Union may have named to him?—That he should ask questions of any individual employee, not necessarily of a Trade Union employee.

1242. Supposing you were complaining that the proper wage has not been paid to two or three men, then those would become more or less marked men, would they not?—If it were known, but it would not be known.

1243. If the inspector asked them questions as he went round, it would?—The same would apply in the case of a factory inspector; any individual that the factory inspector spoke to going round the place would be a marked man.

1244. There it would be a question more of the general conditions of work, and any employee might give the same information; but here is a case where perhaps only two or three people were getting unfair wages?—If they should happen to be our members, we should take very good notice that this Fair Wage Committee would know about it if the men were being victimised.

1245. Would you let the Government Department know the names, so that their inspector could ask these people?—Yes, I would allow the inspector to ask any individual.

1246. But if those men were the only ones getting an unfair wage, would not those employees be marked men?—No.

1247. Not if they spoke to the inspector?—I do not see how they would. This inspector would have the right to verify any statements. We might bring all sorts of charges before this Committee, and the inspector should have the power to go to the employer himself.

1248. But would that not make an employee a marked man?—It would have that tendency, I take it, and we all have to face that tendency. I am a Trade Unionist, and I may be a marked man for being a Trade Unionist.

1249. They have to risk that, do you say?—Certainly they have to risk it, but then the benefit to be obtained would be greater—that would be an advantage that would outweigh the other.

1250. Some Unions make that a strong point with the Government?—I suppose so.

1251. (Mr. Wilson Fox.) There is not really much difficulty in practice, is there, in ascertaining what the Trade Union rate of wages in your trade is in all the large towns?—Not at all.

1252. But there is in the outlying places?—Yes; but most trades are now fairly well organised, and the rates of wages are scheduled pretty well all round.

1253. Take the great staple trades of the country which have strong workmen's organisations, and strong employers' organisations; there is very little trouble really in those big staple trades—like cotton, coal, iron and steel, engineering, shipbuilding and boiler-making?—That is so.

1254. The current rate of wages there, whatever it may be, is very much the same as the Trade Union rate in those large staple trades?—That may be so, but the interpretation of the word "current" may be different.

1255. Where in those big staple trades that I am alluding to the rate of wages are settled across the table, like the miners at the Westminster Palace Hotel and so on, there is not the difficulty which there is in the trades in which the organisation is much weaker?—That is so.

1256. I only want to emphasise the fact that where you have weaker organisations, you have a greater trouble in ascertaining what the rate of wages are, or should be?—That is so.

1257. You make practically apprenticeship the test of the right to employment in your particular trade?—Yes.

1258. And anybody who has not passed through an apprenticeship, according to your view, has not the right, and ought not to have the right, to your work, and must not take up that particular work; and that results in your being able to keep up the rate of wages for the skilled men?—Yes.

1259. (Mr. Bailey.) Mr. Welch, as you are the President of the society, I would like to ask you whether you consider that on the whole the Fair Wages Clause has been productive of good to your society?—(Mr. Welch.) I might say it has been productive of a certain amount of good by certain houses being struck off; but we do not think it has been productive of the amount of good it should be, because we still find certain houses, which are distinctly unfair, are being allowed to do Government work. We think, therefore, that it would be to our benefit if the Fair Wage Clause was strengthened.

1260. (Mr. De la Bère.) You made a remark a little time back, Mr. Friend, from which I rather gathered that there was an impression that an individual workman was debarred from making a complaint. That is not so, of course; there is nothing to prevent anyone complaining?—(Mr. Friend.) I did not say he was debarred. He was recommended to lodge a complaint, but I say it is very seldom done, and I do not know of its being done by an individual.

1261. It has been done, but I rather thought you fancied there was something against it, and that a man was not allowed to complain?—I know there is nothing against it, but I think it is very difficult for a man to do it, and he would not, generally speaking, have the initiative to do it, unfortunately. I have not found it done yet, except through his organisation.

1262. Of course, it is quite open to him to do it?—Yes, I know.

1263. In point of fact, I think as much attention would be paid to it as if it came through any other channel?—I have no doubt.

The witnesses withdrew.

Mr. Ben Turner, called and examined.

1264. (Chairman.) You represent, as President, the Union of Weavers and Textile Workers?—Yes.

1265. Does that Union cover the whole country?—No; it covers the West Riding of Yorkshire.

1266. What have you to say on the Fair Wages Clause?—Taking your terms of reference and the Clause about the evasion of "the current rate" and its interpretation, I am not certain that it is satisfactory from the factory worker's point of view in the West Riding. Take one of the cases that we had at Pudsey and Stanningley, where there are a number of textile mills. Part of Stanningley is in the City of Leeds itself—one little bit; and Pudsey is a separate council or a separate town—but all in the Leeds postal area. When we asked the War Office to insist upon the Leeds rate being paid by a firm in Stanningley, with seven-tenths of their mill in Stanningley and three-tenths in Leeds—it being on the boundary line—it was replied that the wage area was separate and distinct from the City of Leeds. Leeds wages for this class of employment—willeyers and fettlers—were 5½d. per hour, and at this mill doing the same War Office cloth it was 4½d. per hour. An investigation took place by a gentleman from the War Office—or from the department, anyhow—and he arrived after investigation at the conclusion that this was not in Leeds city area, and that therefore the geography disturbed the principle of fair contracts. We therefore failed to get this firm to pay the wage which was the current wage in Leeds on that one class of the trade in that mill—one part of which was actually in the City of Leeds, but the bulk of which was outside the Leeds city itself.

1267. Were they the only employers doing similar work?—No; there were numerous employers in the Pudsey and Stanningley area.

1268. What rate did they pay?—The rate in the district varied from 4½d. to 5d. in the Pudsey and Stanningley area; in the Leeds area, which is the centre of that section of the cloth trade, it was 5½d., as per agreement between employers and employed.

1269. Then you wanted to extend the Leeds rate to the other places?—Undoubtedly.

1270. (Mr. De la Bère.) Might I ask when was that?—About six years ago now, but I would not say to six months. In another case we did manage to bring this into operation, but purely because the Wakefield city had extended its borders, that is, it had annexed a portion called Alverthorpe, which was at one time outside the City of Wakefield and was then incorporated by annexation. We consequently got the rate to apply to a firm, purely because Alverthorpe had been annexed, and therefore had become part of the city. We desire to see it made not a town area but a trade area, that is, where a trade in the West Riding covers the West Riding, the operation of the Fair Wages Clause should apply, where there are stipulated prices—agreed prices—to that trade in general.

1271. (Chairman.) Your contention then is that the district should be very much larger than it is?—That the trade area should be the area, and not the geographical area of the towns or the village, as the case may be.

1272. That would end, would it not, in having a uniform rate all over the West Riding, say?—Yes.

1273. Would that be right?—I think so.

1274. I mean to say, is there no variety in the circumstances which would justify different rates?—No. The centre of trade for the worsted cloth is Huddersfield; for the stuff trade it is Bradford; and for the cloth trade it is Leeds. That applies to all the West Riding without any practical exception, and therefore we think that the rate should be for the West Riding and not for the locality.

1275. Do not the conditions vary in different parts of the West Riding?—No; there is the same machinery and the same class of manufacture.

1276. And the conditions are practically the same?—They are exactly the same.

1277. Is the rent the same?—There is practically no difference. I live in a small town of 32,000 inhabitants, and the rents and rates there are about the same as in Leeds, with practically no difference, and the same as in Bradford.

1278. Are they?—Absolutely.

1279. Do you mean that the rents and rates in all the towns in the West Riding are the same?—Practically in all the manufacturing towns they are. There may be on the Dalesides some little variations, but that is small in itself.

1280. Are there no mills in quite rural parts of the West Riding?—There are occasional mills in the rural parts, but they are very rare.

1281. Rent would be very much lower there, of course?—If they have that advantage they lose it in convenience, of course, in regard to the ordinary methods of living.

1282. Then you think they are not better off on the whole?—I do not think so. They lose some of the niceness of life.

1283. Perhaps some people would think they gain?—I have lived in both, and I would rather live in a town. I would rather die at sixty in a town than at seventy in a village.

1284. What is your next point?—The next point is that this Fair Wages Clause is not satisfactory from the trade point of view, in so far that a firm on the list of Government contractors supplied to us gets part of their material from a place where the wages are not up to the standard of the district. May I explain it this way? This cloth is woven at Huddersfield, but the material to make the cloth from comes from Bingley and from Bradford. At Bradford, where the yarn comes from and the warp comes from, the standard price is not paid at some of the firms which supply the yarn to this firm that make the cloth. I have got to admit there is a difficulty in carrying our suggestion out, but the fact is there. The material for this cloth comes from a place at Bradford; it is woven at Huddersfield, and the weaving is done at absolutely fair rates; but in the spinning of this cloth and in the preparatory stages in the wool-combing department, it is absolutely unfair even for the district of Bradford. Therefore, we want to know if it is possible to make the Clause apply to the raw material, as we may term it—to the preparatory material before it is made into cloth. I have got to admit that there is a difficulty in trying to follow it up, but in town matters we call upon the milkman to supply us with pure milk; we make him the responsible person for the purity of that milk, and he can safeguard himself as regards any out-of-pocket penalty there may be for impure milk by securing a warranty from the person he buys the milk from that he shall recover that risk. Is it not feasible that the same principle may be adopted in connection with cloth that is partly made at one mill, the material being got from another mill? I am not certain in my own mind that it is absolutely feasible, but I think the principle is, generally speaking, on the same lines. Then there is another point in this direction: that is, that the hours of labour do not work out properly under the Fair Wages Clause. The Clause deals with the current rate of wages or the rate current in the district, and it does not apply to the hours of labour. I mean to say, that some of our firms work 58½ hours, though most firms work 55½. Some of the firms that are on this list of Government contractors work for 58½, and some of them for 55½ hours. We want the interpretation to mean, if possible, that the standard hours of labour shall apply as well as the current rate of wages. I am not certain, judging from the statement that you have to guide you on the Committee, that this point is within the objects of your inquiry.

1285. It may be rather doubtful, but we shall be glad to hear what you have to say about it?—Take this case for example: One of the biggest cloth contractors for the Army and the Navy have three mills just now. At these three mills they work on Saturday afternoon and on Sunday at midnight—that is, they go to work on Sunday at midnight. They are the only firm in the Dewsbury and Batley area that work on that principle, and they are the chief Government contractors in that district; there are some more besides, but they are the chief. We want to contend—I do not know whether we can—that they should observe the factory hours of labour as the other firms do. Of course, it is a voluntary business with the other firms, and they could do the same as this firm does if they cared to do so. We want to bring this firm down to the standard hours of labour in the district, and to abolish thereby all Saturday afternoon and Sunday labour. It comes from the personal safety point of view as well, because when a person has worked from Friday at 6 until Saturday at 6 in the morning, and then has got to resume work at 12 noon till half-past 5 or half-past 9 we think from a safety point of view it is not wise—but that is, of course, beyond the scope of your inquiry. Still, we think the hours of labour ought to apply in connection with the standard rate of wages. Another case of a similar character is Messrs. A., at Holmfirth. Their hours of labour are 58½—I am speaking of the male employees now, as the females and young persons are all working 55½. As I say, Messrs. A.'s time is 58½ hours, and the current number of hours at the chief of the mills in the Holme Valley and the Colne Valley are 55½. It therefore interferes somewhat with the working of the current rate of wage, in so far that if you get 23s. for 58½ hours and in a neighbouring mill you get 23s. for 55½ hours, in the first they have three hours more for the pay, and therefore that reduces the value per hour of the labour. We think that question of the hours is quite as important as anything else in conjunction with the question of wages.

1286. Has your Union got an agreement with the employers about both hours and wages?—We have an agreement in connection with the Holme Valley and the Colne Valley with the Employers' Association, for the rate to be 5d. per hour for what are termed willeyers and fettlers. This firm of A.'s are big Government contractors, and they pay 23s. for 58½ hours, which is about 4¾d. in round figures—it is not 5d. by a little bit. Therefore, this company, although they pay 23s., which is the rate except for 1½d.—It is 23s. 1½d. for 55½ hours at 5d.—they are paying these 23s. for 58½ hours. Then there is the question of blankets. The blanket trade is practically centred in the Calder Valley; there is a bit of it at Witney, but practically it is all centred in the Calder Valley, that is, from Luddendenfoot

Sowerby Bridge, Elland and Dewsbury. Dewsbury is the chief centre of the whole trade, and being the chief centre we think should be the guiding principle as to what is current in that trade. I should say that three-fourths of the blanket trade is in the Dewsbury area, and that in Elland and Sowerby Bridge and Luddendenfoot it is an incidental occupation amidst the other cloth trades. Take the question of the blanket-raisers—the men who raise the pile on the blankets, and make the value of the blankets according to the pile that is there. For example, take ——'s, a big firm of Government contractors and ——'s, of Mirfield. They pay their men piece-rate and their men earn 30s. to 35s. per week regularly; but at Luddendenfoot and at Elland similar employees only earn 22s. and 24s. per week.

1287. (Mr. Wilson Fox.) Is that a time wage?—Yes. Therefore, in that connection we are hopeful to contend that these firms outside Dewsbury itself ought to pay what is the current rate in the chief district where the bulk of the trade is—I should say that three-fourths of the trade is there. The firms I named are the finest blanket manufacturers in the world. The other firms are practically scattered all round. Then there is an odd firm here and there outside the Dewsbury area. We want to contend that the Dewsbury area should guide the Government as to the current rate section up there.

1288. (Chairman.) This is much the same point that you started with?—Exactly; I am trying to follow it up. Another case we have had just now is at Eccleshill, but that matter is under negotiation with the Department, and therefore probably it would not be wise to raise it. For many years the firm of Messrs. B. at Eccleshill have not been paying, as we are asserting, I will say, the standard rate of wages. This firm at Eccleshill is on the border of Bradford and on the border of Leeds; at Bradford there is the stuff trade, and at Leeds there is the cloth trade. This is a cloth business, and, therefore, Leeds market, and not Bradford market, governs the trade. We contend that when they pay 4¾d. for willeyers and fettlers, when the Leeds' rate is 5½d., and 6d. for overtime, they are not observing the standard or current rate of wages of the district, as we make Leeds the district. It is a similar point continued in the same direction.

1289. You would make wages depend rather on the market where the things were sold than on the place where they were produced; is that it?—From a geographical and trade point of view, Bradford is the centre of all the stuff trade, Huddersfield is the centre of the cloth worsted trade, and Leeds the centre of the woollen trade; and that is where the markets are. Therefore, the whole West Riding should be one area for the woollen trade, and the same for the worsted cloth trade, and the same for the stuff trade; the area is quite little enough, and still quite definite enough, to be termed an area in place of an urban district area or a town council area.

1290. (Mr. Bailey.) Will you tell us exactly what you mean by "markets"?—You will call Manchester the exchange for Lancashire, for instance——

1291. You mean actually the sale places?—Yes.

1292. Rather than the place of manufacture?—It happens to be both, does Leeds.

1293. Does that apply to the other places you mention?—Huddersfield is the worsted cloth market, and Bradford is the stuff cloth market.

1294. Does that mean that they are the producing places as well as the sale places?—They are the sale places, and the chief producing places. Then there is another point we want to draw attention to. I have mentioned the question of sub-purchases—that is, of a person making one part and buying the material elsewhere. In Morley all the cotton warps, to make our woollen cloths, come outside of Morley; and, unfortunately, the people of Morley have to buy their warps sometimes in Lancashire and largely from Huddersfield, Sowerby and elsewhere. The prices paid for labour in cotton warp making are considerably lower in some parts of Brighouse and Elland, where the cotton warps are made, than they are elsewhere. In Huddersfield on the cotton warps they pay a standard wage for the labour, but it is less at Brighouse, and less at Elland, and less at North Deighton. We say that the cotton warps from the Yorkshire area—and there are only a few Yorkshire cotton mills—should be made at the current rate, and that every person who is making cloth ought to be responsible that he is buying from a firm where this principle of the rate current in the district applies. I have got to admit that there is a difficulty in carrying it out, except that the manufacturer who sells the goods to the War Office, the Admiralty, and to other Departments of the Government, should be responsible in the same proportion as the milk vendor is responsible for all things that take place before he distributes milk.

1295. (Chairman.) Would you ask him to do more than this—to be sure that his yarn is made under fair conditions and that the fair wage of the district was paid?—Not more than that; that would cover the point. For example, the Huddersfield man buys his warp and his weft at Bingley and Bradford. If that firm paid the rate of wages current in the warp trade in that trade area, that would quite meet my point.

1296. I thought you were going rather further than that, and were asking that a rate applicable to one kind of yarn in one place should apply to all yarns everywhere?—I do not know just what you mean by that.

1297. I thought you were claiming that the district for this purpose should be the larger area rather than the smaller one?—Yes, if the trade goes over that area. But there are certain specified districts for this business. For example, you do not buy any worsted wefts or any worsted yarn anywhere except in the Bradford area, as there is none made in Dewsbury or Batley or Morley or Leeds. Therefore, it does not need to go into that area for that section of goods, but whatever the area is, we think it should not be limited by an urban council's boundary. This is the chief point here. We want, if possible, that it should be laid down that the Trade Union rate of wages should be the current rate of wages, that is, we cannot conceive of anything but the Trade Union rate being the current rate of wages. That, of course, is a bigger subject, but I think it is covered by your terms of reference. The other point is whether it is fair business to put down the Trade Union rate as being the current rate.

1298. By the Trade Union rate, do you mean a rate that is agreed upon?—Yes.

1299. Or a rate that is demanded?—The rate that is agreed upon, where the employers' and the workmens' organisations have signed an agreement. But where the employers have not signed an agreement, and where the workmen have asked for an agreement and have been refused an agreement, and refused a conference or refused negotiations, we think even then that that should be the policy for the Government Departments to work upon.

1300. That they should go by the rate that is demanded, rather than by the rate that is paid?—That they should go by both. If there is an agreement between the employers and the employed, that is the rate that should apply to that trade or to that section of the trade. Where there is not an agreement, or where they have not been able to secure an agreement through a variety of causes, the Trade Union rate should be the current rate. That is going further, of course, than has been asked for before.

1301. The Trade Union rate in that sense meaning the rate demanded but not paid?—Exactly—the Trade Union standard, fixed by the Trade Union. We think from the point of view that never up till now, that I am aware of, have Trade Unions asked anything unreasonable, that if the employers will not help to fix the standard, the Trade Union organisation must fix one and that should be the current rate. If it has got to be a principle of fair wage that seems to me the point to establish. Then if there are disputes about what is the current rate of wages, we think that the present method of inquiry is, to some extent, cumbersome and to some extent not evasive but dilatory, and that to some extent probably it had better be done on the spot or in the district. We hope that it will be possible for this Committee, in its Report, to establish for a district—a wide district—a court of some character, composed say of one employer and of one workmen's representative, with the County Court Registrar or some other qualified person to sit there in times of dispute as to what is the current rate of wages. That is, if employers care to point out that they are losing contracts because a certain firm which are not paying the current rate of wages are getting them, or the working people's organisation think the same, they should be able to appeal to this court rather than have to appeal to the War Office or the Admiralty or the Department concerned, which has, of course, to take a lot of time, needfully, to go into this subject, which they do not know much about from the practical or detailed point of view. I do not mean to impugn the honour or honesty or conscientiousness of the persons who come down into the locality to inquire, but I think that the experts in the trade or in the districts, or in the areas, would do it much more satisfactorily and more completely.

1302. (Mr. Westcott.) Do you think the registrar of a county court would know much about it?—I think he would be there to hold the scale between the other two who do know.

1303. He would probably transfer it to some expert?—I only suggested that because they are accustomed to weigh evidence very carefully, and to take the pros and cons. The other two, the employer and the employee, would be experts in the trade area. That was the reason why I suggested it.

1304. He would not want very much expert knowledge then?—No; he would be there to hold the scales.

1305. Would not an official sent down from one of the departments be just as good a judge?—He would not be just as good a judge as the two people.

1306. But he could be the third man?—The matter of detail is for the first and second man that I am suggesting in this direction.

1307. (Mr. Black.) You would let the Registrar be an umpire in case of dispute?—Undoubtedly.

1308. Then he would be a very important person?—He would hold the balance between them, just as Lord James in the mining case yesterday—just the same.

1309. (Chairman.) Would you expect the contracting department to accept the decision of this tribunal?—Yes, and employers and workmen as well. I think that is bound to come some time, in so far that sanity and the public weal demand that these things should be dealt with more by conciliation than by the method of fighting. I think that is the chief point.

1310. You will remember that in this case it is a question of fact?—Exactly.

1311. The question is, what is the current rate in the district?—And who knows it better than the official workman and the official employer? Put it in this way—who knows better what is the fact than say Mr. Marsland for the cotton spinners in Lancashire, the employees, and Mr. Tattersall for the employers there. Nobody knows better than those two. There may be disputes between those two, and then it is a question of a third person drawing the inference what is the right course and what is the right position.

1312. (Mr. Wilson Fox.) Supposing they found there was no current rate in the district, or supposing a firm moved out of a district, would you leave it to them, the tribunal, to say what the current rate should be?—I think I should in this case. They would undoubtedly, I think, under my suggestion of taking the trade area, adjudicate upon what the trade area rate should be. Do I make it clear?

1313. Yes, I see what you mean; you mean to say, whether the particular district that factory had moved into was or was not in some particular trade area?—Yes.

1314. And if it was in that area, it would follow the rates of that particular area in which it was decided by the Registrar to be?—Yes. I will take a case which has occurred just now. Messrs. C., of Pudsey, who are Government contractors according to the list—I am taking that from the list we have had supplied—and Messrs. D., of Dewsbury, do exactly the same class of work in material and machinery and men. Messrs. C., of Pudsey, pay 1s. per pack of 28 stone weight; and Messrs. D. pay 1s. 4½d. for a 16-stone pack. Between 1s. for 28 stone and 1s. 4½d. for 16 stone there is a great deal of difference. That section of labour is absolutely alike both at the firm at Dewsbury and at the firm at Pudsey. We do not see why in that trade area if this work is 1s. 4½d. there, or anywhere about 1s. 4½d. there, that a uniform standard stone of 16 lbs. pack should not apply to Messrs. C. as well as to Messrs. D., even leaving alone the variation in price. The weight has been added to economise or to reduce the price, but we think that the same should apply to that trade area. It is exactly the same process, a similar class of material, and exactly the same kind of labour, and we think, therefore, that it should apply to that trade area.

1315. (Chairman.) Do you say that all the other conditions are the same, too?—Exactly.

1316. Including the cost of living and so forth?—Yes. I live, as I tell you, in a country village of 32,000—they call it a town, of course, and it is a town really—and my rates and rent are exactly the same; in fact, they are a shade dearer than they were in Leeds, and I lived in Leeds for two years; they are exactly as high as they are in Huddersfield, and Huddersfield has a population of 100,000, and Leeds has a population of 450,000. I do not pay a single penny less, neither in rent nor in rates, and the cost of provisions is probably as cheap in Leeds.

1317. (Mr. Westcott.) But you are just outside Leeds, are not you?—I am 7½ miles from Leeds.

1318. Then you have the expense of coming in to work?—Dewsbury and Batley are two separate manufacturing town areas with a population of 32,000, and a population of 100,000 in the surrounding urban district council areas. It is quite as expensive there as at Leeds.

1319. But you have 7½ miles to travel in order to get to work every day?—No; I work in Dewsbury and Batley; but the trade area is all the same, both there and at Morley and elsewhere.

1320. (Mr. De la Bère.) Is the material the same?—Yes, there is the same raw material market. The rag sales are held at Dewsbury, and the rag sales area covers Ossett, Morley, Leeds, the Colne Valley, the district at Birstall, and so on. The raw material markets are the same, and the sales are largely in Leeds cloth houses; and, of course, the export trade is the same all over.

1321. (Chairman.) Have you any more suggestions to make?—Only one, and that is this: For many years the Trade Union Congress have asked if it could not be arranged that sectional lists of contracts, giving the names of the contractors accepted by the Department, should be made public. At present we can go to the Admiralty and see on a schedule there who succeeded; up to recently that was not possible at the War Office, but that has been altered recently. We think that the "Board of Trade Journal" or the "Labour Gazette," when these contracts for blankets and rope, cloth, carpets, and so on, are let, should be made use of as Government publications in order to make the contracts known. The lists given to us are marked "Private and Confidential"—and quite right, too, from the point of view of those who are on the list of contractors. We want to know who has got the contracts, but it takes us two or three months under the present way of investigation, if we know who has got the contracts, to ascertain whether that firm which has got that contract is paying the right wages, and, therefore, the contract may be finished before we know. We think when the contracts are let, that in the ordinary course there ought to be some public print somewhere to go to. That, of course, is another suggestion in the same direction. Then we want as well that juvenile, or boys' labour and girls' labour, and women's work and men's work, as sometimes happens, shall also be taken into account when the current rate of wages is being considered. May I put it in this way? At the —— Mills just now they have 23s. for the willeying and for the fettling; they have 12 people in that department, 8 of them are getting the 23s., 4 of them are getting less because they are strong young men, and are being paid 16s., 19s., and 20s., respectively. Now it is a man's job absolutely all through the trade, and we think that would be a breach of the current rate of wages. They hold, of course, and they would hold it naturally, that they are young men, not adults, and that they are paying lads' wages for lads' labour; but it is men's labour in all mills in that section of the trade.

1322-3. What ages are they?—They will be anywhere up to 20—18, 19, and 20. They are legally able to work overtime, of course. We want it to apply, if possible, to that section.

1324. (Mr. De la Bère.) Whose mills are they?—Messrs. A.'s. Then there is another case at Farsley, and another case at Luddendenfoot, where the same exactly applies. The firm at Farsley are in the blanket trade, but the wages there are considerably less than the blanket trade wages are at Dewsbury, which is the centre of the trade, and we think the centre of the trade should govern the rate of wages. I admit that there may be some difficulties in that direction, but these two experts, one on each side, would be able to understand it possibly better than any gentleman from London could do who was not conversant with both the areas and the trade.

1325. (Mr. Wilson Fox.) The question he would have to decide there would not be whether it was a fair rate for lads, but whether it was a custom in the district to employ lads on that particular work?—Yes, he would.

1326. Your point is that it is not the custom of the trade to employ lads on that particular work?—Yes.

1327. It is not a question whether it is a fair rate for lads if they are permitted to be employed?—No. He would have to inquire into the question whether it was a lad's job or not.

1328. I thought that was your point?—And he would have to inquire whether the price for that labour was not, say, 22s. or 23s., and therefore whoever was working at the place shoud not have less than that.

1329. Is not your point really whether lads ought to be employed upon that; because you do not contest the fact that lads can do the work?—My point would rather be whoever does the work should be paid the standard wages.

1330. That is much the same thing as saying that only men shall be employed on that work?—Probably it would work out that way, because they would not employ lads then. But I must stick to that point that the price is so much—that whatever the labour is that they get, there must be so much paid.

1331. (Chairman.) Have you anything more to suggest?—There is a question when there is no specified standard in some district, and again there is no standard sometimes where there is no good organisation. But there may be an unconscious standard for some sections of employment, and in this case again this section of two would be qualified persons to advise the Government departments as to what was the rate that should be current in that trade. I think that, roughly speaking, these are the points we want to lay before you—that Saturday afternoon and Sunday labour ought to count in the question, and that there are 58½ hours as against 55½. Then we want matters made public as to who gets the contracts, and then we want the area not to be the Urban District Council area, but the trade area. Roughly speaking, that is all.

1332. (Mr. De la Bère.) You mention willeyers and fettlers, do they not come in at a rather early stage?—Yes, they come in in the preparatory stages.

1333. Would they come in in the making-up of the cloth, or rather in the handling of the raw material?—Yes.

1334. Then they would be covered, I suppose, under your proposal for that warranty?—No; in so far as this preparatory stage in the cloth trade is all done at the mill where the cloth is made in the case of the woollen cloths.

1335. In all such cases?—In all cases for the woollen cloths, but not for the worsted cloths.

1336. I think, perhaps, it fair to tell you, that the Eccleshill case has been enquired into by the War Department, and on the information before them, they do not see that there is any ground for their intervention. I thought I ought to tell you that, because you might like to say something on it?—In that case, we think the Government is absolutely wrong. The trade area for that section is certainly the cloth trade. Eccleshill happens to be in the City of Bradford, and this mill happens to be just in the City of Bradford, but the Bradford trade is the worsted stuff trade which is absolutely different from the ordinary woollen cloth that persons wear. At Eccleshill they make woollen cloths just as they do in Leeds, and in the Colne Valley and Holme Valley, and they are paying less wages at Messrs. B.'s by two or three shillings per week than the Leeds men get for that work that you have been enquiring into. Therefore, although it may be the current rate in that small area of Eccleshill, which covers five or six miles, in the larger area of Leeds, which is the governing area for the woollen trade, it is two or three shillings a week higher wages. We think in that case there is clear evidence that the principle of fair contracts is limited by the geographical area.

1337. You think there is something in the contention that such places as Apperley Bridge, Thackley, Idle, and Eccleshill, do form a district of some sort?—It is the Leeds district, absolutely.

1338. Is the work done at Eccleshill the same as that done in Leeds? Is it not rather a finer class of work, and easier to handle?—Not a little bit. At Yeadon, Apperley Bridge, Guiseley, Bramley, Leeds, Pudsey, Farsley, Calverley—they are all absolutely alike.

1339. You would not admit that the Leeds work, speaking generally, was of a coarser and rougher description than that done at Eccleshill then?—No.

1340. On the whole, you would not say the Eccleshill people had a better time of it than a man working in the mills at Leeds—apart from wages, and speaking simply as far as the work goes?—No. I would rather work at Leeds than at Eccleshill in the sections of the trade you have been enquiring into—absolutely.

1341. I thought it was only fair to mention that, as I noticed you passed over Eccleshill because you said it was under consideration?—Thank you.

1342. The consideration has been concluded, and at present we find a difficulty in intervening?—I am absolutely convinced that supposing Mr. D., of Dewsbury, or —— of Bramley, or some expert manufacturer, and some ordinary Trade Union official, had been meeting together on that business, they would have ruled that that was in the cloth trade area, that it was governed by those wages, and that the Department, being so far away, probably would not realise it in the same degree.

1343. Of course, there are many other mills besides this one of B.'s, with much the same rates, and much the same hours, in the neighbourhood?—Yes.

1344. Would you regard them all as coming within the same area?—They are absolutely below the Leeds rate, and they should not be, but some of them are higher than B.'s—two of them, at any rate, are higher than B.'s.

1345. I know that?—Out of seven mills, two are higher than B.'s, and the Department has not taken the highest rate as the current rate.

1346. But are they not paying much the same for the willeyers and fettlers?—There are two other firms in the Eccleshill district, confining that to the district—say, who are paying more wages in that department than B.'s. That has been inquired into.

1347. I saw Mr. Gee upon this, and I understand E. is one?—I think that is the name.

1348. E. pays apparently in one class more and in another class a little less?—Yes. He pays 2s. a week more; that is a detail, but it is there.

1349. (Mr. Wilson Fox.) I understand the cost of living in these districts which you suggest should be formed is somewhere about the same?—There is not a shilling difference, taking it all through Yorkshire.

1350. You raised a question with the Chairman about the hours, as you thought the Fair Wages Clause should include the hours; have you laid down any number of hours a week which you think should be worked?—The Factory Act hours. It has been supposed to be that when the hours under the Factory Acts were brought down from 60 to 56½ and then to 55½, they should apply to the trade, and they do, I should say, to 80 per cent. of the trade in Yorkshire.

1351. But you complain that the hours are not uniform in all the mills?—I complain that some of the contractors are not working the hours that are recognised in general.

1352. Have you laid down what the hours should be?—Yes, the Factory hours.

1353. Have you tried to enforce that against these firms?—Not against these firms, but we have tried to make it 55½ hours. With a good 80 per cent. of them, it is 55½.

1354. About the publication of these contracts, which you suggest should be published in the "Board of Trade Labour Gazette"; do you know that that paper is only a monthly publication?—Yes.

1355. And, therefore, you might have to wait a month for your information?—Yes.

1356. What are the precise things that you want published? Do you want more than the names of the successful contractors?—That is all.

1357. You do not want the price?—No.

1358. And you do not want the details of the contract?—No; just the name of the firm who has got the contract.

1359. You simply want to be put on their track?—We want to know who has got the contract.

1360. These particular contracts?—Any contracts in the sections concerned

1361. They would make a longish list, would they not?—Yes, they would.

1362. If you take the clothing trades and take some of the small contracts there, that would be a very long list, would it not?—Yes.

1363. The "Board of Trade Labour Gazette" would be more than doubled every month, would it not?—It would be more useful.

1364. On that particular point, you mean?—Yes.

1365. It would be a very long list if you were to take in the contracts for building a battleship alone?—I do not think the Government Departments should hesitate to use the public funds wisely in that direction.

1366. I do not know, speaking as having edited the "Board of Trade Journal" and the "Labour Gazette" for some years now, whether all the useful information we publish would not be swamped by your lists?—You give an index which comes out in twelve months' time, when it is not of very great importance, except to a few. I do not see why you should not put the index in once a quarter.

1367. I was hoping you might suggest some other document instead of the "Board of Trade Labour Gazette"; that is all?—There is another method which could be applied. The Departments could send to the Trades Union Congress Office a list of the contractors, and that office could send out to the various districts concerned a knowledge of who the contractors were. I think, after all, the public is entitled to know more than it does.

1368. It would be much more useful to you if you did that sort of thing yourselves, because you would put it in your monthly reports?—Yes.

1369. (Mr. Westcott.) And you would get the information much more quickly, too?—Yes.

1370. (Mr. Wilson Fox.) Each trade would put it in its monthly reports?—Yes.

1371. Your Union, for instance, would not want the iron and steel contracts, but you would only take those that affect it?—Exactly; I think it is feasible, and I know it would be useful.

1372. (Mr. De la Bère.) You recognise, I suppose, that possibly the employers might object to the publication, quite apart from any question of wages or labour; there might be other reasons which would lead them to object to the names of successful contractors being made public?—I cannot see that any contractor for public work can object to its being made known. May I put it in this way? Take ordinary town councils and bodies of that character; the names of their successful contractors are made public, and the persons who supply them with cloth, with boots, with flour, and so forth, have their names specified. I do not see why that should not apply here, nor how it would hinder them at all in any trade matters. I think most of them are rather proud to be Government contractors than otherwise.

1373. They are proud to be contractors, but I do not know that they all wish it to be known that they have a contract at a particular time, or have been successful in obtaining a contract?—I cannot find a reason why they should not be, and if they are going to have public money, I think there is no reason why it should not be made public.

1374. (Mr. Black.) Perhaps that depends a little bit on the trade; it may not apply very much in your textiles, because it is all the same style of manufacture, is it not?—Yes.

1375. But there are some cases where the contractor may say he has spent years in finding out just how to do the Government work?—Yes, that may be so.

1376. He does not want all that experience to be given away by letting other people know he has succeeded in getting a contract?—I think there is very little secrecy comes in.

1377. Is that so in your experience?—I should not think there is, in general. There may be an occasional case, but I cannot see it, in general.

1378. The Government purchases cover a very wide circle?—They do.

1379. There are some specialities, where one firm has laid itself out to get certain results, and they do not want their workmen enticed away perhaps, and all that kind of thing?—I do not see where the secrecy comes in.

1380. I do not think it comes in in the textile trades?—No, it does not.

1381. In regard to the local court that you advocate, would the employer and the employee be always the same persons?—That would be a matter which, I think, could be detailed out later on, if the principle of the thing was there. Just as the Wages Board, it is supposed, will be brought about in a few years' time if certain legislation goes on, so this would be a matter of detail to be arranged by the Government Departments as a whole.

1382. But that employer would have to be ruled out from holding Government contracts, would he not—for the time being, at any rate?—I should imagine that would have to follow.

1383. Would it not create a certain amount of trade jealousy, unless the thing were perhaps recognised by Act of Parliament, or something like that?—I think in certain areas there are specific persons who stand head and shoulders above suspicion, with whom it would not be impossible to arrange.

1384. Still, they might be Government contractors?—They possibly might, but in these days of limited companies even that would not affect it.

1385. Still, I think the employer might be accused of bias, might he not?—It would have a neutralising effect if there was any bias, but I am certain there are public men on both sides free from bias.

1386. What is the general condition of your workers in the West Riding; I mean, apart from these little inequalities of hours and wages, is there any real sweating?—There is not a great deal of sweating. There are some inequalities as regards wages which I should call sweating from the humane standard, I will say, where you find young women of 20 having 9s. 6d. or 10s. 6d. a week in the worsted department. To my mind that is sweating, but according to the standard of how they live, it is not the sort of sweating that we read about in the shirt-making trade, and so forth.

1387. Do you speak in any way for the women?—Yes: we have both men and women in our organisation.

1388. On that question of paying fair wages for the yarn, I suppose it would be very difficult sometimes to get back to the date when the yarn was made; would it?—I should not imagine that it would be impossible. Supposing I am going to make a hundred pieces to-morrow, and I order my yarn three months beforehand, all things are now so well tabulated and kept, both in the office where the order is given and in the place where the order is done, by a good system of bookkeeping, and tickets—you have got to give tickets out for the rates of wages according to the Particulars Clause, if it is piece-work, and your books are there as regards the wages—this is all so well done that I do not think it is impossible. When there is some bad yarn that they dispute, they can always find the record.

1389. I was thinking of something like this—when the Government contract for the cloth comes into operation, the yarn might have been made 6 or 12 months earlier perhaps?—It might.

1390. All those wages are paid, and it would be rather difficult to get back upon them?—I agree with you.

1391. That is one of the difficulties you had in mind, I think?—Yes. Then, of course, the contracting firm would not be responsible for what was done in that direction, but it would be responsible that in the future it saw that the goods it did buy were only bought from fair firms.

1392. You would have to condone all the past?—You could not stop a man from being hanged when he was hanged, could you.

1393. Some of these rules about the hours of work and wages are pretty old established customs, I take it, because many of the Yorkshire firms go back 60, 70 and even 100 years?—Yes.

1394. And some of these customs have been running more or less all that time?—Yes. They dropped down in the old times to 60 hours' work, that is, till two o'clock on Saturday afternoon; then public opinion got them down to 58½; but in place of public opinion having got them all down to 55½ under the new Factory Acts, a number of them, 20 per cent. or more, are still at the 58½ in place of the 55½.

1395. Your little local tribunal would stir up a sort of hornets' nest about its ears sometimes?—It would be quite a god-send.

1396. Still you recognise it would do that?—Exactly.

1397. (Mr. Westcott.) Is there much Saturday afternoon and Sunday labour in the district?—In the Bradford wool-combing sheds there is some little bit, but not much, and in the Colne Valley and Dewsbury there is a bit.

1398. It is not very general, in fact?—No.

1399. I suppose there is an overtime rate when they work on Sunday, and they get a higher rate of pay?—No.

1400. Not at all?—Only in very exceptional firms.

1401. I should think employers must bring great pressure to bear on their people to work on Saturdays and Sundays, if there is no inducement in the shape of extra wages?—We have unfortunately this system, and considerably more men wanting work in busy times than there is work to give them.

1402. Then they are not necessarily the same men who work on Friday and Saturday morning and Sunday?—Yes, they are the same.

1403. I should have thought it was much better to take on another shift?—That means more capital charges for the machinery at the mills.

1404. Do they willingly work on Sundays and Saturdays?—People have got to be willing to work nowadays if they want a living.

1405. It is not forced on the workmen, is it?—Only by circumstances.

1406. As to this Fair Wage Clause, you do not think, as it stands, that it is quite satisfactory?—This Eccleshill case proves it not to be so.

1407. I take it that you want to put in conditions as well as wages?—Yes.

1408. Conditions of employment?—General conditions.

1409. It seems that the conditions are identical all over the district?—Taking the same class of trade, the conditions of labour and the method of labour are exactly alike.

1410. I mean the conditions as to hours?—They vary.

1411. Then you must get some standard before we could specify any?—The standard is 55½—that is the general standard throughout.

1412. Then if a Government Department included the conditions in their clause, it would mean 55½ hours?—Yes.

1413. There would be no question about that?—There would not be a single doubt about it, because the bulk of them are 55½. Lancashire is never in doubt at all about the 55½.

1414. Have you come across any cases where employers have refused to give an agreement, or even to discuss an agreement, as to wages?—Yes.

1415. A thing of that sort is very rare, is it not?—About three weeks ago a firm refused to discuss the matter of wages with us, and then they settled and gave us a slight advance, because we threatened that if they did not we would report that they were Government contractors; so they gave the advance, but at first they would not negotiate.

1416. It was a case of take this or nothing?—Yes. At these very mills of Messrs. A.'s, we have been writing to them, it must be for a month now, trying to negotiate with them.

1417. But that is quite an exceptional case?—They are exceptional, no doubt. More common-sense prevails.

1418. If you had a clause like this—The wages shall be such as are current in the district and accepted by employers and workmen—there would not be much difficulty in carrying it out, I take it?—Exactly.

1419. And then if a firm would not agree with their workmen, it might be regarded as an unfair firm at once; that would be a sufficient reason?—Yes.

1420. I do not see the actual necessity for "Trade Union rate"?—We do; but then, of course, we are Trade Union officials.

1421. (Mr. King.) Have you any members at Eccleshill?—We have.

1422. Then how is it you cannot get your rates accepted there?—Because in this particular firm we have only half-and-half, so we could not get them to do it.

1423. Are the other firms paying the Trade Union rate?—We have risen the standard within this last six months there.

1424. Are all the firms at Eccleshill except this one paying the Trade Union rate?—These are paying the lowest rates.

1425. Have you ever raised that question with the employers that the area ought to be larger?—May I just say that these particular Government contractors have refused to negotiate with us. I think in that direction that the Department ought to insist upon a recognition of the Trade Union, as Mr. Lloyd-George did at the Board of Trade recently.

1426. If at Eccleshill everyone but this firm is paying your Union rate, that rate is the current rate?—Yes.

1426*a*. (Mr. De la Bère.) I do not think you have contended that?—I do.

1427. I mean that the other firms are paying the Trade Union rate?—Yes, I do; and that this firm is paying lower.

1428. Your contention is that this firm is paying rather lower than the others, but I understood you to say just now that your contention was that they should pay the Leeds rate?—I am taking your word "current rate," and this firm is paying lower than that.

1429. Do you contend that they are paying lower than the Bradford rates?—They are paying lower than the Eccleshill rates; B.'s are lower than that district rate itself.

1430. (Mr. King.) What is your Eccleshill recognised rate?—24s.

1431. What are these people paying?—21s. to 23s.

1432. (Mr. De la Bère.) For which class of labour?—For the willeyers and the fettlers.

1433. Are they paying both the same?—Yes.

1434. (Mr. King.) Is every firm but these you object to paying that?—Yes.

1435. The other question I was asking was whether you had ever tried to get the employers to accept your larger areas?—This very firm will not negotiate, so we cannot do anything in that sense.

1436. Is it the only one in the place?—May I just say that the employers in the Huddersfield district—and that includes Huddersfield, the Colne Valley and the Holme Valley—and ourselves have signed a printed agreement as regards the rates of wages for this class of trade.

1437. All over the area?—All over those three districts, Colne Valley, Holme Valley, and Huddersfield; but this firm of A.'s did not do it.

1438. They are not paying the current rate, but all the other firms have accepted it?—Exactly; I know they are not.

1439. About your Leeds rate, is that accepted over a large area?—It is accepted by everyone of the employers in Leeds City, which is a big one.

1440. I am not referring to Leeds City, I am referring to the area you want to bring into Leeds?—No; it is not the county rate yet. That is what we are trying to make it, of course.

1441. You want the Government to help to get the employers to accept your terms?—To give us fair wages, yes.

1442. (Mr. Wilson Fox.) In your industry the distinction between men's and women's work is pretty clearly drawn?—Yes.

1443. So you have no questions as to the encroachments of women upon men's work in the industry?—No.

The witness withdrew.

Mr. John Taylor called and examined.

1444. (Chairman.) You are the Secretary of the Anvil and Vice Trades Association, Dudley?—Yes.

1445. Is that a local society?—No.

1446. Does it extend all over the country?—The trade extends to Birmingham and right on to Sheffield.

1447. It covers the Midland Counties then?—Sheffield is as far as it extends.

1448. What have you to say about the Fair Wages Resolution?—So far as the Fair Wages Resolution is concerned, we have found just recently, in connection with the India Office contracts, that the Fair Wages Resolution does not help us at all. A contract at the latter end of last year has been placed with a firm at Sheffield which it is known to the whole of the Departments, including the Admiralty and the War Office, do not pay the Trade Union rate.

1449. What exactly do you mean by the Trade Union rate?—This list which we have published (handing in same), and which the Departments have been supplied with. The whole of the employers in the industry pay that rate, except this one firm at Sheffield.

1450. How many employers are there?—There are about 12 or 14 in the anvil and vice department.

1451. Where are the works situated of the 12 or 14 employers who have accepted your list?—Dudley, Birmingham, and some at Sheffield.

1452. There are some at Sheffield?—Yes.

1453. (Mr. De la Bère.) Are Messrs. A. manufacturers, that is, do they actually make anvils?—They make vices, but they buy anvils.

1454. (Chairman.) Your complaint is against a Sheffield firm, is it?—Against Messrs. B.

1455. Is it against all the Sheffield firms?—No, Messrs. A. pay that rate for vices.

1456. And who is it that does not?—Messrs. B. The whole of the firms throughout the trade may pay that rate: there is no dispute about it, and there never has been any dispute.

1457. Except with this one firm?—Except from this one particular firm. I may say that so far as this particular firm at Sheffield is concerned, as a rule the men that are finished up at our factories migrate down to Sheffield, because their quality of work has fallen off. That generally is the rule.

1458. Did you complain that the current rate was not being paid?—Yes, we complained, and I have got the notes in respect of the inquiry that was held in the India Office.

1459. What was the answer of the firm or of the India Office?—The India Office say they ought to be allowed to buy in the cheapest market.

1460. But it is a question of wages, I understand?—Exactly; but they say they ought not to be restricted from buying in the cheapest market.

1461-2. (Mr. Westcott.) They buy a manufactured article, I suppose, and they contend that they can go to the cheapest market?—Yes.

1463. (Chairman.) Perhaps you will tell us the story?—There was an inquiry held at the India Office on October 7, Mr. Butler, the Deputy Director-General of Stores, being in the chair. In reply to the questions that we put to him, the Deputy Director-General of Stores suggested to us that his duty to the Secretary of State was to purchase suitable articles at the lowest price. Our contention is that as there is a recognised rate for these special anvils, which the list shows, they ought to pay the rate if they are going to have these Government contracts.

1464. I do not quite understand the case; are they buying anvils ready-made?—No, they make them at Sheffield at this firm, but they do not pay the rate, and our contention is that they ought not to be allowed to have Government contracts when they do not pay the rate, especially when every other employer in the trade is paying it.

1465. What is their defence?—The defence of the firm I have not heard.

1466. What is the answer that you got from the India Office, then?—What I have just read to you.

1467. They said that they bought in the cheapest market?—Yes.

1468. Did they say that they did not think that the Fair Wages Clause applied to them?—They said they did not think they ought to be called upon to interfere with them.

1469. Is the Fair Wages Clause included in this contract?—Yes. I may say in connection with this matter, that I brought a complaint about their subletting this work. There is a part of the work which they could not make, and they had to send part of that work into Staffordshire, because their men were not equal to making that work. They had to pay 2s. per cwt. more in order to get this work made in Staffordshire at a firm of the name of Messrs. C.

1470. (Mr. Wilson Fox.) Is that because the firm of Messrs. C. were paying the proper rate, or what you call the proper rate?—No; they did not know that it was Government work.

1471. (Mr. De la Bère.) Is more paid on Government work?—Yes; 1s. per cwt. extra.

1472. (Mr. Wilson Fox.) That is according to the rule?—Yes.

1473. And that is in your list?—Yes.

1474. (Chairman.) This does not seem to be a case which affects the general principle of the Fair Wages Clause; it is a case of the application of it?—It affects it thus far, that if a firm who pays the lowest rate of wages is allowed to take contracts, then it is going to affect the whole of the trade. One of the employers who was present at this inquiry told Mr. Butler that if this was allowed to take place at Sheffield, there was no alternative for them but to enforce a reduction in wages in our districts.

1475. What alteration in the Fair Wages Clause would you suggest to avoid this particular difficulty?—That they should pay the recognised rate of wages amongst the trade wherever the contracts are placed.

1476. That is in the Resolution now, is it not?—But it does not apply here.

1477. Why does it not apply?—For the simple reason that they do not pay the rate, and they get the orders. I understood from Mr. Butler that there was an order placed by the Admiralty there.

1478. What alteration in the wording of the Clause in the contracts would you suggest to get round this difficulty?—I suggest that a clause should be put in that they should pay the Trade Union rate of wages.

1479. Does that mean the Trade Union rate generally accepted?—The Trade Union rate applying to the particular trade where the order was given.

1480. In what way would that help you in this case?—If they paid the Trade Union rate it would carry out the list.

1481. The Trade Union rate is the current rate, I understand?—The Trade Union rate is the current rate. It could not apply if you say "the current rate"—because then you would only take one firm at Sheffield.

1482. But there is more than one firm at Sheffield, surely?—Not making anvils.

1483. I understood from you there were two or three?—No; the other firm make vices. One firm makes anvils and the other makes vices.

1484. Then it is a case of one firm making a current rate for itself; is that it?—That is so; and our contention is that one firm ought not to be allowed to make the current rate of wages for a district.

1485. Have you any other criticism on the Clause?—No; I think that is about the extent of the criticism, so far as we are concerned.

1486. Your point is that where there is only one firm in a district, the rate paid by that firm ought not to be called the current rate?—Our contention is this: that where you have a trades organisation, there is a list which governs the majority of the trade, and the others do not conform to it, when they have Government contracts should be compelled to carry that list out and pay the Trade Union rate.

1487. But this is a case where you have only got one firm?—Exactly, and we say they ought to pay it. The only way to enforce that is to have a rate of wages that applies to the trade and not to the district.

1488. Do you mean that you would have a uniform rate all over the country?—I should have a uniform rate. There is practically a uniform rate all over the country in our trade, except in the case of this particular firm, and we say they ought not to be allowed to escape.

1489. And wherever they went, you say they ought to pay the same wages?—Exactly.

1490. Then you would not recognise any difference in the circumstances of one place, as compared with the circumstances of another, as justifying a variation in the wages?—In what way?

1491. You would not admit that the circumstances of one place can differ so much from those of another as to justify a lower rate?—If that was to apply here, the Sheffield rate of wages would be higher than it would be in my district because the rents are higher, the cost of living is higher, and the rates for the ordinary engineer, for the bricklayer, and for the carpenter, are higher than what they are in Dudley or Stourbridge.

1492. Leaving Sheffield out of the question for the moment, and supposing there was some other place where those conditions were not as you describe they are at Sheffield. Supposing the rents were lower, other wages were lower, and so on—would you still say that this uniform rate ought to be paid?—Yes.

1493. Why?—Because the conditions of work are exactly the same. There can be no difference in the making of an anvil.

1494. But there may be a good deal of difference in the conditions under which the workman lives?—Then my opinion is that the workman ought to get the benefit of that difference, if such exists; but we do not see the necessity of bringing about a lower rate of wages simply because the rents may be a little less than what they are in other districts.

1495. Is not rent one of the items that go to affect the rate of wage?—We have never taken that into account. We have never had that difficulty to face, of course.

1496. Because you have never had occasion for it?—I say we have never had that difficulty to face.

1497. You have never had a works removed to a very much cheaper district?—We have never had it to face.

1498. But if such a thing did happen, would you still think that the same rate ought to apply all round?—Yes.

1499. (Mr. De la Bère.) Why, if I might ask you, is there an extra rate for Government anvils?—Because of the difficulty in making a Government anvil over the ordinary anvil. According to the specifications that are sent out, they are very different altogether from what they are in the case of an ordinary anvil. I have the specifications for anvils here. The Admiralty have just sent out an order for some 5 cwt. anvils and some vices. I have made pattern anvils for the Admiralty, and it was at my recommendation that they altered the patterns some 20 years ago. I do not know whether Mr. Black will remember that or not.

1500. The extra price is as much as £1 a ton?—If I made an ordinary anvil, I could make a ton of ordinary work very much quicker than I could make a ton of the Government pattern.

1501. Is it a better anvil than the anvil in the trade?—You have so very much difficulty with the Government anvil. Every little thing you have got to deal with—every little detail, such as measurement, and so on, has got to be attended to. The majority of men would refuse to make Government work, and there are only few in the trade that will make Government anvils.

1502. Did I understand you to say that you assisted in the introduction of the Admiralty patterns?—They used to have what we call the regular pattern of anvil. It used to be built from a butt, and they used to have bitt-irons tumbling off or the angle-ends. At that particular time I came up to inspect the patterns they had at the offices, and I found that they were sending out the common anvils and putting common iron and common steel into the anvil. I recommended them to adopt the patent anvil that is made in two pieces, so that the bitt-ends could not be broken off. Then it is made from better quality iron, as it is all made from scrap iron, whereas the ordinary anvils are made from common iron—puddling-furnace stuff.

1503. In your opinion, is it really worth that extra £1 per ton; is there really that amount of extra work put in?—It is worth a great deal more. I have written to the Admiralty many and many a time respecting the allowance that is made for weight. Our men when they have a Government anvil to make, have got to keep it within 5 per cent., and they have got to keep cutting it to pieces, because they make the iron in the forge, top and bottom, and sometimes they will make it 30 to 40 lbs. heavier than is really required, and the man then has to cut it all to pieces on purpose to keep it down to the 5 per cent. He loses double the time in cutting it down that it would take him to make an ordinary anvil.

1504. (Mr. Wilson Fox.) I do not quite catch what you said about your men migrating to Sheffield; I think you said something about the quality of the work falling off?—I referred to the quality of the workmen and the workmanship.

1505. Did you mean by that, that the rather inferior men migrate to Sheffield?—Yes; there is not one of the men down there that could come and work at our place.

1506. Is not the reason of this firm at Sheffield paying lower wages that they have not got such good men?—But that is no justification.

1507. I am only looking at it from their point of view. I put it that perhaps that may be their excuse for paying a lower rate of wages; on your own showing they get a worse class of man?—But the demand of the Government for quality of work is such that only our best men can make them, and if the worst work is accepted for Government work, that makes it a very difficult matter to deal with.

1508. I am not at all upon the point whether the firm should be employed or not; I only want to get quite clearly from you that it is a fact that a worse quality of men are to be found at Sheffield than in your district?—And that that is the reason why they pay a lower rate?

1509. I do not know whether that follows, but, at any rate, it is a fact that they do pay a lower rate, and it is a fact that the men are not such good men at Sheffield as elsewhere?—That is quite true. I do not want to shield anything; I want to tell you the exact fact.

1510. (Chairman.) Do you still think that the inferior workman ought to be paid as much as the others?—So long as it is Government work.

1511. But not on other work?—That is a matter which we can hardly regulate. I should not like to see the old men refused so far as ordinary work is concerned; I think they ought to be allowed to work, and I do not object to that, because otherwise they must be thrown on the streets or something else.

1512. But you still think they ought to be paid as much as the better class of workmen elsewhere?—If they have Government work.

1513. Why do you limit that to Government work?—If it is good for Government work, I suppose it is good for all other work?—Our experience so far as Government work is concerned—and I had had a long experience of making Government work for the various Departments before I took up this work—is that the best workmen have got the greatest difficulty in satisfying the Departments and the inspector, and if the inferior work is accepted, it is only in consequence of its being at a lower rate of wages.

1514. He might take longer over it, and yet produce an equally good result at the end, perhaps?—That would be absolutely impossible.

1515. (Mr. Black.) Is there not some real difference between the methods at Messrs. B.'s and the methods in the Dudley district?—No.

1516. Are you quite sure?—Absolutely.

1517. I have been told on very good authority that this question is only one of method—that they use the steam-hammer at Messrs. B.'s for putting the two pieces, top and bottom, together; and that they also use the steam-hammer and moulds for working the top into shape; whereas in your Dudley district it is all done by hammer and by manual labour?—No.

1518. Practically so; there is one firm I know that adopts a somewhat different method?—No.

1519. Is it not the fact that in Sheffield owing to the introduction of the steam-hammer and other methods—the moulds and so forth—they are able to do this work with a smaller number of men than in the Dudley district; and is that not the reason why the Sheffield firm gets the orders?—No. Before ever Sheffield knew anything at all about making this patent anvil it was made in our district. I have worked at Sheffield—at Messrs. B.'s, myself, and made these anvils; and my father worked there years and years ago, long before Messrs. B. had it. They only introduced the steam-hammer years after we had the steam-hammer in our district. Nobody had the steam-hammer for the patent anvil except Peter Wright's for years, and it was only when their patent ran out that Messrs. B. were allowed to make the patent anvil.

1521. Other firms in the Dudley district now are not making the anvils, are they, as the Sheffield firm makes them?—Some of them, no.

1522. Are you not working five men in a team in your Dudley district, and there are only three men at Messrs. B.'s?—They do not work with five, they work with four men in the Dudley district, and they work with four men at Sheffield where they are making the Government work now.

1523. To put it another way, this is a piece-work question with you, is it not?—Yes.

1524. What are the average earnings of smiths, we will say, in the Dudley district per week on this anvil work, and what are the average earnings at Messrs. B.'s?—I should think the people in our district will get at least £6 a week more than they will get there—I mean the set.

1525. What do you mean by the set?—The four.

1526. The four men in the other district will earn £6 a week less?—Yes; quite.

1527. What is about the fair wage for a smith on heavy smith's work in the Dudley district per week?—Those that make this particular work would get anything from £14 to £18 a week the set.

1528. Those four men will earn that?—If they work the whole week, they would earn £16 or £18.

1529. Taking one week with another, what do you suppose one man earns? You say it is an average of £14 the set; can we get it down to one individual?—The wages are divided up. The foreman gets 5s. 4d., the second fireman gets 4s. 10d., the two hammermen get 4s. 7d. each, out of the £1, and then there is the boy who gets 6d.

1530. (Mr. King.) The boy does not get very much?—This is the boy who pushes the anvil out of the fire. These rates have been fixed for more than 200 years, and they have always been in operation in the division of the money, and the boy knows, when the money is taken out of the office, what his amount is as well as the man himself does.

1531. (Mr. Black.) Without going into details quite in that way, can you say roughly what a smith on anvil work will earn per week in the Dudley district, and what he might earn at Messrs. B.'s?—Shall I take the foreman?

1532. Take anyone?—The foreman in Dudley and the district would get £4 10s. per week, and the man down at Sheffield would not earn more than £2 10s.

1533. Supposing it is the case that the steam-hammer and moulds, and so on, are used in Messrs. B.'s, and that there is a good deal of work being done there by machine?—The steam-hammer was used in our district long before it was ever thought about there, and there is no difference in the rate of wages, and there never has been.

1534. There must have been?—You will excuse me, there was not.

1535. I can only say that my information, which is derived from an independent source, differs entirely from yours both on account of the labour, and as to the method of work in Messrs. B.'s and in the Dudley district?—I will stake my existence on what I say to be true—I will do that. I have not come here to make inaccurate statements; I hope my position proves that.

1536. How do you think the wages earned by Messrs. B.'s smiths on anvil work compare with the wages earned by other smiths on heavy smith's work in Sheffield. You say they earn about 50s. a week at Messrs. B.'s?—Are you referring now to smiths in other trades?

1537. You said Messrs. B.'s foreman would earn about 50s. on anvil work, I ask what would a smith on heavy smith's work in other kinds of works in Sheffield get?—I have nothing at all to do with them, and I could not say.

1538. Is not that a point in the matter?—No.

1539. Surely that comes into the district rate of wages?—No; we have nothing to do with people outside, such as an ordinary smith who makes a hammer or a tool or anything of that sort.

1540. I meant heavier work than that?—We never have anything to do with the regulation of their wages.

1541. (Mr. Westcott.) You are an industry to yourselves, separate from any other smiths' work?—Ours is a separate thing altogether and there is no comparison, if you believe me, between the smiths who make heavy work and the anvil makers. There is no work in the world, I think, that is so hard as anvil making.

1542. (Mr. Black.) But if the heavy work is taken off the shoulders of the workmen by the steam hammer and the mould, that seems to me to make a very great difference?—It is not taken off.

1543. That is where we differ?—Mine is practical experience. I have made anvils under the hammer, and I have made anvils without the hammer. The only difference is you knock the two pieces together to weld them like that (illustrating), whereas the men get the big hammers and strike on the face of it, and the steam hammer goes to work so in welding them together (illustrating). That is the only difference.

1544. Do you mean that the steam hammer does that in Sheffield?—In Dudley.

1545. In all the firms in Dudley?—No, I did not say that; I said at Peter Wright's.

1546. At one firm and one firm only?—That is the original firm, and there has never been any difference in the rate of wages, and that was never thought of.

1547. What about the moulding of the top; is that not done differently at Messrs. B.'s?—No, it is impossible. They must be made in dies before they can form the shape of the throat.

1548. Are they made in dies right throughout your district?—They are obliged to be, otherwise they would not get the shape of the throat. They have got dies made on purpose to put them in, and unless dies are made they cannot get the throat formed.

1549. You do a good deal more in drawing that out by the hammer I think in the Dudley district, as compared with what Messrs. B. do?—Messrs. B. do not do one quarter of the work under the hammer to make the top and bottom that Peter Wright's do.

1550. Do you mean under the steam hammer?—Yes, and Peter Wright's have got three steam hammers to Messrs. B.'s one.

1551. But you confine it to one firm in the Dudley district?—You have only got one firm there.

1552. Only Peter Wright, you mean?—I mean you have only got one firm at Sheffield.

1553. But you have got more than one firm in Dudley?—We have got three firms in Dudley.

1554. (Mr. Westcott.) I suppose your industry is a comparatively small one really, and it does not comprise many firms altogether?—No; about 12 or 14.

1555. And it is in a comparatively restricted area?—That is so.

1556. Your contention is that the rates of wages and the conditions of working should be the same all round?—Exactly.

1557. Irrespective of the geographical position of one place and another?—That is so.

The witness withdrew.

FIFTH DAY.

Thursday, December 19th, 1907.

At 32, Great George Street, Westminster, S.W.

PRESENT:

Sir GEORGE H. MURRAY, K.C.B. (Chairman).

Mr. R. Bailey, M.V.O.
Mr. F. W. Black.
Mr. A. Wilson Fox, C.B.
Mr. A. F. King.
Mr. J. J. Wills (Secretary).

Mr. James Holmes, called and examined.

1558. (Chairman.) You are the Secretary of the National Hosiery Federation, I believe?—Yes.

1559. Is that a Union which extends over the whole country?—It is called a National Federation, but we have no members outside the three counties.

1560. Which three counties?—Nottinghamshire, Leicestershire, and Derbyshire.

1561. That district is the main seat of the trade, I suppose?—Yes; although it exists in Scotland, and there are many other centres in this country. There used to be about three or four, and now there will be 30 or 40 probably, as the smaller machine is getting distributed over the country.

1562. How many members have you?—Now we have about 3,000 and some odd.

1563. Men and women?—Men and women both.

1564. It is mostly a machine trade, I suppose?—Yes.

1565. May we say entirely?—Yes.

1566. Have you minimum rates that your members work at?—No, we do not have minimum rates. It is piece-work.

1567. Is it entirely piece-work?—Yes. We have lists in some districts, but in other districts we have no lists. When I say lists, I mean printed lists which have been mutually agreed and signed by both sides—employers and workmen. In Leicester particularly, and Hinckley, we have lists printed that have been mutually arranged by both parties in conference; and, generally, I should suppose they are kept to very honourably and very fairly up to the present time.

1568. Then these agreed rates do not extend over the whole district?—No. The various districts, having a variety of circumstances, shape themselves accordingly. Take the Hinckley trade, for instance. There they make cotton pants for the Government, and they pay, perhaps, somewhere about 2s. 7d. per dozen. If you take Loughborough, they would pay about 2s. 9d. There is apparently only about 2d. difference, but you have all the other departments to consider—the finishing, the putting on the buttons, doing the buttonholes, the trimming, the pressing, the dyeing, the scouring—all the various operations required to produce the finished article. So you can simply say that at Hinckley they pay 2s. 7d., but that if you take the whole of the pant from beginning to end, Hinckley may pay more than Loughborough.

1569. In fact, the rates cannot always be compared, because they do not always cover the same work?—That is so; and then in the different districts they are working on different classes of machines. Some get a 4-at-once machine, which will make four pants at a time; and in other places you will get a 6-at-once or an 8-at-once machine; the prices of all those machines vary.

1570. Can you say what they make per week or per day at these piece-work rates?—Yes; their earnings are various.

1571. Is there much variation?—Yes. For instance, you will get men making Cardigan jackets and vests, and earning at their piece-work rates from £3 to £3 10s. per week—some of them more; then you will get men on another class of machine making Government pants, and their wages will run from 30s. to 40s. per week.

1572. (Mr. Bailey.) Still on piece-work?—Yes; it is all piece-work, and reckoned by our list. They will get 1s. 9½d. for Government pants to-day in Leicester, and they are paying for that self-same pant on a similar machine at Fleckney, just outside, 1s. 2d. There is a difference there. Fleckney is considered a separate district. Then the manufacturers go to a place where the hosiery trade had never existed before, and they make it into a district, and fix their own rate, and then we in Leicester have to compete with them.

Unfortunately, when they tender for Government work, they know they can get it done for 1s. 2d. against our 1s. 9½d., and they beat us.

1573. (Chairman.) What are your principal criticisms on the Fair Wages Clause in the contracts?—In reference to that matter, we complain more particularly about how it has been evaded. I might mention three particular points, or rather two particular points, where it is done. There is one case that I could give, of which I have sent up an account.

1574. Perhaps you had better repeat it in your own words now?—In the first place, the case I gave is the most typical and the best case I can still give. Just to show you what will be done—because it has been done—this employer, whose name I can give you, if you wish it——

1575. We will leave that out for the present?—Of course, he has been seen by the Government officials—he came to our office and he asked for the lists.

1576. (Mr. Bailey.) What lists?—The price lists upon which the price is based, so much per dozen jackets or per dozen vests, for instance; they count their courses and then fix the price. Prior to that time he had always excluded his men from joining the Trade Union, and it was one condition of his, that if a man went to work there, he must not be a member of the Union. That went on for a long time, and then after he had been out of the Union for some time, he came up to our office and asked for the price lists, and said he was going to pay on these lists as he was going in for Government work. When he got the lists, he put them up and said those were the prices he was going to pay; but we know for a fact that he paid 30s. a week instead of the piece-work rates. For that 30s. a man had to do four dozens, the price of which is 11s. per dozen—that is, 44s. for which he only got 30s.

1577. (Chairman.) That is, the piece-work rate being 11s. per dozen, the man was paid 30s. per week for making four dozens?—Yes, that would be 14s. per week less. The peculiarity of the thing was this: he worked here on one side of the wall, and there was Messrs. A——'s place on the other side of the wall, A—— making the same class of goods and paying the 11s. per dozen, whilst he was paying the 30s. per week. Of course, we complained about this. We found on inquiry that it was true that he was paying the 30s. a week, and that the men were doing four dozens of jackets, the list price for which was 11s. per dozen, or that they were doing eight dozens of jackets which were priced at 5s. 6d., which would, of course, come to the same thing. We simply asked how it was. The men said: "Well, he won't set us on if we go unless we agree to that." One man said: "I have been to ask him for a job"—I quote the very words—and his reply was: 'Well, you can have a job if you come on the same terms; you know what we do—we pay 30s. a week, and we shan't pay any more.' 'I will come if you pay Trade Union rates'"—I have got his words here—"'No; if I pay Trade Union rates, I shall be as bad off as the workmen; I shall never pay Trade Union rates as long as ever I can get off paying them.'" There was a man who was out of work who applied for a situation; we did not send him, but he went. He was told: "Yes; you can have a job, but you will have to start at 28s. a week." "Why cannot you pay me according to the list?" "We do not pay it, and we are not going to pay it—not till we are made."

1578. Was this in a district in which the list was in force?—Yes; it was in the town.

1579. And the list there was an agreed list?—Yes. So that man did not start work. He came up to us, and we came up to London. He came with me, and we saw Messrs. Perry and Major. We talked the matter over, we put the facts before them, and the man stated his own case. Then they said at first, "How much money do they get a week, reckoned by the piece-work rates?" I said, "If a man works a week on the piece-work rates, he would get, according to the man, from £2 10s. to £3 10s." "But does he get full work during the year?" "No, he does not. It is a season trade, and probably he would not get more than you might say six or seven months' work in the year." "This man that gets 30s. a week gets 12 months' work in the year," said Mr. Perry. "Yes, that is true; he keeps the men regularly on, and it is only fair to speak the truth. The man makes goods for stock, and if he has got no orders, he stocks them until he can sell them. He keeps the men going, so probably, on the average, they will get about 30s. a week through the year." "Now these men who get about 50s. a week on piece-work rates and who get about six or seven months' work in the year, what will their wages work out at?" I said, "It varies; I daresay it would work out that perhaps some of them would not get above 30s. a week, it may be true; but that does not quite fit the point." The reply was, "But if they get the current rate of wages, that is, if they earn as much money during the year as the other men, could we not regard it as the current rate?" I said, "Yes, if they work the same time, but if one man is going to work 12 months and another man is going to work seven months, and the wages are the same, how, on the basis of equity, can you consider that fair to anybody? If the Government are going to reckon in that particular way, as long as we know what the basis of your arithmetic is, we shall simply know how to meet it." Anyhow, they sent one or two down and they made inquiries. They found that the books of the firm showed that they were paying list rates, so much per dozen; it was put down in the firm's books and it was put down also in the men's books. But we know for a fact, though, of course, it is very difficult, as I admit, to prove it, but we do know, from men who have left since and who have been to us and told us that they were getting the 30s. a week at the time, that that was wrong—"We had to arrange for that particular thing to be done, or we should have got the sack."

1580. But they were signing as if they had had the piece-work rates?—Yes; they agreed to that when they were asked. They said, "Yes, that is what we are getting." The men said that in conjunction with the employer. Of course, we cannot blame the officials. They simply went down, and they thought they were receiving what was true. When they saw the books, they accepted the books as being a kind of final proof. Still, let me say this; they have had no orders since—not one.

1581. Then this is a complaint which has been remedied?—It has, but we do not know that that is the reason why. If they were satisfied that he was telling the truth, and that things were as represented, it might follow and be logical that he is getting no orders, not because of that, but because there are not many orders to be given out. There are very few of those jackets for the soldiers being made just lately.

1582. Do you see any means by which the Government Inspector could go behind the wages book and the statements of the men that they were being paid the agreed rates?—I really do not; I cannot see how it is possible to do it so as to give satisfaction; I do not know what I can suggest. The only thing I could suggest is this—and I have suggested it to Mr. Buchanan: Wherever a firm interferes with the freedom of their workmen and precludes them from joining their Union if they wish—we do not seek to force them; they are absolutely free in that respect, and we never take any action, only persuasion; so if a man will not join he is outside, and if he joins he is inside—if a firm insists upon a man withdrawing from his Union before they will employ him, or they threaten to dismiss him unless he does withdraw, I think that should be a point that should cause the Government to consider the matter very fully, because a firm that will do that, generally does it for some motive, and if it does it for some motive, it is generally a selfish motive, and you can depend upon it that wherever it can it will simply take advantage of the men when the men are not free to resist. That is the only thing I can suggest.

1583. The question of prohibiting either Union men or non-Union men from being employed is rather a different point, is it not, from the one that you have been dealing with?—But you asked me the question, if you remember, can I suggest any way in which the inspector could get behind the wages book and the statements of the men? I say no, I do not see how he can, but I do see how the firm could be prevented from tendering for orders, if it tries to tender for orders on such lines as those, that is, first of all prevents its men from defending themselves, and then when they get the men in their power, they can make what arrangements they like, the men, being in their power, having to say yes to whatever they say, or they get dismissed. The unfortunate thing is that these men cannot leave their situation to go and get another, because there are so many men more than there are situations for, and the machines are limited in number. Consequently the man, to a very great extent, has to say nothing and has to submit. That is just the difficulty. I think the Government might take note of that, and where they find a firm who simply preclude the men from joining their Association, the Government can depend upon it there is something that is not square at the bottom. There is another firm that does the same thing, yet they get Government orders. They will not allow a single man to be a member of the Union. They have dismissed half-a-dozen men for that, and we have supported them by giving them 15s. a week till they get a job somewhere else. And yet the Government give them work, and we know they make the work at 30 per cent. below us. It is easy to do it once they get the men in their power, so that they cannot get a situation anywhere else; then they get them to make these terms. Of course, it is very difficult for the Government to get behind the firm unless they simply deal with them from the beginning. That is, when a firm interferes with the freedom of the workmen to join their Association in order to maintain the current rate of wages—the fair rate, I always put it—I think the Government might take it that there is something in that firm that they ought to consider more fully before they give them orders. That is my point.

1584. Even if the firm undertook to employ Union men, it would still be possible to make these arrangements with them?—In a way, yes, it would be possible.

1585. Just as possible as it was before?—It is possible, but very improbable.

1586. Why?—There are two reasons. First, the men would be losing so much in wages. That is No. 1. Then there is No. 2. Whenever such a man tries to get work anywhere else workmen somehow fight shy of him, and he is practically boycotted by them. You may not agree with that, but it is a fact that it is so. A man would not shut himself out of the town—that is what he has to do; he has got to leave the town if he leaves that firm, if he does anything that is disreputable; and, therefore, I say it is very improbable that a man would take that risk and lose his wages if he was a member of the Association. The men that work at this particular firm, if ever they leave, have to leave the town, as nobody will work with them at any other place; they simply say, "No, they have been traitors to us, and we cannot rely on them any more." Hence there is not a place in the town where an employer would run the risk of employing such a man and having the others stop. I am only pointing out that that is exactly how the thing works.

1587. Have you any other examples of what you describe as evasions of the Fair Wages Clause?—Yes. The other evasion that I want to refer to is this particularly: It happened that we had some difficulty with a firm—and I could give you the name of the firm—a little while ago, and they sent an inspector down. This firm went from Leicester to Derby. While in Leicester, let me say, they were one of the fairest firms. Nobody—I do not care who it is, no matter how strong their prejudice might be—could say one word against the firm in the way in which they paid their men for the work they had done. The wages were good, and the conditions under which they worked were good. Men who had gone to work there had stopped all their lives. It proves that a firm is not so very bad if a man will stop 30 years at it. This firm was a good firm; but the time came when they removed their machinery from Leicester to Derby, and then made special arrangements with their men. First of all, they would not allow the men to join the Union. Three men did join secretly and they were dismissed. I saw them about it. They said: "We have dismissed them, and we have dismissed them because they were members of the Union, and yet we have not—there were other reasons why; but we do admit that if they had not been members of the Union we should not have dismissed them." The arrangement they made with the men when they were outside the Union was that while they paid 1s. 2d. per dozen on the ordinary pants made for the open market, when they went in for the Government pants the other year, they simply arranged with their men that they should make them for 1s. per dozen. We were paying 1s. 9d. in Leicester for the same things. One or two firms in Leicester specially cater for the Government, and one in particular shut itself out of the open market; and to-day, because the Government have given them no orders, their men are simply walking about, and they are not averaging 7s. a week. That is a firm that has catered for the Government, but they have paid 9d. per dozen more than has been paid at Derby by this particular firm. The result was, of course, that they got the order at Derby, and the men agreed to it. When the difficulty cropped up, the men denied that they had agreed. "Now," I said, "don't you be unfair; if you have, say so." Well, they would not admit it. I saw the firm. The firm said, "Yes, the men themselves agreed with us; they came into our office at Derby and they said, 'Now, if you go in for that Government order, we are quite prepared to make them at 1s. per dozen.'" And the firm said that the men gave reasons why they could do it, and were prepared to do it. Anyhow, the arrangement was said to be mutual—that is what I want to point out, as I do not want to say anything that is unfair, either of the firm or of the men. The firm were very frank and open, and told us the truth when I saw them. That firm has its warehouse in Leicester, and having its warehouse in Leicester, all its tenders go out from Leicester as if the goods were made at Leicester; but they have gone to Derby, and they have established there a district practically of their own. When the inspector went to Derby, he compared Derby with Fleckney, where there is this other firm that I have told you of, who will not allow their men to be members of the Union. As a result, they took the basis of the Fleckney price as being the basis upon which the firm should pay at Derby. The inspector argued the matter out first. "The men arranged to make this work at the price, it was a mutual arrangement, and it was an arrangement that was in keeping with the district." We pointed out that it was 2d. or 3d. less for Government work than was paid on ordinary work, so that a reduction was obtained, though it was not arranged by the firm alone, but was arranged by mutual consent. What we complain about more particularly is that a firm can leave a town and go into another town or into a country district, but retaining their warehouse in Leicester, and no question is asked in any way whatever, unless we raise it, as to whether they are paying the proper rates or not; and when we raise the question with the Government about the piece-work rates, the Government reply generally, "Well, gentlemen, we deal with wages, but piece-work rates are a very complex thing"—which I admit. "The work is made on various machines, old machines and new, some automatic, some worked partly by hand and partly automatic, and the result is that prices vary to such an extent that we do not know where we are if we are going to compare one machine with another." That is the reply given to the case. A woman, for instance, on nearly the latest machine will get 1s. 3d. per dozen; another girl on another machine, a later machine than that, will get 3d., and she will earn 7s. a week more at 3d. than the other one will at 1s. 3d. That makes it very difficult, I know, to differentiate between different kinds of machines—how they are worked, whether they are big or little, whether they are automatic or not, whether they are worked by girls, men, women, or boys. All those things are very complex, and there is nobody but an expert, who understands the whole of the trade, who could deal with the question. Hence I say it is a very difficult thing when the Government simply take the wages, and it is a very difficult thing with us to find out when they say, "Is it the market rate of wages?" We can only say, "No, it is not the current price according to Leicester." I have just pointed out some of the difficulties that both the Government and we have as well.

1588. At Derby, I take it, you have no list?—That is so; we have no list.

1589. Is there any other firm doing the same work there?—There is another firm doing similar work, but I do not think they have ever had any Government work.

1590. Before this, there was no contractor doing this work in Derby at all then?—No.

1591. Your point is that this manufacturer practically made a "current rate" for himself?—Yes.

1592. What is your suggestion for meeting that?—The suggestion we have made before on several occasions to the previous Government, the Government previous to that, and this Government again. That has simply been, could they see their way clear to define what they mean by a district? It is so vague, so indefinite now, that it is not a bit of good, and the Fair Wages Clause is really no good at all, because manufacturers can go and make their own district, they can make their own arrangements, they can pay their own price, and simply get at the back of the Government and do pretty well as they like. If the Government could simply describe a kind of radius of a given number of miles, even that would help. It has been suggested to us that there should be a matter of a 10 miles radius from, we will say, the county town. If the Government could do that, it would give us an opportunity, and then if a man went out from Leicester to a place seven miles away, he would have to pay pretty well the Leicester price. Of course, I know what the Government reply to us is—"You see it is hardly likely we can regulate it; the conditions are different, the price of food is different, facilities are different, a man can have a piece of land, he can have a cheaper house and live cheaper, and so on, in a country district; and if the ordinary tradesman is going to have the advantage of these various conditions, when we buy goods, why should not we have the same advantage of the same varying conditions as other tradesmen?" These are all points that are raised; I understand them very well, and I know the difficulties.

1593. That suggestion of yours would not have helped you in the Derby case, would it?—No. That would be 30 miles away, would it not? It will not meet every case.

1594. How would you suggest that your Derby case should be met?—I simply say that if it is known that a firm precludes or prevents a man from being a member of a trade society, the Government can always take it for granted there is a motive in it, and that is to get behind the list of prices.

1595. Assuming that they did not impose that condition at Derby?—Then, of course, that would be nothing, as far as that goes; and we would simply have to go on unless you take, as we say, the Trade Union rate. If there is no Trade Union rate, then the next suggestion is the Trade Union rate of the town nearest the place.

1596. In fact, that the employer at Derby should be compelled to pay the same rate as the employer at Leicester?—Yes; especially if his warehouse is at Leicester. If he removed his warehouse altogether, and issued his tenders from Derby, then it would be a different matter; but, leaving his warehouse in Leicester, issuing his tenders from Leicester, taking his orders from Leicester, and then going and paying a rate altogether different in a district that he created himself—say, 30 per cent. below the rate where the warehouse is—that is where the difficulty comes in.

1597. Should the place where his warehouse is have anything to do with the wages that he pays to his workmen?—It has this to do with it: it puts you off the scent, and people do not begin to inquire. If a man issues his orders—we will say from Leicester—and his warehouse is there, you take it for granted; Leicester is a place where they pay Trade Union rates, and, of course, he pays them.

1598. He might have a warehouse in London?—He might; but there are none of our goods made in London now. The hosiery trade has left London. He would not come to London, except just for sale. He would not come here to stock his goods—the warehouse would be too costly, the rent would be too high, and the rates would be too high. There are a number of reasons why he would not do that. It is only by going to a country village for his warehouse that he would have to pay less.

1599. Let us come back to the wages of the district. Why do you think that the same wages should be paid in Leicester and in all places 10 miles round?—The reply to that is that there is not so very much difference, everything considered, in reference to the cost of living. While it is true a man in the country can have a bit of land for a garden and can grow his vegetables—that costs labour. He has to work for it, and he does not get it for nothing. It is a facility, it is true, but it is not quite fair to take advantage of that man, and pay him less because he is getting a bit of land for vegetables—"We are going to have the advantage of that; you are growing your vegetables, and you must work for a bit less." That is the way our men look at it, and I am only putting it to you as they look at it. Your house-rent is not so much, but then your house is not so good, and it is not worth so much; so, shilling for shilling, you are getting less return even in the country than you are in the town. Then, besides, if they push the idea, men can spend more money very often in the country than they can in the town. In the winter they can go to a public-house and spend their money there, as there is nowhere else to go—no concert-hall, very few lectures, and very few other places of amusement. The result is a man can be as badly off in the country as in the town; that is the reason why they ought to have the same within 10 miles of Leicester.

1600. Do you yourself think that is a just contention?—Yes, I think it is fair. I do not think there is much in it, but there is this in it: If the man has his garden and grows his vegetables, is steady, and never goes to the public-house to pass away his time, there is no doubt he can save more money in the end.

1601. Do you not think that nine men out of ten would be quite prepared to work for less wages in a village 10 miles from Leicester than they would in the town itself?—No, I do not think so. If you can make the country village the same as what the town is—put up the electric light, and have baths and gymnasia, and all those sort of things—if you can make the country like that, I believe there are hundreds of men who would. Whether it will be so in a generation I do not know; but now we have got men in our trade who early in life lived in the country and then came into the town, and many of those, if you could make it comfortable, could light up the streets of your country village—not with a tallow candle, nor with a little oil, nor with gas—might go back. You can go into lots of villages to-day, and you can walk into a brook which is on the side of the road quite easily, because there is no light. Men go into the country not from choice, but because it is a necessity of our employment. That is the fact.

1602. Have you any other suggestions to make?—I do not know that there is any other. I did make a suggestion to Mr. Buchanan that I might put—that was, could the Government see their way clear, first of all, to fix a rate? Our men suggest this—let the Government take a district, we will say Leicester, or Nottingham, or Derby. On the Government pants in Leicester we make pretty well the coarser pants, the heavier goods; in Hinckley they make the medium pants; in Nottingham they make the lighter ones, that is the very fine ones, and also in Derbyshire, and they make silk ones as well. The suggestion is if the Government cannot see its way clear to do anything else, neither to define a district nor to put down the Trade Union rate instead of the current rate, could it take a district, say, Leicester, and have a radius of any number of miles, say, Leicestershire, and taking the various prices paid, strike a medium or average; and if the Government could strike the average and fix that, and put that price in their contract, the same as they put in the length and the width and the weight and the quality—if they could simply put in the price that they were willing to pay, the impression is that this would happen: First of all, the Government would not go to the lowest-paid districts, and they would not go to the highest-paid districts; if they did give any in the lowest-paid districts they would give a few, and if they did give any in the higher-paid districts they would give a few; but the bulk would be in the districts where the men were paid on the medium rate. In that way a wider distribution of the work would be effected, more men would be employed in making the goods, and the result would be that it would give greater satisfaction. That was a suggestion that was made, and it looks to me as if it is the most practical thing which the Government could do. I put it this way—supposing the Government gives 5 per cent. more than is paid by the ordinary tradesman in the open market, or 10 per cent. even, my contention is that the Government would get a fair return for it. First, the man who catered for the Government would know very well that the Government would not leave him in the lurch so often as it does. When I say that, I mean when they have got no other orders, and they can get no other orders, they are shut out of the market, because they have been making Government work. When the Government take their orders away and send them somewhere else, and a firm gets no other orders in their place, the men walk about and the machines stand still. If it was more equally distributed, even if they had less, and though they paid the higher price, the Government would get that confidence amongst those who catered for them that they would not feel the risk was so great. In the next place, they would secure in return a guaranteed quality in the goods. Now everybody does the best they can to nick the Government. They take a bit out here, and a bit out there, and a bit narrower, and so on; they make it a bit wetter so that it weighs a bit heavier. All these things are done, and I say all these things would simply be eliminated if the Government paid a little extra; in that way they would get a return for it, there would be a wider distribution all round the country, and it would be more satisfactory.

1603. You mentioned just now the substitution of the "Trade Union" rate for the "current" rate?—Yes.

1604. What would be the effect of that in such a case as the one at Derby which you were speaking of just now?—Then you would take Leicester, if you take the nearest town making the same class of goods, unless you take Fleckney; but if you were to take Fleckney, that is not a town, it is a village.

1605. Would the substitution of "Trade Union rate" for "current rate" meet the difficulty that you feel in regard to Derby?—Yes.

1606. What would be the Trade Union rate at Derby?—It would be the Leicester rate.

1607. Why?—Because the man's warehouse is in Leicester—that is what we say—his trade goes from Leicester, and he trades as if he is at Leicester.

1608. That is another point: supposing he had not a warehouse in Leicester?—Supposing he had not a warehouse in Leicester, then it would not apply, unless you do the other thing—that is, take the nearest town making the same class of work and paying the Trade Union rate. That is the suggestion that has been made. In Derby it would be this way—"Very well, you are going in for Government work: you have got to pay the same rate as they pay at Leicester; it is the nearest town, and you cannot go away from Leicester and make a district of your own and fix your own rate."

1609. Then your suggestion would be the Trade Union rate where there is one, and where there is not, the Trade Union rate of the nearest town where similar work is done?—Yes.

1610. Do you find that the Government contracts go, as a rule, to the worst kind of employers from your point of view?—No, I do not think it would be fair to say that.

1611. There are good and bad among them, do you mean?—They may be called good and bad, simply speaking of the rate—those who pay higher and those who pay lower. That is what we mean, I presume, just now, by good and bad?

1612. Yes?—Go to Hawick in Scotland. I was in Hawick a week or two ago; there is a firm there that makes these pants, and women work the machines. Their price when women work them is 10d. per dozen for the same goods that we get 1s. 9½d. for. She works a 6-at-once, the same as ours, but if she worked a 4-at-once she would get more—that is, she would get somewhere about 1s. 2d. the dozen. The Government send some to Scotland, where the lower price is paid, and they send some to Leicester, where the higher price is paid, so it would not be fair to say they send it to the lowest-paid, and I do not believe the Government seek that—in fact, I do not think it is their intention to send it to the lowest-paid, and I do not think they have done it with the motive of getting the goods made as cheaply as they can. I would not say that, because it would not be fair.

1613. Are the piece-work rates the same for men as for women?—No; the women have a rate of their own. A woman will get 10d., but if a man made them, and he does in Scotland—in Hawick—the man will work at nights at the same machine as the woman works, only hers is in the day; and he, I think, would get 1s. 4d. for what she gets 10d. for, and we should get 1s. 9½d. for; but if our men worked at nights on this class of work they would get about 1s. 11d., so the difference is between 1s. 4d. and 1s. 11d.—namely, 7d.

1614. But for the same kind of work, done at the same hours of the day, would the woman get the same as a man?—No, it would be paid at a different rate. As far as the Union is concerned, on the class of machine that we use—that is a Cotton's patent, which is a very expensive machine—we have never made arrangements for women to work those machines. They are considered to be men's machines, but unfortunately women do work them, and there is one place in the town where only women work this particular kind of machine. It is so convenient for men to believe that women cannot do certain things until they do it, and then they find the impossible is done.

1615. You do not object to the employment of women, do you?—The men do that work the machines, because they say, "If the women work these they will work them for less, and then our occupation will be gone." Consequently they try to keep these machines for men.

1616. May we take it that as a Union you have no opinion about it?—We have an opinion as far as this, that those women who work those machines have not been admitted into our Union; they would not accept them as members.

1617. (Mr. Bailey.) You mean the women who work these particular machines?—Yes.

1618. (Mr. Wilson Fox.) Would you accept them on terms?—No; we have never done.

1619. (Chairman.) Where do you draw the line between the machines which you think men ought to work and the machines you think women ought to work?—At the Griswell machines, which are simple seamless machines.

1620. What is the reason of the distinction?—They are small, they are not expensive, and so the depreciation is very small. These other machines, costing, we will say, from £400 to £800, are very complex machines, and really do require a man to look after them; so even if they employ women for them, they have to employ a man or two to look after the machines. Therefore we draw the line between Cotton's patent, which men work, and the seamless machines, which women have always worked, though the men are beginning to work them, and the men are having the same price on those machines as the women, so they are encroaching on the women's machines in that case. But then they work a larger number of heads. The woman will work four heads on these seamless machines, but if a man goes to them he works six, and he may work eight; but if he works eight, he will have a little girl or boy to help him So with the same price he will have more heads; he will turn off more work and do more business, and he has got more money to draw. That is exactly how it is done with the machines. The simple machines are worked by the men, because they are worked with a larger number of heads. Women are working on the other machines, especially in Scotland, and we have a place in Leicester, too, where they are.

1621. Do you see any tendency to employ women more on these machines which you wish to reserve for men?—Not at present, and I do not think it will work that way, because the machine is really too expensive. What will happen more particularly, I am afraid, will be this: that this machine, expensive as it is, will drop out, as it will be too expensive to meet the price charged for the goods. It is comparatively high, and on this machine the goods are simply fashioned to fit the body—the different parts of the body are shaped on the machine. The later machine is a large machine that makes it all in one great circular fabric, which is laid on a table, and a circular saw will cut out the shape—they have got a shape exactly the shape of the body. Then they have an over-lock machine: that is a machine that will stitch and lock at the same time, so that it cannot come undone. The result is that to-day the kind of pant that is made for the Government, for which the charge in the shops will be somewhere about 5s. 6d., they will be able to make on this machine with the same sort of yarn and sell it for 2s. 6d., so that there will be 3s. difference between them. It is the same with the Government pants that are made on the hand-frame. For instance, we will pay 18s. 9d. on the hand-frame, and a Government pant of the finer class of goods can be done for 7s. 6d., and I will guarantee there is no man who is not an expert who can tell the difference between one and the other. I saw Col. Walker some few years ago on the subject, and we were talking the very self-same matter over, and whether they could keep the old men at work. We have got a thousand old men in Leicestershire and Nottinghamshire who are working these hand-machines making pants for the Government, and the Government are keeping those old men on against their own interests to-day; they are finding them about three or four pairs a week to make, which means about 6s. or 7s. a week for them, when the Government could get them made at 7s. 6d. So there is a difference there between 18s. 9d. and 7s. 6d.

1622. (Mr. Bailey.) You gave us just now the number of members in your Union, but have you any idea how many people are in the trade who are not members of your Union?—I dare say, if you reckon those in the warehouses and those in the factories, and if you take Nottingham and Leicester and Derby and Scotland, and all over the country, you can reckon them in thousands. I should say there would be between 30,000 and 40,000.

1623. Practically you are only a small proportion of the total number?—That is so.

1624. Is there any difference in the value of the work done between women's and men's work on the same machine?—No, not because they are men and women. If there is a difference it would be a difference as the result of the machine—that is, in the way in which the work is made. A woman can do equally as good work as a man when she has the same hours and is under the same conditions.

1625. (Mr. Wilson Fox.) The districts in which hosiery is done are pretty well defined as a general rule, are they not? You have got certain centres where hosiery is carried on mainly, have you not?—Yes.

1626. Are the cases numerous where the employers go into country districts outside these defined areas?—Many years ago a very large number of men went out from Nottingham; and from Leicester, I should say—and here I am speaking of hosiery, and not of shoes—within the last 15 years there has been one firm a year leaving us.

1627. From Leicester?—Yes.

1628. And they have gone out into the rural districts?—Yes.

1629. Right into the heart of the rural districts, do you mean?—Yes. They go to Fleckney, Market Harborough, Loughborough, and a number of other places—such as Kegworth; and then there is Arnesby and Ratby. Those are places only 4, 5, 6, or 9 or 10 miles away.

1630. With reference to those cases in the country districts where you suggest that an unfair rate is being paid, are they numerous; have you got many grievances of that sort?—In every case where they go out they always go out and pay considerably less.

1631. Do you find that there is a considerable number of those?—Yes. There would be about one a year that is leaving us. There is one leaving us just now that has employed somewhere about 300—320 probably.

1632. Are those all cases in which you would say that a lower rate is being paid than you think should be paid?—Yes, certainly. Anything less than is paid in Leicester would be considered by the men of Leicester less than ought to be paid.

1633. I have got some of your rates here signed with your name; as a rule these rates are agreed rates between employers and employed, are they not?—Yes.

1634. Therefore, in the large centres, that is, in the towns, the rates are agreed rates?—Yes.

1635. And, therefore, the Trade Union rates in these particular districts, the larger districts, are practically the current rates?—Yes.

1636. It is only when you get outside into the country districts where the current rate and the Trade Union rate may not be the same thing?—That is so.

1637. It is there that the employer, as you suggest, sets up a rate for himself?—Yes.

1638. In a case of that sort your suggestion is to take the town in which the employer has got the warehouse?—Yes.

1639. Supposing that he has got two large factories in two large towns and a warehouse in each, what would you suggest?—We will say he has taken some machinery away and established a factory in another town, and is paying considerably less there than he was paying in the town he left; if he did not pay the current rate, and has gone away to another town to pay less than the current rate of the town he has left, we should simply say he ought to pay the rate of the town he has left.

1640. Supposing he has got a well-established factory in Derby and has had one there for years, and he has also a well-established factory in Leicester, and he has had that for years, and that he has got a warehouse in each place; then he starts a factory out in a purely rural district, right in the wilds of the country: how would you treat the wages in that purely rural district, the third district, where he has just started? Would you take Derby or would you take Leicester as the standard?—If it were left to the men, they would take the place with the highest rate, there is no doubt.

1641. I thought you would probably say that?—I say they would, and there is no doubt they would; but the question is: What would be the fairest thing?

1642. That is exactly what I want your opinion on; because such a case as I put to you might easily happen?—Yes, I admit that.

1643. Particularly where you have got a limited liability company?—That is perfectly true. In a case of that sort, I should say I do not see how you could very well on any ground that is equitable, compel—but I will not say compel, I will say induce—that man to pay the same rates that he paid in the town.

1644. He would not go away if he had to do that?—Probably not; he goes there because it will cost him less. Take the case of Hinckley and a place which is only a mile away; we have even allowed in that case a difference of 5 per cent. between an employer at Earlshilton and an employer at Hinckley, to allow for the difference in the cost of carriage. The man at Earlshilton is further away from the railway station, and it costs him more to take his goods away and for the travellers coming. We have allowed 5 per cent. in a case like that for one mile. That is just to show you how fair we have tried to be. There is no doubt that what ought to be done is this: when a man goes into a country district like that, I do not think it will be practicable to get the man to pay the same rate as the rate in the town, but there should be a difference, and there can be a difference which should be a mutual difference, but would be fair to both; and we have said a 5 per cent. or a 10 per cent. difference, mutually arranged, would meet the case; and wherever we have succeeded in doing it, it has worked very well.

1645. That is a perfectly fair answer, namely, that you would consider on its merits a case where an employer went out into a purely rural district, and you would not necessarily take the standard of the town which he had left, but you might make some allowance?—Yes; there is no doubt that is fair.

1646. In your proof you say, "When a firm leaves one town to go to another to evade the Trade Union or current rate, and creates a district and makes its own rate below the rate paid in the town where their warehouse is left, or to a country district for the same purpose, that firm shall not be eligible to tender for Government orders." I think you will agree that there are cases where a manufacturer would not go out deliberately to evade paying the Trade Union rate or current rate, but he would go out as a matter of business, well knowing that his expenses would be less?—Yes; but the principal expense, of course, is the payment of the wages—that is the highest cost.

1647. I quite agree?—For instance, we will take Leicester and the question of the rates. This is a marvellous case, but it is a case that came from an employer's own lips. He said, though the rates in Leicester had gone up 4s. in the £, reckoning some years back—to 1891, say—and they are now paying 8s. 6d. or 9s., the rates would not determine him to go to the country district, but the wages would. He said, "I will give you the name of a manufacturer, who is seven miles away from here; he made the same number of goods as I made last year"—this would be in 1902—"and he paid £5,000 less for making the same number of dozens of women's stockings that I paid." Of course, he would naturally go out for the wage; the wage question is the principal question he would go out for.

1648. I quite agree, but I understand that in certain cases, instead of the Trade Union rate which has been fixed by the employers and the employed in the large towns, where an employer has gone right out into a country district, you would be prepared to agree with the Employers' Association to come to some arrangement as regards the current rate for that particular district in the country, on its merits?—Yes, I think that would be the fairest. That could be done, and I suggest that might be done. We have done it. Still the suggestion of the men generally is that they must pay the Trade Union rates everywhere, or they should not be eligible to tender.

1649. Might I put this consideration to you, because it has been a difficulty in my mind about the Trade Union rate? At present the grievance is that if the employer goes out into the country district he has got the whip-hand, and he makes a rate for himself?—Yes.

1650. Should we not be setting up a grievance at the opposite end, if when an employer goes out into the country the Trade Union rate was forced on him? Might it not then be said in some cases that the Trade Union was creating the rate, and the employer was bound to conform to it?—Yes.

1651. Therefore, might not we be creating a grievance for the employers, the same grievance, in fact, that we had settled for the workpeople?—Yes, there is no doubt that might be said. Further than that, it might be said, while on the one side you are complaining about the employer getting away in order to pay the lower rate, if you can enforce on us the Trade Union rate and shut everybody else out, then you have got the thing in your hands, and you could make us pay more—you could simply make a monopoly of it and make us pay your price, whatever it is. That is a position I should not like to see pushed to an extreme.

1652. Exactly; when one has settled the grievance of the men, one does not want to see the same grievance arise as regards the employer?—That is true; I agree with you.

1653. You only want to carry out in the country districts the same system that you already have in the town, where you amicably settle your rates of wages with the employers?—It looks to me that that is the most practical thing when all is said and done, and would meet the case better all round.

1654. I see the London County Council in their contracts state that if the contractors employ any workmen on work of any sort not included in the Council's list, the rates of pay shall not be less than those recognised by employers and Trade Unions and in practice obtained in London; that practically is a case where the current rate and the Trade Union rate is identical?—Yes; but that generally refers, as you know, to wages.

1655. Certainly. May I, if I am not detaining you too long, put one other point? I have got here a return which was published in 1905, showing the wages and conditions imposed by local authorities in boroughs and urban districts in England and Wales, from which I see that the boroughs and urban districts which paid the current rate of the district were 138 whilst the number of local bodies who recognised Trade Union rates, as such, were 48?—That is 138 against 48?

1656. Then the return shows that those boroughs and urban districts which paid the rates agreed to by associations of employers and employed—that is, agreed mutually—numbered 57. So the majority of boroughs in England and Wales at present do not pay, primâ facie, the recognised Trade Union rates, although they pay the current rates, or rates which are agreed upon between employers and employed?—That is so.

1657. Of course, I do not say for one moment that in many cases the current rates in the district are not the Trade Union rates. Those are the latest figures that I can find on the subject, and they show that the majority of local authorities in England and Wales at the present moment do not pay the rates recognised by the Trade Unions as such?—That is true; I should say it is true.

1658. There was one observation which you made that I was not quite sure whether I accurately caught. Did you suggest that the Government should pay more by 5 per cent. for Government work?—I said "if" they did.

1659. Would you approve of that?—I would approve of it. I suggested that the Government should take a district and take the average, and then if it cost them 5 per cent. more, or 10 per cent. even, my contention is that the Government would get a good return for it, and it would pay them as a business question.

1660. Would that not entail creating a state of things to which one has heard the objection raised in this room, that in the same factory lower rates would be paid for ordinary work, while the higher rates are being paid for Government work?—That might be, but it would not be in the case I suggest. Take Leicester and its district; it finds that there is a difference between 1s. 9½d. and, say, 1s. 4d. as between Fleckney and Leicester. The Government would take the average price paid by two, three or four places. "What does it come to?" you say. "Well, it comes pretty well to 1s. 7d."—that is 2½d. less than it is in Leicester. If you say "We will pay 1s. 7d. a dozen there," that will be less for Leicester, but it will be more for the other place which pays the average rate; and if you gave some to Leicester, where they pay 2½d. more, you might give some to another place where they pay about 2d. or 3d. less. But taking the average, including every place, you would find that you would not pay, I should say, over 5 per cent. more; but if you did it would pay you. But this is only my own personal suggestion.

1661. You do not think it would lead to any grumbling in certain cases, do you?—Not in the least, because the greatest grumbling to-day is that the work is not fairly nor widely distributed, that some get more and some get less. If it could be more equitably distributed, my opinion is that there would be very little complaint in reference to the matter of price, and I think the Government would have greater scope and greater freedom if they could see their way clear to pay in that manner.

1662. To give each district its turn, do you mean?—Yes, to let the work be equally distributed. If you take some at the lower rate and some at the higher rate, and not give it all to one place which is, say, 10 per cent. or 5 per cent. below the average, nor give it all to another place which is 5 per cent. above the average, but take it in the way I suggest, you will give some to the lower and some to the higher, but the greater quantity, of course, will go to the middle, and nobody would grumble so long as they got a share.

1663. (Mr. Black.) Would they get a share? Would that not rule out Leicester altogether?—No; Leicester would get some as the result of that, because if the Government gave the 5 per cent., or the 10 per cent., which they might agree to do, and they give it now where they pay the highest, and if they also gave it where they were paying lower, there would be no fear of grumbling. Now, if they give it to these districts where less is paid, they are afraid there would be some grumbling. If they were to work on those lines, my opinion is that the work would be more equally distributed.

1664. I suppose you have never thought of reducing your Trade Union schedule at Leicester, in order to keep the firms in the town instead of your men having to follow them into the country?—My friend, it has been thought of many times indeed, but they have never done it yet sufficiently to prevent the firms from leaving.

1665. Does it not look a little bit as if your Union is rather driving the firms away from you;—Yes; it might; but let me say that there is not a town in England, I know, where we have stooped to conquer more. Take Nottingham; there has not been a new machine in Nottingham for three years—not one; I mean, not one of these expensive machines. They have all gone outside. But Nottingham has never lowered its prices anything like we have to meet it. Our class of work is hit more than theirs by a class of machine that is so simple that a girl can work it; and, as a result, the work easily goes from the expensive machine to the cheap machines, and in the end, though we have tried to meet it, we have been unable to meet it. But the men to-day are in this position,—I believe that they would sooner the whole of the work left the town than they would come down any lower. I am not saying whether there is wisdom in it; I am only stating what is the fact.

1666. Have you many restrictions of that kind, I mean as to the number of articles which could be put out in a certain number of days, or a certain number of hours?—No.

1667. You do not restrict that?—No. A man can make as many as ever the machine will make. We have always held that a machine is an economical tool, that it is brought in to make more with less, and that we are not wise if we check it. That men do so, I am not going to deny, but still I know it is not wise.

1668. Do you limit the number of hours per week?—No.

1669. Have you nothing of that sort that you regard as a fair standard?—No. The Factory Act limits the hours of the women, but we do not limit the hours of the men. The men work pretty well whatever hours they and the firm agree. If they get an order that is wanted, they work night and day, or till ten o'clock at night; or they have two shifts of eight hours each without charging anything extra. If they work at night they get paid 5 per cent. or 10 per cent. extra for it; but in order to get the night pay knocked off, they will put double shifts on, so that one set of men will work eight hours and another set of men will work eight hours, one lot going on at ten o'clock and another lot starting at six o'clock in the morning. That is done, so as to give them a chance of competing. We have done that.

1670. You have spoken of one firm keeping its workmen for perhaps 30 years; would their work be piecework?—Yes.

1671. Would they pay the usual rates?—Yes.

1672. Would they have enough to keep their men going so constantly?—Yes.

1673. Do you mean that they would be some of the men who would be standing for four or five months in the year?—No; the firm that the men have been with for 30 years is in the plain trade, and by plain trade I mean the absence of fancy colours. The fancy trade generally means fancy colours, and the plain trade is simply those goods that are all one colour—Shetland or grey or white or blue.

1674. And that trade goes on more or less all the year through, does it?—Yes.

1675. Do the people in the fancy trade earn anything in the slack season?—They will go for months without earning anything at all. They are more hit than we are by the Germans. The Germans make this class of goods, and, as a result, they bring their goods here and sell them very much cheaper, the difference being between 1d. and 8d., that is, they can beat us, because they pay 1d. where we pay 8d. for the thing being done on a different machine.

1676. (Mr. King.) I think you suggested that when a man made Government work and lost it, he was boycotted, and could not get other work?—If I used that word there I used it in the wrong place. I rather mean that when a firm has catered for Government work, it has laid down its machinery, and it has not gone in for getting orders in the open market, and so it gets shut out.

1677. You mean its machinery is not suitable?—No; but the other people have taken the orders in the open market, and these people cannot get them back again. When once you lose orders, it is very difficult to get them back again. That is exactly how the thing stands.

1678. This mutual arrangement that you were mentioning just now would work very well, I take it, so long as the employers came to an agreement with the men or with the Union, but if an employer moved out to a place where there is no rate, and he refused to agree to a mutual arangement, what would you think should be done then?—I do not know. Then you could simply say that that firm should not be eligible for tendering.

1679. That would be the remedy?—Yes, that would be so.

1680. There would be difficulty in apportioning the orders, I think, if every firm quoted the same price. If the Government took the average price, how do you think the orders should be apportioned—would you say according to the number of men employed in each district?—No; I do not think I should be capable perhaps of judging in the absence of the facts.

1681. How would you think a Government office should decide on the apportionment of the order? Supposing they wanted 10,000 of a certain article, and the average price was in force, how would you divide that 10,000 between Fleckney, Leicester, and Nottingham?—I should simply take into account from a business standpoint which were the people that served me best, and which it was my interest best to keep.

1682. Then we might give the orders all to Leicester?—No; I should consider that, and I should consider other things too. It would be done with the idea of distributing the work as widely as I possibly could; but I should go along the line of least resistance whenever I could.

1683. I think you said that whenever a firm objected to employ Union men, that showed that they had some selfish motive?—Yes.

1684. Is it not possible that a firm may object to Unions on principle, without having selfish motives?—That is so, but experience and probability are guides, as they say, in life, and you generally find, as a rule, that they never pay higher, but that they generally pay lower—that is the case in 99 out of every 100 of them.

1685. Might there not be a firm which pays good wages, and yet is not in the Union?—I would look upon that firm with a very lenient eye.

1686. But those firms have got to be picked out?—That is perfectly true. There are some who look at the matter in this way—and I have argued it with them. They have said: "We don't disagree with the Union so long as ever the Union occupies its proper place; that is, if it is a voluntary association existing to procure freedom, and seeking only to give the workmen an equal opportunity with the employers of exchanging their capital and their labour at a fair price, then that Union is an auxiliary; but when a Union becomes an association based upon compulsion, and existing to deprive both workmen and employers of freedom, and seeking not for equal opportunity to exchange, then they say, 'from such a Union good Lord deliver me.'"

1687. Does that not apply to some Unions at the present time?—I daresay it does; I do not doubt it.

1688. I do not think it applies to yours?—We do what we can to avoid it, but we do not say we have succeeded as well as we should like.

1689. The point we have to deal with is, how we should know which of these firms is objecting to Union men for honest reasons and which for selfish motives?—I do not know exactly. Suppose you get somebody tendering at a very low price; there are some tendering at prices that I do not see how it is possible for them to make it pay; and, in fact, I know they cannot. When they have taken the orders they have to manipulate almost everything. Take the yarn: I know that a lower quality of yarn has been put in. I have known a case where there has been 4d. per lb. difference in the yarn. I can give you a case where they paid 1s. 3d. per dozen for making belts at the time when you wanted belts for the soldiers, and at another place they were paying 5½d. per dozen, and the man who was getting 5½d. could earn more money than the man who was getting the 1s. 3d., because the work was done on different machines. But, then, where they paid the 1s. 3d. they paid 4d. less for the yarn they put in. I do not know whether the Government knew, or whether they did not.

1690. All these things make it almost impossible for the Government to decide; we cannot look into all these details?—No; that is what I say.

1691. Do you advise that wherever we get a low tender we should reject it?—No, I am not saying that. A low tender is a good thing for you, but sometimes it is so low that you know it cannot be done at the price—if you would only cost the goods, you would know that they could not be made at the price. Would it be possible for you to cost the goods, and to say: "Here is the yarn, which is so much per pound if it weighs so much; then here is the machine, which costs so much; the depreciation so much; the wages so much?" If you could do that, you would find in cases that I know of, where orders have been given by the Government, that, as a matter of fact, it could not have paid them to make the goods.

1692. If we had known that, we should not have given the order?—Of course not; but, then, if you had made the calculation, you would have known it.

1693. We are not in a position to make the calculation, and I am asking you if you can give us any general suggestion for keeping out these bad firms?—When I was on the Council at Leicester we used to do this: when we got some very low tenders we used always to put them on one side, and say: "Now, how is it possible for this to be done?" Two or three of us that knew the work used to go into it and cost it off, and we found out invariably that it was impossible to do it. We never took a tender when we found the costing kept them out, because it is not fair to help a man who gives in a tender at a price that really will not pay him. That is what we did in connection with some of the iron-work for some engines in Leicester.

1694. Supposing we throw out all the low tenders, will not the tendency be for people to increase their prices? Will they not say: "It is no good quoting low as we are not considered, so let us quote a little higher and then we may get it?"—I should not throw out a tender because it was lower than somebody else's, because that would mean you would have to take the highest always. I am speaking now of tenders that are ridiculously low.

1695. We do not know them—that is the unfortunate part; we are not in the same position that you are, and we cannot total the cost?—Very likely so. I have given you one case. I have given you 1s. 3d. for the belts, and I have given you 5½d.; and then I have given you 4d. per lb. difference in the yarn, and I have got a sample of that very thing in my office now. I know your difficulties are very great, and I sympathise with you. I shall never be a party to throwing a stone at men who are in difficulties and cannot get over them, because I get in difficulties myself that I cannot get over. I have no doubt that you try to do your best, and I know your difficulties are very great; but these are suggestions which it has struck me would meet your difficulties. If you could have a difference in the rate between outlying districts and the towns, I believe it would work very well indeed, and that you would not have so many difficulties.

The witness withdrew.

Mr. James O'Grady, M.P., called and examined.

1696. (Chairman.) I think you represent the National Amalgamated Furnishing trades?—Yes.

1697. In what capacity?—As General Organiser, practically as Organising Secretary.

1698. Is that a federation of several Unions, or is it only one?—It is one Union embracing the whole of the trades in the furnishing industry.

1699. Cabinet-makers and trades of that kind?—Chair-makers, carvers, polishers, and men who work with machines also.

1700. How many members have you?—7,000.

1701. Does your Union extend over the whole country?—It does; we have 100 branches.

1702. All over the country?—Yes.

1703. Would you tell us the criticisms that you have to make on the Fair Wages Clause in contracts?—The Fair Wages Clause which is inserted in the furniture contracts does not carry out the purpose of the House of Commons Resolution; in my proof I give the headings of my reasons.

1704. Perhaps you will go over them in your own words now?—As a matter of fact, in our trade we have found the difficulty of trying to prevent sweating, and unfair competition, principally in relation to Government and public work. Even after the Resolution was carried in the House of Commons and the Fair Wages Clause was inserted in the contract, we yet found that what we term the unfair employer of labour was able to tender for this Government work, and for public work generally; and it got to such a pitch that ultimately the fair employer, as we call him, would not attempt to tender—he was obviously out of it. So that the fair, decent, reputable firms, who would under ordinary circumstances perhaps be delighted to do Government work, abstain from doing it now, because they have not any chance at all, except upon particular or special work. What we term the ordinary unfair or sweating firm would not attempt to tender for that class of work, because he could not carry it out. He would not have sufficiently skilled workmen, nor adequate machinery, nor would he be able to get the requisite material for the special work that the Government may want. So he leaves that small portion of the work to the reputable firms, and they get it in the ordinary way, and probably with not very many competitors for the contract. Time after time we have tried to bring these firms to book. I myself have written to the Government Offices times without number—to the War Department, to the Admiralty, and to the Office of Works, and we have never been able to bring these people to book. Inquiries have been made after the protest has been lodged; then I get the ordinary official reply back, stating that inquiries have been made, and they have to say that the contractor in question is acting within the terms of the Fair Wages Clause, as he is paying the current rates of the district. See how unfairly that applies in London—I do not know whether it is wise for me to give the names of the firms?

1705. It is not necessary, I think?—There is a firm, for instance, in a street close to Curtain Road, which is practically the furniture district for London—speaking of the ordinary furniture. This firm had a Government contract to make writing tables——

1706. (Mr. Bailey.) For which Department?—For the War Office. At that time Mr. Arnold-Forster was the War Minister, and I think I lodged about five or six complaints at the War Office. Ultimately I thought it would be wiser if I could get before some of the officials of the Department, and before Mr. Arnold-Forster himself if it was at all possible, and plead the case in person and try to prove it. I pressed the point, and subsequently they sent down a special commissioner. Naturally the War Minister, being a busy man, probably thought the work would be equally well done if he sent down a special man to investigate the complaint. I think he was inquiring into the complaint for something like three weeks; constantly coming back to me and getting information whenever he had been bothered by a firm when making his inquiries, and also in order to get corrected upon certain points. He went away and he presented his report, and about two or three months afterwards, I will not be sure which, the reply came back to me. They said that upon the report of their special commissioner they had to declare that the firm was acting within the terms of the Fair Wages Clause, and even was paying more than the current rates. It just happened that within an area probably of half-a-mile of that firm it was a nest of sweat shops; and, as a matter of fact, this particular firm that I complained of was actually paying more than the other employers in the neighbourhood. The whole of that neighbourhood was a sweat neighbourhood, and so "fair wages" or "current rates," as I declare in my proof, absolutely mean sweating wages.

1707. (Chairman.) In fact the "current rate" was too low; that is what you would say?—The current rate was considerably lower than what we say was the current rate in London.

1708. (Mr. Bailey.) I suppose "current rate" would be hardly the term to apply to so small an area?—It would not be the current rate at all, in my judgment, because it would be simply taking a particular black spot as far as wages are concerned in London, and saying that the rate there was the current rate.

1709. That is what I meant?—I think this will appeal to you: We have an agreement with the Employers' Federation that certain rates and conditions of employment shall operate within a radius of 12 miles of Charing Cross; this particular firm was well within the 12-mile radius, and there was no other firm in London of any repute at all which could think of tendering for that job against the firm that got it.

1710. (Mr. Wilson Fox.) It was in breach of the arrangement entered into between you and the Employers' Association then?—Exactly. We argued that that employer ought to be made to pay the same rate as our agreement outlined in London.

1711. (Chairman.) In point of fact, it was not the current rate of the London district, but the current rate of a small area within it?—That is so. We argued, as a matter of fact, that our rate ought to be considered the current rate, the Trade Union rate, because it is a compact between the organised employers in their Federation and the organised men in their Union.

1712. (Mr. Wilson Fox.) Might I ask whether that particular firm belonged to the Employers' Federation? It did not.

1713. (Chairman.) The answer of the Department, you say, was that they were paying the current rate, and above the current rate in this case, meaning by that the rate paid in this comparatively small area?—Yes, and therefore it came within the provisions of the Fair Wages Clause.

1714. Have you any other cases in which the Clause has been evaded?—I could cite five special cases. Perhaps a more glaring one still would be that of a firm in Limehouse who are constantly in the habit of getting Government contract work for map-cases and writing-tables.

1715. (Mr. Bailey.) For what Department?—For the War Office again, and in some cases for the Admiralty. Usually, when I find that this firm has a Government contract, I interview them, as I do not want to lodge a complaint before I try to persuade the firm that they ought to pay what I consider to be the current rates, that is, the Trade Union rates. I have here some information given me by the manager of that firm. We began to talk about conditions, and so on, and he absolutely admitted to me that the wages of the men even upon piece-work—by the way, our system is day-work or hour-work, and the firms I am mentioning now, all of them, work piece-work—was 33 per cent. below that which it was stated in our working agreement with the employers, the men ought to take. This is a big machine firm, which buys material as cheaply as any other employer, and it has all the machinery requisite to do the work—perhaps more than some of the more reputable firms; and yet he was able to tender, taking all things into consideration, at 33 per cent. cheaper than, for instance, a firm like Waring's—I will mention the name of a firm now—or a firm like Shoolbred's.

1716. (Chairman.) Was this in the same district as the first case you mentioned?—It would be quite two miles from the first case I mentioned.

1717. It looks then as if that restricted area in which the lower rates were paid is larger than I had gathered from your first case?—The point is this: In that case I complained, and an investigation was again made. They took an area round the shop, the same as they did in the first case; they went and inquired, I suppose, of about a dozen or so firms in this case, and they found that the firm I am now speaking of paid about the same rates as other firms, and they concluded, therefore, that the firm was paying the current rates. They do not map out an area at all; they simply go about making inquiries. They find that there may be other firms round this particular firm paying the same, and then they say: "This firm is paying the current rates." The first case I mentioned is very suggestive, however. Any one who knows Shoreditch, knows there are dozens and dozens of small firms—hundreds almost—within an area of half-a-mile of Rivington Street and Curtain Road. But in the other case further East there are not so many cabinet firms, and in that case, as I said, they inquired of certain firms—probably about a dozen—and compared the rates, and they came to the conclusion, in spite of the fact that the rates were, according to the table of wages, 33 per cent. below our agreement with the Employers' Association, that that firm was paying the current rates as per the terms of the Fair Wages Clause. Here is a case where firms of equal magnitude, from the point of view of the number of men employed and the amount of machinery that they have, many of them reputable firms, who are paying our rates, for instance, 10½d. per hour; and this firm, from the point of view of wages alone, will have the advantage by 33 per cent. in wages when tendering. I know cases where firms will not attempt to tender for Government work; if they are asked to do it, or if tenders are sent them, they will tear them up and put them into the waste-paper basket, and say the game is not worth the candle.

1718. Should you say, generally speaking, that the Government contracts in this trade go to the unfair houses?—I should say that generally that is so. Of course, I exclude special work from that category altogether. In all these cases there is what is known as special work, which ordinary firms would not be asked to tender for; as a matter of fact, they could not do it.

1719. Which Departments do the largest business in this list?—The Admiralty and the War Office. Here is another case—this time in connection with the Admiralty. It is the case of a firm at Forest Gate, and I will sum up the facts after I have placed them before you. They were doing work for the Admiralty, making what is known as lockers—that would be making chests of drawers, really, for the ships, and so on.

1720. (Mr Black.) Is this a recent case?—This is two years ago. I only want to cite this case for a particular purpose. I went down and complained to the firm that they were not observing what I considered to be the terms of the Fair Wages Clause, and I suppose I paid about a dozen visits. I complained to the Admiralty, and nothing was done in the matter. The men were working piece-work there, and the price for making this Admiralty work was so low that even non-Union men struck, and they came along and asked me to handle the strike. Subsequently, within a very short period of time as a matter of fact, the firm went into the Bankruptcy Court. I suppose almost 75 per cent. of the work that they did in that particular factory was for the Government Departments. I think I am not saying too much when I say that the low price at which they tendered and obtained that work drove them into the Bankruptcy Court. The test for that Government work is very severe from the point of view of the material, having regard to the fact that the articles have to lie in a certain warehouse and to be subjected to a certain temperature. If you do Government work under those conditions at a low price, the inevitable result is the Bankruptcy Court for any firm that attempts it.

1721. (Chairman.) Do you say that the answer you got in that case was not satisfactory?—That is so. You see, all the trouble arises over the question of what is the interpretation of the fair wage.

1722. What is the meaning of the "current rate," in fact?—That is so.

1723. Is your suggestion that it should be the rate agreed upon by the workmen and the employers in the district?—I think that to avoid any possibility of getting round the purpose of the Resolution, it ought to be "Trade Union rates and conditions."

1724. What is the difference between that and the formula that I suggested?—There may be different rates prevailing. Where there is no Union, one firm would pay one rate for the making of an article and another firm would pay probably 5 per cent. less, and the probability is that that 5 per cent. less would be a much fairer rate than the rate the other employer was paying to his workmen.

1725. If there is no Union, there can be no Union rate?—There is no standard of calculation—that is my point; there is no guide in the matter.

1726. The standard you suggest is the Union rate?—Yes.

1727. But if there is no Union, there can be no Union rate?—That is so.

1728. How would you propose to meet that difficulty where there is no Union?—I think that in all the great industries you would always get a Union rate and in case there was no Union rate in the particular locality, what I suggest would be that the guide should be the Union rate which exists in the nearest town.

1729. However far away?—It would not be very far For all practical purposes, that would cover the difficulty.

1730. Suppose it was a question of fixing the rate in a country district: should that be the same as the rate in the nearest town?—I believe that if you have "Trade Union rate" in the Clause, what would happen would be this: the employers themselves would see to getting an understanding with the workmen, and the only way they could get that understanding would be through the Union.

1731. If it was in a rural district with no other employer of the same kind within reach, I suppose there would be no Union there?—Speaking for our own trade, that does not exist.

1732. Your work is all done in towns, I suppose?—I could go over England, Scotland and Wales, and at the very outside there would not be half a dozen firms that would be isolated in a rural district.

1732*a*. Would you say, for instance, that the rate at High Wycombe ought to be the same as in London?—No.

1733. Does your Union extend to High Wycombe?—It does.

1734. Have you got an agreed rate there?—Not just yet, but we are trying to get one. We allow each locality to fix up its own agreements with its own particular group of employers.

1735. Have you any other suggestion to make with regard to the alteration of the Clause?—No. I think if those words, "the Trade Union rates of wages and conditions," were inserted, it would bring about, as I say, that uniformity of interpretation which would be a guide in the whole business. If they were inserted, I believe it would absolutely end sweating altogether, and put each employer upon an equality when tendering for this work.

1735*a*. But still it would not meet the difficulty of there being no Trade Union rate either in the place or in the district?—Of course, it is a question of weighing the advantages against the disadvantages. As far as our trade is concerned, there are not half a dozen factories in England, Scotland and Wales that are isolated in that respect. If we take Scotland, there are a lot of small towns along what I believe is known as the Glasgow valley, towns like Lochwinnoch, Beith, Dalry, Stewarton and Ayr, and so on, who have an understanding with the Scottish Manufacturers' Association.

1736. (Mr. Bailey.) Have you one at Kirkcaldy?—Yes, covered by the agreement with the Scottish Manufacturers' Association. So you see, "Trade Union rates of wages," as far as Scotland is concerned, in our trade will cover the point. There are but few places in Scotland of the character mentioned by the Chairman, and these would be also covered by the agreement named. Coming to England, I know of none with the exception of Driffield and Barnstaple.

1737. Are they not covered?—No, they are not covered by the Trade Union, and there are only two firms in question there.

1738. There is a large firm in Barnstaple?—And there is a large firm in Driffield. Those are the only two that I know of. I would say that in those cases it ought to be ruled that the Trade Union rate of the nearest town should operate.

1739. (Chairman.) Would it meet your view if the formula was "the Trade Union rate as agreed upon by employers and workmen"?—Yes. In fact, there could not be any other rate unless it was agreed upon, and no uniform general agreement is possible unless made with a Trade Union. I would accept that as far as I was personally concerned.

1740. How would that operate in the case of a place where there was a single firm only, and that firm were obdurate, and refused to come to any agreement?—I should say that in that case the rate of the nearest town should operate. I believe that the employers themselves generally would agree to this.

1741. (Mr. Wilson Fox.) But supposing this particular employer would not. Could you not get an agreement with the Employers' Association in the nearest town not that the rate ruling in that town should necessarily be paid, but to decide with you what would be the fair rate in this country district which might be twenty miles away from that town?—That would not be fair to employers in the nearest town.

1742. (Mr. Bailey.) Provided the solitary employer in the solitary town did not come to an agreement in the first place?—That is so. I do not think that is a practical difficulty at all. As a matter of fact, there is a spirit existing in our own trade, that no employer likes it to be thought that his firm is an unfair firm. I want to say of these isolated firms, that they would be only too glad to be known as firms who had got Government contracts, because they had agreed, for instance, to pay the rate operating in the nearest town to them.

1743. (Chairman.) One of the commonest complaints we have heard—and we are told that it happens very often—is that a firm leaves a town where there is an agreed rate, and goes to a district where there is none, and then this difficulty arises, what is the current rate in that district?—My own experience—of course, in my own industry—is that the firms who do leave the large industrial centres to go into the rural districts, do so largely because of the question of ground rent and taxes, and not so much from the point of view of the cost of labour.

1744. However, you would be satisfied with the Clause as it stands, if, instead of the current rate of the district, there was substituted "the Trade Union rate as agreed upon by employers and workmen"?—Yes.

1745. Have you any suggestions to make outside the Clause?—Yes. In the first place, we never know until some considerable time after what firms get these contracts. This present Government have been approached, I think, by the Parliamentary Committee of the Trade Union Congress, and an arrangement has been arrived at by which, for instance, I, as an official of my Associaiton, have been supplied with blank tender forms, the name of the firm not being there. The only information we have been able to get was the nature of the contract and the specification. Then we had to watch and see who ultimately got the contract. That was altered, and we were then sent on application a list of the firms who were asked to tender. Even that did not help us much, because, very often, before we actually discovered the employer was unfair, or before we could bring the proof home to the Government Departments, the contract was finished, and, as a matter of fact, I do not suppose anybody cared to interfere then. Often when there were complaints made, I gave this reply to my own executive committee, or to our men: "We could not do anything in this particular case; all that I hope is that the result of our complaints will be that this firm will be careful in future when they tender, or will not be asked to tender at all." I think a way out of the difficulty would be for the Government Departments to be plain about it. I do not see any reason for secrecy in the matter at all, I mean dealing with general work; of course, I know there are reasons in other directions for secrecy. But with regard to these contracts, there is no reason for secrecy as far as I can see, and as soon as firms get these contracts their names and addresses, their title and so on ought to be published in the "Labour Gazette." Of course, I know that even that is a slow process, but, still, I think it would be a great advance.

1746. (Mr. Wilson Fox.) It is a five weeks' process practically?—Yes; but then the contract may be obtained only two weeks before the "Gazette" comes out, and it would only be a fortnight in that case. Even in the case you put, it would be an advantage.

1747. (Chairman.) What you would like, in fact, would be early notice of the names of the people who get the contract?—I think the public ought to have it generally.

1748. It would not interest anybody except your Union, I suppose?—It does. It interests other employers who do not happen to get the contract. I have heard employers say, "We never get a contract; something has happened; I do not know why this chap is able to tender below us," and all the rest. If the information was given, I know the employers would not go beyond ascertaining whether the firm was a decent firm.

1749. (Mr. Black.) They would not go to work to find out that firm's prices, for example?—No.

1750. Do you not think that in some trades they would?—No; and even then, if you have the Trade Union rate operating, it would not matter much.

1751. That would only cover the labour, it would not cover the material and other things?—Even in that case it is generally known what you can buy timber at, unless you can make a cheap deal. But I do not think they would inquire into matters of that kind.

1752. (Chairman.) Have you any other suggestion beyond that?—In our own trade there is the question of the practical designers of furniture. I confess, speaking as a practical man, that I have been appalled at some of the atrocious designs in Government furniture. They are a sore to the eye. To my idea, apart from the question of outline and taste in this matter——

1753. I think this is getting rather outside our business?—I am just coming to my point now. Apart from that altogether, the reason why I make the suggestion is this: that the people who design this furniture for the Government, whoever they are, and who get up the specifications, insert a lot of technical points in the contract in regard to methods of construction that are absolutely useless. Many employers—and I am speaking now from experience of conversation with them—have complained to me as a practical man, as to what is insisted upon in the method of construction. They have asked me my opinion as to whether it was requisite, and what I thought of it. I have characterised it in the main as being absolutely stupid and useless. I insist that the Government ought to get the best of work; in fact, all public bodies ought to get the best of work, and they ought to pay for it and see to it that fair wages are paid for labour and so on. That can be done without all these useless technical points; and I would suggest that probably the work would be cheaper—but that is another thing. Certainly it would be just as useful as it is at the present moment, if many of these technical points in construction did not exist.

1754. In short, you think the specifications might be improved?—I think they might be largely improved by simplification.

1755. Have you any more suggestions to make?—Then there is the question of those who inspect the furniture. I do not want to say this except as a practical man, I mean I do not want to say anything against the officials themselves as individuals. I am simply talking now of their knowledge. I must confess that apparently they have very little knowledge of our trade, from the point of view of the practical working of the trade. Here again the employers tell me, and the workmen tell me—I get this from both sides in this case—that much of their work is rejected because of flaws that are not flaws. Take the question of timber as an example of what I mean. A man who is not practical will probably reject a splendidly made article of furniture, because of what he conceives to be a certain flaw in the timber, for which the technical word would be "sap," whereas it may not be "sap" at all, but simply discoloured by some means or other. The polisher in that case could easily make that right; but even suppose it was overlooked, still it would not affect the article one jot; I mean rot would not set in, worms would not attack it, and so on. Then there is the question of the make of the stuff, and I regret to say that in our trade—I suppose we have been driven to it—there is a great deal of faking done, and while a practical man could detect that faking, the man who was not practical could not do it.

1756. Do you think the inspectors do not detect it?—I will be fair and say that in many cases they do detect it. But in many cases they do not detect it, and in many other cases they detect things that they ought to let pass.

1757. (Mr. Black.) In many cases they do detect actual fakes, do they not—you will give them that amount of credit, will you not?—Yes, I should give them that credit. Then there is the question of the tests for furniture being too severe. I presume the Committee know pretty well that I am simply dealing with my own trade. If one were to ask that ordinary furniture should be subjected to the tests that the Government applies, I am afraid the cost would be tremendous, indeed, I think we should have to put up the cost so much that nobody would buy furniture, or else they would attempt to make it for themselves in a way. I understand that at Woolwich, for instance, chairs and tables and desks, and so on, have to be kept in a place for anything from three months to six months, and are subjected to certain tests of heat, draughts, and so on. Then, I understand, if at the end of the particular period, whether three months or six months, the furniture happens to have gone a bit in any particulars—if the joints have gone, or if the material has twisted a little, and all that kind of thing, as furniture always will do, you exact a penalty. But you are asking for that which is impossible, if you set up that standard.

1758. Do you really state that as a fact? Is it not paid for till after it has been lying all this time in Woolwich subject to this time test, and the other tests?—I will not be certain about that.

1759. Is that not for the purpose of guaranteeing that it will last a certain time? I daresay you are aware of the Admiralty practice; that is, that we pass nearly all this stuff at the works, and there is no further question about it, but we take it then with such defects as we can discover in it; so that with us there is no necessity whatever for the time test?—That is not so at the War Office.

1760. Are you quite sure that it is not a guarantee that the furniture will remain good and serviceable for a certain period, because it seems an extraordinary thing to keep it all that time?—Even if that were so, the tests are too severe.

1761. (Chairman.) I think it is hardly worth while pursuing this point, as it does not concern us very much. We may take it, I gather, that in your opinion, the Government inspection and the Government tests are too severe in some directions and too lax in others?—Yes.

1762. Is there any other suggestion you would make?—None that comes within your reference. In regard to these points that I have brought before you, I think the Clause in the furniture contract might be extended to cover them, and perhaps if the Clause were elaborated a little more so as to cover those particular points, it would be all right.

1763. (Mr. King.) Would you say that a rate was "accepted" by employers and workmen where only a small percentage of the employers had agreed with the workmen?—Yes. In that case I would say so, providing the employers themselves were in an association.

1764. Supposing there were 20 employers in a town and six of them agreed with the workmen's Union, would you say that was an accepted rate in that town and enforce it on the other 14, or at least ask the Government to enforce it on the other 14?—I would in that case.

1765. If it went as low as three, what would you say then?—Yes, I would in the case of three.

1766. Or one?—Yes. We are dealing with fair wages; it is not a question of current conditions at all.

1767. You would not say, if there was not one employer accepted it, that it was the accepted rate, would you?—No.

1768. You must have the one?—Yes, one or any higher number.

1769. (Mr. Black.) The Clause speaks particularly of employing skilled workmen, but I think there is a certain amount of joinery, not of the best kind, which is being done by machinery, and it is just a question sometimes whether that is establishing itself as a practice that can be approved of or not, and it leads to the employment of cheaper labour sometimes—men who are practically machine-minders, and not skilled joiners and mechanics. Of course, I rule out here all the best class of joinery work; we are quite agreed on that point, that skilled workmen only should be employed; but what do you say about the case I put to you?—Even in our trade you must have skilled machinists. There is no sentiment about it; the employer himself would prefer in that class of work to employ skilled machinists, because it pays him best.

1770. The point I want to get at is at what point the Trade Union is recognising the skilled machinist as replacing the skilled mechanic who worked entirely by hand?—So long as the skilled machinist who is employed is paid the rate that is established for working the machine, that is all right.

1771. But that is not necessarily the same rate as that which is paid to the skilled mechanic who is working entirely with hand tools?—No, not exactly.

1772. With machinists there is generally a slightly lower rate, sometimes a considerably lower rate?—As far as we are concerned in London our machinists' rates are higher than cabinet-makers'. In the provinces the machinists' rates, generally speaking, can be said to be the same, if not a little higher, but generally the same as the rates of cabinet-makers, or chair-makers, or joiners.

1773. Is that accepted by the Employers' Association and by the employers generally?—Yes. I may say that we fix up what we call a code of working rules in any town like Birmingham or Manchester. The probability is that there would be no mention of machinery there, but the men upon the machines would get about the same rate. It works out in this way. Sometimes a cabinet-maker, or a chair-maker, is asked to go from the bench to the machine, and having a greater knowledge of the construction of the work, after a while he will make the best machinist. That has brought about this condition of things, that the same rates as the cabinet-maker would have would operate upon the machinist generally.

1774. Touching this special case that you have mentioned, which you referred to the Admiralty a few years ago you said, would it be as far back as four years, do you think? I think we had a case then of a Forest Gate firm, and we found that they were not paying the proper prices in certain cases, but we insisted on their granting certain advances, and we wrote to your Association something to that effect?—I am speaking of a case of four years ago.

1775. My note here is as to the upholstery side of it?—I have nothing at all to do with the upholstery. I was dealing with the making of chests and lockers, and so on. I do not have any recollection of your sending a reply back, but I remember my friend the General Secretary of the Upholsterers did tell me that he had got some good out of the whole thing.

1776. (Mr. Wilson Fox.) Is it among the small firms that you find what you call the sweating rates?—No.

1777. You began your evidence by mentioning a district where there are a very large number of small firms within half a mile?—That is so.

1778. I rather understood from you that it was among that class of small firms that you found that what you call unfair rates were being paid?—I cited two cases, one the case of a firm in Limehouse, as large a firm probably as there is in London.

1779. I only want to get the facts, as I do not know myself what is your experience. Is it among these small firms that you get your chief trouble about low rates of wages?—No, I should say that, although, of course, they are greater in number. As a matter of fact, it is with the large firms we get the trouble as well.

1780. You say the Trade Union rate of wages should be paid. I will not deal with that, because Sir George Murray has dealt with it exhaustively. But you add the words "and conditions." What conditions have you got in your mind, apart from rates of wages?—For instance, there is the question of piece-work and day-work.

1781. But that is all connected with payment?—No. It is the system of work; it is a condition of the employment.

1782. In what way, I mean apart from piece-work rates?—Some agreements with the employers have a statement to the effect that no piece-work is permitted, and then it becomes a condition. Some working agreements would have it otherwise. Then day-work is a system of work, and anything relating to the system of work would come under the heading of conditions. Another condition would be the question of hours.

1783. Do you want the hours added?—The "conditions" would cover the whole thing. In the Trade Union movement, when we fix up an understanding with the employers, it refers to rates of wages and conditions. It ought to have following it "of employment"—"conditions of employment"—but for shortness we simply say "rates of wages and conditions."

1784. That is what I mean; you consider that not only rates of wages, but any conditions which you and the employers sign, should be regarded as compulsory upon all employers employed by the Government?—That is so.

1785. Might I put this consideration to you to discuss? I can quite understand a trade union claiming that fair wages should be paid, and asking the Government to pay them. The object of Trade Unions now, I understand, is to get, in addition, through the Fair Wages Clause, certain conditions for the men who are actually employed on the Government work?—Yes.

1786. That would include rates of pay as one condition, and it might also be made to include hours?—Yes.

1787. It is not in the Fair Wages Clause now, but I can understand that it might be urged that the men in particular works were being employed on too long hours. But when you get beyond that, that is when you get past the wages and past the hours, and you get on to certain conditions such as the limitation of apprentices, the employment of women, and so forth, that is a class of conditions which does not affect only the men employed on Government work in the same way as the hours and the wages do; that class of conditions deals more with the general conditions in, say, the whole furnishing trade, and your proposals may, from a Trade Union point of view, be excellent conditions, having regard to the present and the future organisation of your trade and its condition generally, but they do not appear to me to affect so directly the workmen actually employed on Government work as the question of hours and wages. I want to put this consideration to you: Is not the endeavour to get conditions such as I have mentioned, apart from wages and hours, through the Fair Wages Clause, rather using the Fair Wages Clause for something beyond that which the Fair Wages Clause hitherto has been intended to secure, namely, fair conditions of wages, and perhaps hours, for the men directly employed on Government work? I want to ask you whether you are not trying to secure certain conditions which may embody excellent Trade Union principles, but which may be going a good deal beyond what hitherto has been the object and purpose of the Fair Wages Clause?—No.

1788. I want you to discuss that and give me your view of that?—I must confess I do not see why the proposition is advanced at all.

1789. I raised it on your term "conditions"; I want to find out how far you are going when you use the word "conditions?"—An agreement is entered into between the workmen's association on the one side, and the employers' association on the other; that is a set of conditions known as a code of working rules. You can quite see that if the whole of those conditions were not insisted upon, as I have asked shall be done in the Fair Wages Clause, an employer doing the work may break away from those conditions. He may increase the apprenticeship, he may increase the limit of overtime, and he may increase the number of hours at which overtime should begin to operate. Then we have a certain condition that for the first two hours' overtime, time-and-a-quarter should be paid, and the employer may make it that for the first three hours it shall be paid.

1790. These would be conditions which would mainly affect wages, would they not?—Well, take the question of the limitation of boy labour, for instance. Our rules say one boy to every three fully-paid workmen. An employer may say I will have two to every five fully-paid workmen. You are bound, in other words, to ask for the very same conditions to operate with regard to Government work as operate with regard to outside work. The whole point is this, that if by any manner of means—this is my experience with employers outside—we let slip one of those particular conditions with any employer for certain reasons, the whole of the employers naturally want the same, and the whole conditions thereby are whittled away. Therefore, we cannot recede from that position.

1791. The Fair Wages Clause may be used, and I believe has been used or was intended to be used, in order to secure fair rates of wages to the men employed on Government work, and not to further general Trade Union principles?—May I point out that, after all, the question of conditions has got nothing to do with Trade Union principles?

1792. Would you not say that the limitation of apprentices was a general Trade Union principle in certain trades?—No.

1793. Why would you not say that?—Trade Unionism has been successful in getting that, but it has nothing to do with the principles of Trade Unionism. That is one of the effects of combination; but to say, because one of the effects of combination has been to bring about a better condition of things in a trade, that that is a principle upon which a Trade Union is based, seems to me to be outside the mark altogether.

1794. The limitation of apprentices in a particular shop may not affect those particular men who were doing Government work, although it would affect your whole Trade Union, I dare say?—Why would it not affect those men who are doing the Government work?

1795. Because it might be such a very small thing in a particular shop?—We find those small things have led to bigger things, and so have whittled away the conditions.

1796. But it would not minimise the earnings or detract from the comfort of any single man employed in a particular factory, would it?—Supposing, for instance, an employer in London obtained a Government contract, our rule now being one boy to every three fully-paid workmen——

1797. You are talking of apprentices now?—I am talking about the limitation of boy labour—and suppose he were to say, "As this rule does not operate with regard to Government contracts, instead of having one boy to every three fully-paid men, I will take two to every five men"—or something like that, and so whittle it down; or he might say, "I will keep two men on and I will apprentice three more boys," and so on—the thing would be spread in that manner, and then it would affect the wages of the men.

1798. But unless that employer had a continuous Government contract in hand year by year he could not do that at all, could he?—Supposing he had a Government contract lasting only a month—to take an extreme case—and he found that the condition with regard to boy labour did not apply to that contract, then he might take on a large number of boys for that contract.

1799. As apprentices only though?—It is not reasonable to expect when that contract is finished that he is going to discharge those boys again.

1800. No; but I rather suggest he could hardly take them on for a short contract; he would have to get regular Government work to do before he could take them on?—Supposing he did it with the avowed purpose of breaking up the Union conditions—I have known such cases happen. There was a case of a particular employer who got a number of boys in—he was careful in their selection, naturally, and he was an acute practical man—and suddenly apprenticed them, indentured them properly and legally. When we came round with our rule with regard to boy-labour he said, "Oh! what can I do? I have got these lads apprenticed, and I cannot send them away." In that case we had to take up this position: "Now you will not engage any more apprentices until they are brought within the figures as incorporated in the agreement."

1801. I still put it to you that the limitation of apprentices is a general Trade Union policy or principle, but not a matter directly affecting the wages and hours of a man employed on Government work in a particular shop?—I do not know what you mean by that. If you say that one of the purposes of the Union is to minimise sweating by limiting the number of boys and the number of women in the trade, that is all right; but that has nothing to do with the fundamental principles of Trade Unionism, it would be a result of Trade Union effort. Any number of men who may not call themselves a Trade Union at all can effect the same kind of thing if they are sufficiently strong in combination.

1802. I do not want to carry this too far, though one might suggest that the employment of boys and apprentices may not necessarily be for the purpose of sweating, and might result in good for the trade when lads had passed through their apprenticeship and had become efficient workmen?—Shall I give you a reply?

1803. I think that I know what your reply is?—I wish to give you the reply that an employer made to us in Manchester. I think if you got it from the other side, it would show you that, after all, in this matter there are common grounds of agreement.

1804. Please do tell us?—We were asked why, after all, we limited the number of boys. We said that usually in our trade it takes a boy five to seven years to learn the trade, and the ordinary life of an average workmen is about 20 years from the time he becomes a man. This employer then said, "In that case you ought to say one boy to every four workmen; you are quite reasonable in asking one to every three workmen." So he admitted we were fair and reasonable; in fact, he said we ought to have asked for one to four. However, one to three is the agreement, and there it stands. That is the position taken by one of the biggest employers in our own trade in Manchester—one of the most reputable of the firms.

1805. Your point, as I understand it, is, that whatever conditions are agreed upon and carried into practice with the consent of the employers and of the workmen's representatives, those should be embodied in the Government contracts?—Yes. I do not know whether I have one of those agreements in my pocket; you have seen them, of course.

1806. I have got them here?—That is the kind of thing we mean; it is signed by a number of employers and a number of workmen. (Handing in a print.) But we want "current rates" struck out of the Clause, or we say these (pointing to the print) ought to be considered as meaning "current rates and conditions."

1807. (Chairman.) Why do you lay so much stress on the limitation of the number of boys and apprentices?—There are many reasons for it. Perhaps the main reason is that the boy may be taught the trade better and more completely. I should not care to apprentice my boy in any shop where there was a large number of apprentices, because I know he could not get proper attention. That is one reason.

1808. But that is his affair as an individual workman rather than yours as a Trades Unionist, is it not?—No; because the employers charge us with having a large number of incompetent men floating about. I tell the employers it is their fault, because they have not taught the boys properly, as they ought to teach them. After all, we feel that this charge which is made against us is made too frequently without a knowledge of the subject, and it is sometimes made by the general public, because of their ignorance of the matter. We resent this altogether, and we do want our boys who are apprenticed to our trade to be properly taught the trade as far as circumstances will allow. In a machine shop it could not be expected that a boy would get a large amount of knowledge of cabinet making.

1809. Then your answer is that it is in the interests of the education of the workmen?—I would rather put it in another way. This trade of ours—when I say "ours" I do not mean that we are going to exclude anybody from it, and also when I say "ours" I mean it is as much the employers' as the workmen's trade; and I want frankly to say that if I do not possess a certain amount of practical skill I ought to have it, as I was apprenticed in the old-fashioned way, and, as such a man, I want to see the making of shoddy furniture made impossible. One way to do that is by training our young boys to be craftsmen; another way is, of course, to educate the public opinion and taste for decent furniture. Those two things are inseparably connected. That is the reason why I take up this position.

1810 and 1811. I understand that now. What would you say to the employment of women?—That is a big question. For instance, there is the question of the handling of the articles. No women could be employed in cabinet making, from the physical point of view. Indeed, I would say that no woman ought to be employed in cabinet making, or in chair making.

1812. (Mr. Wilson Fox.) They do the upholstery, I suppose?—I do not think any women ought to be employed in what we know in the trade as upholstery work. There are sections of upholstery work where women are employed, and we call them upholsterers, but they are not upholsterers in the sense that the men are. A woman will put the gimp round the chair—that is the gold cord that goes round; she will sew that on, or in the case of saddle bags, she would stitch them up; then she would stitch carpets or bind carpets or something in connection with that; and she would be called an upholstress. But with regard to upholstery work proper, I say no women ought to be allowed to work at what we workmen call upholstery work.

1813. (Chairman.) Your objection, in fact, is on the ground that they are not physically capable of doing it?—That is so.

1813*a*. You are not objecting to their doing any work that they are physically capable of doing?—Not at all if the proper rates are paid.

1813*b*. Even if it had the effect of ousting men from any branch of the trade?—No. But there is a point about French polishing. It is perfectly true that women are ousting men from that trade, which is a section of our industry, and I would prohibit women from following that trade; not because there is any physical hardship involved.

1814. What is the objection connected with French polishing?—Because they are constantly in an atmosphere of alcohol. I have worked at it myself, and I know that you get what is known in the trade as a muzzy, sleepy, tired feeling; in fact, you are impregnated with alcohol. It is like a man living in the public-house that he keeps; he is always living in the fumes.

1815. Then all your objections to the employment of women are really on physical grounds?—Yes, that would be so 1816. You have no objection where the work is such that women can properly do it?—I should have no objection at all provided the proper rates are paid.

1817. Have you made any complaints to the different Government Departments about your grievances?—Yes, very many.

1818. Have you generally got a satisfactory reply?—I was trying to think whether I ever did get a satisfactory reply. I think I should be safe in saying that in 95 per cent. of the cases in which I have complained, I got absolutely unsatisfactory replies.

1819. Would you mind when you are correcting your evidence, sending in a list of the complaints you have made, with a brief note of the answers you got for, say, three or four years back: would that be possible?—Yes, for five years. You would not deal with the smaller complaints. I suppose you would want the complaints involving a large amount of work?

1820. I should rather like a note of all your complaints that related to the Clause in the contract. I do not suppose there would be more than 20 or 30?—I could not say what number there would be, but I will look it up and let you have the information, but not, of course, for publication.

The witness withdrew.

SIXTH DAY.

Thursday, January 9th, 1908.

At 32, Great George Street, Westminster, S.W.

PRESENT:

Sir GEORGE H. MURRAY, K.C.B. (Chairman).

Mr. R Bailey, M.V.O.
Mr. F. W. Black.
Mr. H. De la Bère, C.B.
Mr. J. H. Hillier.
Mr. A. F. King.
Mr. J. J. Wills (Secretary).

Mr. Joseph George Dibdin, called, and examined.

1821. (Chairman.) You represent the Electrical Trades Union?—Yes.

1822. What sort of trades do you include in your union?—Everything concerning electrical work; that is, electrical wiremen, armature winders, cable jointers, and so on.

1823. Do you include what one may call the cabinet-making part of it?—No.

1824. Only those who are concerned with the metal work, then?—We are really confined to what you may call the conducting part of the business.

1825. Is yours a London union?—No; it is a union for the whole of the country.

1826. (Mr. Bailey.) Including Scotland and Ireland?—Yes. I am representing the whole of the union, but I am the London District Secretary.

1827. (Chairman.) How many members have you got?—About 2,300, I think it is.

1828. Are most of them in London, or not?—The largest number are in Manchester.

1829. Have you any criticisms to make on the Fair Wages Clause in Government contracts?—Yes. Generally speaking, we are strongly of opinion that the Fair Wages Clause as it stands now is more or less a farce, as far as the Government contracts are concerned. The contractors generally are called upon to pay a fair wage, as it is called, on the contracts which they get for Government work, but we wish to try to impress upon this Committee that these contractors should be in the habit of paying it; anyhow, it should be their custom to pay the recognised rates to all their workers previous to getting contracts for the Government—not only that they should pay those rates from the moment that they come on to the Government contracts.

1830. You began by saying that the Fair Wages Clause was a farce as regards Government contracts; but what you mean rather is that it is a farce as regards other work, is not that so?—I will explain what I mean exactly. When we have a complaint—and we have had several, but I have only got three or four here, one or two of which I have been inquiring into myself to find out the real cause—we have made that complaint and sent it through to the contractor first. As a rule, we do not get any satisfaction; and in some cases, in fact, we were totally ignored. Then we send it to the Government department concerned, and invariably, beyond the acknowledgment of the receipt of the letter, the thing goes over a course of anything up to three or four months before we get a decided answer. That allows the contractor to entirely finish the job, and to go away, and in all probability to be paid for it, before there is any satisfaction got by us—in fact, in that way there is no satisfaction got at all.

1831. You complain of the delay in dealing with your representations, in fact, then?—Yes. That is why I say the whole thing ends in a farce. We consider—and I believe that other trade unions would be of the same opinion—that the term "fair wage" is wrong, and that it should be "the trade union rate current in the district," because a contractor can call anything a fair wage, unless he has got somebody looking after him.

1832. The contracts do not say anything about "fair" wages, do they?—The Government contracts do.

1833. I was putting it to you that they do not?—There are some that do.

1834. The expression used in the contracts is not "fair wages," is it?—I would not answer for that.

1835. As a matter of fact, the expression generally used, I think, is "the rate current in the district"?—Well, you can put it that way; but we are working on the Fair Wages Clause—the Government Resolution.

1836. Do you know what the Resolution says?—Yes; I think that is as near as I can recollect it now.

1837. Do you object to the expression "the rate current in the district"?—I object to the "fair wage"; that is the term.

1838. I am calling your attention to the fact that "fair wage" is not the expression that is used in the contract at all?—Do you say it is "the rate of wages current in the district"?

1839. Yes. Supposing it is the "rate current in the district," will that meet your views?—Yes, I believe so.

1840. The Resolution of the House is that "it is the duty of the Government in all Government contracts . . . . to make every effort to secure the payment of such wages as are generally accepted as current in each trade for competent workmen"; and that has been reproduced in the contracts in the form of "the rate current in the district where the work is performed"?—Yes; but then you have a difficulty that way, because, if you take some firms, they will put down the rate that they are in the habit of paying the men as being the rate current in the district, when it is not a Trade Union rate at all.

1841. Do you ask for anything more than the rate current in the district?—We ask for the Trade Union rate.

1842. What is the Trade Union rate? Is it a rate fixed by the Union, or is it a rate fixed by the employers and the workmen together?—It is a rate fixed by the Union, but in some cases recognised or agreed to between employers and workmen.

1843. You would not enforce that rate unless it had been so agreed to, would you?—It is agreed to to this extent in London, that the First Commissioner of Works pays his men according to our trade card.

1844. You would not enforce on a contractor the Trade Union rate, unless it had been agreed to generally by the employers in the district, would you?—Why not?

1845. You would, then?—If we did not do that, where should we be?

1846. Your answer is that you would?—Decidedly, yes. I will answer for London straight away if you like, that it is agreed upon; and I can answer for Leicester and one or two other towns, where it is agreed between the master-builders and other people and the Trade Union.

1847. I am asking you whether you would require the Government to enforce upon its contractors what you call the Trade Union rate of wages, if it had not been agreed to generally by the employers in the district?—Yes, I would. If you would like a case, I could point out one now.

1848. What sort of case?—Where the Government work has been performed by a contractor in London at a rate below the rate which is recognised.

1849. I do not think we need go into that for our present purpose. Is it your complaint that the current rate is not always the rate demanded by the Unions—that it is below it, in fact?—My complaint is that the contractors do not observe the rates put forward by the Unions. That is so, not only in our own case; but, of course, I am speaking of our own case only now.

1850. I understand that point: will you go on with your next point?—Our greatest complaint, as I told you once before, is that when we bring these matters before a Government Department, it takes such a long time before we get an answer. One case I might mention, in order to throw a little light on the subject. There was a firm doing the electrical installation at the Royal Hospital at Greenwich. In August last I went down there, and I found some of the men that worked there—I know their names, and I know them, and I have thorough evidence about the job—were being paid ½d. an hour below the rate recognised in London, and paid, for instance, by the First Commissioner of Works, for whom I thought the work was being done. In the first place, we sent the complaint through to the First Commissioner of Works, and it was sent back to us, telling us that it was under the Admiralty. Then we sent to the Admiralty in August, and on looking up the correspondence, I have discovered that we got an answer on December 11th, when, of course, the job was finished.

1851. You complain of the delay, in fact?—That is one thing. We also complain that the rate of pay was below the recognised rate.

1852. I doubt if you may call it the recognised rate, because the Trade Union rate, you say, is a rate which the Union has fixed, not a rate which has been recognised?—We do not want to go into the Trade Union subject, I presume? I may tell you that it would be a very bad thing if it had been agreed upon, because then it would be stopped and would never go any further.

1853. When you speak of a recognised rate, you mean a rate recognised by the Trade Union?—It is generally recognised in London, if I may take London as an instance.

1854. Is it a rate recognised by the employers?—Yes, by the majority of them—the good employers.

1855. When you speak of a recognised rate, do you mean a rate which is recognised by the Union, or a rate which is recognised by the Union and the employers?—I am bound to take this line; it is a rate that is recognised by, we will say, the heads of Government Departments, the London County Council, various Borough Councils, and the principal electrical firms in London. They have our working rates, and they pay them. I call those the recognised rates of the district.

1856. Then by a recognised rate you mean a rate recognised by the employers as well as by the Union?—Yes, putting it in that way; but there is not a signed agreement to it though.

1857. But it is a rate agreed to, without a signed agreement?—Just so.

1858. That is what you mean by the Trade Union rate, is it?—Yes.

1859. That is not quite what you told me just now. You said just now that what you meant by the Trade Union rate was a rate which the Trade Union demanded, and not a rate which was agreed to by the employers?—Yes; in the first place, they demanded it and they got it; so, of course, it is agreed to.

1860. So far, yes; but that I should call a rate recognised by the employers. I want to get clearly from you which you mean. You do not mean that the Government should enforce upon its contractors a rate which the Trade Union demands, but which it cannot get?—They are getting it, though it is not signed.

1861. Perhaps you would answer my question. I suppose your answer would be "No." My question is, Do you wish the Government to enforce upon its contractors a rate which the Trade Union demands, but does not get?—No. You are asking me a thing now that is a little bit peculiar, because you say I am asking you to ask the contractors to pay a rate which the Trade Union demand and do not get. I am not asking you that at all; I am asking you to ask the contractors to pay the Trade Union rate which they are getting.

1862. I fully understand that now, but that is not quite consistent with what you told me before?—I may have wandered a bit, but I did not mean to.

1863. You do mean by the Trade Union rate a rate which is so far recognised that it is paid by the employers?—Yes, by some; and it is dodged by some more.

1864. But it is a rate which is paid by the majority?—I do not think it is the majority; some of those that ought to know better do not.

1865. Now I think we come to your next point?—Unless you want the cases?

1866. I only want to know the nature of your complaints?—Speaking as a Union, we should like you to take it from us that it is our opinion that when firms contract for the Government—either for the Admiralty, the War Office, or for other Government Departments—it should be found out whether they are fair firms before they tender. We think they should have been paying the rates recognised in the district as Trade Union rates before they tender; otherwise, when we lodge a complaint, as I said before, we are such a long while getting an answer that the whole thing is dodged. That is why we consider the Fair Wages Clause in Government contracts is a farce.

1867. Do you think the Government could fairly ask a contractor to do more than pay the proper rate when he takes the contract? Can they ask him what he had been paying before in the case of somebody else?—I do not see why you should not. I know cases where it is done, though it is not the Government.

1868. Of course, that would be going a long way outside the Resolution of the House of Commons?—Just so; that is what is the matter with the Resolution.

1869. I see; you would like it altered in that sense?—Yes.

1870. Have you any other points?—That is the greatest complaint, and the delay we have in getting replies from the Departments.

1871. You have told us about that. If you have no more complaints to make, then I should like to ask you what your remedy for the complaints about the rate of wages is. I gather that your remedy would be to enforce what you call a Trade Union rate?—Yes.

1872. That rate is a rate which is paid by—what proportion of the employers, do you think?—Where the majority of our complaints come from—the North—I should say at least 85 per cent. in any case, because with the Engineering and Shipbuilding Employers' Federation the rates that our complaints are based upon are agreed; I am referring to the rates for the wiremen working on some of the new ships that are being built for the Admiralty, such as H.M.S. "Goorkha," for instance, and the "Cossack." The Engineering and Shipbuilding Employers' Federation, that is, the employers, have agreed upon rates with the engineering trades; and some firms are dodging the question, and paying somewhere about 2s. or 3s. a week below the rate agreed upon.

1873. What proportion of the employers in any district, do you think, would be sufficient to make what you call a recognised rate? We start with the rate that the Union asks for, and we will say that there is one firm out of 20 which agrees to pay that rate. Do you think that if the Government contracts with one of the other 19 they ought to enforce your rate upon them, though they are not paying it already?—When they take the contract up, yes.

1874. Then you think acceptance by one firm is enough to constitute a recognition of your rate, do you?—That is rather a wide margin, one out of 20, and I do not think you will find it like that.

1875. That is the case I put to you?—Well, I would then.

1876. In fact, all the 19 other employers ought to be levelled up to the one that you have made an agreement with?—Yes; they would not charge you any less.

1877. (Mr. Hillier.) Do you say that, quite irrespective of the number of employees in the firms? Suppose there was one firm that employed two men, and the other 19 employed 20 men each, would you consider that the employer who had two men should govern the 19 who had 20 men each?—I do not see what difference that would make.

1878. It would make this difference: that there would be 19 times 20 men—that is, 380 men—working under one set of conditions and two men working under the other?—In the specific case you put, do you not think it would be a pity to have only two men working in a good-wage firm and 20 men working in a bad-wage firm?

1879. I am only asking you whether in making the reply you have just made, you consider that the payment of a certain wage by one firm should be a justification for our enforcing that rate against the other 19 firms?—Yes. Because there are only two men out of 300 odd who are getting a living wage, that is no reason why the remainder should not get it.

1880. (Mr. Black.) What classes of workmen are you principally thinking about in your Union?—The present complaints refer to wiremen. They are electrical fitters, but they are termed "wiremen." That is a common way of putting it, but they are really electrical fitters on board ship. This is the term I would use, the date has gone past for the name "wiremen."

1881. Have your people gone through any apprenticeship?—You may not know the electrical trade; it is, of course, very young, and it has not been very long in existence.

1882. That is what I was leading up to?—You may know that in the early days men drifted from one thing into another, but now we are very strong in trying to bring about the apprenticeship system. We do not believe in paying premiums, and all that sort of thing, for a lad to walk through a shop with his collar and coat on all through the day.

1883. But your men have gone through some practical training; they are skilled workmen, are they not?—The majority of the young members now are naturally coming out of their apprenticeship.

1884. Where do you draw the line between your people and those that the Engineers' Union looks after; is there any overlapping between the two?—I may state to you that until a very little while ago there were no electrical workers in the Amalgamated Society of Engineers, and I do not think there are many now, but there are some.

1885. Did you say that the Engineers' Union had got a rate for their people working on some of our battleships which you wanted to get and could not get?—No; I did not say that. I was referring to the Engineering and Shipbuilding Employers' Federation—the employers' federation; and I said there was a rate agreed upon between the employers and the engineering trades as a whole at the Hotel Metropole.

1886. Has there been a rate agreed upon between the employers' federation and your union?—Between the employers and the Amalgamated Society of Engineers; in fact, with almost all the metal workers employed in the shipbuilding trade.

1887. I understood you to say that the employers' federation had agreed with the Amalgamated Society of Engineers for a certain rate of wages for certain workpeople——?—One moment; we were with them.

1888. You were with them, were you?—Yes; we belong to this federation. What I am speaking about now is a rate of 2s. a week which was agreed upon twelve months ago last November between the employers and the Shipwrights, the Boiler makers, the Amalgamated Society of Engineers, the Electrical Trades Union, and a few other. Those I recollect. I was there.

1889. Do you generally work with the Amalgamated Society of Engineers when you are struggling for an increased rate of wage?—If it concerns either of us, or both of us.

1890. There may be a little bit of overlapping, may there not?—Sometimes it concerns the one and not the other.

1891. What are fair wages in your view for the electrical fitters, the wirers?—The rate in London is 9½d. per hour, which is a little bit more than the Amalgamated Society of Engineers.

1892. What class of workmen would you take in their society and compare with yours?—I could not say.

1893. Would you take generally engine fitters?—The only thing in which we should come in contact with the Amalgamated Society of Engineers is in fitting and running pipes; but that is not conducting at all.

1894. When you say that 9½d. per hour is a little bit more than the Amalgamated Society of Engineers, what do you mean?—I mean to say that their minimum rate is a little lower than ours.

1895. For what class of workmen is their rate a little lower than yours—fitters, I suppose?—Yes.

1896. Now take the Greenwich case to which you have referred; what kind of work was that?—That was re-wiring the building.

1897. What was the final answer that you got from the Admiralty in that case?—I have got the contractor's letter here which states that they were paying the rate. That is just where there was a mistake. I have got the letter from the Admiralty, and the contractor's letter to the Admiralty. We were never in communication with Messrs. A——, the contractors.

1898. Did the Admiralty do nothing more than send the contractor's letter to you?—You can see the letter from the Admiralty; it is dated 11th December.

1899. I see that the Admiralty on the 11th December in respect of this complaint against Messrs. A——, forwarded to you a letter from A—— dated 18th September, in which they state they had looked into the point, and continue, "my chief chargeman received considerably more than the rate of wages mentioned in the copy letter you enclose; also my regular hands are paid the full rate. The pipe fitters are paid 8½d. and 9d. per hour. All those are paid rates according to their experience and capabilities. Labourers I do not employ. I might mention in no case are the men who are engaged on the job paid a less rate of wages than they asked, which was naturally assumed to be the current rate of the district." Did you contest that in any way?—The job was all done and finished. We got this from the Admiralty on the 11th December—that was the trouble. Had we had it at the time the job was on, we might have found out whether we had made a mistake or not. I am sure we had not, because three of the men were willing to prove that they were given 9d. per hour as wiremen. If you want to go into a trade matter, they have got a reference here to what they term "pipe fitters"; as far as we are concerned, they do not exist; we consider those are wiremen, and that that is wiremen's work. Any conduit to carry cables or wiring for electric conductors is the work of wiremen and of cable jointers.

1900. How far have you got that recognised by employers?—It is generally recognised, only it is dodged where they get a 23rd-rate gasfitter to come and run the pipes. What is the consequence? I may be asking you something that you know something about, but you get a pipe put up in such a manner that no electrical wireman would put it up, and the consequence is, that in pulling the cable through, the insulation is broken, and all sorts of funny things occur.

1901. Work of that kind, of course, would be supervised by the firm, and by the Admiralty inspectors too?—That does not alter the case. If we do not do the work, we shall do nothing.

1902. This gets us rather on to conditions other than wages, does it not?—Yes, we are jumping from one thing to another.

1903. Do you not think your difficulties largely arise from the fact that you are a comparatively new industry, and that you have not quite established your position?—You may go a very long way back when you begin to talk about electricity, and in any case the Union is 20 years' old, so it is nearly time they were recognised by somebody. I do not believe it does pay the average contractor to believe in anything of this; but instead of trying to keep the thing more or less select in the hands of one body of men, he thinks it pays him to split it up into 15 little sections.

1904. In Trade Unionism all that kind of thing has to be fought out by the Unions and rules gradually established, has it not?—Yes.

1905. But it is rather difficult for a Government Department in all these individual cases to enforce rules of that kind?—I am trying to draw a line when I am talking about the Government. We take the Office of Works; in all their work they recognise this fact, that it is done that way, or should be done that way, and all their pipe running is done by wiremen who are paid 9½d. per hour. Surely, if they have experienced men and engineers in that Department, that shows they know the virtue of doing the thing properly.

1906. Does that not mean that your Union has succeeded in getting these rules established in the building trades perhaps rather than in the shipbuilding trades?—I do not know, I am sure. How is it that it is so in a good many cases on the Tyne and the Clyde? It is only, I am rather sorry to say, firms with very important names—I will put it that way—who try to dodge the question more than anybody else.

1907. (Mr. De la Bère.) You mentioned just now that there was sometimes a delay in answering your letters, or, at any rate, in coming to any conclusion upon your complaint; do you not think that possibly that sometimes happens because insufficient details are given in the first instance, and the case is not stated quite so fully, perhaps, or quite so particularly as it might have been?—I do not think so, for the simple reason that in the case I gave you the Admiralty received a letter from Messrs. A—— in September, and it is not forwarded to us, after several inquiries, until the 11th December.

1908. That was the final answer, I suppose?—That is all we have.

1909. Was there not some correspondence with you in between?—Only our pushing the case along in order to get an answer.

1910. Is not this perhaps rather the case—that you started the Admiralty, gave them the clue, and then left them to run the thing to earth themselves?—Any amount of letters we sent through to them, and they did not have to run the matter to earth themselves. If we send a case through to a Government Department, the case is stated as fully as we know it at the time; we cannot make a complaint without showing what the complaint is.

1911. So far as you are concerned, at any rate, you invariably give full details when you first write?—Just so. It may be sent in this way: that on a particular job so-and-so is going on, and we would like the thing rectified; and then they might write for further details or they might not. If they do not, and we do not get a fair answer, we write again, and if it has got worse we state it.

1912. As regards the fair contractor question, you suggest that before a contractor is put on the list the department ought to ascertain that he is a fair contractor?—Yes.

1913. How do you think they ought to set about ascertaining that?—By inquiring the rates that he pays.

1914. The rates that he pays for ordinary work?—Yes.

1915. (Mr. Bailey.) From whom should the Department inquire that?—From the firm. I suppose their books would tell you. I expect anybody who was putting out a contract of that sort would have a right to ask; anyhow, they would oblige the Department by letting them see the pay-sheets.

1916. (Mr. De la Bère.) You think that if a contractor does ask to be put on the list, it ought to be open to the Government to go into all his wages books on his ordinary work, do you?—You would not want to make a very long job of it, I suppose. I think somehow that if they showed me the books, it would not take me above 20 minutes to find out what they paid.

1917. Of course, every contractor considers himself to be a fair contractor?—He would not show you if he was not.

1918. Are your men mostly paid piece-rates, or by time?—We object to piece-work.

1919. Then are all your members time-workers?—There are places in the North, particularly in the armature-winding line, which are affected by piece-work a little. I am thinking of Wolverhampton, Loughborough, and one or two places like that. We have always tried to get an agreement, and we have succeeded in most places where piece-work does go on like that—that never in any case shall the men earn less on piece than they would earn at the day-rate.

1920. Do you find that manufacturers commonly accept your refusal to agree to piece-work?—Yes, in all cases.

1921. They fall in with the time-work arrangement?—Yes.

1922. On what ground do you object to piece-work?—For this very simple reason: There may be two men equally competent but not quite so fast with their fingers, but the one man has as much right to live as the other; one of the men may, through selfishness or something else, put on extraordinary speed, and in the end cut the man out of the job altogether, and he would be discharged because he could not keep time with the other man.

1923. Do you mean that one man could do the work of two?—I will not say he could do the work of two, but he may do it faster than the other.

1924. Do you say that he would do it so fast that there would be no need for the other?—No; but he would do it so fast that the other would be considered too slow to earn enough to keep him on.

1925. Because the one man sets the pace too high?—Yes. A fair day's work is enough.

The witness withdrew.

Mr. Samuel George Porter called, and examined.

1926. (Chairman.) You are the General Secretary of the United Society of Brushmakers, I think?—Yes, I am.

1927. Is that a Union common to the whole country?—Yes.

1928. It is not confined to London?—Not to London alone; it covers the whole of the country, including Ireland and Scotland.

1929. Is it a large Society?—We have something over 1,300 members.

1930. Men and women?—No; men only.

1931. What is your experience of the working of the Fair Wages Clause?—Our experience is that it has been ineffectual so far as we interpret the original object of the Resolution. Of course, very much depends upon that interpretation; but viewing the Resolution as an attempt to establish fair wages under fair conditions, we consider that the Resolution has been ineffectual in that direction, and that the conditions, so far as Government work is concerned, show no improvement when comparing the present times with the periods previous to the Resolution.

1932. No improvement at all?—No improvement at all.

1933. Then the Resolution has done no good to your trade?—None whatever.

1934. What do you ascribe that to?—We ascribe it to its indefiniteness, and to the general disposition on the part of employers, not only in respect to Government work, but in respect to all other work, such as municipal work, to discard and discount these conditions, and to manufacture the goods under their ordinary conditions, whatever they may be.

1935. I do not quite follow; do you mean that they manufacture Government work under different conditions to their other work?—I mean they are not influenced by the conditions set down, they being so indefinite and of such a general character.

1936. Do you not think that "the rate of wages current in the district" is a phrase which is tolerably clear?—No. We are handicapped in regard to that phrase from the fact that in several parts of England employers have, to a large extent, established a monopoly of the industry in those particular districts, and where an employer has been successful in establishing a monopoly, it generally follows that he has done so rather by force and by power over his employees than by the fact that he has established a fair rate of wages. I might give as an instance the Norwich district, over which a well-known firm, Messrs. A., have a monopoly of our trade.

1937. Is there no other firm there?—There are other firms, but small in comparison with the firm I have referred to. Not only the organised portion of the trade, but I believe I am justified in saying that all other brushmakers view the general conditions prevailing in Norwich as being unfair from the workman's standpoint.

1938. Take a case like that, where one firm has a monopoly of the trade in a particular district; what suggestion have you to make for remedying that difficulty?—Our suggestion for remedying not only that difficulty but others which have been referred to, is the adoption of a more definite phrase, such as "the trade union rate of wages."

1939. How would the trade union rate of wages be fixed in the Norwich case, for instance. Would it be a rate agreed upon between the union and this firm, or a rate which the union asked but did not get?—I would take it where there does not exist a trade union rate of wage, that the nearest town, to a great extent, should govern the wage there.

1940. What would be the nearest town to Norwich?—They may either take a place in the western division, such as Bristol, or come London-wards, and take London.

1941. Would it be practicable, do you think, to enforce upon an employer in Norwich the rate of wage current in London or Bristol?—I think so.

1942. Without regard to the local conditions prevailing at Norwich?—Yes. There is very little difference, so far as my trade is concerned, in the rate of wages prevailing in any part of England.

1943. The cost of living in different parts of England must vary a good deal, must it not?—I do not think so—not so much as oftentimes is supposed.

1944. Take rent, for instance. Do you consider that rent is tolerably uniform all over England?—No, I do not say that; but there are advantages in provincial as well as in metropolitan districts, which operate one against the other to a great extent, and so balance things.

1945. Then you would rather be in favour of a uniform rate of wages in your trade all over the country?—Yes. That does not exist actually in our trade, because the rate does vary somewhat, but not to any material extent, as between the provinces and the Metropolis. I might say that our own employers would view as a very great advantage a uniform rate of wages all over the country.

1946. Would you not expect the rate of wages to be higher in London than in Norwich?—As a matter of fact, they are under prevailing conditions.

1947. Take some other town where you are satisfied with the rate; is it generally the same as in London?—Yes. I might say that the recognised price in London is a price that was established as far back as 1872, since which time in many of the provincial districts, if not all, advances of price have been obtained which have more than equalised the price prevailing in London at the present time.

1948. Then prices do vary?—They do vary slightly.

1949. Not very much?—Not very much. The difficulty with the brush-making industry is that it is a piece-work trade. I presume that you find equal difficulties in all trades where payment by piece prevails.

1950. Do you think that your rule of a uniform or nearly uniform rate all over the country should apply to other trades besides your own?—I do not. I know that it is generally conceded that there should be a difference between Metropolitan rates and provincial rates, but that does not apply to any great degree in my own trade.

1951. But the same reasons which would support it in one trade would support it in another, I suppose, because they are based on such things as the cost of living, are they not?—I do not think there is much point in the question of the cost of living as between the Metropolis and the provinces.

1952. Do you mean that it is practically the same?—I think it is. I have had experience personally of both sides of the question.

1953. Then it is all the same to you whether you live in a large town or a small one?—Quite so; I do not find the cost of living materially different.

1954. Suppose, for instance, you have got to go a long way to your work; does that not make it more expensive?—It makes it a little more expensive.

1955. But not much?—Not much.

1956. Suppose that a man was employed in a shop in the middle of London; either he would live close to his work, in which case he would have to pay a much higher rent than he would if he lived at Norwich, or he would live further out, in which case he would have to pay for travelling to and from his work; would that not make a considerable difference in his week's wages?—Yes, it would make some difference.

1957. That would be a reason, would it not, for having some variations in the rate?—Yes; but even if there are variations in the rate, these slight variations which do exist would not affect our suggestion of alteration in the direction of "the trade union rate of wage."

1958. We have got away from the point at which we started. I asked you, where there is no agreed rate between the employers and the men, as in the case you mentioned of Norwich, how you would fix the rate, and I think you said there ought to be a uniform rate for the whole country?—Yes.

1959. But you are rather inclined, now, to think that there is good reason for having varying rates?—Yes. I am taking now the actual fact; as a matter of fact, at the present time there is not a uniform rate throughout the country, and the rate is slightly lower in the Bristol district, for instance, than it is in London.

1960. You would not apply the London rate to Norwich, then?—No. I think the Bristol district rate is the more likely one to apply.

1961. But Bristol would not be the nearest town?—No; it would not. You might take the Birmingham rate; there it is a little lower than in London.

1962. However, you still think that the standard of the nearest town is on the whole the best way of settling it?—Undoubtedly, where a trade union does not exist.

1963. Have you any other point you wish to make?—No; not on that matter.

1964. Perhaps you would go on to your next point?—As I have pointed out in paragraph 3 of my Proof, it does not follow that the district rate of wage, or the current rate in the district, is necessarily a fair wage. I emphasise that, and I point out, particularly in the case of a district like Norwich, where a firm, such as Messrs. A., have secured a practical monopoly of the trade, they can to a certain extent dictate the wages. We know the trade generally does not esteem it a fair wage, although we cannot go behind the fact that it is the current rate of the district.

1965. By "the trade generally" do you mean by employers and workmen, or by workmen alone?—I am not speaking on behalf of the employers.

1966. You mean, then, that it is not considered a fair wage by the other workmen?—By the workpeople, yes.

1967. That is by workpeople elsewhere—not those who are receiving it?—Yes. As regards Norwich itself, I have letters from Norwich in which they deplore the conditions prevailing, so far as the trade is concerned, at Norwich, but they are helpless in the matter as the great strength of the firm is overpowering.

1968. Now, will you go to your next point?—My next point is the tendency of manufacturers to leave the London district, and, whilst retaining touch with the Metropolis, to open factories in the suburbs and outlying districts. We feel that that has a tendency to create a different rate of wage. We know from experience that immediately an employer opens an outlying factory he desires some alteration in the wage.

1969. He probably does it for that reason, I suppose?—He probably does it for that reason.

1970. And on your hypothesis of a uniform rate, of course, you do not approve of that?—No, we do not approve of it, because in many cases employers, to a great extent, take their own workpeople with them. We know cases where employers have opened factories in the outlying districts and have taken their workpeople with them from the metropolitan districts, and then a change in the wages comes. That is a condition which applies to other trades as well as to our own, we know.

1971. But if the workpeople go, they go voluntarily?—Yes, they go voluntarily in a sense, but then a working-man is not altogether free. He is, to a certain extent, compelled to go where his employment is, because he must either go or give up his employment.

1972. Now your next point?—We have on more than one occasion complained that there has been an increase of partly manufactured goods—I am referring now to goods which were previously manufactured entirely in our factories, but which, owing presumably to the question of cheapness, now come into England partly manufactured from foreign parts, and are only completed here.

1973. How is that affected by the Fair Wages Clause?—We feel that that comes generally under the question of the conditions under which people work, and that it does not in any sense maintain the wage. It tends to split up the work, and to disturb altogether the conditions of men's employment.

1974. No alteration in the Fair Wages Clause in the contracts could touch that point, I am afraid?—Only we feel—and, of course, I am expressing the opinion of the men, which may not be quite in accord with the feeling of yourselves—that there should be a stipulation in Government contracts that where the work has hitherto been entirely manufactured in English factories (which is primâ facie evidence that it can be done there) it should not, on the mere score of cheapness, be taken abroad.

1975. I am afraid that is travelling rather outside our reference?—We know that in a kindred trade to ours representations were made—to the War Office, I believe—when portions of the work were being done abroad, and after inquiry by that Department it was stopped and the employers were directed that the work was to be done wholly at home. That was at a recent date, and I have the reply of the War Office in my possession. I might say for my own part, representing the Society to which I belong, I made similar representations, but there had been a change in the representative character of the Government, and we were told deliberately that such a step could not be taken. However, that step was taken undoubtedly on a complaint made under the existing Wages Clause, but I quite recognise that it does not go beyond the mere question of wage conditions (handing in a letter).

1976. This letter refers rather to a question of subletting, does it not?—No.

1977. You have got something to say on the employment of women, I think?—Yes. We find that the increase of women-workers has been very considerable. I am not going to say that it is wholly due to this Wage Clause, but we do say that the Wage Clause has not in any sense helped us in stopping it, although it has materially affected the employment of men. I recollect well making a long inquiry in company with Mr. Sydney Buxton at the time of the passing of the Fair Wages Resolution into the question of women's labour by which means men had been displaced. We quite failed to make any case, but we still feel that the question of wages is materially concerned in the question of the displacement of men by women. We do not wish for a moment to go into the general question of women's labour, but what we do feel is that there should be some recognition of the fact that men are displaced by women, thus largely increasing unemployment, and, so far as we can find, not materially benefiting anybody.

1978. Not even the women?—Not the women.

1979. But they get employment which they otherwise would not get, I suppose?—That I cannot say; at all events, I cannot see any advantage to the State generally in pushing a man out and putting a woman in his place.

1980. Do you object on principle to the employment of women?—No. What we object to is that in the case of a Government contract where the work has been hitherto done by men, it does materially affect the question of wages when men are displaced and women are employed in their stead, so much so that women at the present time are turning out work at more than 50 per cent. less in respect of the payment of wages than the men did similar work for.

1981. In fact, you find that their employment is being extended to your prejudice?—Undoubtedly.

1982. Do you think that that is preventable?—Yes. We think, at all events, that if the clause is so altered that it would be a trade union rate of wage clause, that would to a great extent help in that direction. We have no objection to the employment of women; what we have an objection to is the employment of women materially affecting the wages paid elsewhere to men for similar work.

1983. In fact, you object to the employment of women at lower rates than men?—Yes.

1984. If that was enforced, I imagine it would end in no women being employed at all, would it not?—Probably; but that would be an argument in favour of the fact that they do not fully do the work well.

1984*a*. I do not see why they should not be employed if they do the work well, or if they can do the work as well as the men. Why should they prefer to employ men if women can do the work as well?—That is rather an argument in support of what many of our members feel—that the work is not well done by the women. But I did not wish to raise that side of the question.

1985. Your next point is that the cheapest is not always the best?—Yes. I do not think that need be dilated on.

1986. What inference do you propose to draw from that?—The inference is that the general principle which prevails in regard to contracts—of course, I have not the knowledge of the principle which prevails in the case of Government contracts—I know that in outside bodies it is so—is, that the cheapest is usually the approved tender. What we feel is that that has rather a tendency to reduce wages than to maintain them. We do not ask that wages should be increased; we simply desire that they should be maintained at a living rate. It is going back upon a previous point, but where an employer is able to monopolise a district and thus to control wages, he can naturally tender cheaper than an employer who pays the recognised rate of wages; and it does not follow that his work is any better, although perhaps it is.

1987. What modification would you introduce into the clause in order to meet that difficulty?—Only the one which I have suggested—the trade union rate of wages.

1988. Then this is really the same point which you mentioned before?—Yes.

1989. The question of whether the lowest tender should always be accepted, assuming the trade union rate is paid, would not arise here?—No.

1990. What do you mean exactly by the trade union rate of wages? Do you mean a rate fixed by the union, or a rate accepted by the employers and paid by them?—In nearly every case the wage I mean is a wage mutually agreed upon. In nearly every case in our trade the wages current to the members of the society are wages which have been previously agreed by committees of the employers and workmen. I have a list here, for instance (handing in list).

1991. This list does not apply to the Norwich case?—No, it does not apply to Norwich. I have another list with me which applies to another district.

1992. You have different lists for different districts, then?—Yes, because the character of the work is somewhat different.

1993. You would not, of course, insist on enforcing, as regards any particular contractor, a rate that had not been agreed to by any employer at all, would you?—I hardly follow you.

1994. Supposing that you could not come to an agreement with any employer in your trade, and supposing that you at the same time had prepared a list of that sort, you would not ask the Government to enforce that list on their contractors, would you?—No.

1995. It is only when it is generally accepted that you would?—When it is generally accepted.

1996. Then "the trade union rate of wages so far as generally accepted" would meet your view?—Yes.

1997. Your next point is that the Government should manufacture its own things; I do not think that comes into our reference?—That is so. I have no wish to press that; it was desired, however, that the matter should be mentioned.

1998. (Mr. De la Bère.) Perhaps I might explain to you the apparent difference in treatment which you alluded to just now in the rates paid to the bone-brush-makers. In the first case it was shown, as far as the War Office was concerned, that it was not customary to obtain parts ready made, and in the other, as far as we could ascertain, there appeared to be a custom to obtain the parts?—There must have been a commencement in that custom.

1999. Clearly; but, at any rate, at the time when our attention was called to the matter the custom on both sides appeared to have been pretty clearly established?—I could possibly dispute that. We hold that the practice, which is more or less prevalent at the present time, of obtaining goods partly-made from abroad, has started since the establishment of this Clause. That applies outside the bone-brushmakers, where the practice may have originated at a more recent date.

2000. I think the bone-brushmakers' complaint came in somewhere about 1903, and yours was in 1905?—I know that I made a complaint quite recently.

2001. That was about the wooden backs of brushes, I think?—Yes, I have a letter here of 1905 from Birmingham. An appeal was made to Mr. Chamberlain, and I have a letter here, which evidently comes from the War Office, and it was sent on to me from Birmingham. The same question was raised there, but you see that the reply states that the answers were fairly acceptable.

2002. In the one case, it was considered to be contrary to the Clause which prohibits sub-letting, except it is customary in the trade, and in the latter case—the one which you brought forward—there was considerable evidence to show that it was not altogether contrary to the trade practice?—Of the present date?

2003. Yes?—That I would yield.

2004. Whatever the time when the trade custom originated, when our attention was called to it there was a custom pretty clearly established on both sides?—It is more or less prevalent, I regret to say, at the present time.

2005. (Chairman.) I do not think it was a question of getting the material from abroad. Probably the action taken by the War Office would have been just the same if it had been supplied by a firm at home; would that not be so?—It is not a question of the material; nearly all our material does necessarily come from abroad. It is a question of goods on which a considerable amount of labour had already been applied.

2006. My point was that I do not think the War Office was influenced by the fact that the work was being made abroad, but by the fact that the work was being practically sub-let?—I see the point.

2007. (Mr. Bailey.) Can you in any way show us how the practice of importing ready-made parts has been encouraged by the Resolution?—No, I cannot say that I can show that it has been actually encouraged by the Resolution.

2008. I understood you just now to say that since this Resolution was passed this practice had sprung up?—Yes, I did say so.

2009. Do you think the practice was at all affected by the wording of the Resolution?—Only because of the indefiniteness of the Resolution.

2010. That is to say, because it did not actually forbid it?—That is so.

2011. Can you tell us, as a matter of fact, what is the difference—a rough percentage would do—between the wages paid to your trade at Norwich and those paid in London?—Do you mean the weekly wage, or by the piece?

2012. In whichever way it is more convenient to you to give it to us?—I think I am perfectly correct in saying that there is a difference of between 20 and 25 per cent. in the rate per piece.

2013. (Mr. Black.) Following up that last question, how do you think the Bristol rates compare with the Norwich rates?—There would not be that marked difference between them.

2014. What difference do you think there might be? You have complained bitterly of the Norwich rates, and you have said you would like to apply the Bristol rate to Norwich in order to set it right, so you probably have some idea of the Bristol rate?—I should judge that there is quite half the difference between Norwich and Bristol as compared with London.

2015. About 10 to 12 per cent. then?—Yes.

2016. How do the rates in the country districts around London, in Hertfordshire and so on, compare with your London rate, taking either the rates which the firms in those districts have set up for themselves, or the rates which they have agreed with you?—I know of no firms in our trade in Hertfordshire, but there are firms in Essex, at Braintree, and so on.

2017. Then take those?—Those, I am afraid, are very similar to what prevails at Norwich.

2018. About 20 to 25 per cent. below the London rate?—Yes.

2019. There are some firms working in absolute country districts, I suppose, within 20 or 30 miles of London?—Paying our rate?

2020. I do not know; I am putting that to you?—No, I think not. At one time Norwich was a large centre of the organised trade, but it has ceased to exist in that way now, and we go right away from Norwich to Birmingham before we come in touch with anything like an organised condition of trade.

2021. To put it in another way, is your complaint against the Norwich firm your principal complaint?—No; my complaint is not principally against them, but that was a case which I felt was fairly well known.

2022. In the brush trade generally, is there a large proportion of unfair employers—I mean unfair in your estimation?—There is not a large proportion, but they are found more in the eastern and southern districts than in the northern districts.

2023. Supposing your suggestion were adopted, of course you recognise, taking the Norwich firm, say, that the proportion of brushes they would make for the Government would be very small compared with their general trade?—I could not say.

2024. That would naturally be the case, I suppose. They have a big factory there, have they not?—They have very large works there.

2025. Take any big brushmaker you like; I suppose the Government orders are a very small fraction, generally speaking, of his work?—Yes, generally; but I would not say that in this case.

2026. Do you think the conditions of Government work should be different to those applying in the case of private work?—No.

2027. You have spoken once or twice as if you thought the conditions should be different?—No. The conditions prevailing for Government work are our ordinary prices.

2028. Say, for the sake of argument, that your proposal were adopted at Norwich; do you think that would level up the firm's wages on private work?—It would not.

2029. Do you think it would be likely to?—No; I think it highly probable that they would pay the recognised rate of wages on Government work, and leave their own employees to deal with the other question. If I may add this, we do know a firm who do pay the recognised rate for Government work—while they do not pay it in their other trade.

2030. So that we should not succeed in influencing wages very greatly throughout the brush trade?—I do not know; I think it would be a material help in that direction. Of course, we have not gone beyond the Government work here.

2031. But you would agree that there are firms now who, on the Government orders, do pay what, in your estimation, are fair wages, and yet who do not pay them on their private work?—Yes.

2032. Take Norwich again. How do the wages in brushmaking compare with the wages of other trades in Norwich? Much of the work in brushmaking does not differ very greatly from much of the work in other trades, I think; I mean to say, there are many of the operations which you cannot allege are very difficult?—I could not answer that question, as I have never been to Norwich, and I do not know the general conditions prevailing at Norwich in other trades. But I know that the few members which we have at Norwich complain most bitterly of the general conditions of the brush trade there as regards questions of payment to the employees.

2033. I suppose you are not looking after the interests of women workers, but rather of the people who do most of the work by hand?—Naturally.

2034. Men?—Yes; but we have to deal with machinery, and we do not oppose machinery at all.

2035. Is not the introduction of machinery one of the big features in your trade?—It facilitates the employment of women; there is no doubt about that.

2036. You are a very old-established society; I note you go back for years—1747?—We are very old.

2037. Are we to understand that you are a little bit old-fashioned, and that you do not adapt your rates to modern conditions?—No, I do not think so. Our people claim to be very democratic, though I do not know whether that is so.

2038. What are the dates of most of the schedules of rates that you have drawn up?—I have brought with me some of the most recent; the Chairman will find one of this last year, I think.

2039. You do not find that firms move out from the London district, or from any big town district, with the object rather of getting away from your Trade Union conditions, do you?—No; not at all.

2040. You do not think they do?—That is so. I might say that in the metropolitan district we are working, if there is any difference, at a lower rate of wages than is current in the northern districts. When I admit that the present rate of wages prevailing through the principal employers in London was fixed so long ago as 1872, I think you will see at once that we have not in any sense troubled much for an increase of wages, whereas there have been several advances in other divisions since that date.

2041. What are the portions of the work which you think rather too laborious for women? In brushmaking, generally, the heavy part, that is, the cutting out of the woodwork, is done by machinery, is it not?—Yes. The thing I am particularly referring to is the making of bass brooms.

2042. The drawing?—No, the setting of the bass, the bristles, in the broom, and so on.

2043. The fixing of the bristles is comparatively light work, is it not?—Yes. You could not say generally that it is a laborious trade, but we have always looked upon the question of making what we term bass brooms—those are the brooms that are used in the streets—as being the heaviest part of the work; and, peculiarly, that is the portion of the work in which women are more generally employed.

2044. Take hair brushes and tooth brushes?—That has gone. That is women's work absolutely, and we do not raise a question in respect of that work at all. That has long since been done by women.

2045. So that this question has rather a limited application?—Yes.

2046. It seems to me that your principal grievance in regard to the Fair Wages Clause is against one or two firms in the Eastern Counties, and that your grievance as to women is as regards bass brooms?—Yes. You probably recollect—you evidently have some knowledge of the subject—that some years ago we had a very considerable difficulty with Messrs. B. at Mile End. At that time they installed certain machinery which, as I say, facilitated the employment of women on this particular work. They make that work a specialty, and they do not go into any other portion of our work. We utterly failed, I regret to say, although Mr. Sydney Buxton himself took considerable interest in the inquiry which was made. We had a reply ultimately from the Admiralty—that case was an Admiralty case—dated 1894, in which we were told that we had not even a primâ facie case against Messrs. B. I might say that though we have got quite used to these replies, unfortunately they do not convince our members, and our members hold the same opinion, notwithstanding such replies as the one I have just read.

2047. You have not made many complaints, I think; I cannot find any recently from your society to the Admiralty?—I might say that although my secretaryship dates many years back, yet there was a period of some five or six years when I was not secretary. I have only within the past three years resumed that position, and I do not know what was done during the intervening period.

2048. It may interest you to know that we do watch the maintenance of the quality very closely. I think you spoke of women's work not producing brooms of good quality?—They cannot affect the quality so much, except as regards workmanship. I went into a factory quite recently—not one of our shops, if I may put it in that way—which had received a small portion of an Army contract for bass brooms. They had from the War Office a sample broom which had evidently been made at Messrs. B.'s. We saw at once a marked difference in the workmanship of the two articles—the one made by the firm in question, employing men to do it, and the other made by women at Messrs. B.'s.

2049. Would you say the difference in the workmanship affected the durability of the broom?—I should say most decidedly that the broom made by the men would be more durable than the broom made by the women. But that does not affect the quality, because that character of the article depends on the material used and not so much on the workmanship.

2050. (Chairman.) It is just as effective a broom, do you mean?—No; but I say the strength of the workmanship would be greater in the broom made by the men than in the broom made by the women. The quality of a broom is not affected by who makes it, that is, as far as the material is concerned.

2051. (Mr. Black.) Of course, it is always a nice point whether you do use a broom up to the full extent of your work, is it not?—It is.

2052. It depends more on the quality of the bass than on anything else, does it not?—Yes.

2053. (Mr. De la Bère.) I take it that what you mean is that the materials in the two brooms are the same, but they are not so well put together?—That is it exactly.

2054. (Mr. King.) Are there any conditions that you would like imposed as well as the Union rate, that is, Union conditions that your trade wish for and do not get from non-Union houses?—No. Being a piece-work trade, of course, to a great extent, there is perfect liberty extended to the workpeople, and therefore we have not considered any other conditions.

2055. You have no limits, for instance, as to the hours the men may work?—No; being, as I say, a piece-work trade there is a certain amount of liberty.

2056. (Chairman.) Have you anything you would like to add?—I think nothing more, except to emphasise what I have stated—that it is a general desire expressed not only from London but from all parts of our trade that "the Trade Union rate of wages" should be substituted for "the rate current in the district," which they think would be more effective and would be less liable to evasion, and at the same time would tend to the maintenance of wages and would keep down the question of unemployment. That is the generally expressed feeling which I have been deputed to lay before you as strongly as possible. I do not know that I can say more. In my proof I have submitted it in writing as concisely as I possibly could, and I can only hope that it may meet in some degree with your approval.

The witness withdrew.

Mr. William Coleman called and examined.

2057. (Chairman.) You are the Secretary of the Basket, Skip and Hampermakers' Federation, are you not?—Yes.

2058. Is that composed of one Union, or of several?—It comprises five Unions. I could give you their names if it is desired.

2059. Perhaps you would do so?—It comprises the London Union of Basketmakers, the Lancashire and Cheshire Union of Skip and Basketmakers, the British Amalgamated Basketmakers, the Yorkshire Union of Skip and Basketmakers, and the Scottish Union of Basketmakers.

2060. Which is the largest of those?—The Lancashire and Cheshire Union.

2061. Is Lancashire and Cheshire what you would call the centre of your trade?—Really London is the centre, but Lancashire comprises the most of our members.

2062. What number of members do you suppose there would be in those five Unions?—Just over a thousand.

2063. All men?—Yes. We do not recognise girl—or women—labour in the trade.

2064. How has the Fair Wages Clause affected your trade, do you think?—It affects us for the worse quite as much as in other trades. Our work is composed of piece-work, and the list is based upon piece-work all through except upon repairing for Government work—that is, in connection with the Postal hampers. I may say that the work of the Federation is to organise in regard to Government work chiefly. There is such a large quantity and it keeps increasing from year to year, so we have taken the step of forming this Federation. One of our chief points is that, taking the words as they stand to-day, "the current rate," it would be much better if the Clause were to be "Trade Union rate." Take, for instance, a case of Government work which has been given out. In 1899 an employer in London received an order for medical panniers from the War Office; they sub-let part of the order to a German Jew, and when the Society officials visited the house of this man they found a shocking state of things. They had to descend into the lower regions—about two flights of stairs—when they found it very dismal. There was not a chair in the room—only boxes and beds, and the beds were stacked up in the corner whilst the occupants were working at their trade in making these panniers. There were about nine persons who lived in that room, and they were making these panniers. The man was informed that he was doing wrong by taking this work, and the employer was seen upon the matter and also the War Office. After 18 months this employer was struck off the list. He was paying to this German Jew for these baskets 4s., and the rate of wages in London at that time was 4s. 3d. for making them. The value of the material in itself was 2s., so that this man was making them at 2s. 3d. less than the current rate of wages. To come to a case recently in regard to the Post Office, there was an order sent down to Grantham for 500 umbrella baskets. There had not been any made for years of that class. The Federation meet each year when contracts come out and visit the depot, and if there is any change in any basket they fix a price upon that and send it round to every employer who is known to be a Government contractor. I may say in fairness to the employer that a statement of the change had not been given to him, as it was not a district at that time—it was the fault of the district secretary. This employer called the men into his office, showed them a sample of this basket, and asked them what price they would make it at. Of course, the one Union man amongst them said: "Well, that basket is 3s. 9d." After that, the officials visited Grantham, after receiving a complaint that he was having them made for half-a-crown—that the men had accepted this half-a-crown—but that only non-Union men were making these baskets and the Trade Unionists did not make them. I may say that 2d. was deducted from our original price of 3s. 9d., because we saw the baskets in Grantham—I was one, and Mr. Butler, of the British Amalgamated Society, was the other—and we found there was no foot upon the umbrella basket. So we deducted 2d. for that, and the price now is 3s. 7d. for the making of that basket, while he was having them made, as I say, at half-a-crown. He acknowledged to us that he knew the price because the man had told him, but he said that he was paying 3d. more than he did pay 10 or 11 years ago for the same basket. We told him that it was not right, and he practically promised that if any other order came out of the same class he would pay the standard rate of wage. This employer had always paid the price according to the list in force at Peterborough and Leicester, where most of the Government work is made. There were many complaints from these two places, and I may say that the Union men—there were only four of them—sent their contributions to show that practically we considered it a district, although there was no Trade Union district secretary there—only somebody in the capacity of receiving their contributions and sending them on to Peterborough as the head of this district. Taking that payment, it means that he was paying 1s. 1d. less (the difference between 3s. 7d. and 2s. 6d.) than any other contractor who had tendered and who was willing to pay the price for these self-same baskets. We as a trade say: How is it possible that fair good employers can be expected to compete and to get orders where instances like these are concerned? We as a Federation would not have brought the case forward and mentioned it here to-day, but that there is another side of the matter, and that is sub-letting. Going down a street in Grantham I saw, looking through a house-window, a man occupied in making these baskets. I watched him through the window making them, and I saw that he also had about six or seven baskets there. We went to get a witness to see these baskets as proof of what myself and Mr. Butler had seen. We got a witness, and we brought him to this house. In the meantime these baskets had been removed. After, we found the baskets and saw them in the warehouse of the employer. I saw this man some time ago in Macclesfield, and I got a statement from him that he had made these baskets.

2065. (Mr. Bailey.) Which man was this?—This was the man that I had reported to the Post Office. They have the name of the man, but I do not want it to be published, because it would be detrimental to the man's interest in regard to his ever getting a job. You can understand that point. It was placed before Mr. Sydney Buxton, and it is practically on the tapis at the present time, and this firm will be watched in future as far as these matters go. That is what I take Mr. Sydney Buxton's letter to mean.

2066. (Chairman.) Your complaint is, first of all, that they pay less than the recognised rate, and secondly, that they sub-let?—Yes. Not only did they sub-let this basket to the man, but the man was purchasing material from the employer in order to make the baskets in his own home. I myself saw the man carrying two of the baskets back to the warehouse in order to get his week's money for his week's work. The employer was getting two profits off that man's labour. He was getting a profit off the material by selling it to the man, and he was getting it off the labour of the man after he had produced the article. Sub-letting is an evil that we as a trade catch as much as any. Take, for instance, such places as Castle Donington; that place is practically surrounded by Nottingham, Leicester and Derby. Now Castle Donington has always been known as a poorly-paid district. They have had Government orders for a large number of shell-baskets for the War Office. I cannot tell whether they got them direct from the War Office or from the ammunition-maker; but they kept a lot of people for, I should think, 16 or 18 months. I visited Castle Donington, and I may say that the men were making these baskets at 1s. 1d. each, our price being 1s. 10d. On Mr. Butler, of the British Amalgamated Society, seeing this firm, they said that they would pay the price for General Post Office work (which they had had), but on the ammunition baskets they said they had got a patent out which was better for the men. We as a Union could not get in touch with the employers to bring it to an issue, but, nevertheless, we know the price is not fair, as there was a difference of 9d. The patent was simply a matter which would benefit a man who was not used to the work. These baskets are made of such material, and they have to be used with so much care in making to fit the shell so closely, that a man has to take his time; and thus the articles, although small articles of 22½ inches long and 4 inches at the base, and shaped like a shell, take a great deal of work, and the men have to be very careful; thus the price was heavy upon them. It was practically left at that stage, and I hear at the present time they have no orders; but whilst districts can quote what is possibly the "current rate," that is so elastic a term as far as concerns the employers that are not good employers, that they can stretch it to such an extent that practically they can come into a town such as Grantham and say: This is the district rate—the current rate. So we contend, as a trade which instituted that as being the current rate of the district, that it should be specially stated and quoted in all Government contracts that it should be "the Trade Union rate of wages." I also have a complaint as far as our trade is concerned upon these shell-baskets, and that is in regard to a case which occurred in Leicester. These shell-baskets were made in Leicester by a firm of the name of Messrs. A. They were paying a number of girls to make these baskets, thus bringing girl labour in after other employers had quoted a price based on 1s. 10d. and 1s. 8d. per basket. These girls were practically making them at an average of about 9d. How is it possible that fair contractors and good honest employers can compete with those? I may say that we had been in dispute over this very same thing.

2067. (Mr. De la Bère.) What rate were they paying?—About 9d. per basket; that is what it came to.

2068. (Chairman.) What is your price?—1s. 10d.

2069. Per hour?—No; 1s. 10d. for each basket, because it is a piece-work rate.

2070. How many hours does it take to make a basket?—I should say that a competent man would make four or five—five at the most—in the day, and he would have to work and he would have to be a very excellent man to make five a day. Of course, this employer tried to prove that there were some men making as many as seven and eight per day. We contend that a basket of that description cannot be made by girls. I may say that that firm had 790 rejects sent back to them. That shows that there was not care, and that the girls were not competent workmen to make these baskets. Competency comes in there, as it does in regard to all Government contracts. We brought it before Mr. Haldane, and I may say that before meeting Mr. Haldane at a personal interview in the House of Commons on 14th February of last year, we met this employer, and a settlement was come to that no girl labour should be allowed to make any class of Government work in future. So the dispute was settled after a matter of 15 months. Nevertheless, the biggest part of the order had been made, and our members say that in the slack time—that is, in the winter time when no Government work is to be made, when, of course, they have to suffer, and they had to suffer here—to bring basketmakers' own daughters to compete against their own fathers is very unfair indeed.

2071. Do you object to the girls doing any work at all?—Yes, we object to girl labour.

2072. On what ground?—It is a rough job. I am a practical workman, and I was working up to coming here, so I know what the trade is, and you can see the condition of my hands. It is generally the case that a basketmaker gets hands like mine. Although this was all light work, it was practically all thumb work, and the girls were not competent. To show that, I might quote that 798 of these baskets were sent back to the firm.

2073. (Mr. Bailey.) Out of how many?—I should say out of about 25,000. Some men had made a few of them, and I may say also that the biggest part of the girls did not make them right through, because they were not competent enough to set the basket in the first instance. A man set the basket in many instances, and the girls then began what we call the siding or the randing of these baskets. There was no mistake but that, as far as our trade was concerned, we won a splendid victory on that point. He based his prices upon girl labour, and other employers based their prices on the district rate of 1s. 10d. and 1s. 8d. I might say this, to quote again Grantham, the employer at Grantham paid the standard rate of wages—he had some to make for the War Office, and he paid the price. I may say that I visited many parts of England in regard to seeing the poorly-paid districts. I was at one place last autumn, and my attention was called to the case of a noted employer who lived about 20 miles away from a certain place. When I went into this village I got in conversation with some basket-makers. I said: "Have you ever any Government work here?" "Oh," he says, "certainly we have. We have done splendid." I said: "What have you made then?" He says: "Some panniers." I did not know whether they were medical panniers, grocery panniers, or any other kind of panniers that is mentioned in our list of prices. "Whom have you made them for?" So-and-so was mentioned, and that was this employer 20 miles away. He was a Government contractor. Why I do not mention the name is simply because I, as a Trade Unionist, mean to watch that little village in the future whenever any Government contracts are given out. I think there is nothing so mean and contemptible as for an employer to go and send that out into districts which are under-paid, which have sub-letting and sweating—and sweating in the worst instances in this case. He sent them to a village and had them made there and then sent back to his works, thus doing good, competent men out of a job. We say: Why should there be a difference between the towns and the country on Government work at all?

2074. (Chairman.) You would expect there would be some difference between Government work and other work, would you not?—Not so, seeing that the employers in so many cases that we can bring forward are always sending them practically out into these districts, into the country. I say they base their prices upon a legitimate price, and of course their price is supposed to be a fair price; and so it is under a good, fair employer. As Mr. Sydney Buxton said on the 13th February, 1891, in discussion in the House, "Sub-letting also, except in special circumstances, "ought to be prohibited and when Government work "is indoors, if let out to contract, it ought to be done "in factories and workshops, and not in the homes "of the labourers." To use a sinister phrase, it was one employer "throwing back the largest amount of "blood-money," and was unfair to the good employer. He also said that all that he asked was that the State, as a capitalist and an employer, should show a good example. But here, in these towns, private employers have to pay 8d. per hour, and why should not the Government? Then there is the question of repairing. I am turning now to a case which I had to ask Mr. Sydney Buxton to consider, and on which I expect the result will be given when the Commission in regard to Postal Servants' Wages is finished. At Peterborough and at Leicester there are men engaged repairing the postal hampers. The current rate of Peterborough as stated in our list is 8d. per hour, and the Government is having these men work for them at 7d. per hour, that is 4s. less per week on a 48 hours' week than the trade allows. If private contractors that have to base their tenders on 8d. per hour can do this, surely the Government can do it? That is what we contend. We have many cases of sub-letting that are too numerous to mention. All we ask this Committee to do is to give a fair and honest consideration—which I am sure you gentlemen will—as to which is the fairest. You have all this class of sub-letting going on around you, and it costs us a good deal of money in trying to ferret out where these orders go to.

2075. I do not think you need labour that point, because it is already provided for in the Clause that there should be no sub-letting except what is usual?—That is so.

2076. You are satisfied with that part of it, are you not?—I should say certainly that no sub-letting should be allowed.

2077. None at all?.—None at all. There are hundreds of employers who never touch this class of work, and it should be given out in small quantities instead of in large quantities to employers who practically know that they cannot get the work out. As the work is given out now, it is all rush, and every other part of the trade is busy at the time with agricultural work. Thus it is hard to get men at times to make the Government work.

2078. I daresay your prohibition of sub-letting might operate very well in your trade, but you can easily see it would not operate in all trades?—It would not in all trades. But I should say that if there were a war on and there was a quantity of war material required, then of course the contractor would want to sub-let part of that, because perhaps he would get an increased contract and so on.

2079. I mean it would not do to have an absolute prohibition against sub-letting altogether?—Not as far as that goes in a case where war breaks out, or anything like that. I would certainly say leave that to the Government.

2080. Even apart from the question of war breaking out if, for instance, you contract with a builder to build a house you would not expect him to make his own window-frames, would you?—Certainly not.

2081. He would have to sub-let those?—Yes, that is right; but in our trade it is a basket, and a basket is a basket. That is the basketmaker's work. Take the giving out of orders at the present time by the Government. I consider that it is wrong to give the orders out to an ammunition maker and to put in the contracts at the same time that he can have the basket part of the business. Who is best qualified to have that? The Government should give that contract out direct to the basket manufacturer instead of giving it to the ammunition maker. That would be much better, because the ammunition maker simply gives the order out. Of course he thinks that everyone is doing right; but we can get closer into the Government than we can to the ammunition maker in the first instance, as we can know where the orders are going to, practically. That is a point—knowing where the contracts are going to as far as the Trade Union is concerned. There is nothing published at the present time with regard to where the contracts are placed. Of course I agree that there are some contracts that should not be made known, as perhaps a secret has to be kept in regard to these contracts as to how many of this and that are being made. But in the case of the basketmakers, it would be much easier if information could be published in the "Labour Gazette" showing where the contracts are being placed. Thus, as a Trade Union, we could help the Government by watching for anyone who is sweating or sub-letting, or not paying the current rate, as the Government state in their contracts at the present time. I think it would act very well, especially for our trade. I speak in ignorance, but I believe from looking at the Trade Congress Report that it is possible to get to know the contractors' names by writing to the Parliamentary Secretary for it. If that is correct, then of course that is a very good thing.

2082. That is all you want?—That is all we want as far as that is concerned, if that is correct. Perhaps you gentlemen could put me right upon that matter.

2083. (Mr. Bailey.) What Parliamentary Secretary do you mean—the Parliamentary Secretary of the Trade Union Congress?—Yes, Mr. Steadman.

2084. (Mr. Black.) Did you say that you wanted the names of the accepted contractors, or of the persons who would be invited to tender?—I did not mean really any of them as far as that is concerned. As far as I have got to know by writing to Mr. Steadman, he can get the knowledge as to who these contractors are.

2085. (Chairman.) That is all you want to know, in fact?—That would satisfy us as far as that is concerned. That is where we are in the dark as a trade. Practically we have had to find these things out for ourselves, and have done in the past, and it is a hardship upon the heads of societies.

2086. (Mr. Bailey.) You want, as I understand, the names of the accepted contractors; is that so?—Yes, that is so.

2087. Not the names of the persons who will be invited to tender?—No, only the accepted ones; that is what we require.

2088. (Chairman.) Have you any further point to make?—Speaking of the London Basket Makers, these are very badly hit by "the current rate." Their rate is higher than the rate of the provinces. The last list that was made was for the provinces alone, and London is higher than that. I have been told by men who have worked for contractors who have had orders in London that there are three different firms that have never paid practically the price for Trade Union labour—I am not speaking of Government work but of other work—but as soon as Government work is given to them they get a few Trade Unionists to come in and make that work. They are supposed to pay the price; but is it not obvious that if they will do that with these men—and they have their men there making it—how can they expect the employer to pay the price—even when an employer goes so far as to charge 5s. per week for that man to sit down on a plank and make work? These cases cannot be practically proved, because of the closeness of the men that are in; but we have it on good authority that these things are being done, and I mention them just to show you that there are under-currents at work to cut up the prices for all fair honest work. Nothing in this list is a fancy price. Practically these prices are based upon the Trade Union rate of wages which is current in the different Unions—on the best class of work understand, because I say this, that so far as Government work is concerned, Government expects that it shall have first-class work, and we say first-class prices, but no fancy prices. That is what that list has been based upon. That list was made in 1900, representatives from each Union being sent, and we based it, as I say, upon those prices. Another point which I may touch upon is in regard to giving the contracts out. If there were some alteration made there it would be a benefit to the Government. The contracts which are given out in March for the Post Office and the War Office are practically all made out of new stuff. The willows contain a large amount of sap, and when that sap is dried out there is a shrinkage in the basket, and the basket is not half as strong as it would be if it was made of mature willows.

2089. I do not think we can go into that; that is not a question arising on the Fair Wages Clause, is it?—No; but nevertheless I know that you gentlemen are connected with that, and I just mention that. If contracts are given out, so that the work would stretch over a year instead of over a few months, I believe a better article would be produced for each Department of the Government as far as baskets are concerned.

2090. Have you anything more to say?—I do not know that I have anything more to add to what I have said.

2091. Is your Federation much more interested in Government work than in other work?—That is so, because we have so much of this sub-letting going on.

2092. Are the employers for whom your members work more interested in Government work than in other work?—No, they are not. Suppose there is a dispute in Lancashire, and the men come out on strike, the Federation help to pay those men a certain amount per week whilst they are out on strike. There is seldom any Government work goes into Lancashire, and thus, gentlemen, you can see it is not all Government work. But by the Federation making that list of Government work, it has brought us all in one line, and thus we are able to watch it more closely. That is where we take a special pride, as far as the trade is concerned, in seeing and watching that no man shall go and sub-let in a district where there is a poorly-paid price.

2093. Have you the same list of prices for other work that you have for Government work?—Yes, just the same. The prices for the other lists are based upon the best work.

2094. Are the lists generally accepted by the employers in your trade?—Yes, they are, all round.

2095. How many employers do you suppose are outside that arrangement?—I could not say.

2096. Not many would you say?—There are not many. There has not been one complaint, except in regard to that dispute in Leicester upon the shell-baskets; that is the only dispute that has occurred in regard to the prices on that list.

2097. Then your grievance is not a very extensive one?—It is not an extensive one outside.

2098. And it practically only affects one employer?—It did, but he has come into line.

2099. Then your grievance is entirely removed?—That grievance is entirely removed as far as that is concerned. We have had other employers who have had Government work, who are supposed to pay the price, and I can quote cases in London where we cannot be expected to believe that they can pay the price when they won't pay it upon the ordinary work—the everyday work that is made in London.

2100. Do you say they pay less on the other work?—Yes, they do.

2101. Then they do not pay your list of prices for that work?—In some of these shops in London one man does not know what another is getting.

2102. (Mr. King.) When you drew up these prices did you get the consent of the employers before you printed them, or did you print them and send them to the employers as a kind of ultimatum?—As far as I am aware—I was not the Secretary at that time—they were sent to the employers, and it was drawn up, and the biggest majority of the employers, as far as I understand, were in favour of it. They said, "As long as we know that other employers are paying the same as we, then we are quite satisfied."

2103. So that the bulk of the employers have accepted these?—Yes.

2104. If that is so, why did you not tell Mr. Buxton so when you wrote to him a month or so ago? He asked you whether these prices had been accepted generally by the employers, and your reply was "the employers are not organised, making it difficult for us to get their opinion"?—That was in reference to the extension of the list, as you will find at the back of the list.

2105. But he referred to the list of sizes and prices?—I misunderstood Mr. Buxton with regard to that. My answer was upon that addition.

2106. Let me read your answer: "In regard to your question whether the Sizes and Prices of Government Work"—that is the title of that little book, is it not?—Yes.

2107. "Have been formally agreed to by employers, I desire to state, in the first place, that the employers are not organised, making it difficult for us to get their opinion." If you had their opinion, why did you not tell Mr. Buxton so?—But I was only writing upon that case at Grantham.

2108. No?—That is how I want it to be understood.

2109. Then you did not make it plain?—I give you that as an honest reply.

2110. May I take it that these prices have been accepted by the bulk of the employers?—They have been accepted, as far as this is concerned, and there has been only one dispute that I am aware of, and that is by Messrs. A. of Leicester in regard to the shell-basket question.

2111. That is not acceptance. Have you had actual acceptance of these prices by the employers?—As far as the acceptances go, it is a matter of fact that they are not organised. We cannot expect employers who are not organised to write and tell us. I have been the Secretary of the Organisation for twelve months, and what I did was this: When that list was printed, I sent so many copies to each district where Government contractors were, those copies to be sent by the District Secretaries, or the General Secretary, whichever desired, to these employers, of course, expecting them at the same time to say: "Does this meet with your approval?" I have never had any reply sent from any employer.

2112. You did not get "Yes" or "No" from any employer?—I got neither "Yes" nor "No."

2113. That is not exactly acceptance, is it?—It is as far as this—when there is no reply, I take it for granted there is no grumbling.

2114. Now about this Grantham case; the contractor called his men together before he took the contract and asked them what price he could put in for their wages, did he not?—Yes.

2115. And they said half-a-crown. Would you blame the contractor for putting in the price that the workmen told him?—I should certainly say yes, when that Union man told him that it was 3s. 9d.

2116. The contractor had not your book then, had he?—No, he had not, and I said that in fairness to the employer.

2117. He took the advice of his workmen and tendered on the half-a-crown and paid them the half-a-crown?—Yes, that is so.

2118. Do you not think that was quite honest on his part?—I do not, when the Union man who was there told him it was 3s. 9d.

2119. The Union man ought to have persuaded his fellow-workmen not to accept the half-a-crown, surely?—I wish he could have done.

2120. Then about the man who worked at home; this firm says that it is customary in the trade to give out work in that way?—It is not customary.

2121. There was no attempt at concealment, was there? You told the tale as if these baskets had been hidden from you and you had spied them out through a window, but nearly every person in the town who was interested knew about it—the Postmaster, for instance, knew?—Yes; he lived there.

2122. There was no concealment or attempt at concealment?—It was a concealment to the Union that they were not being made at a fair price.

2123. The contractor was paying this man who was working at his own home exactly the same as he was paying the men at the shop?—That is so.

2124. He was paying the price that was agreed upon between him and his workmen?—Yes.

2125. But you think that was wrong?—I do think so. I think it was a clear case of sub-letting.

2126. But they say sub-letting is customary in the trade?—It is not customary. As a trade we do not recognise it.

2127. Have you any evidence that it is not customary at Grantham?—I could perhaps produce evidence that it is not customary.

2128. Is there another firm of makers of baskets of any sort at Grantham?—I could not tell you.

2129. There is not, I may tell you; so I do not know how you can prove it is not customary at Grantham?—Then you contend that an employer who tenders and contracts for an article, and who sub-lets them outside to a man and sells that man the stuff with which to make them and then pays him the rate that I have stated, is quite correct as far as the Government is concerned, because where he is is his district?

2130. No, I am not dealing with that. The question we had to look at was: Is it customary in the trade? We were told it was, and we have had no evidence to the contrary. If it is customary in the trade, it is in accordance with the terms of the contract?—You may take this, that if it was done in Leicester every man would come out on strike against the thing.

2131. In such case we should not allow it there, because it would not be customary in the trade, but we had no evidence that it was not customary at Grantham?—You take Grantham as a district, and because it is in that district you say it is customary, but we say it is not customary.

2132. We have to take the evidence we can get, and the only evidence we could get at Grantham was that it was customary in the trade there. Later on, after it was all done and paid for, you contended that it was not customary, but the baskets then had all been finished?—Just so, the baskets had been finished.

2133. I do not see therefore that you have any complaint against the action of the Post Office in the matter?—I have no complaint against the action of the Post Office in regard to the manner in which they took it up, but there is this about it, that as far as our looking at the affair and the Government looking at it, we are quite opposite in views. You simply take it that because it is in a district where we will suppose it is customary, that it is all right if it is customary there; and if the Trade Union lay down a basis and they do not sub-let in this manner and do not agree to it, then the Trade Union is not to be considered at all, and the Government allows that man to go and bid against employers that are sending in tenders from Leicester we will say.

2134. It is a question of whether it is customary or not, and it is not a question of whether the Trade Union want it. The terms of the contract are that there must be no sub-letting except such as is customary in the trade. In this case there was no evidence that this sub-letting was not customary in the trade; all the evidence that we had was to the effect that it was customary?—That was from the employer.

2135. That was from Grantham, the town where the work was going on?—Take this remark of a workman which he made to me. He said: "Many times my employer has said to me, 'Well, I would sooner have my stuff not cut up here but cut up by the men at home'"—simply because when the man took the willow home and made the baskets there, whatever waste there was was on the man's part and against the man. He was speaking as a working man. That man would have to pay for that waste out of his own pocket.

2136. You said there ought not to be any sub-letting in your trade; you do not expect basketmakers to make the metal parts of baskets, do you?—No. Do you mean the trays?

2137. Yes. You agree there must be sub-letting?—There must be.

2138. Then there are hinges on some baskets, and pieces of iron to strengthen them; what about those?—We have nothing to do with those. Our concern is with the basket proper.

2139. The basket is ordered as a whole, and there must be a sub-letting of all those metal parts of the basket, must there not?—Yes, that is right. We are not a metal trade of course, and we deal with the basket work alone. The trays are in a separate contract. That came about by the Government listening to the appeals of the different Unions in regard to the trays. Before they had a separate contract we found that sub-letting was going on in regard to the trays, and that the trays were being made in the country at a ridiculous price.

2140. At what time of the year would you prefer to have the orders given for the baskets?—I should say that the period should be extended, and that it should cover the whole of the year.

2141. Not specially in the winter rather than in the summer, but equally over the whole year?—Yes. Then the department would get an even flow of work and they would not be pushed for it.

2142. I do not think that it would be so much an advantage to the department as it would to the trade, but it is being considered whether the orders can be spread over the whole year?—Most of our men are out of work in the winter time. In the summer time they are generally in work, on account of the agricultural work coming in; that clashes with the postal work, and of course there is always a rush.

2143. For that reason would you not rather have the bulk of orders given in the winter than in the summer?—Yes, that would suit.

2144. Would that not be better?—That would be better, because there is less work in the winter, and of course that would leave the man free to do the agricultural work in the summer time.

2145. (Mr. Black.) On that point about the time of year, you put your argument before a little on the greenness of the willow at particular seasons, I think?—Yes.

2146. Would you get over that by spreading the orders through the year?—The willows are cut when the frost is about. They are put in pits, they are about a yard long, and they are covered up as far as possible in these pits with earth. Then water is allowed to flow in these pits just lightly covered with earth, and they allow it to stay there until the tops begin to bud again. When they bud it is time to take the willows out of the pit to take the bark off. They put the willow through a machine, and as they draw it out it takes the bark off and leaves it white. When that is done—and they have to start working in March on a quantity of these—they all retain a great deal of the sap, and when the sap is dried out of them there is a shrinkage in the baskets, and the baskets wobble about. If the baskets were made of mature willows, that is, of willows cut and then left practically till the winter months before working, it would be better.

2147. Ought you to cut them in one winter and keep them till the next winter?—That could be done.

2148. Is that what you think ought to be done?—It would be a good thing. It would make it more pliable, especially for the men. They have to dip the willow again in water and soak it, and then they work it. Of course, when it has been dried, there is very little shrinkage in a good sound mature English rod.

2149. On this question of home work, you do not allow any of your Union men to take work home, do you?—No, there is none of that at all.

2150. You strictly forbid it?—Strictly.

2151. And the best firms in the trade in any particular district do the work in their factories?—Yes.

2152. Providing their own material?—Yes.

2153. And paying your men wages at piece-work rates?—Yes, that is so right throughout the country.

2154. Your Union deals with men only, I think?—With men only.

2155. But a great deal of basket making does fall to women, and has for hundreds of years, I think?—Yes, the very fancy light work.

2156. Light baskets?—The very light ones. I cannot quote one unless it is a letter basket.

2157. You mean table baskets for papers?—Letter baskets you may call them.

2158. Making those is rather women's work, is it not?—I acknowledge it could be made by women as far as the table basket is concerned. There are very few baskets made for any of the departments any lighter than that; that is about the lightest work there is.

2159. The workers in your Union are skilled men who work all the year round at your trade, I think?—Yes, that is so.

2160. There is a good deal of labour, is there not, going on just through the winter by people who travel through the country?—Do you mean migrating from one place to another?

2161. Yes. Do they affect the trade in any way?—No, I do not know that they do. They simply travel about from one district to another to try to get work.

2162. They come into the towns in the winter to get basket work?—That is so.

2163. Do they not compete with your regular skilled workers?—No.

2164. They work at home, I suppose?—We will take Lancashire. I may say that I was for over three years the General Secretary for Lancashire up to twelve months ago. I do not know of one case in which a man has come from a district and has refused to join the Union. Take Mawdsley in Lancashire, which is one of the most underpaid districts in the country; I have not known a man come from there who has refused to join the Union. We are well recognised in Lancashire, and that being so, the man has come and he has got a good wage at the price that we get, and of course he has always been willing to pay his contribution as far as he was concerned. There are not many who come from a place like Mawdsley; they seem to stick in a place like Mawdsley. Then we may take the hamper districts. There is Warrington, which is only 24 miles from Oldham; Oldham is the centre of the cotton trade, and the cotton trade require a great many baskets—skips as we call them. Very few men come from Warrington to Oldham to compete against us. They do not compete; in fact, we have a Union at Warrington and thus we are on a level. If they come away it is because they would rather get a better wage than stop in the country districts, so they do us no harm in that respect.

2165. I do not think you have said very much about the sixth point in your proof, which is the importance of laying complaints before the different heads of departments. I take it you do not want to bring the complaint before a Cabinet Minister in all cases, do you?—No.

2166. Is what you mean that you want to be in closer touch with the permanent officials?—Yes, that is really what I mean.

2167. Because you can explain things better verbally perhaps than by letter?—I may say that I should explain it in this way: Take the case which I referred to of the War Office panniers, and it is a case which occurred in London. In that instance it took the Union a matter of 18 months to get a settlement. There was a constant drumming at the department to send an inspector down to inspect the place, but there was no one sent. The Union kept pegging and pegging at it, and it took 18 months to do it. When it was brought to the head of the department he ordered the inquiry out again, and it was settled immediately, and the man was struck off the list for the manner in which he had done the work.

2168. (Mr. De la Bère.) You will admit that the hands of the War Office were rather full just about that time—1899 and 1900?—I will acknowledge that; there is no doubt about that. Nevertheless, it was in London, it was not far away, and if an inspector had gone down and seen it right away, I think that the matter could have been seen into at once.

2169. In reference to the home work which you alluded to, is that given out direct to the worker, or is it done on what is known in some trades as the piece-master system; that is to say, is it given out to a man who splits it up amongst others working under him, or is it mainly work taken home by the worker and done by himself?—It is done by himself.

2170. So it is not done by the piece-master system?—No.

2171. In regard to the firm you mentioned at Castle Donington, what do you calculate, taking your rates as a basis, that a man should earn in a week?—I should say from 36s. to 38s.; but understand this, that in piece-work it is a question of the competency of the man.

2172. Take the average man?—One man might go and he might do £2 10s. worth of work easily we will say, because he is a clever man; but the average man, taking all things into consideration, I should say would earn about 36s. to 38s. as far as that class of work was concerned. Taking the whole of the work in our trade right throughout the country, I do not think that it would reach above 32s. all round. He is a very good man if he can make the same as I say.

2173. As regards the ammunition baskets about which you raise the objection that they were being made by girls and women, the objection, I take it, was chiefly based on the fact that the girls and the women were working, and not that the work was unsuitable for them?—I say it was unsuitable for the girls.

2174. It was a light basket, was it not?—It was not exactly on account of the lightness of the basket. Perhaps I could describe it to you. We will say that there are 23 standards in such a basket; they stick out like that all round (describing); there is a certain size of cane used there which would be no more than the 16th of an inch in diameter, and to work another cane round that which is nearly as thick as the cane which stands up, requires a lot of thumb work in order to get in between. Being very close work and fine work, it is hardly possible that a girl could make it. I have myself seen men with their thumbs bleeding through working on these baskets. The pulp-cane which it is made out of is cut by a machine. It goes through this machine, and as it comes out, it is just as if the wooden bark of this black lead pencil was taken off and only the inside left. When it comes out from the machine, the cane being porous, the machine in cutting it has left a certain amount of those pores around, and they make it so rough that I have seen the men's thumbs bleeding with the work.

2175. You considered it was unsuitable because of the material used rather, we will say, than because it was hard work?—Yes, that is so.

2176. You would not admit that a girl with a slender arm would find it more easy to do this work than a man would, owing to the length and narrowness of the article?—She may be a weak girl. It would all depend upon the hand. All our work depends on the strength of the hand, especially in the thumb. The thumb part is the main part in basket making. You have to thumb the cane into position. If you have a thin soft stick standing up, and the other cane that had to go round it was hard, you have to wind that hard cane round that soft cane and to make it of just one form, and that is where the pressure comes in with the thumb. That is where the hardship is as far as that is concerned. Otherwise, there was not any hard work with the basket, and the basket practically was light and had to be made light.

2177. I suppose what it comes to is that you would not consider that a girl could draw that quite as tight as a man could?—She could not. It is impossible for a girl to do it, as far as that part of the work is concerned.

2178. (Chairman.) Does the same remark apply to the women?—It was women I was speaking about.

2179. I thought when you spoke of girls you meant females who were not adults?—There was adult labour there as far as I know.

2180. Then the same remarks would apply to the adult female as to the girl?—Yes.

2181. Both would be equally incapable of doing it?—Yes, they would be incapable of doing that class of work. We contended that. Of course, the baskets were made, but, as I say, the hardest part of the work was practically done by some men. I am not saying that every basket was not made entirely by a woman, but one woman might be cleverer than others, and she might be able to make one. But men had to form that basket, and they had to make the nozzle part which was very close—it came to 2½ or 2¼ inches. It had to be formed into that shape by thumb work, and it is impossible for most women or girls to do that. Thus these men did it at a stipulated wage.

The witness withdrew.

SEVENTH DAY.

Thursday, January 16th, 1908.

At 32, Great George Street, Westminster, S.W.

PRESENT:

Sir GEORGE H. MURRAY, K.C.B. (Chairman).

Mr. R. Bailey, M.V.O.
Mr. F. W. Black.
Mr. H. De la Bère, C.B.
Mr. A. Wilson Fox, C.B.
Mr. J. H. Hillier.
Mr. J. J. Wills (Secretary).

Mr. George Dew, called and examined.

2182 (Chairman.) You represent the Amalgamated Society of Carpenters and Joiners?—Yes.

2183. Which is a Union spread all over the country, I believe?—Yes. I am also a member of the London County Council.

2184. Do you consider that on the whole the Fair Wages Resolution has done any good to your trade?—It has done a great deal of good, more especially here in the London district. Previous to the passing of the Resolution workmen engaged on Government work were generally underpaid, and in many cases very much underpaid; for instance, in my trade at that time joiners were only receiving 7½d. per hour when they ought to have had 9d. But since the passing of that Resolution, whatever the Trade Union rate has been from time to time they have generally had it—of course with some rather bad evasions and exceptions that I am going to deal with.

2185. (Mr. Bailey.) Are you speaking now of men employed on Government work only?—I am speaking both of men in direct employ and of men employed through the contractor on Government work.

2186. For Government work only?—Yes, decidedly. We always maintain our money with private employers; but the Government was the exception, and there was bad work in consequence. I dare say you know your Law Courts were largely built by cheap labour—and I do not think anyone is very proud of them.

2187. (Mr. Hillier.) They were built before the passing of this Resolution?—Yes; I was only saying in reply to the Chairman that there has been a very great improvement as the result of this Resolution.

2188. (Chairman.) Have you got an agreed rate with the employers in London?—Yes.

2189. Have you got that everywhere in the country?—In nearly every district of any importance we have practically got an agreed rate with the employers. The representatives of our Union meet the representatives of the Employers' Association, and they generally agree—in most cases it is done by mutual agreement—and a code of rules is drawn up.

2190. But you have found, notwithstanding the Resolution and the Clause in the contracts, that there have been certain evasions?—There have, and some of them have been very bad ones, more especially here in London. Notwithstanding the fact of a definite agreement with the employers that such-and-such are the rates of wages and working conditions, yet we have had under-payment on many of our Government jobs.

2191. Do you get more cases of evasion under Government jobs than under other jobs?—That I would not like to say.

2192. You are often making representations to employers of all kinds, I suppose?—We never have any difficulty in regard to rates of wages with all the best class of firms; but you do sometimes allow firms to have your work that do not observe the recognised conditions of employment.

2193. But that is not peculiar to Government work?—No.

2194. I suppose you will find what you call evasions in all work?—Yes. What I really mean is that, generally speaking, we have very little difficulty at all in maintaining our rate of wages. Respectable employers—that is, the best employers, especially those who belong to the Builders' Association—do not attempt to underpay or to take advantage.

2195. We cannot go into the merits of the cases here, but perhaps you could give us one or two typical instances of how evasion is managed?—Yes; I should like to if you will allow me. First of all, as I mentioned in the proof that I sent in, I have had a good many complaints from the Plymouth and Devonport district, which of course is a very large district, in regard to Government work.

2196. You need not mention the names of the people—I think you had better leave those out; but you might just give us an idea of the sort of case you are thinking of?—In connection with the Keyham extension, a very big contract in that district, the recognised customs of the trade were not observed by the contractor.

2197. Are you speaking only of customs or of rates of wages? I want to show you that customs mean wages. The working hours, for instance, were not such as were agreed to by the local employers of Plymouth and the district for this job.

2198. (Mr. Bailey.) Do you mean that the contractor wanted the men to work longer?—The men had to work longer. I want to show to the Chairman that that means wages. There is a definite rate agreed to for the ordinary working hours, and then there is an increased rate agreed to for overtime, so that any hours worked beyond the ordinary number come within our Resolution. The firm was waited on, and we tried to induce them to set the matter right. They said they would consider the matter and they would send a reply in writing. Their reply was that on the following day the whole of the members of my Union were paid off and discharged, and no Union men have ever got work again on that job; in fact, they could not very well, because they could not work there under our rules. The whole of that work was done on the Keyham extension, so far as the carpenters and joiners are concerned, under unfair conditions, and none of our men in the district could participate at all in that work. This matter was made known to the Admiralty, but they did not set it right, and consequently on the whole of that work the members of my Trade Union could not be employed.

2199. (Chairman.) You did make representations to the Admiralty, you say?—Representations were made by the local secretary of the district, and I should be very pleased to arrange for him to be produced here if he is wanted.

2200. What was the Admiralty's reply?—I could not give you the exact terms, but I believe it was that they could not see their way to interfere or could not admit that there was anything wrong; in fact, the reply was of such a nature that many cases since that time in the Plymouth district have been allowed almost to go by default, as the men have looked upon the Department as being unsympathetic towards them.

2201. The Admiralty, in fact, did not admit that the contractor was paying less than the current rate?—I suppose he would say that he was paying the current rate. Where it came in was, that he was paying the current rate, but that he kept the men longer than the recognised working hours, and for those additional hours he ought to have paid, but did not pay the overtime rate to the men who worked the additional hours.

2202. It really was a question of overtime then?—Yes, of causing the men to work longer hours than those agreed upon. I have the rules of the district in my bag, which I can leave behind. There was another case in the Plymouth district; that was a contract for the Admiralty at Turnchapel. A contractor there only paid 7d. per hour instead of 8d. He definitely refused to recognise the rate, and said he did not employ Trade Unionists, or that they had nothing at all to do with the rules and customs of the district. It was impossible to get that matter set right. There was another matter in the same district, which I am glad to say was set right. There the contractor was doing some work at the naval barracks. It was pointed out to the officer who was acting for the Government, the Clerk of the Works; he had the matter looked into, and it was found that the contractor was only paying wages ranging from 5d. to 8d. per hour, whereas every man ought to receive 8d. per hour, which was the rate of the district. I am glad to say that in that case the matter was set right, and the back money, that is, the full money, was paid.

2203. What was the result of your complaint in the case which you mentioned immediately before this—the case at Turnchapel?—So far as I have it from the Secretary, there was no result. The job went on and was continued by men employed at 7d. per hour instead of 8d., and of course that prevented our men from having any work. The men are supposed to work at a recognised rate, just as a lawyer would not work under his recognised fee.

2204. Then you do not know whether a definite answer came from the Admiralty about that case?—I do not know. I am told that the job went on—I am told that in writing from the responsible secretary of the district—that it was carried through at the lower rate of wages, and that the Trade Union carpenters and joiners could not take any part in the work. The same thing happened even in the case that I have previously mentioned of the naval barracks, which was set right. The very fact that a firm only pays 5d. and upwards to 8d. per hour would make it an unfair firm, and the ordinary Trade Union workmen could not be employed in that firm. So even where that was put right, it did not benefit the Union carpenters and joiners, because the firm being unfair, they could not take employment. There was another firm in Plymouth that I was asked very specially to mention. That was a firm that had a job out at the forts some four miles outside the city. In the local working rules, especially for the building trade, where work has got to be done at a distance from the shop, an allowance is made for walking time, which, of course, is wages. This contractor refused to pay that allowance, and did not pay it, although it was a job four miles away. You can quite understand that it was very necessary that the men should have had an allowance, but they did not get it. That job was done under such conditions that the men of the district were prevented from accepting employment on it. Then I have a case from Southampton that I should like to mention. I have got copies of the correspondence, which is very interesting, that took place in that case. There, a firm was carrying on some work at Netley for the War Department, and they were not paying the current rate of the district to the carpenters employed. One man, a member of my own Union, got work there and was paid 1d. per hour under the rate of the district; another man, not belonging to the Union, was receiving 2d. per hour less than the rate of the district. The matter was reported to the War Department, and up to the present we have not been able to get any settlement. Here is the first letter in reply coming from the War Office, dated February 22, 1907: "With reference to your letter of 14th inst., alleging that Messrs. A. and B. are not observing the Fair Wages Clause under their contract for the execution of artificers' work at Netley, I am to acquaint you that on the receipt of specific particulars as regards the allegations made, the matter will be investigated.—I am, sir, your obedient servant, (signed) Arthur E. Turner. To Mr. F. W. Woolfenden, Secretary." Then a further letter was sent to the Secretary of the War Office, dated March 3, 1907:—"Sir,—In reply to your letter of February 22, we allege that Messrs. A. and B. did not observe the Fair Wages Clause under their contract for artificers' work in at least two cases this year, viz.: (1) L. M., carpenter, employed during first week of February and paid 1d. per hour less than the standard rate for the district; discharged for refusing to work for less than the standard rate. (2) P. Q., carpenter, employed about same time as previous case, and paid 2d. per hour less than the standard rate.—I remain, yours faithfully, (signed) F. W. Woolfenden, Secretary." The reply to this letter was dated April 4, 1907:—"Sir,—In reply to your letter of the 3rd ult., I am directed to acquaint you that a reference has been made to the firm in question, who state that the two men were discharged as incompetent. In these circumstances, it is not proposed to take any further action in the matter.—I am, sir, your obedient servant, (signed) S. D. Williams. To Mr. Woolfenden." There was a further letter in reply to that, dated April 8, 1907—a long time ago—to which we have not yet had any answer. This letter was addressed to the Secretary of the War Office. "Sir,—Reverting to yours of the 4th inst., in relation to your inquiries of Messrs. A. and B., the information you have been given is entirely untrue. The man L. M. was not discharged for incompetency, but left because the firm in question refused to pay him the full money. The second man, P. Q., was employed over a month, and was discharged upon completion of the job, being told in the presence of witnesses that the firm had nothing against him, and that the only reason for his discharge was the completion of the job upon which he was engaged. In these circumstances you will see the necessity of your taking further action in the matter.—Yours faithfully, (signed) F. W. Woolfenden." There that case ends, and we have never been able to get any farther. So far as we know, that case had never been settled. I should be very pleased, indeed, if you would like it, to give further information, or to bring up local people from Southampton in connection with the case

2205. Of course we only want to know the point; we cannot go into the complaint itself?—You want to know whether these things have really taken place?

2206. Yes?—I would like now to come nearer home. I will give you the London cases, if you will allow me; and I want first to mention a case that is going on at the present time, a case in connection with H.M. Office of Works. I refer now to the new post office at Kingston. There the contractor is only paying 10d. per hour instead of 10½d., which is the rate of the London district. The rate of wages, as you know, for London, which extends to a radius of 12 miles from Charing Cross, as agreed to between the workmen on the one hand, and the Association of Master Builders, on the other, is 10½d. per hour for carpenters and joiners. I can produce in your room, and shall be very pleased to do so at another meeting, the very man we allowed to remain on that job to get the evidence that the workmen there only get 10d. an hour. It has been reported, but we can get no settlement about it, and we want to know how it is that H.M. Office of Works does not intervene.

2207. When did you begin that complaint?—I cannot quite say, but it was some months ago. I shall be very pleased in that case to bring our London secretary here; he has got a very big pile of correspondence dealing with the matters affecting the Office of Works. I do not know quite the date when it was first reported, but I have here a copy of a letter written to our General Secretary on 29th November about the case, and I will read a part of this letter. This is from our London District Secretary to Mr. Chandler, our General Secretary:—"I have been instructed to ask you to call the attention of the Parliamentary Committee of the Trade Union Congress"—that is trying to get another channel to deal with it—"to the effect that Messrs. C. & D. are carrying out a contract under H.M. Office of Works in the erection of a new post office at Kingston and are not conforming to the recognised rules of the district. This firm is only paying the carpenters 10d. instead of 10½d." It previously had been reported to H.M. Office of Works, and we find that the firm has set up the old plea which has been so often successful, that the rate of wages for that district is 10d. per hour. How on earth they could set up that plea when there is a definite agreement that within 12 miles of Charing Cross the wages are to be 10½d., I do not know.

2208. (Mr. Wilson Fox.) Is that a local firm that is doing this job?—The firm comes from Isleworth.

2209. (Chairman.) Are there no local variations in the London district?—No. I may say that Mr. Harcourt had given to a deputation from our body some time ago a promise that the London rate of wages should be enforced generally; but, anyhow, here is an evasion.

2210. Have you any more cases to bring before us?—Yes, I have several. I want to show that right round the outer belt of London, where of course the Union is the weakest, there you have allowed the Union to go to the wall, by not helping us at all to maintain the wages.

2211. Your point, I understand, is that there are local variations from the standard rate?—There are always people who try to pay less, especially when you get on the outer verge of the radius; but it is not fair to the good employer in the inner part of London who estimates and puts in for the job on fair terms that he should be under-sold by someone out there.

2212. Perhaps their contention is that though your rate is general all over the London district, it is subject to modification at certain places outside the district, or on the edge of it?—We do not admit that.

2213. I say that is their contention?—Yes, I know it is. Here is another case in connection with the Office of Works; it is the case of a post office at Sutton. The Office of Works was written to in this matter, and we could not get the matter put right. There only 10d. per hour was paid instead of 10½d.

2214. I take it that is the same sort of case over again?—Yes.

2215. (Mr. Wilson Fox.) Although there were signed rates between the Trade Union and the employers, do you think that the majority of men in those districts were receiving those rates?—I do not know all the districts. Take Sutton; I know something of that district, as the London County Council have got a good deal of property near Sutton. There is our big Banstead Asylum, for instance, where we have a large amount of work. We always pay the London rate of wages there, and I think all the main work in Sutton is paid at the London rate.

2216. You said the Union might be weak in some of these places, and I thought the result of that, perhaps, was that the standard rate was not paid?—Surely the Government should not take advantage of that.

2217. I am not defending it?—This Resolution was passed to try and help us in such matters.

2218. I only want to know what is the fact—whether the Union being weak in those places, the majority of the men there were or were not being paid the Trade Union rate according to the agreement that has been signed?—That I cannot say, but I do know that the rate is paid there by several people. Then I have another complaint, and this is a complaint that I want to impress upon your Committee and ask their help. It is a complaint in regard to a firm at Enfield, which is engaged in doing work for H.M. Office of Works. They do a good deal of jobbing work, I believe, in connection with post office and other buildings. This firm habitually disregard the proper regulations with regard to the employment of workpeople. They will not work the proper hours, and they will not give the extra time rate, although they make the men work longer hours than the hours laid down. They only pay the proper rate and give the proper conditions when on Government work, and I do say that it is a wrong practice for any Government Department to allow. That means that this firm to all intents and purposes is an unfair firm so far as their ordinary employment is concerned; no workmen belonging to a trade organisation which has got to maintain the rate of wages, can go to work there. They are supposed to qualify for work under the Government Resolution by simply saying they will give the rate of pay and conditions to the men employed on Government work. I ask, Sir, when you do make your recommendations that something shall be done to stop that kind of thing going on. We get a lot of complaints similar to that, and this is a typical case. It has been fully reported, and I can produce from our London Committee the whole of the correspondence dealing with this matter.

2219. (Chairman.) That is a type of case we are quite familiar with, but do you think that the Government can fairly be asked to go beyond seeing that on their own work proper wages were being paid, and to undertake in addition to see that on all other work done by the contractor equally good wages are being paid?—I believe so. I was in the House on the night of the debate when the Resolution was passed, and if I understood the feeling of the House at that time, it was that the Government work should only be done by fair employers.

2220. But you see the difficulty that the Government would be involved in if that were carried out; it might be called upon to inquire into the rate of wages being paid by a contractor to men employed on work with which the Government are not concerned at all. They have sufficient to do, I should think, to inquire into the complaints made about the rates paid to the workmen employed on their own work, and if we are to extend that to all the work of the contractor, do you not think that there would be some difficulty?—May I point out that if once you allow a contractor to do your work, who admits that he does not generally pay the rates of wages and conform to the recognised fair conditions of employment, how difficult it would be for you to ever find out that he was paying it when he was doing your work—the Government work. For instance, take my trade, the joinery trade. Perhaps he will be a builder with 30 or 40 joiners, and when the jobs are given out, they are often numbered, and you would not know where they are for, and it would be difficult for you to find out whether a full-priced man has the work or a cheap man. You can see therefore what difficulty there would be to make sure that the men engaged on the Government work got the right money.

2221. It is very difficult, I admit, but it seems to me that your proposal would be still more difficult to carry out?—I mean that in your position, with that type of firm, you should not let them have work at all, if they do not conform to the conditions and will not accept the fair wages fixed between workmen and employers by mutual agreement. I say that the firm who will not do that, should not be allowed to do Government work.

2222. The question arises then whether they are doing so or not, and according to your proposal the Government would have to satisfy themselves whether they were or not?—It is admitted in this case that they are not working under the conditions generally agreed to with the employers as fair; but they are excused and allowed to go on with Government work, simply because they comply with those conditions on Government work only. I contend that that is a very unfair way of dealing with the matter. I have another difficulty that I want to mention for the purpose of showing how, in order to take advantage of the Resolution, one class of workman is sometimes used to the detriment of another. This is not a case of disagreement between the workmen themselves. I am speaking of a London firm in the Woolwich district who do work for the Government and who employ two different classes of workpeople. They employ cabinet-makers and they employ joiners. Cases have been proved where they have been underpaying the proper wages upon joiner's work; but they have at once said "This was not done by joiners but was done by cabinet-makers." Cabinet-makers can work for 10d. per hour, which is ½d. less than the joiners. The cabinet-makers have got two rates, 10½d. as well as 10d. This firm in question at Woolwich do a large amount of work for the Government, and they dodge about in that way. They do work both for the Office of Works and for the War Department, and they employ a good many joiners, but they do not pay the wages and do not conform to the conditions of the trade.

2223. I am not quite sure that I follow the exact point in this case?—You have had complaints made frequently to you in regard to this firm at Woolwich not paying the proper wages, and the London County Council also, for whom they work, have had many complaints; but the firm generally make this excuse when you prove that the joiners have not received the rate—"We did not have joiners on the work, but we employed cabinet-makers"—simply because the cabinet-makers are allowed to work for 10d. We complained about the under-payment, but they somehow or another managed to dodge it in that way.

2224. They call a man a cabinet-maker whom you call a joiner; is that what it comes to?—Quite so; or it may be that they may sometimes have a cabinet-maker upon the work; anyhow, they are getting the work done cheaper by ½d. an hour less than what it otherwise should have been done at. I will hand in an extract from the report of our committee on that case. Then there are two cases that I would wish to mention with regard to Croydon, to show the hardship that is inflicted upon my trade in London by your not compelling the proper wages to be paid in these outer districts. In the Croydon district two firms have been doing work under the Post Office and H.M. Office of Works, and in each case they have only paid 10d. per hour instead of 10½d. In the case of one of the two firms you refused, or you did not help us, anyhow, to enforce the wages, but the firm was dealt with by the Builders' Association themselves; they helped us in the matter. They even called upon the firm to withdraw from their Association, because they would not pay the proper wages; yet they were still allowed to go on and do the Government work.

2225. Did you complain there?—Yes, we made a complaint.

2226. What answer did you get to that?—That they were paying the money that you believe to be the local rate for the district. Instead of taking our agreement, agreed to by the Association of Master Builders of London (which covers a radius of 12 miles), you allow some of these local people to set up the contention that they have got a local rate.

2227. That is practically the same case as those you have mentioned at Kingston and Sutton, is it not?—Quite so. You did allow these people at Croydon to set up the contention that they had a local rate as against our general rate. But the builders of London did not agree with you. The two firms belong to the Builders' Association, and they were brought to book, and one was told that if they did not comply there was no course for them but to withdraw their membership from the Association. I will just, if you will let me, read an extract from the report of the conciliation board of the Builders' Association of London, which is composed of an equal number of workmen and employers. This is their finding: "The Board, having learnt that Messrs. E. and F. are not conforming to the London rules at the works the subject of complaint, and that the same are situated within the 12-mile radius, conclude that they have no option but to resign their membership of the London Master Builders unless they conform to the rules at present existing." There you have got a pronouncement by the builders of London. But in both these cases they were allowed to go on by the Government, although they never paid the proper rate of wages on their work. There was a promise made in the case of the second firm that they would comply with the rules of the London district so far as concerned any future work to be done. I have here some printed details that you might like to see—printed extracts about the case. (Handing in same.)

2227A. Does that conclude your London list?—That by no means exhausts the number of cases we have had in London, but it is a fair sample of the difficulty we have had to contend with in the London district. We do ask in connection with matters like that, that the different Government departments should strictly accept the arrangements come to between the workmen and the employers, and not listen to any of these excuses that they have got some local rate different to that. What is generally accepted by the workmen and employers should be accepted by you, and should be strictly enforced—in fact, I think you would be wise for your London work to adopt the same plan as the London County Council, and print the wages in the schedule and make the contractors subscribe to it.

2228. In a schedule to the contract, do you mean?—Quite so; the wages should form part of the contract. That is the plan adopted by the London County Council, and it has been very effective. Then I have a case from Norwich that I want to mention. There is a firm there who do a good deal of work for the War Office and other departments of the Government; they are unfair, and do not comply with the recognised conditions of the district in regard to wages and working conditions. They have been repeatedly reported, but we have never been able to get the matter set right. Their name is published in the unfair list of the Carpenters' and Joiners' Society as a firm where no carpenter and joiner who belongs to our Society can go and accept employment. But notwithstanding all our representations, this firm still goes on doing Government work and not paying the standard rate of wages. They had a contract some little time ago in connection with Greenwich Park—I think it was the building of some refreshment rooms or something of that sort. They brought carpenters up from Norwich for that work; there was no objection to their bringing these men from Norwich, but we complain that they only paid them the Norwich rate of wages, 8d. per hour, as against 10½d., the London rate. You will see at once that there was a very great hardship inflicted upon the men in London by that firm being allowed to do that kind of thing.

2229. Is that the point in their case, that they sent men from Norwich, where there is a low rate, and paid them here at the same rate?—Yes. This matter of Greenwich Park was reported to the Office of Works. Not only did they do that in this case, but generally the whole working of the firm in Norwich is contrary to the recognised rules and customs of the district, and no member of a Trade Society can work in that firm. We maintain that there are so many good firms that there is no need for you to have work done by a firm of that description.

2230. What was their answer in the case of the Greenwich complaint?—I did not bring the letters with me, but the letters are over in our district office.

2231. Do you happen to remember the gist of it?—No, I do not. The fact was that the work was done in that way, and our District Secretary (whom I should be pleased to arrange to bring here) told me that they could get no redress whatever. These cases, including the Greenwich case, have all been reported frequently to the departments. I am asked to mention another case from Norwich. That is the case of a big firm of electrical engineers who receive contracts from the Admiralty, and who do not pay the Trade Union rates so far as my trade is concerned. In connection with their work, it is necessary to employ carpenters, and I think my friend Mr. Lane will deal with almost similar cases that he has trouble with in Sheffield when he gives evidence to you on the Sheffield case. This firm of electrical engineers employ some 300 or 400 engineers or other men in connection with the engineering trade. I have no doubt that all those men make them conform to the rules of the Amalgamated Society and other societies of engineers. But they require many carpenters in connection with the works, and to those carpenters they pay less than the rate paid by any builders in Norwich, and the men in their employ to-day are only getting 7½d., whereas the rate of the town is 8d. What I want to ask is this—that the Government departments shall assist us in this way—that they shall not simply accept a firm as being fair because, if, we will say, it is an engineering firm it is fair in engineering, but that if it is fair in engineering and it wants to employ some carpenters, then it should not pay them less than a builder would pay them. We want you to interpret the matter that the firm should be fair in every part of its business.

2232. What is their contention on the point?—I may say that there is no unfriendly feeling towards the firm, and there has been no report, I think, sent to headquarters about them. As far as possible, we always try to negotiate, and they are still trying to get the matter put right, and I think we have gone even so far as this—I am not quite sure that there may not be some of the members of our Society who are allowed to go in for a time, hoping the matter might be rectified. At all events, here is a case where, although the engineers no doubt are getting their full money, the carpenters employed have got to work for ½d. an hour under the rate. Then there is a case at Doncaster of a firm which appears on the unfair list in our published Reports, which is information to our members not to work there. This firm receive a very great deal of work from the Post Office, but they do not comply with the fair conditions of employment.

2233. What is the complaint in their case?—It is a complaint both as to wages and as to working conditions. Complaints have been continually made, and our Society has been very much troubled indeed with the complaints we have received about this firm. We have not been able to get that matter righted. The complaint there is underpaying—paying all kinds of lower wages and sometimes adopting an objectionable method of working. I do not know whether that firm does it, but a firm that I mentioned some time ago has its work done by piece-work, practically by task-work which is priced out—instead of being done by day work. It is the practice in the building trade to only have day work, that is, work paid by the hour.

2234. Do you recognise no piece-work rate?—We do not recognise any piece-work, and no good class employer recognises it either. In all the best building firms there is no piece-work whatsoever. We had it very many years ago, and it led to so much scamping and so much bad work that there was almost a mutual agreement to put an end to it. You would only find it to-day with what we call the very cheap speculative work, running up very cheap cottages and things like that out in what we call the fields. You might find a little of it there; but we do not recognise it, and no respectable employer in the building trade recognises it. Now I come to some general suggestions that we make to you, and I make them as having studied this question of Government contracts and of the Fair Wages Clause rather closely; I also make them as having had now ten years' experience upon the London County Council. We are, as you know, rather large employers of labour, and I think we have more strict conditions with regard to the payment of wages and other labour conditions than what you have in the Government. I am asked to make these suggestions. I make them to you officially, and I do hope that they will receive your consideration. I believe they will help you very much indeed towards a better interpretation and a better carrying out of the Resolution of the House of Commons. I am very sorry indeed to find that the reference to this Committee is so narrow, and that you have no power to recommend an amendment of the Resolution, with the drafting of which I had something to do.

2235. We are not authorised to deal with an extension of its scope?—I had to do with the drafting of the original Resolution which Mr. Sydney Buxton endeavoured to move when the Government brought on the amendment. Of course, we did not get it as we wanted it, and I am rather sorry now that they have not allowed this Committee to make some suggestions for a further amendment. I am bound to keep my remarks within your reference, and these suggestions, I think, all come within your reference. I take it that it is quite within your power to make such suggestions as will assist in carrying out the present Resolution.

2236. That is it?—I desire to make the following suggestions which will be the means, if adopted, of causing a more strict compliance with the Resolution of the House of Commons:—(1) That the contractor shall sign a declaration that he is at present paying and will continue to pay all his workpeople the Trade Union rates of wages, and that the conditions of employment in each branch of his business are in strict conformity with the recognised working rules and customs of the various trades; (2) that the contractor shall cause to be displayed, both in his workshops and on the site where the building or other works are being constructed, a schedule of the wages he is paying, together with the hours of labour under which his workpeople are employed; (3) that the contractor's pay-sheets and wages books shall be open to inspection, and it shall be the duty of the clerk of works, inspector, or other official of the Government, to inspect the pay-sheets or wages books and satisfy himself that the Resolution of the House of Commons is being observed; (4) that penalties similar to those adopted by the London County Council should be inserted in all Government contracts, and where a contractor persistently evades the Resolution that he should not be again allowed to tender for Government work. I use the term "Trade Union rate of wages" instead of "the wages current in the district," but the two sets of words mean the same thing, because the standard or current wage is the wage which is generally agreed to between the representatives of the workpeople, on the one hand, and of the employers, on the other; in fact, there would be no standard rates of wages at all if it were not for the collective bargain that takes place between the Trade Union, on the one hand, and the Employers' Association, on the other. I should like you boldly to adopt the term "Trade Union rate of wages."

2237. "As agreed upon?"—If you like to put in some qualifying words such as "as agreed upon" I am quite willing for that, so that no Union should attempt to post up a rate that had not been agreed upon. I am quite prepared to have qualifying words, and we have some qualifying words in the County Council Clause, with which I daresay you are familiar—they are something like "in practice obtained."

2238. I know; that is a common term?—"The Trade Union rate" you can qualify by "as agreed upon." I think you will get rid of a lot of the difficulty if you adopt those suggestions.

2239. (Mr. Wilson Fox.) You could not regard the rate as a Trade Union rate unless it was in practice paid, could you?—Decidedly not. We have never tried, in our Union, to enforce a rate that is not generally adopted. For our own self-defence in trying to build up our Union, if we tried to force a rate that could not be maintained and at the same time had a rule to punish a man for working at less than that rate, our Union would cease to exist. You can see that at once. It is useless for us to try and maintain a rate that is not generally maintained in the district; it would put us in a very awkward position.

2240. (Chairman.) Do you happen to know what the extreme range of your rates is over the country? I suppose London would be the highest?—Yes, London is the highest.

2241. That is 10½d., I think you said?—Yes.

2242. What would be the lowest?—The rate would run down to about 6d. or 6½d. in the West of England, I think.

2243. As low as that?—Yes. I can hand you in our report in which we give a list of the wages in every town or place where the Society extends, and in which also you will find a list of the firms that I have been referring to (handing in report).

2244. How do you set to work to fix a rate? Take that Norwich rate of which you have spoken, which is 8d., I think you said. How do you set to work to decide what the rate is to be in a particular place?—First of all the workmen, if they were going to make a change, or to suggest a change in the working conditions of the town, would undoubtedly have meetings, and they would appoint a committee and instruct that committee to make inquiries and say whether they were justified in seeking for some improvement in their position, or in bringing about some amendment of the working rules of their district. This committee would report to a full meeting of the trade; every consideration would be given to their report, and then, if the meetings agreed, the suggestions would be embodied in the form of a memorial which would be addressed to the employers' association—that is, the Builders' Association of the district. They would be asked to kindly consider it, and to agree to a conference between the representatives of the men and themselves. In most cases that conference would take place, and there would possibly be some give-and-take; in fact, there generally is a little give-and-take. In most cases, I am glad to say, we get our rates fixed without having any dispute or any difficulty whatsoever, though occasionally an unfortunate dispute will take place. When once the change is agreed to, the rules are drawn up and they are generally signed by the master builders, on the one hand, and by the employees, on the other. They are then printed and handed round to the workpeople for observance. I will give you a little book of the rules from Plymouth (handing in same). We have also got established, I am glad to say, to-day, in connection with the building trade, in nearly every town of any importance, a building trade conciliation board, and we hope to find in the near future that we have solved the difficulty of disputes, and that we shall have very few of them.

2245. Why, for instance, should the rate be 8d. at Norwich and 10½d. in London; what is the justification for that difference?—If you ask me, I say there is no justification for any difference in the rate of wages for a good skilled carpenter or joiner whether employed at Norwich or in London, except that slight difference which there may be in regard to living conditions, such as rent and the various other living conditions, which would not, however, account for all that variation between 8d. and 10½d. That is my opinion, but unfortunately there are these variations in wages.

2246. In fact, your contention would be that the rate ought to be much more uniform over the country than it is?—Quite so, it ought; because the man in Norwich is equally as skilled as the man in London; in fact, many of the London men come from different parts of the country, including Norwich. I do not know how it ever came about that the wages remained so low; I suppose it is due to the neglect of organisation amongst the workpeople. We have got very good wages up in the North of England; there are some places there where they are getting almost as good wages as in London, and I should say, taking the living conditions into consideration, they are quite as well off there as in London.

2247. Supposing you were trying for a uniform rate, of course you would attempt to level up to London?—Decidedly, we should attempt to level up.

2248. Would it be reasonable to attempt to average them if you did have a uniform rate?—Of course no one would care to take anything less than what they were getting, and perhaps in averaging, if you took a number of towns in a district, and some were a little better off than others, and tried to average them, I do not think that the town that had got to lose a little on the average, though many others would gain, would consent to a reduction. I think there ought to be a little more uniformity in the rates of wages paid to-day. Of course, in the legal profession, wherever a man goes to practise, he gets his fee, and we cannot under-pay him; but his Trade Union is a legal one, and a very strong one.

2249. I see from this report that you have handed me that in Milford Haven, for instance, you have got a rate as low as 5¾d.?—Yes. I said to you that I thought it would run down to about 6d. or 6½d.

2250. What are the conditions at Milford Haven which justify a rate of 5¾d., when the rate is 10½d. in London?—I should say there are no conditions that justify it. Undoubtedly they get their rent a little cheaper there, but not enough to justify that very low rate of wages.

2251. But there must be some reason for the rate being very low there?—I think the chief reason is that in the smaller towns and the scattered districts it is difficult to organise labour and to get them to combine and unite together. In the big towns the men naturally organise themselves in their Trade Unions and use their collective power.

2252. But they have got a branch of your Union at this place?—Yes, I know, but as a rule the Unions are rather weak in these provincial towns. I hope it is not so at Milford, although you have a big dockyard near there—the Government rate in the past in some of the dockyards has not been very helpful. I think that it is a little better to-day than it used to be in the dockyards.

2253. Then take Cirencester, for example, that is 5½d.?—Yes.

2254. Then another place, Falmouth, allows, I see, 4½d.—Yes. There are great exceptions, we know. London is an expensive town, but there is not enough in it to justify the other towns being so badly paid.

2255. Have you any views on the question of what some witnesses call sectionising work, that is, allowing the rougher part of the work to be done by a less skilled form of labour than the other, and paying the less skilled form of labour rather lower? You have not anything of that kind in your trade, have you?—No, and we do not recognise anything in that way. Of course when a lad is apprenticed to the trade and serves his time and goes through the proper training, when he is of full age he is supposed to maintain the rate; there may be a little latitude given him, but in most cases they turn out very smart young men.

2256. All the work, I suppose, is pretty even in quality, and there is no great variation in the amount of skill that is wanted for one kind of work as compared with another?—Most of the firms have all kinds of work in hand, but there is a great deal more skill required on some work than there is on other work. Some of the work that is done here in London is very highly skilled, but the builders never make any difference on account of the high class of the work; and I only knew one firm that paid all their men more than the Union rate. That was the late Mr. Sage, who was the head of the firm of shop-fitters. He used to give all his workpeople an extra halfpenny per hour, and he did very high-class work. I asked him one day when I was interviewing him on a business matter, how it worked out that he gave the men who only did the rougher work just as much money as he gave the men who did the higher and more skilled work—he gave them all this additional halfpenny per hour beyond the rate. "Well," he says, "it is like this, Mr. Dew; of course I select my men, I am bound to have a certain amount of rough work done, and if I can get some strong, robust, healthy fellows for the rough work they would not be happy on the very highly skilled work; they give me by their muscle and strength all that I require on that work; they turn out a good quantity, and they are as happy as can be at it. If I reversed the thing and put the men that can do a lot of strong hard work on to the highly skilled work they would be very unhappy, and, on the other hand, if I were to put the highly skilled men on to the rough work they would be unhappy too." So he told me that he got the full value out of their work, and he gave them that halfpenny above the actual rate in order to encourage them.

2257. Is it the general practice to pay every man the same rate, whatever he does?—He must not receive less than the standard rate, but an employer can pay as much more as he likes. If once we allow a variation the employers will take advantage of it, or a certain class of employers would.

2258. Either above or below?—They can pay upward as much as they like; we only fix what we call the minimum standard rate, and we say below that a fully-skilled workman cannot work.

2259. (Mr. Bailey.) There are, I believe, a number of cases in which men are paid above the Trade Union rate?—Yes, plenty of cases, and we have no objection to that; the more we get the better. Our only difficulty is that some people may want to pay below, and we say No; where there is a rate which is a standard and recognised rate in the district, the workmen must not receive less.

2260. (Chairman.) Do you think that these variations represent the average level of wages in other trades in the same places; are you guided by that?—I think the engineering trade is more uniform than ours, but of course they do not extend to so many districts as we do; for instance, in very little agricultural towns right away in the agricultural counties there are always a few carpenters, and there is always a little bit of building work.

2261. When you are thinking of trying for a rise, do you consider the rates that are being paid in other trades in the same place?—If we can get any comparison that is favourable, of course we use it.

2262. If you found, for instance, that the engineers got an increase, would you consider that a reason for trying to get one for yourself?—Very possibly so, if what they got was a good improvement upon what we were getting, because the standard of living as a rule is not too high, and workpeople, with the precarious nature of employment to-day, have got a terrible job to make two ends meet.

2263. (Mr. Bailey.) As a matter of fact you do, I think, look to it to see that the wages paid to carpenters, joiners, and cabinet-makers should bear some sort of approximation to the wages given in other trades?—Yes, generally.

2264. The plumber, as a rule, is the most highly paid in the building trade, is he not?—Yes; plumbers have had rather better conditions than any others, though I do not think they are quite maintaining their position to-day as they did.

2265. Then almost immediately behind them would come carpenters and joiners?—Yes. The general trades in the building all work together. The plasterer to-day is getting a little more than the joiner is in London; but in nearly every town in the United Kingdom, the wages of a bricklayer, and of a mason, and of a carpenter, and of a plasterer, would be practically uniform—in fact, most of the settlements and agreements made between the employers and the men were made generally by the whole of the trades combined.

2266. You spoke just now about the Trade Union conditions which you would like to tack on to the requirement as to the Trade Union rate of wages; would you kindly define for us what Trade Union conditions are?—The Trade Union conditions are the conditions that have been agreed to between the Trade Union on the one hand and the Employers' Association on the other.

2267. Would you call the regulation of the length of hours, for one thing, a Trade Union condition?—Both the hours and the wages.

2268. And such other minor matters as walking money and overtime?—Such as walking time and extra for overtime and a certain amount of payment given on discharge. Two hours, as a rule, is given on discharge.

2269. As grinding money?—Yes.

2270. Then in regard to sectionising; supposing machinery is employed, either such a small thing as a hand-mortising machine or a steam-driven mortising machine, or a planing machine, and so on, do you always require that the men on those machines should be carpenters and joiners?—No, but I would prefer joiners.

2271. You would admit less highly paid men for this, would you?—They are not less highly paid as a rule. They are men who do nothing else, but who have practically been trained as machinists and have spent all their time with machinery.

2272. But they would no longer be within your purview?—No. We have got a good many men working machines—and plenty of men who are not joiners—who are getting the same money as joiners—in fact the machinist generally gets a little more, because he runs a risk and a danger.

2273. (Mr. Wilson Fox.) You have taken great interest in the Fair Wages Clause from the beginning, I think?—Yes.

2274. You have been kind enough to tell us your view as to the agreement between employers and employed with reference to obtaining either the Trade Union rate of wage or what you call a fair wage, but our difficulty is not with those cases that you have put before us. Our difficulty would either be with reference to purely unskilled labour, for which there might be no Trade Union rate, or else it would arise in remote country districts where a firm went out from a town and there was no other firm of the same character there, and no Trade Union rate at all. I should like to know your view of those cases, because they really are the difficult problems. Take purely unskilled labour first, which is employed by a contractor who is doing work for the Government at a place where there is no Trade Union rate?—In most of our larger towns there is an agreed rate for unskilled labour.

2275. But in certain cases there is not, I think?—I do not say it is always definitely agreed and stated in rules so well-defined as you get it in connection with the skilled trades.

2276. But the question as to whether there was ½d. difference would be far more difficult to get at in certain of these cases?—Yes; but as regards some of the outlying districts I should suggest that you should take the rates paid in the nearest town or the nearest district to the outlying part.

2277. Supposing in a town like Woolwich, there was purely unskilled labourers' work being done, with reference to which you could not say there was a Trade Union rate, how are the Government to say what is a proper rate to be paid?—If it was impossible to arrive at what the rate would be locally, I do not know whether your Labour Department of the Board of Trade could help you.

2278. You would suggest falling back upon some form of inquiry?—Yes.

2279. In order to get some standard or other, somebody would have to make some inquiry as to what a fair standard there should be?—Yes; but I think you would generally find that the firms in any district, so far as they did employ labour, had some kind of recognised rate upon which it was employed. Even in regard to agricultural labour, most of the counties have a rate.

2280. That is so. You are now talking of a trade in which there is no Trade Union at all. We will assume for one moment that the Government set up an experimental farm in some county; you could only then take the current rate of the district, and you could ascertain the current rate of the district, but there would be no Trade Union rate?—That is so.

2281. Do you think labour men generally, there being no Trade Union, would be satisfied with that policy?—Certainly; where there is no Trade Union, then, of course, you would have to take as far as you could find it the current rate in the district. In my trade, you would have very few places where you would not have a Trade Union rate.

2282. Take a case which has been raised very often, and oftener than the one I have been dealing with, where a firm leaves a large town and goes right out into a remote country district. It is said at present, and I dare say quite fairly, that the employer in such circumstances as those makes his own rate, and therefore the workman is at a disadvantage, because there is not that element of bargaining between two strong sides as there would be in a large town. How are you going to get over that? The men say that the Trade Union rate ought to be paid, but supposing in such a case as that—as, indeed, you have already pointed out is the fact—there is no Trade Union rate which is actually paid?—In regard to the skilled labour, you would have to be guided by the nearest town where a Trade Union rate existed.

2283. And you would allow a percentage off?—No, because in some cases you have to draw your labour out from those towns. Of course you know that the County Council have adopted a twenty-mile radius in order to get over the difficulty in the case of their outlying buildings.

2284. Supposing a firm went from a town into a purely rural district twenty miles away, and the men who had been employed by that firm moved out into that village, would you pay them the same rate as they were paid in the town twenty miles away, where rents were much higher, or would you take some percentage off for the decrease in the cost of living? I want to know how you would deal with the problem?—I think in many cases it would be necessary, especially in the building trade, even with what you call unskilled labour, to take a number of labourers out, and

I do not think they ought to have less than the town rate.

2285. I can quite understand that they might have to take some labourers out?—There would be a very few firms who would pay less, in fact, they would pay rather above what was generally prevailing in the district in order to get the pick of the labour in the district.

2286. Then would you make no difference at all for the difference in the cost of living?—Not in a case like that, because, assuming the men would have to move out for the sake of the work, they would be put to great cost.

2287. Take your 10½d. in London and 8d. in Norwich, such a difference, assuming it is justifiable, might be equally justifiable if you had, say your 8d. in Norwich, and a certain number of men were working right out in the middle of Norfolk in a remote country district, say thirty miles off, and Norwich was the nearest town; would you pay those men the same rate as you paid in Norwich?—Decidedly.

2288. You would?—Decidedly; in fact, most employers would have to give them something extra, in order to get them out there, and pay for lodgings. But if you had to carry on a considerable amount of work in any out-place like that, you would never find sufficient labour there to be able to do that work for you, and you would always have to begin at once with taking your labour there.

2289. I can quite understand that, but I was not dealing with that point?—You would certainly have to be governed in that case by the rate of the nearest town and the nearest district. Whenever the men are taken out like that, it is a very common thing indeed for employers to pay lodging and travelling and out-of-pocket expenses.

2290. I was not really dealing with that class of man, I was dealing with the man who went out of town to live entirely, and took his family into a remote country district, and became an inhabitant of a village near his work; and I want to know whether he should be paid the same as in Norwich?—I am afraid it would have to be whatever prevailed in the district, whatever the rate of pay there was, whatever he could get there.

2291. You think so?—Yes. I am only answering you from the point of view of a contractor going out there to do some work.

2292. I know; and that is why I want to be at one with you?—If there was no combination or anything else behind him, he could get nothing better, however poor the rate might be, and he would have to put up with it, would he not?

2293. I know in most of these cases where contractors undertake, say, to build a workhouse in a rural district, they would take out a large body of men from a town and find them lodgings in the neighbourhood of the work; they would come, say, from Norwich, and would pay them the Norwich rate?—Quite so.

2294. But supposing a contractor set up in a country district, and there was a good deal of work around, and it was worth while for a dozen of the men to live in the surrounding villages there, and to take their families there, would you then pay them a lower rate, having regard to the fact that they were actually living in a rural district, or would you pay the Norwich rate?—I think they would very soon have to consider their own position out in the place where they have been drawn to, and they would fix their own rate.

2295. You mentioned certain working conditions which you thought should be enforced by the Government as well as the wages and the hours; are those conditions those relating to monetary payment or questions akin to it, such as walking time, hours, overtime, and so on?—Yes.

2296. Are they apprenticeship questions, or questions of that kind?—No, I am not troubling you at all upon that point.

2297. I only want to know how far you would go?—They all relate to money questions; for instance, the walking money is, after all, a wages question, and working longer hours than the ordinary hours without the extra rate for overtime is a wages question. I am trying to put all my suggestions within the scope of your reference on the wages.

2298. I only wanted to find that out, because some witnesses have suggested that all the conditions which are agreed upon by the employers and employed in a set of working rules, should be enforced under the Fair Wages Clause?—I quite agree.

2299. Including the limitation of apprentices?—We have got very few codes and rules in our trade which deal with apprentices, but where there is anything in that way, I certainly should agree that the ordinary rates of the district should be enforced.

2300. No matter what they contain?—Of course I have tried to keep myself within your reference, knowing that you had not power to make recommendations or of dealing with anything beyond that reference.

2301. As you have not raised it, I will not go into that?—Wages really govern working hours, and I ask you always to consider working hours, because they are really governed by wages.

2302. And the higher wage might be counterbalanced by giving longer hours?—Decidedly.

2303. (Mr. Black.) Now about these Admiralty cases; you seem to regard the Admiralty as an unsympathetic Department?—No.

2304. You mentioned, I think, three cases—Keyham, the Naval Barracks, and Turnchapel. In the Keyham case we did not adopt your view, in the case of the Naval Barracks we did partly, and in Turnchapel my note differs from your version of it, as I find that the Admiralty did consider that it was a breach of the Fair Wages Clause, and that they warned the contractor?—You did not call upon him to pay the difference in money?

2305. We may not have done that, and I do not know that we had power to do that?—Then do you admit that really he got off with the 7d. instead of the 8d.?

2306. We warned him that it was a violation, and that he was to be careful as to the future at any rate. I see in the Chatham case—you did not mention that—we took similar action?—No, I did not mention the Chatham case.

2307. I am only taking up your word "unsympathetic"?—I can quite see that all our Government officials do the utmost they can, and it is not those at headquarters who are to blame. You have got to depend upon a large number of others upon the works. That is a suggestion which I do hope that you will follow, by making it the duty of the man on the works to see that the Resolution is being carried out with regard to the wages.

2308. Your Society on the whole, according to the notes I have got, seems to come off rather well with the Admiralty in these cases?—Yes.

2309. (Mr. Hillier.) You refer to the London rate extending 12 miles out, but the London rate was a rate agreed upon between the master builders of London with the trade societies?—Yes.

2310. It was agreed that they should pay this rate for all the work that they did within a 12-mile radius?—Yes.

2311. But the builders or the employers on the fringe were not parties to that agreement, were they?—They were, many of them.

2312. But not in all cases. For instance, we will take the case of Kingston; the builders of Kingston do not recognise the London rate, they recognise their own rate?—There are a few people there who try to set up a rate of their own, I know.

2313. Is it not a fact that there is a rate at Kingston which is different from yours, not only in the rate of wages, but in the hours?—No, there is not. In each branch of the Trade Unions they always maintain the London rate in Kingston, and they never allow a member of their Unions to work for less than that rate.

2314. That may be, but still the builders of Kingston, and other towns on the confines of the 12-mile radius, were not brought into consultation; they did not agree, and they have not subscribed to this agreement. That agreement affects the master builders of London, and they say that that agreement should extend 12 miles, but that agreement does not say that the builders on the confines should be bound by that agreement, otherwise the master builders might have made such an agreement and then gone 50 miles out, and declared that it affected all the people in a 50-mile radius?—Of course you know that agreement has been in force now for a great many years, and I believe the builders always invite all the other builders to take a part with them in their association. All I am expected to know is that I suppose they adopted the same methods as the Trade Union would do when they are having meetings, and that they invited the co-operation of these builders, and indeed I gave you a case of co-operation where the man was absolutely a member of the Builders' Association and had to resign his membership. He was a party to the 12-mile radius, as is proved by the very fact that he was a member.

2315. He had to resign because he was under bond not to do it at less than the London rate, but if he had not been a member he would not have been bound, would he?—No.

2316. You quoted a letter just now from the London Masters' Association, from which I inferred that he had done something very wrong. He did something wrong as a member of the Masters' Association, but he did not do anything wrong as regards transgression of the law at Croydon. I have got a copy of the letter here from the Masters' Association. The Secretary to the London Masters' Association said that the payment by this firm at the rate they were paying was not contrary to the proper reading or rendering of the Clause current in the district?—You know that the London County Council have acted in this matter.

2317. That is another matter?—And perhaps you know that they also fine these gentlemen, and penalise them.

2318. The London County Council insert in their contract that the wages paid should be at the London rate; therefore, those who take contracts under the London County Council are bound by that agreement. You have admitted that they have the right of making arrangements with their men?—Yes.

2319. And therefore there would be nothing wrong in Kingston or Croydon, or any of those firms that were not parties to this agreement of the London Master Builders, making arrangements?—My dear sir, suppose you adopted a plan—for instance, take my position as a member of the London County Council, the people outside would say, "We have got to pay for the improvement of the inner part of London, but we live out in the suburbs. We are spending a lot of money there, and why should you not let us off part of the rates?" It would be just as reasonable for people to make that excuse.

2320. Take the other side of the question: The master builders could extend their area to any distance, we may say to 60 miles, and then are the people in the towns in that area not to be considered?—I am quite sure that the London builders would consider them, and did consider them, in extending the radius, and I am quite sure, in order to get the conditions of the contract in London fair, it was only right to say to the people in the outer area, "You must agree with us, and we must have a general basis." After all, the people in the outer district do get some advantage. They are living in a cheaper rented and cheaper rated place, and if they are also allowed to get cheaper labour, then it will be very hard indeed upon the employer in the inner part of London.

2321. Is there any other Society besides your own dealing with questions appertaining to carpenters and joiners in the London district?—There are two small Societies, and we often consult them on trade matters.

2322. Do you know anything about the London Building Trades' Federation?—We are affiliated to it. There was a Building Trades' Federation some years ago, and it is just now restarted.

2323. You have got carpenters and joiners who are employed by firms who are not builders, but cabinet-makers or engineers?—Yes.

2324. And your men, of course, form a very small proportion of the whole?—In the firm, yes.

2325. If your rules are to be enforced against their employers—and that is one of your conditions—you will find this, will you not, that if it is an engineer's shop, say, they will open at 6 o'clock in the morning, or if it is a cabinet-maker's, at 8, whereas your time in the summer, according to your rules, is 7, is it not?—No; it is 6.30 in London, but there are different hours in other parts of the country.

2326. Take London with its half-past 6; if a joiner is employed in one of those firms which opens at 6, does not a question arise at once as to the payment of that man between 6 and 6.30?—I have no doubt that we should never be arbitrary in dealing with a matter like that about the times of starting and leaving off work, providing that the maximum number of hours was not exceeded, or, if they were exceeded, extra remuneration was given for those hours.

2327. In the summer your joiners work fifty hours?—Yes.

2328. And in the winter so many hours less?—Yes.

2329. But these engineers and cabinet-makers work fifty hours all the year round?—I am afraid the engineers do—worse luck for the unemployed. They work too long. I think the engineers work about fifty-three hours on the average, taking the country right through.

2330. Fifty-four, I think it is, but still fifty-three suits my purpose. You consider it unfair because a man has the opportunity of working more hours than you prescribe, and your hours are lessened in the winter because of the darkness and the weather—that is the real reason that you limit your hours in the winter, is it not?—I do not think we have ever suggested, or that we should ever be so unreasonable as to suggest, that an engineering firm should adapt their hours to those of the builders. It is more a wages question. We do say that so far as they employ our men they should pay them at an equal rate to what a builder would give them. I think on the question of the hours of working we should always meet them. Where our trade was in a great minority, we should then have to fall in very largely with their arrangements; they could not have two or three hours for starting work—that would be very awkward to a firm, and we admit that at once. But what we do say is, "If you employ our men you should not pay them any less than what a builder pays them."

2331. That is the point which it does come to. If a joiner working in an engineer's shop, or a cabinet-maker's shop, works the full hours, naturally he claims overtime in the winter after he has worked the number of hours prescribed by you?—Yes; but then our committee have got a discretionary power to consider and deal with all those matters, and I do not think we should have any difficulty in managing that. All my questions and all my complaints relate to this engineering firm not paying the ordinary rate of wages during the ordinary working hours. I should be sorry to think my Union would ever be so unreasonable as not to see that they have got to fall a little bit in line where they were dealing with a trade which only employed very few joiners as compared with the large number of men belonging to other trades.

2332. But those questions have arisen. There is another question—this time in connection with joiners working in a cabinet-maker's shop. In the building trades piece-work is not acknowledged, but in the cabinet trade it is, I think?—In the cabinet trade it is acknowledged.

2333. A joiner working in a cabinet-maker's shop under your rules can only work by the hour?—That is so.

2334. And, therefore, if he applies to a cabinet-maker's shop for employment, and it is piece-work, he cannot accept that because your rules will not allow him to work piece-work?—There has never been a question under the Fair Wages Clause of our men applying at a cabinet-maker's shop for cabinet-maker's work. I have referred you to a case where there are two classes of men employed, and where the employer takes advantage of that, as it suits his purpose. If the cabinet-makers prove a case, then he falls back upon the joiners for some excuse; and if the joiners prove a case, he falls back upon the cabinet-makers. We have mutual agreements with the cabinet-makers, and we have lately formed a joint committee which represents both the Cabinet-makers' Union and the Joiners' Union, and the Wood-working Machinists' Union, so that when we come to deal with matters of that kind we are not in any way in conflict.

2335. (Mr. Wilson Fox.) They would refuse to do the work if they were put on the wrong work, I suppose?—Yes, very largely.

2336. (Mr. Hillier.) But still the work of a joiner and the work of a cabinet-maker are closely allied, are they not?—Very closely.

2337. And a man in either industry could do the work?—There is a great amount of this work that could be classed as joiner work, and if the cabinet-maker does it he must not have anything less than what a joiner would receive.

2338. What is it that fixes that?—The Unions fix it. For instance, we have many cabinet-makers who go to work for building firms at times, when out of work.

2339. And joiners go into a cabinet-maker's shop, but not as joiners, because they are not asked whether they are joiners or cabinet-makers?—No man in the one trade will ever take advantage of the other, and whichever trade the work belonged to, of course the rules of that trade would govern.

2340. I am coming now to the specific cases that you have alluded to as showing what you consider as evasions. I have got a copy of the code of working rules for the building trades in the borough of Kingston and the district, and I find the working hours in Kingston are 56½ all the year round—contrary to yours?—Yes, and you will find that ours are stated as 50.

2341. I know; but this is a copy of the rules in the building trades of the borough of Kingston, which are the rules and regulations in force?—Those rules were never made mutually between the two parties—that is, the Trade Union on the one hand, and the employers on the other. I would ask you to take that interpretation. You cannot show me a recent code of rules for Kingston—not since the twelve-mile radius was agreed to—signed by the employers on the one hand, and by the workmen on the other; and you cannot do it for Croydon, nor for any other place within the twelve-mile radius. If we are going to allow a builder to make a rule, that would be a one-sided ruling, and any number of trades can send out and say so-and-so is the agreement. You would not agree with us if we sent out something as our working conditions when we had got nothing signed.

2342. If workmen work under those conditions—I am not saying they are Trade Unionists—and those are the conditions that apply to that town, would that not be rather the establishment of a rate?—I am afraid we must at once drop to a low level, seeing the quantity of unemployment there is to-day, and we should very soon run the wages very low. But we are dealing with a resolution intended to maintain fair conditions, and I say it is absolutely unfair for a builder in Kingston, or a builder in Croydon, to try and make a rate for himself when he has not been able to get the workmen to agree to that rate, and for him to try and call that the rate of wages as against the rate agreed to by the London builders. That is my point. If you can show me an agreement mutually made in Kingston between the workmen on the one hand and the builders on the other, then I will agree you have got some conditions in Kingston about the rate of wages; but until you can do it, I contend there is no other rate but that made by the builders of London and the Trade Unions of London.

2343. Of course I need not go into the question of Croydon, because it is exactly on the same lines?—It is exactly the same.

2344. That is, the builders of Croydon say they do not work under the London rate, but they work under their own rate?—Members of my Trade Union have to work, and do work, under the London conditions, and no other conditions have ever been signed or agreed to since that 12-mile radius was established.

2345. The next firm that you refer to was the firm at Woolwich that employs the double men—the joiners and the cabinet-makers. That was a case which the Office of Works investigated. I think your contention is that this work was done for the Government, and had been done by joiners, and not by cabinet-makers?—I do not think we raised that contention. Our complaint was that the firm was not complying with the rules. That firm employs joiners, and they do not work in accordance with the rules of the joiners of the London district. That is our trouble with that firm. They only pay 10d. an hour, whereas the joiner should get 10½d. For instance, Messrs. P. and Q. are a large firm of contractors in Woolwich who do a lot of your Government work, and they pay 10½d., and it is very unfair for this other firm to be able to get men and make them work for 10d.

2346. But the other firms pay 10d. as a minimum rate, and that rate is the current rate in the district, is it not?—No. The biggest firm in the neighbourhood is Messrs. P. and Q., who do a large amount of Government work, and they have always paid 10½d.

2347. They are bound to, because they are one of the subscribers to the London Builders' Association?—Yes, but I take it that they do it as a matter of honour as well. I do not think it is a question of being bound. They are big contractors, and taking the work all over London they do a great deal for the Government. They pay the 10½d. I say that one firm does it, and the other firm which is allowed to get Government work only pays the lesser rate.

2348. But this other firm works under the Engineers' rules, does it not, and not under the Builders' rules, because they are not builders?—They are a very funny firm, and they are in many trades.

2349. But still, they are an engineering firm?—Yes, but they are very largely engaged now in the wood-working trade. I dare say you know they do a great deal of school-furnishing, and all that kind of work. They have made wood-work a big part of their business, so much so that to-day they should come within the regulations applied to the wood-working trades.

2350. They call themselves cabinet-makers?—They can get a cheaper rate as cabinet-makers.

2351. In this particular case, we investigated the charges, and we found the men that were employed upon this work were getting not 10d. but 11d. and 11½d., and some earned as much as 1s., because they worked on piece-work. The rule that was adopted there was this—the time that the men worked was charged at the minimum rate allowed by the cabinet-makers, and beyond that they had the piece-work value, so that no man could receive less than the minimum, but they all had the opportunity of earning more than that; and they did as a rule, for the average came out to about 11½d. an hour?—How many cases did you see?

2352. I went into the particular cases mentioned in your complaint?—I mean to say, how many pay-sheets of the work-people did you see? Did you take the whole of the shop?

2353. We took the whole of the shop?—And the whole of the men employed?

2354. At the time when this complaint was made they had so many cabinet-makers and so many joiners; is that the only complaint you have to make against them?—No. Some men are paid by the hour there, and then they only get the 10d.

2355. But it is as cabinet-makers?—No; they are employed on joiners' work—the same work as the other firms employing joiners do.

2356. That may be?—There have been men, I believe, who are members of our Trade Union, who have gone there to work; we do not allow our men to go in unless they go in in this way just to see what is going on, because otherwise they would be breaking their rules.

2357. This is not a very flagrant case, is it?—It is a flagrant case. They are turning out this work, and they are getting their men for 10d. an hour.

2358. As a minimum?—No. If you take the piece-work way of working, sometimes it may work out a bit better. They employ a large number of men, and they only pay a great many of the men 10d. per hour when they should pay 10½d. That makes that firm unfair; otherwise there should be a number of our joiners working in that shop.

2359. I found that men had been at work there for 38 years, 30 years, 22 years—these are getting on in life—clearly showing by the age of these men that they could not have been sweated very much. Now, turning to the firms in the Norwich district, you referred to that building at Greenwich, but as a matter of fact it was not a Government contract, and they were carrying it out for a licensee of the Government. Directly attention was drawn to it by your Society, we immediately wrote to these people, and within a month they paid the Trade Union rate to your men?—They did not pay the back money, I suppose?

2360. No; but they agreed in future to pay it. They had paid the Norwich rate, and they agreed to pay the London rate which made a difference of a few pence in the day. Then there was the question at Doncaster; the complaint that was made there was, was it not, that they sent men from Doncaster to carry out work that they had to do in other places, and did not pay them the Doncaster rate of wages?—I am not sure about that. My complaint, that the men made to me, is that the firm do not act fair in Doncaster, and do not pay the proper wages there. That is the complaint made to me. I know that the notice is in our report about them, and that they do send men about, or employ men in other Post Office work; and I also know that our branches are generally on the look-out for them to see that in those districts they do pay. That is why I have asked for my amendment that you should instruct your officials to help us in that way.

2361. At Doncaster they pay your recognised rate, do they not?—My information is that they do not, and they are, as I say, in the list of firms for which our men cannot work. We should only be too glad to get the firm fair, so that our men could go to work for them. I can assure you that I have no wish to do anything against a firm, or to say a word here to stop a firm coming into line. We are very anxious to get them into line in order to get employment for our men. It is the desire of the Union to be on very friendly terms with employers all over the country, so that these places should be open to them, and our men could go and get work.

2362. Now in regard to your general suggestion to the effect that an officer of the Government should inspect the pay-sheets and wages book of the contractors, and satisfy himself that the Resolution of the House of Commons is being complied with, have you any idea of the sort of labour that would devolve upon a Government Department?—May I just tell you how I think you can do it in a way that would not mean any labour at all? Wherever you have got work going on under the Office of Works, you have always got a clerk of works on the spot—that is, you have got a man looking after matters for the Government. While that man is looking after the work on behalf of the Government, there would be no difficulty at all in his saying to the contractor now and again, "Just let me have a look at your wages sheets and see what you are paying." He can always see them, and the contractor could show them to him when he was going about there getting information if he liked. For instance, every Saturday when they are paying the men he could say, "What rates do you pay? Just let me have a look at your sheet." If it was in the contract that the clerk of works should have a right to look at the pay-sheet, he would have it shown to him, and you would not have to call in the officialism of headquarters over these matters. You would simply say to this man, "You must see what wages are being paid; they are part of the conditions of the contract, just as much as to see that the contractors give good timber, good stone, good brickwork, and generally carry out a good sound job." You simply hand the duty over to him, and ask him to look to it. I can assure you that unless you do something like that, you will never get the Resolution carried out. If you would not mind, I would like to illustrate that by a little difficulty I had to deal with once with one of your Government jobs. It is going back a good many years now—to about 1894—when you were doing a tremendous amount of work at Aldershot, in fact you were rebuilding the whole of the camp down there—any of the officers will remember the period. I used to have frequent complaints that a certain firm in the district did not pay the proper wages; this was the firm that had got the triennial contract—I think it was triennial there, as you have it here in London—for the repair of the Government buildings. There was a big yard known as the South Camp Yard, up in the South Camp, which was the builders' depôt there. Sir Henry Campbell-Bannerman was then Minister for War. He was very sympathetic on the matter, and I went and saw Sir Henry, and also Mr. Woodhall, who was there also, I think, at that time, and talked the matter over with them. I was quite certain, from information I had got, that the carpenters working in that department doing the repairs for the Government, were only getting 6½d. per hour, whereas the standard rate was 7d. Even this very builder that was doing repair work had himself a big outside contract on which he was paying 7d. per hour. I made the complaint, and the War Department took a great deal of trouble to try and get to the bottom of it, but they could not get to the bottom of it. They said, "Well, you say the contractor is only paying 6½d., but all the information we get is that he is paying the current rate of the district; we have no information but that he is paying the full current rate of the district." I was so much upset about it, that I thought one day, "I will try and get to the bottom of this," as I had had a lot of correspondence with the War Office. I went down one day, and I made myself look rather extra respectable, and with a frock coat on and a tall hat I thought I should look a little bit like a Government official. It is rather difficult to look like some one coming from the War Office, because you have got to get a little bit fierce, I believe. I took one of the bluest and biggest of all the envelopes I had got with a bulky package of papers inside it, and I walked into the camp and into the yard, and I said, "Where is the foreman of the building department; where shall I find him?" The man was very polite; he saluted and he said, "This way, sir." He took me round to the foreman. Then I said, "Now what about all this trouble over the wages down here?" The foreman said, "What wages?" I said, "All these complaints about the rate of wages you are paying; the Trade Union says you are not paying the Trade Union rate of wages current in the district, and the firm says they are paying the wages that are current in the district." "Oh," he says, "I have not heard anything about it." I said, "Haven't you?" "No." "I suppose you can convince me at once; you have got your pay-sheets, and you can show me the rate you paid on Saturday"—this was on the Monday or Tuesday. "Yes, sir," he says. He opens the book before me, and there I found name after name of carpenters paid at 6½d. per hour, and no one getting more. I said, "Your books seem to bear out the complaint made by the Trade Union. Here are these men who are only getting 6½d., whereas builder after builder is paying 7d." "Yes, I admit that. Of course, on the new work we are paying 7d. The builders generally pay higher on the new work, but on the repair work we only pay 6½d." "That is absolutely reversing the order of things, is it not? I don't know much about the practice of the trade, but I understood that when men did repair or dirty work they often got a little extra money, because it damaged the tools and the clothes." "Well," he says, "that is our practice here." I said, "Now, just oblige me with a sheet of paper." He immediately gave me a sheet of paper, and I made a list of the names and the wages. Then I thanked him, and just as I was leaving I said, "Perhaps you may hear something more about this, you had better take my card." He looked at my card and he said, "I have made a mistake, sir." I said, "No, you have not." He said, "I shall get into trouble." I said, "You won't." And might I say this—I never did try to bring that man into it, and although I am telling the story to-day, it was as long back as 1894 when it happened. I went straight to Pall Mall to the War Department with this list, and with commendable promptness they did put the matter right. That was how I had to get the information; but someone from your Department could have got this information at any moment, and that is why I am asking that your officials should have access to the pay-sheets and wages book, and that it should be put in the contracts that they shall have access, and can go and look at the wages book and the wages sheet; also that the contractor shall put up a schedule of the wages like we have in the contracts of the London County Council. On every job of the London County Council there has got to be put up a schedule of the wages that the contractor has to pay the men; he contracts to pay them, and it is only a fair thing to see that he does.

2363. That is all very well in the building trade, but the word "contracts" has to apply to contracts generally, and in a lot of industries there are heaps of contracts made for small sums all over the country.

Do you expect a Government official to see the wages books in the case of these small contracts which are spread over the country?—I do not say in every little case like that, but I think the very knowledge that it might be done would have a very good effect upon the contractor. In the majority of cases, of course, the work is big enough to have a man going round, and the man in passing about would find no hardship and no difficulty in doing this, and I do not think any good employer would object to it; he need merely say, "Just let me have a look and see what you are paying."

2364. I may tell you that that is done already; we have the power to inspect time-sheets?—I know; but that is only when a complaint has been made, and it is never done otherwise. I want that done automatically, not that you should only go and inspect when you receive a complaint and make your investigation then. If your official in charge of the work had got authority, and had got orders to see that that part of the contract was being carried out as to the paying of the current rate of wages. I do not think you would ever get a complaint at headquarters at all; I think that it would lessen the friction and trouble at headquarters.

2365. Do you not see that a contractor who has got a Government contract may have a great deal of other work to do, and that the amount of work he is doing for the Government may represent £50, say, while the work that he is doing for private persons may amount to £5,000; is the Government official to look through all his books?—No; I am only speaking of your own work; it would be quite easy to see that the full rate of wages was paid.

2366. But our own work in that case forms a small portion of what he is doing?—It is my suggestion that you shall not give work to firms who do not generally pay the current rate of wages. But I am only speaking so far as concerns the pay-sheets for paying the men which are generally laid on a table where they are employed, and an inspector going round could see them. I think you will find if you talk to your clerks of works and your inspectors in charge, that they will see no difficulty at all about doing that duty.

2367. (Mr. De la Bère.) Do you not think that most of the cases that you have cited here form rather striking testimony to the efficiency of the Fair Wages Clause?—I said in my opening that, knowing as I do what took place previous to the Resolution, it has been a very great improvement and a very great advantage indeed to the workpeople of the country.

2368. You have just heard from Mr. Black, for instance, that all the cases in which you made representations to the Admiralty were inquired into, and that your complaints were considered to be proved and justice was done—or, at any rate, that is what I understood?—He has just told me that now, but we had not had that information before that that one matter down by Plymouth was set right; I shall be very pleased indeed to make that known in the district. You remember some correspondence I read about it; it has been going on for practically one or two years with no settlement.

2369. There are only two cases that you quote in which the War Office is concerned, and in both of these cases the result was similar, the contractors who were involved being informed at the time that they must pay the current rate. One of those cases was at Southampton and the other at Norwich, I think?—The Southampton case is not settled yet.

2370. Pardon me, but as the names are not mentioned, perhaps I might read you the letter which was sent to the contractor on August 2nd:—"I have to acquaint you that the information afforded by you is not considered to be satisfactory. I am to point out that Clause 5 of the conditions of the contract lays down that you should employ efficient workmen only on work for this Department, and that Clause 26 provides that the wages paid must be those generally accepted as current for competent workmen in the district. I am, therefore, to warn you that in the event of any future complaint being raised which proves that these conditions are not being fully complied with, it may lead to the removal of your name from the list of firms eligible to hold contracts with this Department." That was written on August 2nd; what more could you want than that?—That letter would only deal with the future. That firm got off though underpaying their labour.

2371. It could hardly deal with the past, because they had discharged the men?—I have a registered member of my Trade Union in Southampton who did not receive the proper rate of wages, and had to leave because he could not get it. Another man, a non-Union man, had a larger reduction made from his wages, that is, he was paid 2d. under the rate. You did not see that these men had that money made good to them.

2372. They had gone?—I know, but you never penalised him, or did anything except to warn the contractor for the future.

2373. Still, I think that is a very considerable thing?—I know, but I think you ought to have come upon them and said, "You will have to make good the money that you have underpaid these men." The County Council would do that.

2374. Similar action was taken in regard to the case at Norwich?—I admit, but it was for the future again. It ought to have carried some punishment for the contractor. I am sorry that letter has never come to us. I have written down to the Secretary, and he said that the letter I read was the wind-up of the correspondence as far as he knows, and that they had not been able to get a further reply.

2375. I only quoted it, because if it had not been for the Fair Wages Clause we should absolutely have had no right to send such a letter?—Quite so. It is a very good letter indeed.

2376. It is only by the power of that Clause that we could write such a letter?—It is a very good letter indeed.

2377. In the case of that firm in the Norwich district which you quoted, they were paying 7½d., and they were told that they must pay 8d., which was the current rate?—Yes, that is so.

2378. Then there was just one other case in which you say you got practical benefit from the Clause; but that was some time ago, was it not?—Yes.

2379. In 1895?—I do not know how long ago it was.

2380. This question was considered by the Fair Wages Committee in 1897, as you probably remember?—Yes; I gave evidence before the Committee.

2381. They stated that it was impossible to lay down hard and fast rules, but each case must be dealt with on its merits?—Yes.

2382. In regard to your general suggestions, your first is that the contractor shall sign a declaration that all the workmen in his employ are in receipt of the Trade Union rate of wages?—Yes.

2383. You mean that to apply to his private work as well as to his Government work, I think?—Yes, I mean that he shall declare that he is a satisfactory and fair employer. I want to get a declaration, because I think the real spirit of the Resolution was that you should not only be fair, but that you should only deal with people that were fair.

2384. Of course, as you know, the Resolution only applies to Government contracts?—Quite so.

2385. And, so far as I can see, it does not enable a Government Department to go outside a Government contract?—That is so. But I want you, if you can, to adopt that, because then you would get a declaration from a firm of what they are at present paying. I do not think they ought to have work on merely saying that "the bit of work we do for you we will do at the current rate." We have had some very serious trouble in that way with firms doing work for the London County Council, especially in another class of work than building work, I mean in the clothing work. The County Council fixes its own log, and fixes its own prices, because the prices are so poor in the East End. There we get awful dodgery. They will give them three days on County Council work, which is fairly remunerative, and then three days at work on which they can earn practically nothing—making cheap sweated articles. In that way they eke out, and they get something made very cheap against the better wages paid by the Council.

2395. (Mr. Hillier.) In reference to an observation you made upon my statement about the Norwich firm, I find that a letter went to your Society on August 30th?—Thank you.

2396. (Mr. Wilson Fox.) Have the County Council got a minimum rate for unskilled labour in London?—Decidedly.

2397. That is rather important?—We have our schedule which I suggested should be especially for work in London where it is so well known, showing what the prices are. That is why I suggested to the Office of Works that in their London contracts there is no reason why they should not have their schedule of wages just the same as the County Council have.

2398. There is a line below which unskilled labour cannot go as regards the County Council contracts?—Yes.

2399. (Mr. De la Bère.) Is the rate uniform for women and girls, or do you have different rates?—The only work we have to deal with that is done by women is in connection with the making of clothes.

2400. Do you fix a minimum for that?—We have got a log with a price for each garment.

2401. Then there you go further than the minimum?—The inspector has got to go round and see that they get that price for the garment that they make. There is no difficulty about the price of unskilled labour in London.

2402. (Mr. Black.) About conciliation boards, I suppose they are constituted in a way to enable them to deal with these questions of Government contracts?—They deal with all the general questions of the work of a district. If something is going wrong, and if there is a question whether the firm's contention or whether the workmen's contention is right, then matters of that kind are referred to the conciliation boards; and also questions of improvements in wages, alterations in hours, and everything in connection with the ordinary working; instead of having a row about it, they talk it over at the board. But I daresay they would not be able to touch the great engineering firms of Sheffield.

2403. I was not thinking now of the engineers. In regard to your own carpenters' and joiners' work, would you put a case arising upon a Government contract in front of your conciliation boards, in preference to bringing it under the notice of a Government Department?—No; I think we should bring it before the Government Department.

2404. You would prefer to do that?—Yes. What I think we might do would be what was done with one of the firms I referred to at Croydon. That firm was brought before the conciliation board, and the employers were asked to deal with that firm, because they refused to comply with the recognised rules of the district, and were members of the Employers' Association. They told them to withdraw from membership. In the ordinary case, I do not think we should report a breach of contract to a conciliation board, but we should expect the Government Department to deal with that, certainly if it was a case where a builder was persistently underpaying.

2405. You spoke of looking forward to the time when conciliation boards should assume a stronger position, I think?—Yes. Speaking generally, we have already regulated wages and regulated conditions of work, and we have hardly a town to-day of any importance where we have not a conciliation board in the building trade.

2406. But you do not contemplate them to step in and to take the place of a Government Department for the purpose of settling any questions arising on a Government contract?—I do not think you would like them to.

2407. I am not advocating it, I am asking you your view?—You would not allow them to, I am afraid.

2408. I did not know whether you were looking forward to any such thing?—No, I am not. I am looking forward to stronger action on the part of the Government, and to the Government strengthening their officials in settling these matters direct.

2409. (Mr. Wilson Fox.) In regard to the case you mentioned as to what was cabinet-makers' work and joiners' work, that raises a question as to what is the line of demarcation as between the two Unions, does it not?—Yes.

2410. How would you settle that?—All matters of that kind we should settle between ourselves. We have a committee, the Parliamentary Committee of the Trade Union Congress, that very often deals with any matter between another Union and our Union.

2411. You would not, of course, bring any such question before a conciliation board?—I do not think we should like to bring our employers in to decide those matters; they are matters that we like to decide for ourselves. Where there is a difference between the two Unions we generally bring them before the Committee of the Trade Union Congress, or some similar body, and make them submit their case.

The witness withdrew.

Mr. William Lane, called and examined.

2412. (Chairman.) You represent the Sheffield Trades Management Committee of the Amalgamated Society of Carpenters and Joiners, I understand?—Yes.

2413. What is the exact nature of that committee? Is it a branch of the Carpenters' and Joiners' Society?—Its members are selected from the body of the Carpenters' and Joiners' Society at Sheffield to manage the general working affairs of the trade—that is, respecting wages or any difficulties arising with the different employers, or anything that happens in that way affecting the carpenters and joiners in Sheffield. At each annual meeting of our district they appoint certain members to form this committee to look into all the things that arise during the year, and to manage the general affairs of the trade—wages, hours of labour, or any difficulty arising between masters and men, and such like.

2414. How does it differ from an ordinary branch of the Union?—It is selected from all the branches of the general body. We have five different branches in our trade in Sheffield, and the members of this committee are selected from the general body of them at an annual aggregate meeting to manage the whole of this business. We have also two members belonging to the General Union of Carpenters and Joiners, which makes it into what they call a United Trades Committee.

2415. Is there much Government work done by your trade in Sheffield?—I do not know about my trade, but our contention is that any employer calling himself a Government contractor should certainly pay our trade the standard rate of wages, and not less than the standard rate of wages.

2416. I was wanting to know what your interest in the matter at Sheffield was. Are there many contractors for the Government in Sheffield?—I should say so. I suppose most of these on the list I have sent you will be Government contractors, as well as others besides. You will see on that list the difference in the standard rate of wages and the conditions of labour in these firms, so far as regards carpenters and joiners.

2417. Have you ever complained about these low rates to the contractors or to the Government Department?—We have written to the Admiralty, and also to the War Office respecting the low rate of wages.

2418. What answer did you get?—I have a letter here that I received from the War Office, saying that they had made inquiries, and had found there were no joiners employed upon that Government contract. That does not seem to satisfy the general trade of carpenters and joiners. They lay down that every carpenter and joiner employed in a firm of that kind is, in some way, interested in the work, in fact, although the firm said they did not employ them directly on the work, they are indirectly necessary for the work to be carried on. For instance, in armour plate work, and such like, they have to do a lot of backing-up, and perhaps there is a lot of woodwork in the preparation. Some of the firms say they employ their joiners on packing cases and such like work, but even packing cases are undoubtedly required for much of the Government work and should be paid for at the standard rate of wages. It is not considered generally fair that a firm of this standing should be able to make a lower standard of their own in face of the standard that is made by the trades that are represented here—the carpenters and joiners and builders. The builders of Sheffield, and the carpenters and joiners of Sheffield, as Mr. Dew has told you, meet and draw up these wages and conditions of labour; and as builders of Sheffield say that they do not think the wages at all excessive, and as they generally recognise the conditions—most of the conditions are their own making in fact—my trade considers that no other trade, such as these on the list I sent in, should have the liberty to take down and lower the standard, but that they should, as all other bodies do, conform to the standard rate of wages. All the public bodies in Sheffield do it—everybody, I think, bar these firms, pays the standard rate of wages.

2419. Your point is that the standard rate ought to be paid under the Government contract to all persons, whether directly or indirectly employed on the contract?—That is so. If they are on the list of Government contractors, they should pay all their men standard rates. As my friend Mr. Dew says, they should be a fair firm, and you cannot call a firm a fair firm which acts like these firms do. Take the one on the top of the list which pays in some cases even 13s. a week less, and in some 11s. a week less. The carpenters and joiners of Sheffield felt very dissatisfied on this matter in 1906, and they instructed us to get in touch with this firm and see if we could come to some settlement with them. I was instructed to write to them and ask them to receive a deputation from the committee. They did so, and of course they very kindly received us, and we were for some hour and a half or two hours, I suppose, discussing the matter of wages. We could come to no understanding properly with regard to any alteration. They would not alter the wages; they admitted the low wages were true, but they tried to show us the benefits of the firm, or the benefit of their standard of wages rather, by making the extra number of hours and so on. They contended that by the men working there and receiving regular employment—I suppose they would think that was one benefit—and working these number of hours, that would practically mean more than the ordinary wages, and they thought there was a great advantage in that. But unfortunately the Trade Unions do not think that is an advantage, the man having to work a great number of hours to make his wages. We consider that if a man is worth his money, he ought to receive it, and we do not believe in doing as they say. When you go to them, they say the man does not have to work so hard there; but that is not what we desire. We desire the man to be a man who shall be paid the standard rate, and who will also accept the responsibility as regards the work. We do not like the idea of a man being paid less on account of easy employment.

2420. Do you not attach much importance to permanence of employment?—Not as regards the standard rate of wages, because if a man is permanently employed, and he has to work a great number of hours more in order to get that money, it is not a great advantage.

2421. I think I understand that point; is there any other you wish to make?—I might say here that one of these firms up to 1904 used to pay the standard rate and worked to the conditions; but whether the dividend was going down or not I would not like to say—possibly it might be so—and they had of course to fall on the workmen perhaps to keep it up; they fell on the joiners and gave them notice to leave. But still there was a condition set up in the shop there that although they had given them notice to leave, they could be re-engaged on other terms, the other terms of course being reduced wages and increased hours. That firm received a deputation from their men, and in one or two cases they did concede to pay these men the proper rate of wages. Of course they were considered superior men, and they paid them on their superior qualities, I suppose. We waited upon this firm also, and we had a long consultation with them, but they would not concede to pay their men the proper wage. Both firms, when we waited upon them, gave us to understand that if we did not like the conditions, we could take our men away, as there were plenty more. We do not consider that to be a right standard for a firm considered to be Government contractors; we do not consider it an honourable standard to take. In all these cases we do consider that in the case of every employer calling himself a Government contractor, the Government should see that he is a fair employer, and he should pay all his workmen the standard rate of wages.

2422. Then your men are not working in any of these shops, I suppose?—Yes, we have some men working there now.

2423. At what rate are they being paid?—They are receiving rates according to the figures you see in the list.

2424. Do you allow them to do that?—We have allowed them up to the present time. We do not wish to withdraw the men; we wish to raise their standard so that the men can keep their employment. We do not want to take men away from employment, but we wish them to have their standard raised to the proper conditions. There was one point raised with Mr. Dew with regard to the conditions of work—that some of the men might have to work perhaps one time, and our joiners would be expected to work another. I might say we did offer to make a little concession on that point if they would give the men their proper wages, that is, the 9d. per hour; we offered to make the concession of letting the men work according to the hours of the firm. We found we were making a good concession there, because that really would be an advantage to them. In the ordinary course of working, this would raise their hours from 49 to 53, and that would mean practically so many hours at the ordinary rate which they ought to be receiving overtime for. We offered that concession, considering it would be a convenience for the firm. We said, We do not wish to be hard, and we do not wish to press anything that is not right, but if you will make a concession there and pay the men the standard rate which we consider is due to them, we will make the concession as regards our time. But of course the concession was not made on their part.

2425. What is the next point?—On the face of it, I think you will find that if they pay the men the standard rate of wages, there is a great advantage to them as private employers, because if they were to employ a builder from outside, they would naturally have to pay a percentage on his wages as well as on his material. Here you see they are not satisfied with that; they really take a percentage on the material, and they do not even pay the man his standard rate, so they gain more than they really should in the ordinary course of business. I do not know whether you quite understand the point.

2426. I do not quite?—Under the present conditions they are paying the men so much an hour, and if they were to employ them under a builder from outside instead of employing them direct, they would have to pay him an increase upon their wages on the construction. If they were to pay the ordinary rate of wages, the 9d. per hour, they would be gaining by that perhaps 2d. per hour over what they would pay if they employed a builder from the outside. So that on the face of the thing it is not right that a man should be allowed to pay less than that and gain double advantage over a builder. You see the builders and general joiners of the town, as I said before, agreed that this is not at all an excessive price; in fact, I asked them some time ago whether they consider so, and they said they did not consider it was so at all; they considered the price was nothing excessive; taking the conditions of the town and the expenses the men were placed at, they considered the prices were nothing more than fair. If it is only fair for them, it is not fair that firms like these firms should pay on a lower standard. It does not look right that we should have to press small employers, we will say, for this standard. Take a man in Sheffield, employing perhaps three or four joiners; that man has to pay the full standard rate of wages, and he has to work on those conditions, and yet here is a firm which is much more wealthy—and it is because it is wealthy, I suppose, that it can take the thing into its own hands and say, "We shall pay you even less than that." That is not right. Our trade generally in Sheffield consider that every firm which is thought worthy of being a Government contractor should be a fair paying firm, that is, in all its branches. I think that is only a fair condition.

2427. Have you any other complaints or points you wish to add?—That is the principal point I want to raise. Of course I should like to press it very much.

2428. We quite understand that, I think?—I might say this, although these firms desire to have a lower standard rate of wages, they do not desire to have a lower standard of men. When we were interviewing some of their representatives, I said to them, "You pay the men a low rate of wages, would you have any objection to taking some of our older members and giving them this easy work, as you say it is—perhaps it might be an advantage to them to take it." They would not take the older men; they wanted men not over 40 years old, so they practically wanted the prime of the employees, although they have got easy work, and they wanted to pay a lower standard for the best in the trade. That, on the face of it, is not right.

2429. (Mr. De la Bère.) I do not quite see how your complaint comes within the terms of the Resolution, because it admittedly does not apply to men at work on Government contracts?—Not at present, but if you are considering the Fair Wages Clause, it can be made to apply to them, can it not?

2430. Your complaint admittedly applies to the private work of the firm, and not to the Government work; I think you will admit that none of these carpenters are employed on Government work?—The firm do not recognise it to be so, although, of course, we consider that everyone who is indirectly employed for that work by this firm are generally at work for the Government.

2431. Do you mean that a carpenter putting in a window on the place is indirectly employed on a Government contract?—All the work is necessary to the contract.

2432. I think that is going too far, is it not?—Even the factory where it is made is necessary in order to do it in, and if a man is employed in making that factory he is employed indirectly.

2433. I take it you have established a recognised rate for carpenters in the building trade?—Certainly.

2434. You have got as far as that?—Yes.

2435. Your difficulty is that you cannot get that rate extended to iron and steel works?—That is it.

2436. That is the whole point?—Yes.

2437. Would you consider the conditions quite the same in the iron and steel works as in the building trade? There is no seasonable difficulty in the iron and steel works probably, and they are not suspended for bad weather?—I do not know that they are suspended for bad weather; but I do not consider that should be a condition for employment under these rules. The rules are made for all to comply with, and not to take that into consideration. If you take that into consideration, you might say the joiners in Sheffield or elsewhere employed in the shop alone, and the out-workers, should be differently paid, but our rules apply both to indoors and out-doors in the same way.

2438. Under the present wording of the Resolution of the House, how do you think the Government could intervene in regard to the trades not employed on Government work?—I think at any rate the Government could ask them to comply, though they could not compel them.

2439. I think you mentioned packing-case makers; would you regard them as skilled carpenters and joiners?—I did not say they were packing-case makers. I said these firms employed them upon such work.

2440. I do not think they admit that they employed skilled carpenters and joiners upon packing-case making?—They say many of their men are employed on that.

2441. Many of their men, but not many of their carpenters?—We were speaking of carpenters at that time, so they were referring to carpenters and joiners. Whether they are skilled or otherwise I cannot say; if they are carpenters and joiners, and they are skilled sufficient for them to be employed as carpenters and joiners, they would not employ them for packing-cases alone; they would not employ a man to make packing-cases only if he was of use for other things—at least I do not think so.

2442. (Mr. Black.) Do you think you really know enough of the work on which these men are employed in the steel works to be able to say whether they ought to be skilled joiners?—I know many of the men are skilled joiners.

2443. You believe then that the firms do succeed in getting skilled joiners at these low rates of wages?—I quite think so.

2444. Are they men who have gone through their apprenticeship?—Yes, they have gone through their apprenticeship as carpenters and joiners, undoubtedly.

2445. What is that work which you mentioned in connection with armour plates? You spoke of backing them or something?—That would be rough work which some people would not consider perhaps as joiners' work; but I am not well versed in the armour trade I must confess. I understand that there is a backing up of the armour plate for testing purposes, and carpenters and joiners are of course employed on that; it is for that purpose at any rate.

2446. Do you not think much of the work in these steel firms would be of that character—rather rough carpentering than skilled joinery?—Possibly so; but if they are carpenters and joiners they should come under the same rule.

2447. You do not recognise any inferior skill in rough carpentering as distinguished from joinery then?—I do not think they would employ a man just for rough work alone if they mean, generally speaking, only to do that. In the building trade they do not employ a man to do the rough work only; you are supposed to take the whole course.

2448. Supposing the woodwork of a firm is mostly of that character?—We could not have sections in that way; I do not think we could do it.

2449. You do not think it would be a fair thing if the work were of that character, that the firm should pay rather less?—I do not think so at all, and in fact they do not say so themselves. We understand that they employed them on all classes of work at different times—sometimes they would be employed on rough work, but at other times they might be on smooth work.

2450. You could not say whether the rough work was the main portion of their work?—I do not think it is.

2451. You mentioned a case about which you complained to the Admiralty, but I cannot find it on my notes; was it recently?—I wrote to Lord Tweedmouth I think it was some time back, but I did not receive any reply to the letter.

2452. Against which particular firm?—It was a complaint of firms generally—that these firms did not pay their joiners the standard rate of wages. There are similar firms in Sheffield that do pay the standard.

2453. Have you any conciliation boards in Sheffield?—Yes.

2454. What kind of cases do you refer to them?—Cases arising in the building trade.

2455. Then you would not refer questions of this kind to the conciliation board?—No, I do not think so.

2456. Nor questions with the steel firms?—I do not know whether the steel firms would consider it. You see by their action here they take a standard of their own; they make a code of rules, and they say they pay a standard wage of their own.

2457. And they do not recognise the conciliation board?—I do not think they would. What we have generally done with the conciliation board concerning the building trades, supposing we will say a firm is not complying with our rules, is that the particular trade—it might be the builders or the plumbers or whatever it was—which was connected with the conciliation board would report that to its own trade organisation, its own trade organisation would try to bring about reconciliation between the men and the firms, and if they failed then it would be reported to the conciliation board, and the conciliation board (which is formed of a joint board of masters and men who are connected with the trade) would meet and consider the matter, and come to a decision, we will say, to bring them into line.

2458. Supposing it was one of those questions we were referring to just now, as to what was cabinet-maker's work and what was joiner's work, and supposing that question arose under a Government contract, do you think that is a kind of case that might go before a conciliation board?—I do not think that our conciliation board, having regard to the way in which it is constituted, would take up the case of such a contract at all.

2459. (Mr. Wilson Fox.) Your Union appears to work very harmoniously, and I should like to know whether it gets to hear of most of the complaints in your trade with regard to the workmen employed on Government contracts?—Yes, I suppose so.

2460. You think you would hear most of them?—I should think so.

2461. The Union would be in a position, therefore, to make representations to the Government?—Yes.

2462. And there would not be many cases in which the representatives of the men had not the opportunity of making representations to the Departments concerned?—I do not think so. Of course sometimes we have a little difficulty. One of the firms I have been speaking about wanted to establish a medical examination for the men, that is, every man had to go through a strict medical examination before they would accept him on the firm. We were able to bring that to an end. But that you see was with a low price; they pay a low price, the work they say is not very skilled and is easy, and yet they want a medically examined man to go and do it. That of course we, as a Trade Union, will be able to deal with ourselves, and we should not bring that matter up before the Government.

The witness withdrew.

EIGHTH DAY.

Thursday, January 23rd, 1908.

At 32, Great George Street, Westminster, S.W.

PRESENT:

Sir GEORGE H. MURRAY, K.C.B. (Chairman).

Mr. R. Bailey, M.V.O.
Mr. F. W. Black.
Mr. H. de la Bère, C.B.
Mr. A. Wilson Fox, C.B.
Mr. J. H. Hillier.
Mr. A. F. King.
Mr. J. J. Wills (Secretary).

Mr. Robert Holmshaw, called and examined.

2463. (Chairman.) You are Secretary of the Sheffield United Cutlery Trades Council and of the Scissors Grinders' Trade Society, I understand?—Yes, I am Secretary of the United Cutlery Trades Council, as well as the Union in my own trade—the Scissors Grinders' Union. I am also Secretary of the Sheffield Federated Trades Council. In addition to that, I am a member of our City Council and a member of the Education Committee.

2464. Do you think the Fair Wages Clause in Government contracts has been beneficial to you as workmen?—To a very limited extent. We have had cases where our grievances have been remedied under it, but the process is so slow and the difficulties of proving a complaint are so great, that it has not been anything like as beneficial as it might be if it were amended on the lines that we suggest.

2465. Your first objection, in fact, is that it takes so much time to investigate your complaints?—Yes.

2466. And that the job is very often done before the complaints have been inquired into?—Yes.

2467. All your rates are piece-work rates, I gather?—Yes.

2468. You have no time rates at all?—No.

2469. How are your rates fixed?—They are generally fixed by agreement between the employers and the workmen. In regard to my own trade, I have here a list of our prices which was agreed upon at the date named at the bottom between the employers and the workmen. I may say that it has been departed from in instances, and that it is regulated by discounts (handing in list).

2470. This is a sort of standard rate?—Yes.

2471. With variations?—By discounts.

2472. This was fixed as long ago as 1873, I see?—Yes.

2473. Are all these rates agreed still between the employers and the workmen?—Yes, subject to varying discounts

2474. And practically you have got the whole trade in Sheffield in agreement with the employers?—Yes; but unfortunately they do not all work now by the same discounts. We agreed to a 10 per cent. discount in a depression of trade, and some of our employers take a great deal more off. In Government work many employers fix a net price and ignore that statement.

2475. Is that practice recognised by your rules?—No, we do not recognise that.

2476. You wish to stick to the standard rates?—Yes.

2477. With the standard discount or addition, as the case may be?—Yes.

2478. What has happened is that your standard rates are getting rather broken down, and are being replaced by specific rates for specific work?—In a few instances that is so, more especially in Government work.

2479. Is that a common practice among all the employers, or is it only done by a few?—It is a common practice.

2480. The rates so fixed have practically become the current rates, have they not?—No; they vary again. You may have a rate fixed for one Government order, and it may vary by arrangement between the employer and his own workmen for another Government order.

2481. These workmen all being members of one of your Societies?—Very often they may not be members of a Society who agree to it.

2482. Would you allow the members of your Society to be parties to an arrangement of that kind?—No.

2483. Then none of your members would work under that arrangement?—Not with our consent; if they did, it would be unknown to us.

2484. Is that your chief complaint, that the standard rates are being modified by these subsidiary agreements?—Yes.

2485. And your remedy for that would be to enforce the standard rates?—Yes.

2486. But if your standard rates have ceased to be generally accepted, which I rather gather from you is the case, how would you propose to deal with the matter?—We would have the standard rates fixed by agreement between employers and workmen.

2487. I gather from you that the employers will no longer agree to your rates?—Perhaps I have not made that quite clear. In many instances, the employers do adhere to that statement, with the discount of 10 per cent. off.

2488. And those employers would not make these other agreements that you speak of?—Not to my knowledge.

2489. Is the number of houses which make these outside agreements considerable or small?—There are a number of them, but they are generally the smaller manufacturers; the principal manufacturers adhere to that list.

2490. You do not know the numbers at all, I suppose?—I could not give you the numbers offhand.

2491. I see you make a suggestion that the current price for Government work should be the one nearest to that paid by the majority of the firms doing the same class of work?—Yes.

2492. How would that affect you?—In the case of Government work, it would make the price in many cases higher than the price which is at present paid.

2493. Would it?—Yes, for the Government work.

2494. By the firms doing the same class of work, you mean the same class of work but not under a Government contract?—Yes. The Government patterns are ordinary patterns.

2495. Do you find the rates paid under the Government contracts are lower than they are for other work, as a rule?—They are lower.

2496. How do you account for that?—I suppose one reason would be that the Government, like every other contracting party, take the lowest tender, and the employers in competing for Government work always want it done at a lower rate, because they know they will not get the contract unless they do.

2497. Would that not apply to all other contracts?—It is only Government work practically that is contracted for in the cutlery trades; there is very little other contract work.

2498. Outside the Government they just give an order and it is executed?—Yes, from a shop; it all goes to the shopkeepers.

2499. Then I see that you would like to know something more about the firms who are doing the Government work?—Yes.

2500. Do you get any information about the firms who have been successful in tendering?—None officially. The only way we get to know it is from knowing unofficially that certain work is being done in certain firms, but, of course, that is when the work has got under weigh, as it were.

2501. What is it you would like to have?—Briefly, we would like to have the schedules of every Government Department that orders go from to Sheffield sent down to some responsible representative of the men, at the same time that they are sent down to the manufacturers who are invited to tender.

2502. What do you mean exactly by "schedules"?—The schedules of the contracts that you send out.

2503. The tender forms do you mean?—The tender forms, I suppose. I thought the proper term was "schedules."

2504. What you really want to get is not the tender form, but the name of the firm that gets the contract, is it not?—We want the tender form first, and then the name of the firm when the contract is given out.

2505. You have a further suggestion that there should be kept "at the Government Office concerned a list of rates of wages to be paid, together with hours of labour and conditions of employment"; that would mean in your case a long list of piece-work rates, would it not?—Yes; in all branches of cutlery that would be so.

2506. Is that quite practicable?—No Government Department would order all the kinds that are in that list; they would only order a few kinds, and there would be no difficulty there. You see there are many kinds in that list, and many sizes, but the Government, as I say, do not order all; they order what we term horse-scissors or surgical scissors, perhaps; and in the table knives, a knife that is known as the "Army" knife and the "Navy" knife, and the same thing with spring knives, and so on.

2507. Does this general list of prices, which you have put in, include an agreement about hours and other conditions of work?—Being piece-workers, hours do not enter into it.

2508. Does it include any other conditions?—No; no other conditions.

2509. Then practically the agreement is confined to the piece-work rates?—Yes.

2510. Will you explain the further suggestion which you give in your Proof, namely, "that the contractor be required to insert in a schedule to be added to the contract the names of the various classes of labour which he intends to employ, together with the places where such labour will be employed, the rates of wages paid, and hours of labour and conditions of employment observed in respect to each class of labour; and that no tender be accepted unless rates of wages, hours of labour, and conditions of employment inserted in each schedule are in accordance with the list agreed on and kept at the Government Office"?—I may say that that is practically what is entered in the London County Council contracts, and it is what is entered in our Sheffield City Council contracts. Every contractor is required to pay rates of wages according to that list. This is the standard that we have in our fair contracts, and you will see it embodies the suggestions that I am making (handing in print).

2511. But these, as you have pointed out, would not affect your trade very much?—It would not affect us at all, because the Sheffield Corporation do not buy such a quantity. But an engineering firm tendering for engineering work must pay the rates of wages to their engineers that are set forth in that list of rates.

2512. In your trade, you would substitute for a schedule of this kind a list of piece-work rates; is that your proposal?—Yes; that is the proposal.

2513. (Mr. De la Bère.) You have suggested that the schedules be sent to the secretaries of Trade Unions, whose members are interested in the contracts, at the same time as they are sent to the firms invited to tender. I am under the impression that you already get those schedules at the time competitions are invited?—No. I may say that some little time ago, as Secretary of the Cutlery Council, I wrote to the War Department and the Admiralty, asking that these details might be supplied to me as the Secretary. I was referred to the Parliamentary Committee of the Trade Union Congress, and from there I was told that they only send these schedules to Societies already affiliated to that body. We have not been affiliated, and therefore could not have the schedules. In the reply I got from both Departments, I was told that two gentlemen were already in receipt of these schedules. We have no complaint against these two gentlemen, one of whom we know very well, but the other is not a Sheffield gentleman. The one we know is very much interested in labour matters, and so on, but he is not in the cutlery trade. We did not know until about two months ago that this gentleman was receiving these schedules, and I have only seen two of the schedules that he has received, both of them relating to work that this gentleman is not interested in. Therefore, although both Departments are sending out these schedules, presumably to the workmen interested, in consequence of the arrangement made they are not reaching the workmen except in an indirect way, and then, of course, they only come to hand long after the order is given out.

2514. I suppose that the people who do receive them are those who are given to us as the proper recipients; would that not be so?—That is quite right.

2515. The difficulty, I take it, arises from the fact that you are not affiliated to the Trade Union Congress; is that it?—That is the reason given by the Parliamentary Committee.

2516. Then probably the answer would be the same to the question I was going to ask you further, upon your suggestion that the list of all firms on the Department's list should be supplied to the Trade Unions; you are probably aware that that list is already supplied to the Parliamentary Committee of the Trade Union Congress?—Yes; but again the same answer would apply—we do not receive it. That is not the fault of the Department, I know. I may say here that there has been a great change. Some years ago, I wanted to know for which Department an order was being executed in Sheffield, and although I wrote to both the Army and the Navy I was told that it was not customary to give that information. Afterwards, I found that the scissors were for neither Department —I believe they were for the Indian Government. That custom has now been departed from very much in your Departments, and we think—at least I think —that you might go a step further, and say, "If you represent the cutlery workers, you shall have the schedules at the same time that they are sent to the manufacturers who are asked to tender, and also when the tender is given out you shall have the name of the successful competitor."

2517. Of course, that is another point; you have not asked for the name of the successful competitor to be given, have you?—That was in my mind.

2518. It is rather difficult for a Government Department to ascertain precisely to whom these schedules should be sent, except through the agency of the Parliamentary Committee of the Trade Union Congress, is it not?—Yes, I grant that.

2519. There may be other bodies in existence whom we know nothing of?—Yes.

2520. It is very difficult indeed to depart from the names given to us as those to whom this information should be sent?—Yes, I see that.

2521. (Mr. Wilson Fox.) I see that you say in paragraph 4 in your Proof that in some branches of the cutlery trades different firms vary in the price per dozen?—Yes, that is so.

2522. Have you got any piece-work rate recognised by the Trade Unions? I think you said the rate varies in different firms?—Yes, it does vary.

2523. I will tell you why I raised that point at once, if I may. In your suggestions you ask that there should be lists of rates of wages to be paid, together with hours of labour and conditions of employment to be observed by the contractor, those lists to be jointly recognised by the Trade Unions and the employers and open at all times to public inspection; but what you say in paragraph 4 rather leads one to suppose that you have not got a definite recognised Trade Union piece-work rates?—In many of the cutlery trades —and I am speaking now of the cutlery trades broadly and not confining myself to the scissors trade —there is that difference of payment. In all disputes that there have been in Government work between employers and men, they have tried to fix a current rate nearly approximate to that of, say, half-a-dozen of the principal firms in the city, and that has been established, I think—in some cases, at any rate—as the current rate, but evidence about it will be given to you later on.

2524. Have you endeavoured to settle that with the employers?—It has been settled, I think, but I am not quite clear, and some of my friends could answer that question perhaps better than I could.

2525. I should like to hear about that, because of what you say in your next paragraph, No. 5. You say there, "The difficulty could be solved by making the current price for Government work the one nearest to that paid by the majority of firms doing the same class of work." Supposing there was a dispute about this matter, and supposing you appealed to the Government Department concerned, and said you thought the rate was not a fair rate or a proper rate, then according to this paragraph No. 5, some Government Department would have to make the inquiry themselves?—Yes.

2526. Would you suggest, if there was any dispute, or if you thought you had not been fairly treated as regards wages, that the Government Department concerned should send someone down and make the inquiry as to what was the rate that was being paid by the majority of the employers?—Yes.

2527. That is your suggestion, is it?—That is already done by Government, and you do send, and you have sent, inspectors down to Sheffield from the various Departments.

2528. If you have got a complaint?—Yes.

2529. And if you cannot agree with your employers, do you expect that, or hope that that will be done?—It has been done, and we are only asking for what has already been done.

2530. What I want to point out is that there being no Trade Union rate necessarily for this class of piece-work, you then fall back upon a current rate?—Yes. Our experience is that an employer will pay a certain price for what we term country work, that is, the ordinary work, but when he gets to Government work he wants that done for less money.

2531. (Mr. De la Bère.) For precisely the same article?—Precisely the same article.

2532. (Mr. Wilson Fox.) May I take it that that is a general condition in Sheffield?—Yes, I think you may; there are very few exceptions, I think. I am speaking of cutlery now, not of files.

2533. Then you suggest that the contractor should be required to insert in a schedule to be added to the contract, among other things, the rates of wages paid and the hours of labour and conditions of employment observed in respect to each class of labour; and that the rates of wages, the hours of labour and the conditions of employment inserted in each schedule are to be in accordance with the list agreed on and kept at the Government Office. Those, again, I understand, are conditions which are agreed upon between employers and workpeople?—Yes. The list of wages which I have handed in to the Chairman, for instance, is agreed upon between employers and workmen.

2534. And any conditions as well?—Yes, conditions as to hours, and so on.

2535. Do any of these employers do work outside Sheffield in the country districts?—They may have a few workmen working outside, but these men bring their work to the central place.

2536. What governs the piece-work rate of these men outside?—They are paid piece-work rates, and they get the same rates; it does not alter the rate of wages. But it is a diminishing quantity; it is really the remains of the old system before steam power came in, and it is very small.

2537. It is diminishing, and therefore it is not worth considering?—It is not worth taking into account.

2538. (Mr. Black.) In your second paragraph you say, "It is argued that as this work is given out in larger quantities, therefore it is possible for the men to earn an actually higher wage even at a lower rate; but the assumption is erroneous." Can you show that that is erroneous?—Yes. Supposing a man is working continuously on a Government order, he goes through just the same process. He does not take a gross and go through and do the gross at the same time on one process, and then shift on to another process. He will probably take five or six dozens in that process and go right through and finish them off. He must do that, because if he did not, other workmen would be waiting for him, to follow him, and therefore he takes quantities equal to that in his ordinary work. You see it is all hand work, and it is not the same as if you had to work a machine and were turning out large quantities through a machine.

2539. But there is the point, is there not, of the growing experience of the workmen?—No; he has learnt his trade, and there is no difference in the experience.

2540. Take a new pattern just introduced; we found this kind of thing—that an employer goes to his men, and says, "This is a new pattern; now how much will you charge for the first dozen"? They are made as samples, perhaps, and then a rather higher rate is named for that; but when an order goes down for some hundreds, perhaps running even into thousands, that rate is revised, because the workmen get from day to day more accustomed to make them. Surely as experience grows, their power of increasing their earnings grows, does it not?—Yes; but that would not apply to cutlery. It may apply to other things of which we have no knowledge, but it would not apply to cutlery.

2541. What do you include in the term "cutlery"?—I am including all kinds of knives, scissors and razors.

2542. Surely even in putting on the horn, the hafting of the knife, and so on ——?—If you would not mind referring that question to Mr. Crofts (who is a practical table-knife cutler), perhaps he could answer that better than I can.

2543. You say that the question of hours does not come in. I suppose you ought to make a comparison with the weekly wages, ought you not?—Yes.

2544. Can you tell us roughly what you consider a fair weekly earning in Sheffield? I think you work five days' full employment, do you not?—Nobody can fix the rates of wages really to be correct in Sheffield.

2545. I do not say fix it, but what do you suppose under a piece-work system to be the fair weekly earnings?—Mr. Crofts, who is a working cutler, will again be able to tell you what his average earnings are. I am not a cutler, and so I could not say that. In my own trade of scissors grinding they would run, say, from about 28s. up to 40s.

2546. (Mr. Wilson Fox.) What is the average number of hours per day a man would take to earn that sort of sum?—He would have to work 50 hours in the week.

2547. (Mr. Black.) Supposing the wages are agreed between the employer and the workmen, you do not lodge any complaint, do you; or do you take up a case, for instance, on behalf of people that do not belong to your Union, supposing they agree with their employer?—Yes, we should do so.

2548. Even against their wishes?—I do not know that it would be against their wishes, but we should take it up in the interests of the other employers who desired to pay a fair rate.

2549. We are sometimes informed in these cases by the individual workmen who are receiving those rates that they have actually agreed to them with their employer, and it is not their wish that any question has been raised?—But it must be done in the interests of other employers and other men who are prepared to observe fair conditions.

2550. Supposing that a particular set of workmen were earning quite as much, owing to their experience and skill and the facilities granted by the firm, as the workmen on a higher piece-rate in another firm are earning, would you think you had a case to interfere then?—We go by the prices, and we should say yes, because we do not think that the men in one firm are more skilled and should therefore work under better conditions than the men in another firm would do.

2551. But there are a great many firms who say this perhaps: "We do not care for this work, and our workmen do not care about it; and therefore if we take it at all we should expect our men to ask rather a high price, as it is a dirtier kind of work than they are accustomed to." That is the kind of thing that arises?—The prices are fixed according to the grade of the work, so that the higher grade would receive necessarily more.

2552. I think some of your very high-class firms in Sheffield do advance that argument, and say practically, "We do not care whether we take that work or not"?—The reason being largely because the prices are cut so low by other manufacturers that it does not pay really unless they are going to pull their men's wages down.

2553. Although we might find that the men actually doing that work at the lower prices were getting a very good weekly wage?—We might, but I question whether we should.

2554. Coming to this other point about sending the schedules to the Secretaries of Trade Unions, and so on, is there any prospect, do you think, of your coming to any arrangement with the Parliamentary Committee of the Trade Union Congress?—We have already decided that one of our branches, at any rate, shall be affiliated to the Parliamentary Committee of the Trade Union Congress for that purpose. I may explain that practically all the Unions in Sheffield were affiliated to the Congress at one time, but they are small Unions, and we found that we had practically no power there, because the large national Unions dominated the Congress; and so we gradually lapsed.

2555. But you can quite understand that one of the things which perhaps facilitated making this arrangement with Mr. Steadman was that there would be one man only in each district to whom the Department would be put to the trouble of sending a schedule?—Yes.

2556. I see Mr. Mappin mentions six Trade Unions in files alone?—Yes, that is so.

2557. And I think you have a good many edge-tool Societies—you have at least two?—Yes.

2558. Altogether you have a good many in cutlery?—Yes.

2559. So it would mean that we would have to send 20 schedules to Sheffield where we now send one?—May I say what would satisfy the cutlery people, and I think also the edge-tool people, would be if the schedules were sent to me as representing the whole body and as Secretary of the Cutlery Council. That would meet their wishes.

2560. So that we should only have to recognise two people in Sheffield, the one appointed by Mr. Steadman's body, and the one appointed by all the other trades?—Yes.

2561. That would cover the files and the cutlery?—Yes.

2562. (Mr. Hillier.) But not the electro-plate?—No.

2563. Mr. Black.) I have an application from one of the edge-tool Societies at the present time?—Yes, I know you have.

2564. I think that is a point you might think over amongst yourselves, because you would be much more likely in that way to get any benefit that accrued, as it would really be a troublesome thing to send out a dozen or twenty schedules every time we let out a tender?—We do not want you to do that. You have now one gentleman in Sheffield, and if you were to appoint me in the same way to receive all the schedules, that would satisfy us, at any rate, if you said they should be sent to me as representing the men.

2565. Perhaps Mr. Hobson might not require some of the cutlery schedules?—He does not require the cutlery, I am sure; the silver and electro-plate he would, because he is interested in that branch.

2566. Do you not think you could talk it over with him and perhaps make some proposal?—Yes, we could do that.

2567. I think that might help the Department to help you?—We are very desirous to make the thing as smooth as possible, and we do not wish to give the Department any trouble at all. We only desire to know what Government work is being done.

2568. (Mr. Hillier.) With regard to the difference in the rates paid by the employers to the workmen upon Government work, may that not be caused by the Contractor taking his men into his confidence in the first place, and asking them what they would do the work at, so as to ascertain what price he could put in for the work?—No.

2569. Do you mean that he will not consult his men to see what they would do?—That is so, because the patterns are not fresh patterns.

2570. But, still, being a large order, the contractor, in order to keep the work, as it were, in his particular workshop, may call his men together, and say, "Although the price for similar goods to the ordinary trade may be a certain sum, still, there is a large order here, are you prepared to take a little less?" and upon the price given by the men he bases his tender?—He may do that.

2571. Therefore, it might be to the interest of the men in that particular shop to do it at a little less in order to keep the work in the shop?—They might do it for less in order to keep the work; but we contend it is unfair, because there is just the same skill required in this work, and the men cannot earn more money, because it comes in in a quantity, than he could on his ordinary work.

2572. But it might keep the man employed when otherwise, through the competition in the trade, he would be idle?—Yes.

2573. And although the firm which is successful is probably paying a little less, another firm which is paying the ordinary rates might also have done it at a little less if they had been successful? Do you see what I mean?—Yes, I quite follow. The process of manufacture in Sheffield is just the same as it was 100 years ago, and there is no more machinery in it. It is just a matter of the forging of the blades, and large or small quantities does not enter in so much. What I mean by "large or small" is that if a man gets out six dozens of a kind he is doing as well as if he was getting out six gross.

2574. I agree, but that is not quite what I mean. What I want to put to you is this: Is it not to the common interest of the employer and the workmen themselves to try and obtain this contract, and may not a contractor, after making arrangements, be enabled to get the contract by reason of the men taking a little less?—Yes; but that is the contention of every sweater in the country, you know.

2575. In piece-work it must be so, must it not?—Yes.

2576. If it were not, there would be very little competition?—Our contention is that whatever competition there may be amongst manufacturers the wages fund should be left untouched. They can lose their profits, if they like, and they can reduce them to a vanishing point, but we say, "You shall not touch the wages fund."

2577. But you say you have allowed discounts, and that you do allow discounts off that rate?—That is the same to every manufacturer and for the same class of work. We do not say that because someone else is coming along to give an order, therefore, while the men are working on that, they shall earn less wages than on the other.

2578. Supposing it were not a Government contract—supposing it was a large foreign contract which was coming in, would not the same conditions apply then as what you say apply to a Government contract?—We have no experience of large foreign contracts coming in, and they are not entered into, I think. I have no experience of any in cutlery.

2579. (Mr. King.) Have you any conditions about the employment of boys, such as limiting the number of boys?—In some industries they say that only the sons of the members shall be brought into the trade; in other there are no such conditions.

2580. And there you do not mind how many boys are employed?—In some they do not; in some they do. There is no guiding rule for all the trades. In my own we lay down a rule.

2581. What is your view?—We say we only take the sons of members.

2582. Is the number limited?—No, there is no limit to the number.

2583. There are no women employed in your trade, I believe?—No, not in the grinding. Of course there are women employed in burnishing and dressing, but not in the grinding.

2584. Would they be members of your Union?—No, only grinders are in our Union.

2585. (Chairman.) I want to ask you one more question about the point you mentioned earlier in your evidence, namely, these outside agreements made between an employer and his workmen for a specific job, and made at lower rates perhaps than you have got in your schedule. How far do you mean to carry your principle that they should be discountenanced? Suppose that the firm in question employ a large number of people who may be outside your Union altogether: would you object to their making an arrangement between themselves as to the price to be paid, independently of your prices?—Yes. The Fair Contracts Resolution that I have handed in makes no distinction between Union and non-Union men, and we do not think the Government ought to make any distinction between Union and non-Union men.

2586. Are you not asking the Government to accept the rates fixed by the Union, and to enforce them on people outside it?—Yes, we are.

2587. Without reference to the number of people outside it?—Yes. We say that an employer shall not pay less for Government work than he pays for other work of the same kind and quality.

2588. That is not quite the point I was on. The case I was thinking of was where, for a special job—whether it is Government work or other work does not matter—the workmen and the employer have agreed on a special rate; you object to that because the rate is inconsistent with the rate that you have fixed in your agreements?—Yes.

2589. What I want to know is whether you are going to enforce that rate against any number of people who are not members of your Union, and against the employer who employs them?—Yes.

2590. Do you think that it is practicable to maintain that position?—We think so; we think it is fair.

2591. But why should the Union rate govern all the others if the number of the others is larger than the number in the Union?—We do it in the interests of the fair employer; that is, the employer who is prepared to pay what is recognised as a fair wage. If we are going to allow an employer and his men, because the men are outside the Union and the employer is outside the Employers' Federation, to pull down the prices as low as ever they possibly can, then we are going to get no guarantee against sweating.

2592. Do you not think that the number of people would make a considerable difference in cases of that kind?—How do you mean?

2593. Supposing the Union was a small one and the number actually at work in the trade outside the Union was much larger, ought not the majority to be allowed in their own interest to make their own bargain?—We think not. We think they should not, because they are outside the Trade Union, be allowed to pull prices down.

2594. But you are practically asking there that the minority shall fix the price that the majority shall accept or pay?—We think so. In the one case the minority are combined and represent a common interest; in the other they are simply representing their individual interest, which is against the common good—the good of both employers and workmen.

2595. They may be dealing collectively for this purpose, though not as a Union?—Yes; but they represent no one but themselves.

2596. Does the Union?—The Union would represent more firms, probably, although not so many members. We have an illustration of the necessity for some alteration at the present moment. We are informed that the Admiralty have just placed a contract for knives in Sheffield, but we are only informed so, and it is being ferreted out just now which firm has got the order and the conditions under which they are working. If we had had these schedules before us we should have known long ago that the orders were going to be placed, and if we had known the names of the successful firm sent to us we should have known straight away who the firm was. At present we are groping in the dark, as it were, although we think we have got a little light.

2597. (Mr. Wilson Fox.) You said, I think, that the Trade Union rate ought to be adopted by all the employers?—If I did not say so, I will say so.

2598. But, according to paragraph 5 of your Proof, where there is no Trade Union rate you are prepared to make the "current price for Government work the one nearest to that paid by the majority of firms doing the same class of work"; do you mean the "majority doing the same class of work" to include Union and non-Union men?—If there were no Union, of course, they could only include non-Union men.

2599. Then it would have to come to that, that the firms would include Union as well as non-Union men? Supposing there was no Trade Union rate, and you had to find out what was the current rate, would you include in your inquiry firms employing Union and also firms employing non-Union men?—You would have to do.

The witness withdrew.

Mr. GEORGE HENRY SHAW, called and examined.

2600. (Chairman.) I think you are the Secretary of the Pen and Pocket Blade Forgers Protection Society?—Yes.

2601. You have got some illustrations to give us showing the difficulties which you have encountered in the working of the Fair Wages Clause?—Yes, I have.

2602. Could you give us the general drift of them? You need not go into the details, as all we want to know is the main features of your difficulties?—I have some correspondence here in reference to Messrs. A. and Co. showing how difficult it is for my particular Union, the Spring Knife Grinders Union and the Spring Knife Cutlers Union—all of which I represent to-day—showing how difficult it was for our three branches to get a settlement of a particular price for a certain work by the firm referred to, Messrs. A. The correspondence began on June 10, 1899, and it ended on December 27, 1900; and there was no final settlement then. One of our grievances is that after all that wading through letters on either side we did not get an adjustment of the case, nor for some time after; in fact, not until someone else was making a fresh contract.

2603. Then this is an instance of delay?—Yes, by correspondence. (Handing in the correspondence.)

2604. Is there any other point in it besides the delay?—We want to show a few. First, about Messrs. A. and Co. again. They paid for forging blades 7s. per gross, the reason being mainly on account of the steel being Bessemer rail steel. If you were to wade through all that correspondence you would find that an inquiry into the cost of the steel used is very material. I have a copy here of an analysis of the steel made by Prof. Arnold, of Sheffield, which proved our case to the officials of the Government at the time. You must understand that we, as workmen, knowing the class of blade being forged by this firm, and knowing the nature of the steel by the working of it—the working being very soft—knew it was Bessemer steel, and we managed with difficulty to secure a schedule. We found that the contract given to Messrs. A. and Co. stated that it should be cast steel. So we stated in a complaint that they were violating the conditions of the contract, and that they were not giving the quality of the material asked for, and consequently they could under-cut merchants in the town. The steel, being Bessemer steel, was soft to work, and the workman was induced to work a blade at less than he otherwise would if it had been cast steel. That is one main point regarding price. It was first of all 6s., and there being a deal of trouble, the firm lifted it to 7s.; but at that time the price paid by other firms doing Government work was 8s.

2605. If it had been specified to have been cast steel, would the rates have been right?—It would have corrected it to a certain extent, but perhaps not to the 8s. Then, according to the Fair Wages Resolution of the House, the price has to be the curent price, and we have had a deal of trouble in arriving at the current price. We took it that the "current price" meant the price paid by most of the firms doing Government work. We found that Harrison Bros. and Howson, and Hunters, for instance, were paying 8s. per gross at this time, while this firm was only paying 6s.; so we contended that 8s. was the current rate which we were entitled to.

2606. What was the result of your complaint in the end?—The result has been, I believe, that Messrs. A. and Co. completed their order which they had on hand. I might say that having to wait 13 months before that correspondence was complete, and so many months before we got to know what the Department had demanded, the result was that the biggest part of the contract was done, and the firm, I believe, was allowed to run out the contract by giving a slightly increased price to the three branches. As a consequence, I do not think Messrs. A. and Co. have had a Government contract for the same knife since. That was nine years ago.

2607. Have you any other cases you would like to give us the details of?—Not in my own particular trade. I am representing the forging now, and in reference to the firm at present having the order for Navy knives, I am informed by our workmen that the price is satisfactory.

2608. Then at present the condition of things is satisfactory to you?—As far as my own trade is concerned; but then I have two other Societies to represent.

2609. Are there other cases in other trades that you would like to bring forward?—Yes. I am not representing now my own Society, the Forgers, but I am representing the Blade Grinders and the Knife Makers—the Cutlers. If you will look at my proof you will find the cases; the Cutlers commence, and the Grinders are second. There are several cases there.

2610. Will you tell us in your own words what you want to bring before us?—Dealing with the same firm—Messrs. A. and Co.—they paid 3s. a dozen for making the grey buff spike knife, the materials partly worked being calculated to be worth 1s. 4d. per dozen. That was a total of 4s. 4d., and the price at this time paid by other firms for the same order was 5s. 6d.

2611. What was the result there?—Whilst I might say Messrs. A. and Co. made 14 to the dozen, other firms paid 6s. per dozen of 12 knives for the black horn knife, and 7s. per dozen of 12 knives for the grey buff knife. So, on account of the trouble we had with Messrs. A. and Co., and the quality being maintained by other firms, we contended Messrs. A. and Co. were not supplying the quality. They got it made cheaper all round; they were getting an inferior knife made in every particular, both in the blade and in the grinding, and being inferior—scamped, as we call it—the men naturally worked for less money, too. We believe that after this contract was done the other firms who do the same class of work paid the proper rate of wages.

2612. There, again, you were satisfied?—Yes, with that knife; the present knife which is being supplied to the Navy is not satisfactory to the workman. The firm at present on the contract is paying the men 3s. per dozen and 1s. 6d. for hafting. That work was partly done by girls, and the employer deducted 2s. 8d. for that. These girls do the boring or the drilling of most of the material, and the firm is paying the men who put the knife together 3s. per dozen, and is collecting 2s. 8d. for the girls, and our information is that these girls at the present time are receiving from 2s. 6d. to 3s. per week. He is sweating these girls, and putting it into his own pocket. He is quoting low for the order and getting it, in consequence of the cheap labour he has got; and the men think that they have a grievance there.

2613. Their grievance being, first, that the girls are employed instead of themselves?—Yes, that is one reason.

2614. And, secondly, that the girls are under-paid?—They are under-paid, and the work which the girls do is the lightest part of the work which the men reckon to do. They have little machines that run freely, and there is no trouble attached to it—they simply have to be there and watch the machines and put the things in.

2615. Will you give us now the other cases that you want to mention?—I would like to say further regarding the spring-knife cutlers, that another firm in Sheffield which has made the same pattern knife that is being made now, pay their men 7s. 3d. per dozen of 12 knives, whereas the firm last referred to, which employs men on Government work, gets these knives made 14 to the dozen, so consequently the last firm referred to pay for 14 knives, 8s. 5½d. against 4s. 6d. less the labour paid by the girls.

2616. Are these all cases in which you have made complaints?—No, the last one is not. I was giving you these as showing how unsatisfactory the thing is at the present time. We are informed that Mr. B. employs the girls and pays them this money. He has men working at day-work, some of the cutlers as low as 22s. per week, and when they work extra hours they are working at the rate of 4d. per hour. These new men are not getting the proper rate. Therefore the cutlers think they have a cause of grievance, and I have no doubt this particular firm referred to will be reported to the Department in course of time after investigations have been further made. I am not lodging a complaint against that, but I am stating what we have ascertained up to now.

2617. (Mr. King.) Are girls employed by any other firm besides Mr. B.?—I am not aware that they are employed in the making of the knives, but they are employed in the spring-knife warehouses, and in all cutlery warehouses, for the purpose of warehousing, wrapping up, wiping, sharpening, &c., but not for this particular purpose that I am aware of.

2618. What is the objection to employing them on that work; is the work unsuitable?—No, it is not altogether on account of its being unsuitable, but it is on account of their being able to get cheap labour.

2619. Is the work itself suitable for women?—I do not think it is at all suitable for women to be kept at work in a shop.

2620. I thought you said it was light work?—It is light, but it is dirty.

2621. It is dirty work, do you say?—It is not at all healthy for the women.

2622. You have mentioned time rates, but are not piece rates general in your trade as in the other cutlery trades?—Are you speaking about the blade forging now?

2623. You mentioned that one firm paid 22s. per week, which was a time rate, and I am referring to that; is that quite exceptional?—It is exceptional.

2624. It is not a rate obtaining generally in your trade, then?—It is the only firm that I am aware of who employ men at time rates, excepting the one or two men in a whole firm to do the repairs.

2625. (Mr. Black.) In that Admiralty case that you referred to, which occurred about seven or eight years ago, I see that Mr. Newton raised the question; was he the trade secretary?—Yes, of the grinders.

2626. He agreed, when we inquired into it locally, that the Government work might be paid at somewhat less than the outside rate, as the volume of it enabled the men to work off more dozens in a given time on account of the men not having to change tools, and so on?—Yes.

2627. Does that apply in this case?—It does in the grinding, but I have not quoted that at all.

2628. (Mr. Holmshaw.) May I interpose by saying that Mr. Shaw is not a grinder, but I am. I speak as a grinder, and Mr. Shaw speaks as a forger. Speaking as a grinder of many years' practical experience, I say it does not make any material difference.

2629. (Mr. Black.) Was Mr. Newton a practical man?

2630. (Mr. Holmshaw.) Mr. Newton was a practical grinder, and he is against me there—I grant you that.

2631. (Mr. Black.) But that was his expression of opinion at that date?—Yes.

2632. He also agreed that in no two houses were the prices of glazing exactly alike?—I do not know about that being so in no two houses. There are only two courses open—a firm might give this grinding work out, and they might say they want buffing or glazing after they have been handled in the warehouse, and then some firms will order that the blades shall be ground and finished off, but if the warehouse likes to do that all over again, it is all right. When it has not been done in the shop, there has been a slight allowance made and agreed to.

2633. I see the case did undoubtedly take a long time to settle?—Yes.

2634. You apparently are agreed that Mr. Newton's idea of 16s. was a fair one?—Yes, I have got that here. 1s. 7d. is the price paid for that same work if done as what we call country work.

2635. We found there was no fixed rate throughout the trade for grinding and glazing, but we did come to the conclusion that 16s. was a fair rate. I do not think I need pursue that, as it is a case of about seven or eight years ago?—Yes, it is rather a long time ago. Regarding the last firm, if you will allow me to mention it, take the spring-knife grinders, I know my friend Mr. Newton will be glad for me to say what he asked me to say upon it. Speaking about Messrs. A. and Co., they paid, at the date mentioned in 1899, 10d. per dozen, the current rate which we recognise being 1s. 4d. The reason of that was, as I said, in the forging, on account of the steel being of such a soft nature that it was quite easy to get the edge sharpened quickly, and consequently to do a larger quantity. As the result of agitation the price was lifted to 1s 1½d., partly finished, and I am assured that the rate paid, 1s 1½d., owing to the way in which the blade was roughly finished, was equivalent to 1s. 4d. paid anywhere else, as the blades were quite inferior.

2636. How is it you do not succeed in getting a greater measure of agreement about the rates for work of this kind? It seems to me that these difficulties arise out of the unsettled state of things between the Trade Unions and the employers in Sheffield?—It is not our fault at all. I might say that a few months ago Mr. Holmshaw, myself, and several other members, met the Chamber of Commerce and the Cutlers' Company on other business than this, and after we had done our ordinary business it was suggested by us that the employers who did Government work should meet the representatives of the men who worked at Government work, with the idea of arriving at a standard price for all patterns and all kinds of goods supplied to the Government, in order to stop all this, and also to stop the undercutting one against the other; and we hope to receive some good out of that.

2637. That is the best line, and it will pay you to follow it?—Certainly; but at the present time we have to take the cases as they arise, and do the best we can with them.

2638. (Mr. Bailey.) I understood you just now to say that girls are employed upon some processes in the manufacture of these knives for the Government?—Yes.

2639. Are the girls employed on similar work for private orders?—No. They might be on that one firm—I would not say whether they are or not on that one firm—but they are not employed anywhere else in the town, neither for Government nor for private work, to do the same class of work as they have to do at the firm referred to.

2640. (Mr. Wilson Fox.) Would you object to the employment of these girls if they were paid the same rate on piece-work as the men?—If that were so, the firm would not employ them.

2641. As a matter of principle, would you object?—I should, as a workman, because I think that if there is a certain amount of work to be done on a knife, and I have to do the hard work, I am entitled to do the soft work, if there is softer work.

2642. That is exactly the point I was going to put to you, because I think you stated it rather as a matter of grievance that the girls did the lightest work?—They do.

2643. I thought you mean by that, and I still think so, that if you had all the lean you must have some of the fat; that is your point, is it not?—This is a new idea, and it is not done anywhere else. It is simply a case of the employer filching the easy job, or the light job, from the man who has to do all the other work, and he is doing that for the purpose of under-bidding other employers so that he can get the contract. We do not think that is fair.

2644. If I may follow that up, he is able to underbid other employers because very few of the other employers do employ women, as a matter of fact?—Except in the warehouse.

2645. It has been suggested here by a great many witnesses on behalf of Trade Unions, that Trade Unionists have not got a sufficient opportunity of knowing about the contracts?—That is so.

2646. But, on the other hand, in the stronger Trade Unions, they are so well organised that as soon as the men think that they have got a grievance, they inform their Trade Union officials pretty quickly?—That is so.

2647. In the more highly organised trades the men would usually go to their officials and inform them?—Yes.

2648. (Mr. De la Bère.) Your first case, I think, was a War Office case?—Yes.

2649. And it is nearly eight years ago?—It was in 1899.

2650. Have you no later instances?—This is in the cutlers' department, you understand, and I am not a cutler. We have not had any later cases in the cutlery department in connection with the making of knives since then up to the present time, and up to the case I referred to last where we are making inquiries, so, of course, at present it is rather premature.

2651. That complaint, I suppose, in a way, was satisfactorily settled, was it not, from your point of view?—It was satisfactorily settled by the firm who had the contract—Messrs. A.—but, as I have said, we were so many months before we knew anything about who got the contract; the Department were 13 months in correspondence with us, and then the contract was practically the biggest part over. So Messrs. A. and Co. worked it out, and since then they have not had another.

2652. That is what I was coming to. You lodged a complaint against Messrs. A. and Co., and as your impression is that as a result of that complaint they have not had a further order, would you not regard that as a satisfactory result?—We are quite satisfied, especially as the other firms who got the order after that paid, as I have said, instead of 4s. 4d., 6s. and 7s., the price having been lifted.

2653. I was not quite sure why you quoted that case?—As showing the delay.

2654. Merely on the question of delay?—Yes.

2655. On the point of the delay, I do not think the whole negotiation was contained in the correspondence, was it?—No.

2656. I think the inspector went down at least once, if not twice?—Three times.

2657. He had a meeting at which you and various others were present, and he went into it, I think you will admit, very carefully and closely?—Mr. Major, Mr. Evans, and Mr. Hall, all came down to Sheffield and saw the process of manufacturing in each department. They had shown to them the blade forging from the steel, and the different qualities of the steel; in fact, I brought samples of these to London along with our friends, and we showed various patterns and showed them all the rubbish they were getting and being supplied with. The blade, even when it was hardened, you could bend.

2658. The various steps which employed that interval are not all contained in this bundle of papers?—No, they are contained in different books.

2659. I think you will admit that the trade is a very complicated one, and that it is extremely difficult often to arrive at any decision as to what is the current rate, the processes of manufacture differing so much in each firm, and the number of operations being so great?—Yes, but I want you to understand this regarding this particular knife, or any knife which you send to get made:—There is a pattern knife sent to the Cutlers' Hall, Sheffield, for any manufacturer to view, so that he can quote what he can do it at. Everybody who sees that knife, no matter what class of firm they might be who make that knife, could see the quality of it, and could know exactly what it has to be. And we know too; and one of our main contentions is that we should, at the same time as the employer who tenders for the contract, have the opportunity of seeing the knife. The knife, as a rule, does not stay at the Cutlers' Hall much above a week on view. If we see the knife we can see how it is made, and we can then inform the department in case we find any employer infringing the contract, or not observing the proper quality of the article—the same as Messrs. A.

2660. Those are all primarily considerations relating rather to the quality of the article than to the wages, are they not? They are matters rather for the inspector and the inspecting department of the Government?—We are concerned with both. We are concerned in the case of Messrs. A. and Co., both as regards the quality supplied and as regards the price. In my own case, the forging, we knew that they corrected the price somewhat, and that they brought it up 1s. per gross.

2661. Your interest in the quality is so far as it bears on the price of labour?—Not altogether; of course, we are not thinking only about our money.

2662. I did not say that offensively; but that is really where you touch on the point of quality, that it affects you primarily in the price of the labour?—Yes. Then we do not think it right that other manufacturers in the city, who are fair manufacturers, who pay a good price for their ordinary work, and who occasionally tender for this class of work, should be cut out of a contract because another employer is unscrupulous, and is supplying the department with inferior-class work and inferior material, which is no earthly good when you get it. If you will look at that correspondence, you will see what Professor Arnold says about the quality of the blade.

2663. I have seen that. You mentioned that a particular firm was paying for its knives at 14 to the dozen; at that time was that not the customary method of calculation in the trade?—It might have been at that time, nine years ago.

2664. They could only calculate according to the custom of the trade at the time?—That is so, and I am not complaining about it then; but at the present time they are being done 14 to the dozen, when the outside quantity is 12. This is premature, because the firm referred to who do 14 to the dozen are having inquiries made about them, with a view of complaining.

2665. You have not complained of that case, then?—No, I am just showing you what is done.

2666. I do not think that was any point against the firm at the time?—Not the 14 to the dozen, but the price and the quality of the article were.

2667. Is what is called the little master system dying out, or is it as strong as ever?—It is not as strong as it was. A great many of these larger firms are buying up the little masters, and instead of having these little masters, who perhaps employ a dozen or a score of men, and who supply some of these larger houses, they buy a firm up, and appoint the little master as manager over a department, as a rule, to make that class of knife, or other article which he has been used to manufacture, for the firm.

2668. In other words, the sub-letting which used to be customary is becoming less and less so?—I suppose the system of little masters was very much a question of sub-letting.

2669. Is it not what I say?—Yes, I think so; of course, we do not want sub-letting.

2670. It is gradually becoming less and less frequent?—Yes, that is so. This was sub-letting.

The witness withdrew.

Mr. Alfred S. Mappin, called and examined.

2671. (Chairman.) I think you represent the Sheffield Machine File Cutters' Union?—Yes.

2672. You have half-a-dozen Unions in the file trade, I think you say?—Yes, we have half-a-dozen Unions in the file trade, each demanding skilled workmanship, that is, if I was out of work I should not be able to get employment as a hardener, because it requires skill in the knowledge of the hardening of steel; I should have to look for another situation in my own trade. Each Union confines itself to its own branch of trade.

2673. Then you have noticed that the keener competition for orders produces a tendency to evade the provisions of the Fair Wages Clause in the contract?—Yes.

2674. Will you give us a short account of the kind of evasion which you are thinking of?—I may mention that at one time only a few firms went in for machinery, that is, before it became so general, and before the quality of the file got up to a certain standard, owing to the lack of improvements, not many firms manufactured files by machinery, and all the contracts at that time were supposed to be for hand-cut files; but since the gradual improvement in the cutting of the file by machinery has taken place, other manufacturers have adopted machinery, and consequently they turn out a larger output during the year, and they look to the Government orders to supply them during the greater part of the year with work.

2675. To come to the question of evasion, what are the particular kinds of method of evasion that you are thinking of?—I will mention first, substituting machine-cut files for hand-cut files.

2676. What had that to do with the rate of wages?—There is a difference in the rate of wages paid.

2677. How does that evade the requirement that the rate of wages paid shall be the current rate?—They were able to evade the Fair Wages Clause in one way, and when they were found out they turned their attention to other parts of the contract under which they thought they could evade it. By certain ingenious methods they are evading the Fair Wages Clause.

2678. It is those methods I want you to describe?—One method consists in sectionising the work similar to our friend Mr. Shaw's case, that is, the lighter part of the work is given to the unskilled man, and the trained workmen have to do the skilled part of the work.

2679. Do you regard that as an evasion of the Clause requiring the current rate to be paid?—Yes, because the money they take off for the unskilled part is greater than it ought to be.

2680. Do you mean that the unskilled man is underpaid?—No, I mean that the masters are pocketing what the skilled men ought to get. They are subtracting from the skilled men's wages something to pay for the unskilled labour.

2681. Why do you object to that?—They are taking too much off.

2682. In principle you do not object to the unskilled man having unskilled work, I suppose?—No, not in principle. If it tends to improve the quality of the file we do not object. The master ought to pay the unskilled man 15 per cent. of the skilled man's wages, if, that is, one unskilled man could do the work necessary to keep six skilled workmen employed. But in point of fact the master is paying the unskilled man only half of what he has taken from the skilled workmen; so he is certainly evading the contract.

2683. Not if he is paying the unskilled man the unskilled rate, is he?—I think so, because he is taking it from the skilled workmen.

2684. Never mind whom he is taking it from. Let us suppose that there is a current rate for those unskilled men, and that there is another current rate for the skilled men. As long as those two rates are being paid it does not matter to you what the employer makes out of it, does it?—But he is taking one wage from the other.

2685. I am assuming that he is paying the current rates to both?—We have not found that to be the case.

2686. He has not done so?—No.

2687. To whom is he not paying the current rate?—To the skilled workmen in the trade.

2688. Are you talking of piece-work or of time-work?—Of piece-work.

2689. Then the skilled man is not getting the proper piece-work rate for what he does; is that it?—That is so, where the work has been sectionised. I have a chart here which I have made, showing the difference between firms who do sectionise and firms who do not. There are only half-a-dozen firms in Sheffield who do sectionise, and it is the largeness of their output which enables them to do so.

2690. How do you arrange your piece-work rate when the sectionising is introduced? I do not see how it works?—The masters simply stop from the skilled workman what they think is the amount.

2691. Give us a concrete example of a file?—Messrs. A. some years ago wanted to sectionise the work; the men did not care about it at that time; they had a most serious objection to it. They brought some unskilled labour into the shop, the one unskilled man practically keeping six machines going, that is, doing the unskilled part of the work for six machines. Instead of stopping one-sixth of the skilled workmen's wages to pay for the unskilled labour, they stopped one-third.

2692. Just give that in a concrete form as applied to files. Do you price files by the dozen?—Yes, and we have a minimum rate of wages.

2693. Per dozen files?—Per dozen files. Each employer as a rule has some little alteration in his shop; some employ a piece-work foreman and some employ a datal foreman, and there are other conditions which make very little difference and to which we have no objection at all.

2694. Take the case of a dozen files?—Messrs. A. and Co. were paying 1s. per dozen for a certain class of files; they introduced this unskilled labour by which one man can serve six machines by doing the unskilled part of the work, and they took from the skilled workman 3d. per dozen, or 25 per cent.

2695. So that he only got 9d. as his share?—He gets 9d. instead of 1s., and the other man may get a datal wage of perhaps £1 per week or something like that.

2696. Then the question arises whether the skilled man makes enough out of his 9d. per dozen to give him the proper rate; is that it?—I hardly follow you.

2697. If the work was not sectionised he would get 1s. per dozen?—Yes.

2698. But the work is sectionised and he gets 9d. as his share, and then 3d. goes to somebody else who does part of the work; is that it?—Only some of the 3d. goes to the other man, but 3d. is deducted by the firm from his wage to pay the other man.

2699. And the other man does not get the whole of the 3d.?—No.

2700. Is your complaint in that case on behalf of the skilled or on behalf of the unskilled man?—On behalf of the skilled man.

2701. You say that 9d. is not as much as he ought to get; is that it?—Yes.

2702. How much ought he to get —Take another firm Messrs. B.; they sectionise and they give the men the benefit—they give the men the whole shilling.

2703. And pay the unskilled man besides?—Yes; they find the advantage, I suppose, in getting a greater output from the machine which partly compensates them for that.

2704. How much ought they to pay the other man?—They pay the other man a similar wage—about 20s. or 22s. per week.

2705. Not by the piece?—No; all these unskilled men are datal as a rule.

2706. At any rate, what you feel is that the result of these processes is that the skilled man does not get as much as he ought?—That is one thing, and the other is that the quality is not turned out equal to the man who does all his own work.

2707. You mean the sectionised file is not as good a file as the other?—No, it is not.

2708. Your complaint, of course, is that the man who makes it does not get as much out of the price as he ought?—Yes, that is so.

2709. That there is an undue amount deducted from him as representing the work that is done for him?—Yes.

2710. Now will you go on to some other form of evasion?—In my proof you will notice, I say, "This particular firm then commenced to lower the rate of wages of the piece-workmen in their file department, and by intimidation coerced the men into accepting the reduced wages." That is a concrete case in regard to Messrs. A. He sent for the men one by one, and got them to sign an agreement to work at a certain rate of wages for a certain period, and those who would not sign had to leave.

2711. Were those men members of one of your Societies?—Most of them were at the time, and in consequence, when we found out the terms, those who kept on we practically debarred from any further benefits of the Union.

2712. In fact, they agreed to accept a lower price for their work?—Yes; a lower price than the current rate in the town.

2713. Have you got any other illustration?—This sectionising also leads a firm to employ girls and boys on work which men ought to do.

2714. Why ought they to do it?—This same firm, Messrs. A., are employing girls and boys at the present time on work which every other firm in the city gives to skilled workmen to do.

2715. But if the girls and boys can do it, why should they not?—If they do it at the expense of the quality?

2716. Do you mean they do not do it as well?—Yes.

2717. Do they do it sufficiently well for the purpose?—I do not think so. I do not think another firm could do it, mind you, because they have not such a large home consumption. If they make a lot of waster files, their firm is large enough to consume a lot of them themselves.

2718. If the people who buy the files are satisfied with the work of the boys and girls, why should you object?—I do not think they are satisfied.

2719. They would make it known if they were not, would they not; they would cease buying them probably?—Not if they can buy them cheaper.

2720. Are they satisfied with them at the price at which they can get them?—Perhaps so, but it is detrimental to the whole trade of the town.

2721. Because it is turning out bad files?—Yes. If I go over into a warehouse, they say "Messrs. A. do them at such a price per dozen; can you not do them at that price?" That is one of the questions put to our men all over the town. It has a tendency to lower the wages all over the town, because they are quoted by others.

2722. And to lower the quality at the same time?—They do not talk about the quality; they expect a good quality at the reduced price.

2723. I thought your objection to the cheap files was that their quality is not as good?—It is not as good.

2724. And yet people think it is?—I do not know that. I think if it is the custom for the Government to accept the lowest tender, then most likely they get it with under-cutting the price.

2725. But probably the Government would not be content to accept a bad article?—We have found it works that way.

2726. Do you think that they do accept a bad article?—Yes, because other firms are copying their example and putting inferior steel in.

2727. That is rather another point; the point you were on was the inferior labour?—Yes, the inferior workmanship.

2728. Will you go on?—We contend that the inferior quality of the steel used combined with inferior workmanship is not compensated for by the slightly increased discount allowed; that is, it is possible for the manufacturer to make a greater profit at 70 per cent. discount than another manufacturer would at 60 per cent. discount, by simply using bad material and under-cutting in wages.

2729. I do not see how the bad material affects it?—If they put in common stuff, they expect to get it cut at a lower price.

2730. Would the labour be less on the common stuff?—It would be no less.

2731. But it would be paid less?—It would not be so good a file, and they know it. You cannot get the same workmanship upon that file as upon a good file; it is impossible to put the same workmanship upon bad steel as upon good steel.

2732. Therefore the price of labour falls with the quality; is that it?—They try to make it fall; but it ought not to fall, because the workman really has to put more work into it.

2733. But of a lower quality?—Of a lower quality.

2734. You think that ought not to be paid at a lower rate?—That is so.

2735. I see that you have some suggestions for meeting the difficulties that you have described; for instance, easier accessibility to the Departments where complaints require to be made?—Yes. We believe the closeness with which the Departments have kept these schedules and other information in times past, has encouraged manufacturers to evade the conditions of the contract. We have had this complaint to make for years, but we have never been able to get a copy of the conditions of contract.

2736. How do the conditions of the contract affect you?—Because they are not paying the current rate of wages in the district.

2737. The contract would not tell you anything more than they are bound to do it, would it?—It would tell us the quality of steel required.

2738. And that would affect the rate of wages?—Yes. They try to make it so, but it ought not to.

2739. Now you want to see the conditions of the contract, particularly as regards the quality of the material to be used?—Yes, that is so.

2740. And then you want a list of the firms who are eligible to tender?—Yes; we think that ought to be supplied at the same time as the schedule.

2741. Then you want a more uniform test of work, you say?—Yes.

2742. What exactly do you mean by that?—Firms can supply bad files under the present test required by the Government Departments. They can have bad files doctored up, and they can pass the tests required by the Departments. We think if the more uniform trade method which is adopted by manufacturers for their own work—their private work—were applied by the Departments, that would tend to keep unscrupulous manufacturers from getting the contracts, if all had to pass the standard test which is recognised by the trade, because the bad files would, of course, be thrown out.

2743. In fact, you think the Government Departments get bad files without knowing it?—I am sure of it. The test which is imposed by the Admiralty is one which can only be applied to certain classes of files. The great majority of files used by them cannot really pass this test because of their shape and formation.

2744. Do you mean that they pass files which do not pass the test?—Yes, because the method of testing is rather cumbersome and cannot be applied to small files.

2745. They either take the files without testing them, or apply a test which is not suitable?—Yes. The only test required according to the contract is one which is unsuitable in our opinion. The War Office adopt a different method of testing, and one really more in conformity with the town method; but still that is not sufficient. They only insist upon them ringing true and clear; that is, without any fracture in them.

2746. Have you ever seen any of these Government tests applied?—No, never; but it describes how they shall be tested in the conditions of the contract.

2747. And you think that is an unsuitable test?—I do.

2748. What is the object of this proposal of yours that a paper should be issued annually to a responsible working foreman, on which he should be instructed to give a report on the working qualities of the files supplied; is that part of the test which you would suggest?—Yes. I think it would be a very fair test. I do not think the heads of departments know the quality of the work which is supplied to them from time to time. They have to depend on their subordinates in the workshops to complain, and if the complaint does not reach them, or is not strong enough, they simply do not know. I do not blame the heads of the departments at all.

2749. Do you think they depend on their working foremen too much?—I think if they were supplied with annual returns by their foremen in the various depots, they would gather a better idea of the quality of the files which have been used during the last 12 months before they place another contract.

2750. Your next suggestion is something about marking?—Yes, about marking it "Best crucible cast steel." One condition of the contracts requires that the best crucible cast steel shall be used in the manufacture of files. From some investigations we have made, we know that certain firms that are on the list do not use what is known as crucible steel. Of course, we have no definite knowledge of the testing of Government work, or of the steel that has been handed in to the Government department; so we cannot say whether the Government have accepted those files.

2751. Finally, your last suggestion is that when a complaint has been made, the department concerned should make an inquiry; that is generally done now, is it not?—Yes; but we want to point out what form the inquiry should take.

2752. What do you suggest?—Where a standard rate is adopted by the Employers' Federation and the Trade Union, they should recognise that rate. Where there is no standard rate, then they should recognise the current rate of wages paid. In my proof I go on further to show how that current rate of wages is to be obtained—by the firm in dispute naming three firms, and the Trade Union naming three other firms, and the average price paid by those firms to be recognised as the current rate of wages in the district.

2753. That would make the current rate depend upon these six firms, would it not?—Yes; six firms which are picked out, of course.

2754. Do you think that would be a good workable arrangement?—Yes, I think it would. But, of course, where sectionising is carried on by a firm complained of, any sectionising that tends to improve the quality should be allowed for. We are quite prepared to allow a discount for any sectionising that improves the quality of the file.

2755. Or does not impair it?—Yes. One method of sectionising, which does not improve the quality of the file and which debars men from becoming competent, is in the sharpening of the chisel. Where that is done the man who is cutting the files has perhaps to waste a number at a time, because the man who is working the machine puts the chisel in that is given to him, and whether it is suitable for smooth work or other work is left to the knowledge of the man who sharpens the chisel, although he does not know the quality of the steel that is being used for the particular file.

2756. I think I have dealt with all your suggestions, have I not?—Yes, with all the suggestions. I have a paragraph in my proof dealing with the attitude of the trade towards Government contracts. There are many firms who do not bother about them. There are many firms which are on the Government list that I do not think care about tendering, if they do tender at all, because the prices have been cut so low that it is impossible for them to pay the current rate of wages and supply good material at the same time—it is impossible at the prices.

2757. I gather that you think that the material is deteriorating generally?—It has to a certain extent.

2758. And that in that way the best firms have been cut out of the business?—They have been cut out entirely. I mention two firms, one of them being the largest manufacturers of files in Sheffield, and they are not on the list; then there is the second firm, whose head is the Master Cutler at the present time, and they are not on the list. On this chart I show they are paying above the minimum price recognised by us.

2759. Let me look at your chart for a moment?—(Handing same.) You will also see that the firms who are on the list are paying below.

2760. What conclusions do you draw from this diagram? For instance, I see one firm which is on the list and another firm which is not, which seem both to be much the same?—Yes, that is so.

2761. Then what is the conclusion that you want us to draw?—I drew that to show that the firms who are on the list could afford to pay the same wages as those who are not on the list.

2762. These two firms do pay substantially the same?—Yes.

2763. And your point is that other people might do the same?—Yes.

2764. But do not?—But do not. The cost of the material is such a great item in the production of a file that it is the weak place, as you may see. Ten per cent. off the man in our trade would practically only mean 2 per cent. off the net cost of the file as supplied to the Departments; but 10 per cent. off the material would be equal perhaps to 3 or 4 per cent. off the net cost. There is as much paid for material as for labour nearly in the file.

2765. It is about half and half, is it?—Yes, that is, with good material. Consequently, it being such a large item in the production of the file, they have flown to that to make what reductions they could, at the same time taking it out of the men.

2766. In fact, the wages go down with the deterioration in the material?—Yes, we have found that to be so.

2767. (Mr. De la Bère.) I suppose your difficulties really arise from the change through which the file trade is passing? You are actually being transformed from a hand-trade to a machine-trade, are you not?—That is so. Another thing is that the machine runs at about one-third of the hand-cutting price, and that means that all the reductions at one time were being made upon the hand-cutting in order to compete with the machine. Now the machines are preponderating, and they are trying to take it out of the machine-price.

2768. What I mean is, you have not yet succeeded in adjusting yourselves to the new state of things, both as regards the employers and the employed?—We proposed that idea to the employers some time ago, but they told us that the time was not quite ripe to adjust our price list yet. They will not recognise a standard percentage taken off the hand-cutting list until the improvements in machinery come to a standstill practically. As I have said, we were quite prepared some time ago to submit that to the employers.

2769. When you come to an agreement of that sort based on the new conditions, things will be very much easier, I suppose—I mean many of these difficulties you refer to will not arise?—I think they would with certain employers.

2770. But not with others?—No, not with others.

2771. I suppose the improvements in the machinery are still going on?—Yes, but I think they are coming to a conclusion now, and that they have got about to the height.

2772. The tendency is, I suppose, for the machines to become lighter and more easily managed, and altogether more practical?—The tendency of the machines is that they are doing smaller work than has been done before, but that requires as much skill of course.

2773. That would rather favour the employment of women and girls on them, would it not?—To an extent it would on small work.

2774. Is the trade being gradually concentrated at Sheffield?—No. The employment of gas engines and the use of motors has a tendency for manufacturers outside Sheffield to employ workmen at their own places. It is spread out now, and there are a lot of blank files going out from Sheffield ready for cutting.

2775. As regards the materials, are not many of the larger Sheffield file makers also manufacturers of their own steel?—That is so. That is where we have had a difficulty in getting to know what kind of steel has been used.

2776. What is your precise object in getting to know what is the exact description of steel which has been used?—We thought the Government ought to have the steel that is required, and that so long as they want crucible cast steel, we say they ought to have it. If they want inferior steel, let them put it in the contract. Other manufacturers are being debarred who would not care to put inferior steel under the present contracts.

2777. Of course, these makers who make their own steel make crucible steel among other sorts of steel?—Yes. Many firms use several grades of steel. The firm I work for uses three classes of steel in the production of files.

2778. Are you quite sure that the Government specifications require the use of crucible cast steel?—Yes; they distinctly say so in the contract, and the difference in the price of the steel of itself accounts for the best quality. The cost of the material for files, that is the best crucible cast steel in the ingot, runs to £22 per ton, and the inferior qualities run from £12 to £16 per ton. The Siemens-Martin steel runs from £7 15s. to £8 10s. per ton.

2779. Perhaps the point is not really very material, but a great many of the War Office requirements of files are for "best cast steel," and it is not crucible steel that is asked for?—The War Office use a definition which has a very wide meaning, and allows them to substitute inferior steel. All steel is cast whether it is inferior or the best, and by insisting upon "cast steel" only, manufacturers can say they are not evading that condition, because they are supplying cast steel. The definition there is too wide.

2780. (Mr. De la Bère.) Is it the custom in the general trade to make a closer definition than that?

2781. (Mr. Shaw.) It is understood in Sheffield amongst the workers in the steel trade—amongst the cutlers and amongst the employers generally—that when cast steel is spoken of it means crucible cast steel. That is understood generally all through the town.

2782. (Mr. De la Bère.) That may be, but there is a difference, I think, in the technical wording; the specification, in point of fact, is not worded "best crucible cast steel"?—No; and that is where they can evade, in my opinion, one of the conditions of the contract, because it is too wide a definition.

2783. Then as regards the War Office tests, you are not satisfied with the existing tests?—No; but I am more satisfied with them than with the Admiralty tests, though the War Office tests are not quite sufficient, in my opinion.

2784. I take it you are going into these points, let me say, more from a patriotic motive than from considerations of your own interests?—Yes, that is so, so that eventually trade should get into the hands of the firms who are doing the best work. While you want the best work, you ought to have it. We have found this, on investigation, that the firms who evade one condition of the contract are ready enough to evade others, if they have the chance; if they are willing to pay less wages, they are willing also, at the same time, to use less steel.

2785. (Chairman.) Your primary interest in the use of the good steel is, however, a wages question, is it not?—Inferior steel requires more working upon than good steel, in order to produce a good tool from it. While they use the argument from the manufacturers' point of view that inferior steel is easier to work, it is not our point of view, and we think that the rate ought to be the same at least for bad material as for good.

2786. But I think you said to me that your primary interest in it was due to the fact that the wages were apt to fall where the inferior steel was used?—The rate has a tendency to fall.

2787. I think you said it fell at the same time as the deterioration in the material went on, and that one produced the other?—Yes, it has a tendency to produce it in that way.

2788. (Mr. Wilson Fox.) About this sectionising; I suppose that among your reasons for objecting to sectionising generally, one is the fear of a reduction of the number of skilled men in the industry, and another is the fear of the rates of wages being lowered?—Yes; that is the main reason.

2789. If those two elements are absent, and supposing you had no fears of that sort, would you still object to sectionising?—Not where the tendency is to improve the quality of the file.

2790. Take the firm or the firms which you have mentioned where they put unskilled men on machines and make no reduction at all in the skilled men's rates——?—Excuse me, I did not say that they put unskilled men on the machines; the unskilled men look after the preparatory work for the machines.

2791. At any rate, they put unskilled men on to do some of the work that skilled men were doing, and they did not reduce the skilled men's wages at all?—That is it.

2792. That is almost equivalent to a rise in wages to those skilled men?—Yes.

2793. Because they are being paid the same weekly money for doing less work?—Yes.

2794. In cases of that sort, would you object on principle to sectionising?—No, we do not object on principle to sectionising.

2795. Where the element is absent of your fear of a reduction of the number of skilled men in the trade, and also of your fear of a tendency to reduce wages, you would not object to sectionising?—No, because the sectionising by that particular firm does not interfere with the skilled part of the work.

2796. Still, on the other hand, supposing that the employers had taken off money from the skilled men, in that case you would object; and you would object on the ground, I understand, that they were reducing their skilled men's wages?—We should not object to a reasonable reduction.

2797. You would not?—No. I have allowed for a reasonable reduction upon that chart.

2798. Your general fear is a matter of principle that if they introduced unskilled men into the doing of certain portions of the work, that might be taken advantage of, and the tendency might be to reduce unduly the skilled men's wages?—It may be.

2799. You are afraid of introducing that principle because of those possible results?—We only object where the sectionising goes too far.

2800. Exactly; but there are cases where you say sectionising does not do any harm to the quality of the particular implement they are making?—Yes.

2801. Of course, that might be a very controversial subject, as between the employers and the employed, because the Trade Union might say that it does do harm to the production of the particular article?—Yes.

2802. And that would be a difficult question to settle, probably, in some cases?—Yes.

2803. You say in your proof, "Where sectionising is carried on by a firm complained of, any sectionising that tends to improve the quality of the files should be allowed for"; the question whether it improved the quality might be a very controversial matter between you and the firm, might it not?—That would be so, I am afraid, with certain firms, but not with others.

2804 Then you say you might get at the current rate of wages by taking six reputable firms, three chosen by the employers and three chosen by the workpeople. Do you think it would always be in your interest to do it in that way, and not to take the rate paid to the majority of men in the trade? Might it not conceivably be against your interests in certain cases?—No, I do not think so.

2805. You, naturally, would probably take three firms paying the highest, or somewhere near the highest, and I do not blame you for that, I am sure?—Yes.

2806. And the employers, probably, might take three firms who were paying somewhere near or below the average of the whole district?—I do not think there would be any reputable firm that would pay much below.

2807. I am only putting it to you that I can myself conceive cases where you might, perhaps, get more by finding out what the majority of the men in the district were paying?—How would you arrive at that matter?

2808. By taking all the firms. I do not say it is a better method; only it has been suggested in this room by various representatives that you should take all the firms in the district, and then take as the current rate the rate which the majority of men in the district have been found to be paid. I only put it to you that that suggestion has been made, because your suggestion is rather a new one?—I think that suggestion of ours would quite answer our purposes; we should get the benefit out of it.

2809. (Mr. Black.) Do you think the employers would like that arrangement, speaking from your general experience of them?—We have had very little trouble with them, except with two or three firms. They are below the current rate, and they could not take anybody lower than themselves.

2810. I suppose, apart from these points that you are raising now, you have not put many complaints before the Public Departments, have you, in regard to the wages in the file trade?—No. The difficulty has been in getting hold of the contracts, so as to know what we wanted to base our complaints upon. We have had these complaints ready to make for some time.

2811. You must have known what rates of wages were being paid?—We did not know the exact wording of the Fair Wages Clause.

2812. Did you not?—No. I have applied to the gentleman who was secretary of the Trades Council before Mr. Holmshaw. He represented the hand-file cutters at the time. I do not say there was apathy shown by him, but it was very awkward to get information, and until you were kind enough to send me a copy of the contract, we were not able to know the conditions upon which the contract was given out.

2813. Still the text of the House of Commons Resolution is pretty well known on which those wages clauses are based, it it not?—Yes, but we did not know the exact words of it. It implies competent workmen.

2814. In your Proof, you speak of firms being on our list "who seem to be on for no other purpose than to advertise the fact with a view of obtaining orders from other sources, as they could not by any means execute a contract or even a substantial part of one without outside aid." What is the outside aid you are referring to there particularly; is it the pro viding of the steel itself?—No. I mean they would have to get the files cut elsewhere; there are some firms on the list who do not manufacture files.

2815. Then what processes do they carry out?—They might supply the raw material; that would be all.

2815*a*. But they do not carry out any part of the manufacture of the file?—No. They factor their files. They may supply the raw material, but I could not say whether they do so or not.

2816. Are you sure that is the case with certain firms on the list?—Yes.

2817. I think you say you have not seen the tests which are made by the Admiralty?—Yes.

2818. So I need not go into that; but I want you to understand this, that we do have tests of the files in use at the dockyards; I do not want you to assume, because there is only one test mentioned in the contract, that that is the only test that a file must stand, because it has still to be shown to be a good file and fit for use?—The test in the contract seems so out of place to anybody in the trade. There is no other body I know of who buys files who requires the same test.

2819. Still, we are not precluded from putting other tests when we examine those files at the dockyards, and, as a matter of fact, we do put other tests. Is there a legitimate field for women's employment in some parts of the file-making trade? With reference to the two firms of a world-wide reputation that you speak of in your Proof and that you rather recommend, I fancy I have seen a great many women employed at one?—Yes, but they are employed on very small work, which they used to do by hand before the machines became general.

2820. You do not object to women's labour going as far as that?—No. It is when they are given men's work, that is, the larger files to cut, the 12-inch and 14-inch files, and when they have to do the overcutting; that is what we object to.

2821. (Mr. Hillier.) You referred to a price of 1s. per dozen being paid for cutting certain files, and you said as a result of sectionising the work, 3d. per dozen was taken off; does part of that 3d., do you think, go towards providing the machinery or other appliances that the manufacturer has to provide?—No; that is all done in the first place; before the initial price is fixed, all allowances are made.

2822. But when you bring in the unskilled labourer to help the skilled man by doing certain of the rough work, is there not any extra machinery required for that?—No.

2823. None?—A small emery wheel is used in some cases, which of course is not very expensive—it only costs a few shillings.

The witness withdrew.

Mr. Walter Crofts, called and examined.

2824. (Chairman.) You are the Secretary of the Table and Butcher Knife Hafters' Trade Society, I understand?—Yes.

2825. You have got three cases, I think, to bring forward of the difficulties which you have experienced in dealing with the Fair Wages Clause?—Yes.

2826. What is the point of the first one?—We put forward a claim for 3s. 10d. per dozen being paid for hafting cooks' forks for the Admiralty, and I may say as showing the stamp of workman who works on this particular thing, that the firm in question offered to their own workers 1s. 6d. per dozen, which, by the way, is a ridiculous proposal. They found an outworker who did a few of them, and then either gave it up, or the firm did not give him any more—I am not sure which, but I am certain that he could not have earned any sort of wage whatever at it. After complaint to the Admiralty, the Admiralty raised the price from 1s. 6d. to 2s. 6d.—an advance of 1s. on the price offered by the firm. What we differ from is that they say that a standard higher than that paid by the general public should not be set up for Admiralty contracts. We did not attempt to set up a standard higher than that paid for these forks generally in the district. The Admiralty say, "Moreover, it does not appear equitable that prices which would be fair for hafting a small quantity, say, a dozen forks, should be made to apply to a large quantity." I work on this class of work, and the firm at which I work is a firm on the Government list. I am not troubled with oddments, that is, the firm work on the principle of stock, and I will get six dozen or a gross of knives to haft or what not, and those would be stocked, and as the orders come in in dozens or half-dozens they are taken from the shelves of stock and dispatched. It is very rarely that I have to do the very small quantities, but nothing is taken off my prices on account of that, and if it were, I should object and so would the other workmen object. Therefore, we repudiate that any difference should be made. I say as a practical man that I could not to any material extent increase my wage by working on larger quantities. In the first place, it might be said that I already do that, seeing that we work on the principle of stock. The second case that I have is a complaint about a cook knife. We claimed 4s. 8d. per dozen for hafting, and the firm in question were paying 3s. 2d. The Admiralty decided against us. I am not here to differ with that decision at all, that is, as a decision, but that same knife has been done at considerably less than the 3s. 2d. paid for since then, and it has been through the lack of accurate information that I have not taken any steps to try and prevent the decline in prices. I believe there is one firm—I can only say I believe, though I have a strong belief—that have actually done this knife at 1s. 9d. That is altogether beside the point, in our opinion, as 1s. 9d. would not come up to the average or anything like the average of prices.

2827. (Mr. Wilson Fox.) Have the men complained in that case?—No, the men have not complained. I got my information, as a matter of fact, after the order (which, by the way, was not a large one) was completed, and when it was too late to take any steps.

2828. (Chairman.) Your point in this case is that though less than the current rate was being paid, you could not identify the fact?—No; I could not have sworn to it.

2829. I do not know that anything we can do will remedy that for you, will it?—The proposals put forward by our Secretary, Mr. Holmshaw, would remedy that to some extent.

2830. By giving you the names of the firms?—Yes. I did not even know where that order had gone to.

2831. Now for your third case?—You will see in my proof the letter sent to the Admiralty, the prices quoted by us at the interview with the representative of the Admiralty, and the prices paid by the firm in question, these being less than had been previously paid by this firm. This firm had paid 2s. 5d. previous to this contract.

2832. (Mr. Black.) Was it 2s. 5d. or 2s. 4d.?—Would you follow me here very carefully? In the first place it was 2s. 5d.; then the firm got an order for forks only, and they paid on the order for forks only 1s. 1d. per dozen for the hafting. After that they got an order for both knives and forks; they lifted the forks ½d. per dozen in price, and called it 1s. 1½d., and they dropped the knives from the 1s. 3d., which they had paid, to 1s. 2d., which was a reduction on both the ½d. per dozen knives and forks.

2833. But by agreement with their workpeople in each case?—That may be so; but is it not the fact that the Fair Wages Resolution of the House of Commons was passed with a view of protecting the trade in any particular district in a general sense, and not of benefiting anyone who could get at any so-called private agreement between themselves and their own particular workmen—and I may say it was only a section of the workmen.

2834. (Chairman.) You object, in fact, to the answer that you got from the Admiralty that this rate was agreed upon between the employer and the workmen?—Yes.

2835. Your point being that it was not agreed upon by the workmen generally, is that it?—Our point is given in the language of my closing remarks—"We therefore respectfully call the attention of the Committee to this letter. If the workmen, or a portion of them, at any particular firm, expressing their satisfaction with the rate of wages paid, irrespective of prices paid by other firms in the district, is to be considered as satisfactory evidence of compliance with the Fair Wages Clause of the conditions of contract, then, in our opinion, some reform is needed."

2836. (Mr. Black.) On this question of a different rate for bulk orders, as compared with small orders, I gather that you do not admit that?—No.

2837. I think, in effect, you do, by conceding the first paragraph of the Admiralty letter in each of those cases, do you not? that is to say, you began, in the first case, by claiming 3s. 10d. as reasonable, but you do not now challenge the half-a-crown that the Admiralty settled in that case?—I may say we do challenge the half-a-crown.

2838. You did not prove 3s. 10d. was the standard agreed rate, and now you confine your criticism entirely to paragraph 2 of the Admiralty letter of November 17th, 1904?—Yes.

2839. But you began by asking 3s. 10d., and you now apparently accept the rate of 2s. 6d.?—No, I do not accept the rate of 2s. 6d.

2840. But you do not challenge it, on the face of what you bring forward here?—No; that is true.

2841. Now let me take you to your second case. You began with 4s. 8d., and you do not challenge the 3s. 2d. that the Admiralty settled was a fair rate, but you are now complaining that some firms have dropped as low as 1s. 9d. Therefore, in each of those two cases, I think you do really concede the point, because what we found in both cases was that 3s. 10d. in the first was the current rate for small orders, and the 4s. 8d. in the second had been paid on the sample dozen, but had never been a current rate; for the sample dozen, when it was a new pattern, 4s. 8d. was the agreed price, but it was never the customary rate for any large quantity?—You are now speaking of the second case with reference to Messrs. B. and Co.?

2842. I am really taking your first two cases?—With respect to the first case, I do not concede the point. In the second case I do, but I maintain as a practical man working at this particular class of work, that there ought to be no difference between these two. The knife has a bolster on, but the fork is without that, and that necessitates shaping the tang; while the knife has the tang shaped, the fork wants it shaped, so it works one equal with the other.

2843. I do not think that really touches my point, that you began by saying 4s. 8d., and now I think you would be very well content if you were able to maintain the 3s. 2d.?—I should be more satisfied with the 4s. 8d.

2844. Our argument is that the rates of 3s. 10d. and 4s. 8d. had been assessed on small quantities in the first case, and on the first sample dozen in the second case, and therefore never had been paid as the current rate?—I may say that I could give evidence where men do this class of work and get far higher prices than the 4s. 8d. I am now speaking of firms who do a few dozens, because these never come in in very large quantities, even from the Admiralty, or they have not done up to the present. Some of the firms pay as much as 6s. and 7s. per dozen for the hafting. We have taken evidence, and we have found very few below, and that there are some of the first-rate firms who pay from 5s. to 7s. or more.

2845. I think we, on our side, found a great many firms—and good firms too—who tendered on the basis of 2s. 6d., but we did not accept that, instead we accepted 3s. 2d. as the fair standard. But there was a wide difference between that and the majority of the tenders which were based on 2s. 6d.?—I may say here on the evidence that I have gathered since I was secretary (and I was not secretary when the complaint came forward) that I should be pleased if it had not got below that 3s. 2d.; and further, I may say, though I do not know whether it would be fair to put it in evidence, that the firm of whom we complain here are sore about our complaining respecting the prices paid by them and not complaining to the Department respecting other firms who have paid less.

2846. I can quite understand that?—The reason that it has come about is because, as I say, I have not had the evidence on which to come to the Department. I could not come to the Department and say: "Will you kindly make inquiries; I believe so-and-so is doing this at so-and-so."

2847. Taking your third case, you did not, I think, prove to us that firms had actually agreed and accepted those rates of 2s. 8d. that were mentioned by you to the inspector sent down by the Admiralty?—Yes.

2848. From some independent inquiries he made, he verified some as actually paid, but he found differences on many of the others; and he went, I may tell you, to other firms and found that other rates below these were being paid. Then there is a further point you do not dwell upon, and that is that there is a difference between the different firms in what is known as the facilities afforded?—What are they?

2849. I think I have got a note of them here if you want them. Would you mind telling me what are the ordinary facilities for piece-work?—The ordinary facilities for piece-work are that a man is provided with power and a bench—side room, as we call it—for which he pays rent varying anything from 9d. to 1s. to as high as 1s. 6d. per week. Then the man as a rule finds his own tools; that is not quite universal, but more of the men find their own tools, and some also a portion of the working material. For instance, men find their own pin-wire—that is a general rule; there are one or two exceptions, but they are very exceptional—and they find their own rosin for the fastening of the handle.

2850. Supposing that the firm provides and keeps up the glazing wheels, including the provision of glue and emery, the buffing wheels with their leather covers, and the polishing locks or dollies, and supposing the men have the advantage of buying waster files from the firms; are not these rather additional items to what you have mentioned?—They are additional items, but, still, these men pay rent. I may say that some of our tools are fairly long lived. The longer a glazer lasts, the better it is for us; so long as it does not get out of order, it gets better with wear.

2851. Those items might make a difference of ½d. or 1d. per dozen pairs. I think when we investigated the actual rates paid, going over a wider range of firms than you gave us, and allowing for these facilities, we found that it was a fair average in this case, or very nearly a fair average, and that it was one which was assessed by the workmen themselves without any pressure from the employers; the men preferred it, and they did not apparently thank you for taking up their case?—No, probably not in the case of those men that you saw, for the simple reason that they are frightened of losing the order. I suppose every body of workmen at every individual firm have the same fear of losing their employment.

2852. What do you think would be a fair weekly average for a man to earn at your trade generally?—36s. per week for men fully employed on ordinary work, at fair firms, apart from Government work. That refers only to this branch of the trade known as "oval hands."

2853. Would you think if these people were earning 36s. per week they were not doing badly?—If it came out to 36s. I should not think so.

2854. It came out at more than 36s.?—Of course, I wish you to remember the hours. Did you make inquiry into the hours they worked?

2855. Yes, we did?—What hours did they work?

2856. I have not got a note of it, but we did inquire into that, and we also inquired as to the weekly wage that the men were getting on general private work. It was nothing like 36s.; in fact, we had an admission from a trade secretary in a previous case of a considerably lower figure than that?—It may be so in some cases, because you must remember that our men sometimes suffer from such a thing as shortness of work. Was that taken into account? For instance, even to-day, if you inquired into the average earnings of a man it would not come out at 36s.

2857. That is what these men said, I think. They were very well content when they were on a job that was giving them a good deal more than 36s.?—It would not follow that they would earn, say, their 6s. per day.

2858. The rate came out considerably over 36s. in those cases?—But is it altogether a question of the rate of day-wages? Was the information that we gave so far wrong? For instance, there are two firms whose men objected very strongly to the prices that we put forward.

2859. But some of them do not care about the other class of work. They say it is a dirtier class of work than they are ordinarily accustomed to, and that accounts sometimes for the kind of choking-off price quoted by some of those big firms?—I do not know about a choking-off price; of course, I do not pretend to know that.

2860. There are some firms who do not particularly want that kind of work, or whose workmen do not particularly want it; therefore they say: If we take it we will only take it at a really high rate; so that you cannot take their figure as in any sense an agreed rate?—I know this, that other manufacturers have expressed to me their disappointment at their small chance of getting Government orders. Not long ago one met me in the street and said that he had applied for a Government order, and all he heard was, "Your tender received with thanks." So far as my information goes, that particular firm has really tried to enter into competition with the idea of getting orders.

2861. I did not quite catch what you said—that his tender was simply declined with thanks?—Yes.

2862. That happens to a large number of competitors for every contract?—I may say that one firm sent for me, and asked about the firm mentioned in my case. That case was complicated by the schedules for another order coming out before this case was settled; but two other firms, the case being, as we may say, sub judice, promised to come up to the price which was asked for by us.

2863. This was not a case where you had signed a scheduled rate for that particular knife, was it? This was comparatively a new pattern knife, differing from the trade article—differing slightly, at any rate?—I may say that we have hundreds of patterns in our trade—that is the worst of it. There is the question of the handle, the bolster, the pins—for instance, is it to be a flushed bolster, or what not, or is it to be two pins instead of one pin, and so on.

2864. And all these little points have to be considered in the schedule rate for each particular pattern?—Yes. I do not assume for a moment that one price would suit all, by any means. Our prices range widely, especially in a particular line—so widely that people will scarcely credit it and scarcely recognise the difference in the worth of two similar articles.

2865. (Mr. King.) Is it not the fact that you have no agreed rates with the employers in your trade?—So far as agreed rates are concerned, we have a price list, which I have with me; but I am afraid that if you gentlemen spend your time upon it, it would be very much like Greek and Latin would be to us, because our prices are reckoned one article from the other—so much extra for this, so much extra for that, and so much extra for the other; on that we build up one price.

2866. I asked that only because in your statement you say, "We claim so-and-so," and you do not say "The recognised rate is so-and-so"; in each case you say, "We claim this." I want to know whether there is a recognised rate?—We went on the average price that had been paid.

2867. But it was proved not to be the average; and I do not know whether it was a recognised rate, or merely a rate fixed by yourselves?—It was not a recognised rate; we were claiming the rate that had been paid previously.

2868. Which you thought had been paid?—Which had been paid. This has been paid, and that I am absolutely certain, and I could produce the men who have drawn the money for it.

The witness withdrew.

NINTH DAY,

Thursday, 30th January, 1908.

At 32, Great George Street, Westminster, S.W.

PRESENT:

Sir GEORGE H. MURRAY, K.C.B. (Chairman).

Mr. R. Bailey, M.V.O.
Mr. F. W. Black.
Mr. H. De la Bère, C.B.
Mr. J. H. Hillier.
Mr. A. F. King.
Mr. J. J. Wills (Secretary).

Mr. John Templeton and Mr. George Simpson, called and examined.

2869. (Chairman.) (To Mr. Templeton.) You are the General Secretary of the Scottish Typographical Association, I think?—(Mr. Templeton.) Yes.

2870. And what are you, Mr. Simpson?—(Mr. Simpson.) I am a member of the Committee of the Edinburgh branch of the Scottish Typographical Association.

2871. Does the Scottish Typographical Association cover the whole of Scotland?—(Mr. Templeton.) Yes.

2872. Have you many branches?—Thirty-two. I might explain that while there are only 32 branches, in several instances a few towns where they are small are grouped into one branch.

2873. How many members have you got?—4,500, roughly speaking.

2874. You have, I suppose, agreed rates of wages with the employers?—Yes.

2875. Is there an association of employers?—In some places there is, in some places there is not.

2876. I suppose that where there is an association you have agreed with the association, and that where there is not an association you have agreed with individual employers?—Yes; there is a mutual understanding as to wages framed one way or the other with the employers.

2877. And that is the case all over?—Yes, all over.

2878. Have you found that the Fair Wages Clause has done you any good?—No.

2879. Things are just where they were?—Yes, so far as Scotland is concerned.

2880. What is it that you complain of chiefly in the working of the Clause?—The chief cause of complaint is that our members do not get the work to do at all practically. It is done by cheap female labour—that is the difficulty.

2881. But where your men are employed, are they getting the agreed rate?—Yes, outside Edinburgh. We have Government work produced in quite a number of our branches, where they are being paid the fair rate of the district in which it is being produced. The under-paying is confined to Edinburgh, so far as we know.

2882. Are there cases in which your men are working at less than the agreed rate?—None.

2883. Then what is it that you complain of?—The work being given to females to be produced at a cheap rate.

2884. I began by asking whether, when they were employed, your members got the current or agreed rate?—Yes, whenever they produce this work, they do.

2885. What you complain of is that other people are introduced who are getting another rate?—Yes, cheap labour.

2886. That is mostly women, is it?—Almost entirely women.

2887. That has grown a good deal in Scotland in the last few years, has it not?—Only in Edinburgh.

2888. This complaint only applies to Edinburgh, then?—Yes. I might explain—as it might be information to the Committee—that we had a very serious rupture in Edinburgh in 1872. That was a rupture betwixt employer and employee, and it was before my own day. The rupture was very keen at that time. It lasted for some three months, and the local branch funds were entirely depleted, so then they had to come in and take whatever terms they could get. The employers took the opportunity then and rushed in a lot of females, starting them then. The local people being depleted in funds were unable to resist this introduction of females, and since then they have never been able to cope with the question. The Society is now split into two sections, the compositors forming one section and the machine men forming another, and neither body during these years has been able to deal with the question in any way. That is the reason why the females are in Edinburgh.

2889. The introduction of female labour, you say, dates from about 1872?—Yes.

2890. Are the women organised?—No.

2891. Is there no sort of organisation?—No. It has been attempted times without number, but without success.

2892. Are they mostly girls or adults?—They are mostly girls.

2893. What are they employed on?—On all classes of Government work.

2894. And other work?—Yes, on some other work.

2895. Both machining and composing?—No, only composing. When I say only composing it is with a reservation—they work the monotype machine in setting the type—not in actual printing, but in setting the type.

2896. Is the machining properly so-called done exclusively by male labour?—Yes. There is no complaint as regards the machinery; it is done by male labour, and in the majority of instances paid over the local recognised rate of wages.

2897. Your complaint is that the composing is done by girls and women?—Yes.

2898. Why do you object to their doing it?—We do not object to women as women by any means; we simply object to their doing it at an unfair rate of wage. I might put it this way: Take the sasines, for instance. They have a girl to set a hundred lines and she is paid 1s. 9d. for that; but if a man set the same thing he would get 2s. 9d.

2899. Are they paid by the piece, then?—In some instances the females are paid by the piece similar to the males. I am taking this as a concrete case. In setting up sasines, as I say, a girl would only get 1s. 9d. for setting one hundred lines, whereas a man would get 2s. 9d. I would like to add that the injustice to the printer in London, where the Government work is mainly produced, is made all the greater, because the minimum local wage in Edinburgh is 32s., and in London it is 39s.; so that there is to start with a difference of 7s. in the wages without interfering with the male labour.

2900. What would your members earn in the week at piece-work at that rate of 2s. 9d.?—It is a very difficult thing to average. It has been all through openly said, "See that the girls are kept employed, and the men may starve if they like!" The girls get the work while the work is there, and the male piece-workers in Edinburgh only get, as it were, the crumbs that fall from the girls' table. The girls get all the work, and the men are thrown into the street. We have spent thousands of pounds of out-of-work money in Edinburgh owing to the girls being there.

2901. Your claim is that if a woman does the same work as a man in the same time, she should be paid the same rate?—Exactly so.

2902. You would not admit that there would be a current rate for women, differing from the current rate for men, then?—There has never been such a thing in existence to my knowledge.

2903. And you would object to it, even if there was? Take this case: Supposing these women were organised, and supposing that their organisation agreed to a lower rate than the men are getting, would you still object to it?—That is a question which it would be impossible to answer. We know the impossibility of it. We have an apprenticeship of seven years to begin with, but 99 out of every 100 of these girls when they go to the trade expect that they will be married before that time passes. They have no intention of relying on the trade, and, of course, they will not join any Union. There is not a girl who goes to the trade with the idea that she is going to earn her bread in it. That is the difference betwixt a girl and a boy, that the girl goes simply for the time being and the boy goes to it for a living. So the employer simply sets her to the case to set up close matter. If you take her away outside of that, she is not a compositor in any sense of the word, and she has no intention of ever becoming one, and she will not apply her mind to it, because she is only there for the moment. But the boy knows that he has got to be there all his life, and he has got to pay attention. So it is impossible to organise the females, from the very fact that you could not get them to undertake to serve any apprenticeship. The employers do not want that either; they simply want to introduce this cheap labour to answer their purpose for the time being.

2904. What I wanted to get at rather was your view on the question of principle. I should think that organisation of women was not so wholly impossible as you seem to think; but assuming for the moment that it is possible, and that they did agree, as they probably would, to work for a lower rate than a man, what would you say to that?—Personally, I should be opposed to them working for less than a man if they did the same work as a man.

2905. Do you think, on principle, that you could object to their doing it?—Very often principle is laid aside in these things. For instance, when a lady passed for the Bar, although she did not want to work for under-pay at all, she was not admitted, and the result is she cannot practise. That is what happened in the legal profession, and we say what is good in one case is good in the other. Self-protection is the first law of nature. In our case, if the women would not go to work at a penny less, we would have no objection to them; but we certainly think that when a man has learnt a trade, when he has got the responsibility of a family to rear, that man is entitled to some protection against cheap labour, so that he may have what he has spent his life on. Apart from cheap labour, female labour does not exist in our trade.

2906. I suppose you would agree that the work is suitable work for women?—No, I do not. The scourge of our trade has been, all through life, phthisis. Our death-rate has been very heavy, though of recent years it is not quite so heavy; and we cannot exactly focus the consequences when it comes to females who are there for a few years leaving with the germs of the disease in their system. People talk of the degeneracy of the race, but by these means this disease of phthisis is spread all over, and we have no way of focusing it and confining it at all. It is admitted by all that the trade is an unhealthy trade—it cannot be otherwise because of the lead poisoning. Quite recently we had two men off the "Glasgow Mail" with lead poisoning.

2907. Is it a more unhealthy trade for women than men?—Women constitutionally are not so strong to stand it as men are. In the ordinary way, where girls are employed, you have to provide them with seats, but such a thing never happens with males—they have to stand. When a girl is made to stand one day, she cannot stand the next, her back gives way and she cannot do it—Nature revolts against it herself. For these reasons, and for medical reasons, we are opposed to female labour in our trade, because we think it is not a trade for them. Still we have no objection to them if the employers want them and pay them fair. If a girl does the same work as a man, she is entitled to the same rate of wages, if it is to be fair wages at all.

2908. Some of the reasons you have suggested might account for her being paid at a lower rate, might they not?—It might if she was paid a stab rate of wages; that is, a weekly rate of wages. But that argument is done away with entirely when you put a girl on piece wages and she is not getting what she earns. If she is put on piece-work at a lower scale than a man, and if she turns out a hundred lines, the price for which, according to the local scale, is 2s. 9d., I say it is nothing but pure robbery for the employer to give her only 1s. 9d. and put the other 1s. into his own pocket. It was never intended that that should be done under the Fair Wages Clause.

2909. Would you explain that at greater length? What makes you think that the Fair Wages Clause was directed against the employment of women at a lower rate than men?—I do not say it was directed against the employment of women at a lower rate than men; I say that the Fair Wage Clause meant that a fair wage was to be paid.

2910. It says the "current" wage?—The current wage in Edinburgh, as I say, is 32s. a week.

2911. For men?—For men; and there is no wage for girls and never was.

2912. But there is a current rate for girls, is there not?—No; every employer pays as he chooses.

2913. I know; but what they pay constitutes the current rate, I suppose?—Yes, if you take it that way.

2914. That is the rate generally paid?—On the same argument you may take it that every employer in Edinburgh if he chooses to close his office to the Union and simply starts his own rate and pays whatever he likes, that would be the current wage. That certainly is not what was intended. The current wage is supposed to be the wage that is paid all over.

2915. On the assumption on which you are proceeding, namely, that the employer started afresh and fixed a new rate of wages and got people to accept it, that would be the current rate so far as it went, would it not?—If the employers as a whole did that, but not individually.

2916. I thought you suggested that?—No; your question indicated that. I said they all paid different rates of wages to the girls. You said the wage they give would be the fair wage, but I say none of them give a regular wage, so that you have every kind of wage paid. I say there is no fair wage for girls whatever—none.

2917. But you would not say there could not be, would you?—I did not say there could not be.

2918. There is a current rate for girls, I suppose; that is, there are several employers employing them?—Yes, employing them.

2919. And they all pay much the same, I suppose?—No, they pay different, just as it suits them. There is nothing to keep them from doing that in any way. They engage the girls; the girls are cheap labour; they have no union and no combination of any kind, and in this case they say, "We will pay the girls whatever we choose," and they do so. It is most difficult to get any information as to what is being done. It has taken us a year or two to get the information that we have got. They keep you out of it religiously, as though they were keeping you out of the most secret place possible, and it is instant dismissal in some of these places to attempt to get information in any way.

2920. (To Mr. Simpson.) Does that express your view pretty well?—(Mr. Simpson.) Yes. There may have been some difficulty in understanding Mr. Templeton's views, because he is speaking for the Association as a whole, and the position of Edinburgh is exceptional when compared with the Association as a whole. In these places the girls have the first choice of the work, and then what we term the stab men or wages men come next, along with the boys.

2921. But in substance Mr. Templeton has covered your ground, has he not?—Yes, he has stated the contention against the girls being employed, especially on Government work.

2922. I suppose they are not more employed on Government work than on any other work, are they?—No. The majority are employed on general composition.

2923. It is the ordinary practice of the trade, is it not, in Edinburgh to use girls for composing?—No, it is not the ordinary practice, but in the majority of the houses they have girls more or less. In Edinburgh we look on it that the girls being retained is a deterrent to our making any official move in our trade.

2924. But it is the general practice, is it not?—(Mr. Templeton.) No. I might explain that we have got over 1,100 members in Edinburgh, and there will not be 200 females on Government work altogether, I think. (Mr. Simpson.) It is hard to get an estimate. (Mr. Templeton.) As covering the female element, I should say 200; and we have actually 1,100 compositors. I am not counting the printing members in at all—we have something like 570 of them—I am simply taking the compositors, because the females do not affect the machine section. We have 1,100 members who are paid the minimum stab wage of 32s. a week, or its equivalent in piece-work, and there are, as I say, only something like 200 girls altogether on Government work.

2925. Only 200?—I think that is about it. (Mr. Simpson.) I should say between 200 and 250 or 270, taking it roughly. That is on Government work; the total number of girls employed in the city is nearly 750. (Mr. Templeton.) You have a better idea than I; it is very difficult to know the number.

2926. But still, most of the houses, I suppose, do employ them?—I could not say most of them. (Mr. Simpson.) In Edinburgh there are five large offices, and three out of these five do employ females; one does not employ a girl at all, and the other has a maximum of six or eight. Then there are any amount of smaller offices where only two or three men are employed, and some of them employ one girl and others have none at all. It is very difficult to get at the actual state of matters in regard to the employment of girls by the trade as a whole.

2927. But you say three out of five of the largest houses do employ them?—Yes; what we reckon the largest book houses in Edinburgh.

2928. Would those 250 or 270 girls be distributed over those three houses?—(Mr. Templeton.) Most of them. (Mr. Simpson.) The girls fluctuate. The difficulty with the girls is that if they get an indifferent job, or if they get tired of it, they go away for a spell into something else, or get employment at one of the other firms. So that you cannot very well fix their numbers.

2929. How long does it take a girl to learn composing?—I would say it requires seven years to learn the trade, the same as with a boy. (Mr. Templeton.) To learn the trade would take seven years, but I do not think they would be above 12 months at the trade until the employer puts them on piece or a set wage. Whenever they are able to do the ordinary close setting of type, they are put to it. For instance, there are 30 girls on the sasines, in regular work; and these girls are all on the piece. In framing a piece-scale for printing you have to frame the scale so that it covers everything; that is, so that it covers what we term "extras" as well. For instance, in setting a pamphlet or a book a half-page would count the same as a full page. The scale should cover everything within the covers of the book. When the females get this work to set up, the whole of what we term the "fat" is taken out, that is, all the space is taken out and they simply get close matter to set, and they get paid for that. It is the other girls who are on set wages who put in the "fat" work, and the house gets the benefit of it. So it is cut to the very finest, so far as the females are concerned.

2930. Seven years is a very long apprenticeship, is it not?—It is the recognised time in the trade.

2931. Cannot a man learn it in less?—We have discussed that two or three times. As a trade we should be perfectly willing to reduce it to five; but the moment we talk about that, the employers get up in arms, because they say we should rob them of the two best years of the apprenticeship, because we should be taking off the last two years when the apprentices really have some worth and they are making some money out of them. We do not know what we can do—we can neither please them one way nor the other.

2932. This is practically your only complaint, I think?—Our only complaint is about the female labour. Our complaint is that the fair wage, so far as Edinburgh is concerned, is 32s.; and it is not paid on Government work at all. We do not get that work, but it is given to the girls; and of course if we do not get the work, the fair wage cannot be paid.

2933. That is as regards the composing?—Certainly. This gives the Edinburgh employers a very great advantage over London and other places where the employers are paying fair. Take, for instance, the "Edinburgh Gazette." That is produced by females. These girls are getting from 13s. to £1 a week for producing the "Gazette"; and in London they would have to pay 39s. at the very lowest to the men who are producing Government work; so that the competition is not fair. It is no benefit to us that the work is placed in Edinburgh, because we are not getting it. We should prefer to see it done in London—so long as it is done by male labour, it is no matter where.

2934. Do you say the girls make from 13s. to £1 at it?—I think so. (Mr. Simpson.) On that particular job.

2935. Would you not consider that a fair wage for a girl?—I may state that they are reckoned as expert girls on the monotype machine. (Mr. Templeton.) Those girls are on the monotype machine, and the monotype machine is even more dangerous than the ordinary setting of type, because you have got to go over the machine, bending all day at it. The girls have to take turns as they cannot work it continuously, and they are frequently off ill, being unable to keep it up. It is a fairish wage for a girl working 50 hours when she makes a matter of 19s. or thereabouts; still, if a man was on that on piece the man would be making twice that money.

2936. But it does seem to be a fair wage for a girl, does it not?—It is certainly a large wage for a great many girls, but it is not a fair wage for the work that the girl is asked to produce. It depends entirely on what you ask the girl to do, and what she gives value for.

2937. Take girls employed in other trades. Do you find that they get more than that?—Yes; we find ordinary girls, working on machines at tailoring, making about 25s. a week at machining, and not working the same hours nor under the same unhealthy conditions in any way, and not having in any way the same responsibility. (Mr. Simpson.) There is just a point I would like to mention in regard to the girls. I understand that when they get a job which they consider is not satisfactory to them, they can go into what we term the rubber factory and make superior wages there, only the conditions in the factory are not conducive to their appearance, and so when they get tired of the factory they go back to the composing again.

2938. What do they make at that?—I suppose it will average 15s. to 18s. a week. They are paid fortnightly there.

2939. They make less at it than at composing, then?—Yes; but those who are making the 21s. are exceptional. Very few girls receive that, and those who do receive it are expert monotypists.

2940. (Mr. Bailey.) Mr. Templeton, when you were up before the Committee at the Treasury, I think you mentioned another class of labour that you said was underpaid, namely, the labourers who were employed in lifting and locking up heavy formes?—(Mr. Templeton.) Yes, that is so; but that affects the Government work so very slightly that I did not think it was wise to bring it on here. I might say that even in connection with the monotype machines, while the girls do the perforating they employ males to do the casting—an apprentice, I think it is, does the casting. Where the females are employed it is impossible for the girls to lift the heavy metal forme upon what we term the stone—that is a table like this; they cannot lift it up from the floor and put it on the stone and lock it up, and then lift it off again. Therefore, they have to get a labourer or somebody who has some strength. As a matter of cheapness a labourer is cheaper than a tradesman, and if a labourer is in amongst the girls he cannot complain the same as a tradesman would if he saw what was taking place. There is cheap labour employed in that way, but we do not take great exception to that, because they are so very few.

2941. You mentioned that the girls' rate of wages is about 13s. per week or thereabouts?—On that particular work, but they go very much lower. In Messrs. A.'s they average from 6s. to 18s. per week.

2942. Do they not go higher in some firms?—They do not go higher than 21s.; the very highest wage paid is 21s.

2943. (Mr. Black.) What do the girls do when first they come in whilst they are gaining their experience; they do not go through a regular apprenticeship, I think you said?—No.

2944. Then what kind of work do they put them to?—They put them to the case to learn the boxes.

2945. That is what they would do on being apprenticed?—It is really what an apprentice would be set to do. The moment they come to know the boxes they give them something to attempt to set; it may be very bad for the time, but the firm put them on that for some weeks until they are able to do it—possibly after two or three weeks, though they may be very slow, they are able to do it so that the matter set can be used. They are some months at it before they get actually quick. They serve no apprenticeship.

2946. Within about 12 months do they become quick?—They are capable then of doing a sufficient amount of work to earn a fair wage at that class of work.

2947. That would seem to indicate that a boy ought to learn the trade a little quicker than in seven years?—But you must understand that that is really not an apprenticeship, because these girls, if you take them away from that particular thing that they are at, are not a bit of earthly use.

2948. They do not get an all-round knowledge of the trade?—Not at all. It is simply as if you were to make pencils like this; that would be a simple matter, because after so many months at it, it would become mechanical—you have got that to do and that only; and for the other branches you would be quite at sea. That is where the difficulty comes in.

2949. What remedy do you think the Government ought to apply?—The only remedy is that the fair wage of the town should be paid. I do not care whether it is paid to females or males, but if the minimum wage is 32s., or the piece-work rate is 7d. or 7½d., that should be paid, no matter who produces it.

2950. (Chairman.) You cannot conceive of it being right to have a different wage for women from that for men?—Not at the trade. If I may put my own opinion without the slightest feeling in the matter, I should say it is positively wrong for women to be in the trade at all, because it is not a trade for them from the health point of view. That is my own candid opinion. It is not a trade for them, and I would not allow a daughter of mine to go into it under any consideration, no matter what money she got.

2951. On grounds of health?—Yes.

2952. (Mr. King.) Did you say that the whole of the Government work was done by women in Edinburgh—the whole of the composing, I mean?—Possibly there may be one man assisting in some way, but beyond that it is all done by female labour.

2953. Some of these firms employ male compositors, do they not?—Not on Government work. (Mr. Simpson.) Messrs. A. have stab boys and girls in one of the Government rooms, but not working on sasines. (Mr. Templeton.) Not the work I have referred to; but they do produce other work.

2954. Take a firm that employs both men and women; do they take pains to keep the women always at the Government work, and to see that the men never touch Government work?—In these offices they have different departments, and the different class of work goes to the different departments.

2955. It is not entirely a Government classification of work, is it? They would not say, "This is Government work and therefore this is for women, and that is for men," would they?—The room is Messrs. A.'s, which is referred to, is entirely recognised as the Government room; is that not right? (Mr. Simpson.) Yes. (Mr. Templeton.) It is Government work only that is produced in that room. (Mr. Simpson.) In Messrs. A.'s that is solely done by girls with only two male assistants—a foreman and an assistant.

2956. Do the firms employ women to a larger extent on Government work than on ordinary work?—(Mr. Templeton.) Unhesitatingly I say yes.

2957. Firms that have Government contracts?—In Edinburgh, yes.

2958. They do?—So far as I know they do.

2959. Can you suggest why they treat Government work in that way?—To make profit out of the cheap production.

2960. Could they not make a similar profit on the outside work? Why should they treat Government work differently from other outside work?—I cannot exactly answer that. Of course, there are some classes of work that they get where they are compelled to pay the actual local wage, and where there is compulsion to pay the local wage they cannot employ the girls.

2961. If they have got two jobs of the same sort of printing, I understand you to say that the Government job would be given to the women entirely, whereas on the private order they might employ men?—I do not mean to say that they would do that as a matter of a simple division of the labour. The girls are put on to the Government work, but if the Government work is scarce at any time they would not hesitate to give these girls the ordinary work.

2962. But they never put men on to the Government work?—I do not know that men were ever on any of the work we have mentioned here, except one or two, as has been said, to supervise. (Mr. Simpson.) There is a lot of Government work which we term "fat"—as, for instance, blank schedules which are put together in a very short time.

2963. Is Government work simpler than outside work?—No; the technical term that we use in the trade is that it is "fatter." (Mr. Templeton.) There is less printing and more white paper.

2964. (Mr. Bailey.) That is on tabulated matter?—On open matter. (Mr. Simpson.) On schedules.

2965. (Mr. King.) The better-paid work they pick out to be done by the women?—It is selected for the girls.

2966. (Mr. Bailey.) There is a large reprint trade, I think, is there not, in Edinburgh?—Yes.

2967. Who do that chiefly, men or girls?—It depends on what houses it goes to. For instance, in the house I am in myself we do a great deal of reprinting, but there are only eight girls employed, and they are in a room by themselves. The men are employed as much, or more so, on the reprint work than what these girls are, although these girls are wholly confined to reprint work.

2968. Would that apply to the other houses also?—It does, but there are a larger number of girls employed there than there are men.

2969. On the reprint work?—On all work in the press the girls preponderate. In comparison with the number of men there are two or three girls.

2970. In all the houses?—In these reprint houses. (Mr. Templeton.) I might explain that there is policy in giving the girls reprint work. It is simple matter, and easily got on with. Unfortunately some of our best intellects turn out the most miserable specimens of penmanship conceivable, and some of them are almost undecipherable. The result is that the copy which is not decipherable is given to the piece-work compositor, and he has got to make the best of it. If it was a girl she would throw the thing away, put on her hat and away she would go and get other work. She would not do it at all. But the stab man, or the man who is being paid a piece-work rate, he has got to do it and get what he can, possibly spending more than half his time in trying to decipher it. There is good reason why the easier work should be thrown to the girls.

2971. (Chairman.) It is done because she will not do anything else?—Yes. As Mr. Simpson says, if the work that comes in is not sufficient to give the girls their wage, they simply throw it up and they get a better job elsewhere. But a man cannot do that; if they cannot get on with it, they have to go into the street. So that it is a different matter altogether with them. It is a serious matter so far as we are concerned.

2972 Have you anything more to add?—(Mr. Simpson.) There is just a statement with regard to the number of girls employed as we reckon. Messrs. A. have 120, a third of them on the sasines work. These girls, with the exception of three, are all piece-workers. There is a forewoman who gets 27s. 6d., and there is one girl who "clicks"—she makes up the job, that is, puts it together—and she gets 19s.; then there are two assistants who get 18s. The remainder are on piece, and average roughly, say, from 6s. to 14s. There are such a number of girls employed that there is not sufficient work to keep them employed wholly, and therefore they are indifferently employed, which affects their wages to an extent. There are 26 girls on general Government work, and they are paid set wages from 6s. to 18s.; and over and above those there are 60 on general composition who are all piece-workers. At Messrs. B.'s there are about 100. 10 of those are employed on the "Gazette," and 10 are employed along with the stab and boys in the Government room; those 10 girls are employed assisting the stab. The remainder, about 80 of them, are employed in general composition. At Messrs. C.'s we cannot get any information at all, as we have no member in the place; but the conditions are anything but healthy. It is in the basement. (Mr. Templeton.) Under the street level. (Mr. Simpson.) There is an embankment of earth in front about six feet from the windows, which runs all the way along.

2973. (Mr. Bailey.) It is an open area, is it not?—(Mr. Templeton.) Yes. (Mr. Simpson.) It would be six feet high, and it actually means that the gas has to be used almost all day. That covers the three places that we could get any information about. The piece rate for the girls we understand is 4d. per 1,000, and for men it is 7½d. As has been said already by Mr. Templeton, any little "fat" that there is is taken from the males and the girls only get the bare lines. Of course, if a man was employed on it he would be entitled to charge for all. (Mr. Templeton.) I might put it in this way: As far as Messrs. B. are concerned, where they produce work for the Post Office, the Sheriff Court, the Board of Trade, the Local Government Board, the Lunacy Board, the Northern Lighthouses, etc., there are nine females constantly employed on the work at wages ranging from 6s. 6d. to 14s., making an average of about 9s. per female for 52 hours per week. 9s. per week for an average is very low. That is what the girls are getting, so of course there is a terrible inducement for the employer to do it; but it is not fair, and we have got to try to protect ourselves, if it is possible. We do not want anything unreasonable, but we think we are entitled to get what is reasonable.

The witnesses withdrew.

Mr. Simeon Webb, called and examined.

2974. (Chairman.) You are General Secretary of the Galvanised Hollow Ware Sheet Metal Workers and Braziers' Association, I understand?—Yes.

2975. Is that a society in the Midlands?—Yes; it is confined to the Midlands now exclusively.

2976. What kind of trades are you connected with?—Wrought hollow-ware. We are known as iron-plate workers, and we are engaged in the making up of sheet-iron.

2977. Coal-scuttles and that kind of thing, do you mean?—Yes.

2978. Where is the principal seat of your industry?—The principal seat at the present time is at Lye. Birmingham and Wolverhampton are older, but Lye has become the principal seat of that industry. It has grown there.

2979. Does your Society cover all the three places?—Yes.

2980. Have you a rate of wages fixed?—Yes.

2981. It is a piece-work rate, I suppose?—Yes.

2982. Has it been agreed to by all the employers?—I cannot say that it has been agreed to by all of the employers. The employers have no organisation of their own, and consequently we have not that arrangement with the employers that they have in some trades, where they meet them occasionally and agree to certain matters.

2983. Then your rate practically is not an agreed rate with the employers?—Excepting that the rate is agreed to by the fact that they pay it. What I mean is that there is no written agreement between us that they will pay this fixed rate of wages.

2984. But they do pay it in practice?—Yes.

2985. And you have very little trouble with them?—Very little trouble on the whole.

2986. What has been the effect of the Fair Wages Clause in contracts on your trade, do you think?—We are at a loss to understand where the advantage comes in to us, for the simple reason that we have not been able to understand what is meant by the "current rate of wages in the district." As we have understood it there has been a "current rate," but when we have complained and the matters have been inquired into, the decisions have been such that we have not been able to come to a definite or clear understanding as to what we are to understand by the term "current rate." What we recognise as the current rate it appears that the officials who investigate these matters will not understand in the same way.

2987. Perhaps you could give us a case illustrating your difficulty, without however mentioning the name of the firm, as we only want to know the kind of case?—This is the first case I can give you. We made a horse-manger for the Admiralty in 1891. We were then a national organisation covering Manchester, Liverpool, and all the rest of the towns where our industry was carried on. We then agreed to a uniform rate for the making of these mangers and that rate was observed until 1905, when a firm in the Bilston district secured the contract. Our rate was 10s. per dozen, but that firm would only pay 6s. per dozen, with the result, of course, that we complained of their not paying what we understood to be the recognised and the current rate. So far as I was able to gather from the report we had from the inspector, the firm held that the process of making had altered since we fixed the rate, and consequently the men were able to earn as good a wage at the 6s. rate as they were at the 10s.; but that was not so.

2988. Do you claim the same rate for the new manger as for the old one?—Yes, because it is exactly the same thing. There has been no alteration whatever in the pattern or in the making of the thing.

2989. Did the firm contend that it was a different article?—No; they contended that they were making it in a different way—that they were, by their machinery, assisting the men to such an extent that the 6s. was equal to the 10s. by the old method. But that was not so, inasmuch as all that they did by the machinery was just a matter of an hour's work on a dozen of the articles, for which the men were prepared to allow the usual deduction of 6d.

2990. It was found on inquiry that the 6s. rate was the current rate, was it?—No. The official stated that as the employers had made out their case for assisting the men in the making of this article to the extent that they did, the 6s. rate under the new conditions was equal to the 10s. rate under the old conditions. But then the men could not earn nearly so much wages, so that was a demonstration that they were not assisted by the machinery to the extent that was claimed.

2991. Have you any other case?—Yes; we have a more recent case than that. In July, 1906, we issued to the employers new rates of wages for all Government work. We gave them a month's notice to bring that new list of prices into operation, and with two exceptions the list was accepted. In those two instances they refused to pay the rates or to recognise our claim to any alteration in the rates of wages; consequently we reported them. In the first case, which was at Lye, it was a matter of two months before there was any inquiry made after our complaint was lodged, and the report that we then got was that that firm did not then appear to be engaged on a contract for the War Office. The fact was, of course, that it had been cleared off long since. The other case was a question of day-work. We have a day-work rate as well as a piece-work rate, the day-work rate being 7d. per hour. This firm dismissed three men because they claimed the 7d.—they were then having 6½d. The report eventually was that 6½d., it was argued, was the current rate, and I was asked to supply them with a list of the firms who had agreed to pay the rate of 7d. I did so, and gave them the names of the 13 principal firms that there were in the industry in the Midlands, and since then I have heard nothing further; so we regard the thing as having fallen through.

2992. In the other case you mentioned, you said that two firms refused to pay your rates; how many accepted the list?—There is a matter of about 50 employers in the trade in the Midland district.

2993. Then may we say roughly that 48 accepted it and two refused it?—The whole of the 48 do not make Government work; all the manufacturers in the trade do not go in for the Government contracts.

2994. The Government work does not differ in kind, I suppose, from other work outside? I mean, other people want mangers besides the Admiralty?—It differs in quality.

2995. Is the quality of the Government work better or worse?—We always regard the Government work as the best.

2996. Do those three cases exhaust your difficulties?—Yes; those are the only three cases that we have troubled to get, simply because we were not satisfied with the results.

2997. Now, what is your remedy? The difficulty seems to be that there is no rate which can be recognised as "curernt" in your trade, is that not it?—We do recognise the rate as being current because the other firms, with the exception of the three that I have referred to, pay the rate that we recognise as being the current rate.

2998. How many firms pay it?—The whole of the firms that make Government work, with the exception of these three.

2999. How many would that be?—I should say there would be a matter of 15 or 16 firms.

3000. Then there are three firms standing out against the 15 or 16?—Yes. We have had no trouble with any of the other firms.

3001. I see one of your suggestions is that for "current rate" you would substitute "Trade Union rate"; do you mean by the Trade Union rate the rate that the Trade Union fixes or the rate that it gets paid?—The rate that it gets paid, of course; but then the Trade Union fixes the rate that gets paid.

3002. You mean, do you not, the Trade Union rate as accepted by the employers?—Yes. In a trade where there is an organisation there is no other method of fixing the rate except through the Union. The Trade Union always fixes the rate where there is a Trade Union in an industry.

3003. But it only fixes it subject to its getting it accepted by the other side?—Yes, certainly.

3004. You make a further suggestion in your proof that all work for the Government should bear a distinctive mark, so that the workmen themselves may know when a Government contract is in hand. What is the object of that?—We have cases where the manufacturers will say that it is not a Government contract, and then we have a difficulty, of course, in ascertaining whether it really is. We have had cases where we have not known of their being Government contracts until they have been completed.

3005. Would the men then be paid at a lower rate?—Yes.

3006. Do you find that is a general practice in your trade that the men get more for Government work than they do for other work?—Yes; it has a higher price, because, as I have already said, it is a better class of work.

3007. All through?—All through. We know perfectly well that it is no use scamping, if I may use that word, on Government work, because it has to be subject to inspection, and if it is not properly made it is returned.

3008. Other consumers are more easy-going?—In the general market they are very easy-going as a rule.

3009. You would like the workmen to know when they are on a Government job, because in practice they ought to get more for it?—Yes.

3010. Is that indicated in your list of prices, or do you have a separate list of prices for Government work?—We have a price list for Government work which is quite separate and distinct from that for the general class of work.

3011. Do you happen to have your price list with you?—Yes.

3012. May I look at it?—Yes. (Handing in same.)

3013. These prices are all for Government things, are they?—Yes.

3014. About how much more are you paid for them than for ordinary things of the same description?—We do not get things exactly the same for the general market as we do for the various Government departments.

3015. Here is a cabin-pail; would not those be very much the same as other cabin-pails?—No; it is made altogether different to what we regard as a chamber-pail.

3016. Again, here is an oval bath?—That is a special thing, and there is nothing like it on the general market. You have patterns altogether your own.

3017. The patterns are nearly all special, are they?—Yes.

3018. I see you have a suggestion that patterns should be sent to a centre in the Midlands, in the same way as the Admiralty have rooms at Birmingham where patterns may be seen?—Yes. We find that we are very often placed at a great disadvantage—both the workpeople and the employers. We get a specification, say, from the War Office; that specification is not sufficiently clear to us to indicate as to the actual make-up of the article, and consequently when we are asked to fix a price for making it before the employer accepts or tenders for the contract, it works out in practice that often we have been deceived, and that the article is much more difficult to make than what we had anticipated. On the other hand, we have found often that we have had an advantage; we have thought there has been more work in the article than what there was when it actually came to be made.

3019. Would not the natural thing be for you to say to the employer before you quote your price that you would like to see the article?—Yes; but the rule is, I think, that the article can be seen at the Arsenal, and that means either sending someone up here or else not seeing it at all. Some of our manufacturers will ask their travellers to call; but then, of course, the traveller, not being a practical workman, cannot give the workman the details which the workman requires in order to be just in fixing his price for that article.

3020. I do not see how either the employer or the workman can fix the price without seeing the article?—We have had very great difficulty quite recently with respect to several articles in this way.

3021. And so you would like a sort of pattern museum in Birmingham?—Yes; the way the Admiralty do it. They have got rooms there, and when they are issuing their contracts, they send the patterns down of all the articles they require, and we can see them at the rooms. That consequently gives us an idea as to what the article actually is.

3022. Taking up that suggestion of yours that the "Trade Union rate" should be substituted for the "current rate," how would it work in your case, for instance; you would wish to be able to enforce the rate on all the firms instead of only on the majority of them?—Yes.

3023. What amount of agreement between the employers would justify you in calling it a "Trade Union rate" accepted by them?—We would say if the majority accepted.

3024. If there were 15 firms and eight accepted it and seven did not, would you call it an accepted Trade Union rate?—We should have to draw the line somewhere as to the majority.

3025. (Mr. De la Bère.) In regard to those cases which you mentioned that you brought to the notice of the War Office, I rather gather that you were under the impression that nothing very much was done; is that not so?—That is my impression.

3026. Perhaps you will take it from me that we devoted almost an unusual amount of attention to those two complaints, and that we were pulled up by the difficulty, which I think would be apparent to yourself, that we could not arrive at any conclusion as to the acceptance of your book of rates. We had an official in the district investigating the facts at the factories you complained of, and we also wrote to no less than 54 firms within a radius of 30 miles of Birmingham asking whether they had accepted this book. Out of those 54 we could only find 17 who gave an unreserved acceptance. There were three or four more who said that, subject to certain conditions and exceptions, they had agreed to it, but 17 only gave an unconditional acceptance?—The 17 would be those who were contractors to the War Office.

3027. The bulk of them were so, undoubtedly?—Am I to understand that you wrote to 54 firms who were contractors to the War Office?

3028. We wrote to 54 firms on our list—not necessarily firms holding contracts at the time?—In the hollow-ware trade?

3029. Yes, and within a radius of 30 miles of Birmingham?—That is more firms than I am aware of. We have not 50 firms on our books.

3030. Some of them may be small firms, but, in fact, we wrote to 54. There were a few who did not reply—it is possible that they may have dropped out; but we got 49 replies, and out of those 49 only 17 gave an unconditional acceptance. That was the difficulty which pulled us up short at once?—I presume that those 17 firms would represent, shall I say, two-thirds of the trade, that is, so far as output is concerned, and so far as employing the workpeople is concerned. There are a lot of very small firms in our trade, and the smaller firms, as a rule, do not go in for this class of work, but the larger firms do. Many of the large firms do not, for the simple reason as they say that the thing is cut so, and there is so much trouble with it, that it is not worth troubling about. The difficulty was that of there being no uniform rate until we issued that new list in 1906.

3031. As far as we could discover, that list was issued by you, but it did not appear to have met with any very general acceptance?—If 17 firms accepted, and those firms were what we call the larger firms employing the majority of the workpeople in the trade, we should regard that as being an acceptance. You get one firm employing from 60 to 100 hands and you get others employing a matter of five or six.

3032. In the letter you wrote issuing the book, you did not ask the employers to accept it, did you?—No, because we had been asking them for a long time to accept a general list, and there was no response to that—not any hearty response—so we simply made a demand for this.

3033. That is what we found. As regards the rates of which you complain—to pass from the book to the actual rates—you said, I think, that certain firms were paying less than 7d., which you maintain is the accepted rate?—Yes.

3034. On that particular point, we wrote to 15 firms, and we could only find that four agreed to 7d. as the rate?—That would be four firms who perhaps did not recognise the piece-work rate; there are a few firms in the trade who do not recognise piece-work but day-work. That was the reason why we stipulated a day-work rate in our list of prices. What we say is that we have no objection to an employer putting a man to work day-work if he chooses so to do, and we fix the rate accordingly. So there is an option; if they do not agree with the piece rates, then they can put their men on the day rates.

3035. Which is the most prevalent—the piece or the day?—Piece-work.

3036. That is 3s. 3d. on this particular item?—Yes.

3037. Do you consider that the placing of orders with a group of men at a piece-work price generally exists in the trade?—That is how they have tried to evade paying the price. They make one man responsible; they call him a sub-contractor, and he takes it at a price—that was the case with the second firm we referred to with regard to the day-work rate—then he refuses to pay the men he employs the rate of 7d., and dismisses them; of course, we then take action in Court to recover wages in lieu of notice.

3038. It is done within the factory, I take it?—Yes, within the factory.

3039. It is not put out outside?—No.

3040. It is a sort of Little Master system within the factory?—That is so.

3041. That custom prevails rather generally in the Midlands, does it not, in many trades?—Yes, it does, unfortunately.

3042. Has it been prevalent in yours?—Not on the Government work until quite recently, but on the other cheaper class of work, the very common class especially, it has.

3043. As a Union, you have set your face against it?—We have.

3044. Do you think it would help matters if we had a clause in the contract requiring direct payment to the worker?—Yes, I do.

3045. We have that in some of our contracts, but as a rule in most of the contracts for goods which are produced in the Midlands we have not introduced it, because there is a definite trade custom of that nature in many trades in the Midlands. At any rate, you are of opinion that as regards Government contracts, in your particular work that practice has not existed to any large extent?—No, and we regard it as being one of the greatest evils we have in the trade.

3046. Is machinery being very largely introduced into the trade?—Yes; there is a fair amount of machinery, but it is just a matter of three or four firms. The others are too small to invest capital in machinery.

3047. That was the allegation of one of the firms you complained of, that the rate in the book did not apply to them because they used such a large amount of machinery?—That was the argument which the same employer used to me when I interviewed him with respect to the matter. My contention was that we did not wish to interfere with the machinery; all that we asked was that those who were engaged on the work should be paid at the day-work rate, because he was then paying them day-work. The day-work rate will cover any work that it is not possible to do by the machinery.

3048. Then as regards those samples that you want sent down; you perhaps know that the Birmingham Chamber of Commerce exhibit a certain amount of samples for the War Department, but hitherto we have not sent down ironware samples because they are rather bulky both for carriage and for the space they take up for their proper exhibition; but do you think it would be very much appreciated in the trade if they were sent?—Yes, I do. I have had that same thing spoken of to me by the employers as well as the men; the employers themselves complain that they really do not know what the actual thing is.

3049. I suppose exhibition at Birmingham would be sufficient, would it not?—Yes, because that would cover the Midland area.

3050. At one time we used to show at Wolverhampton, but for various reasons that was dropped. Would Birmingham do?—Birmingham would do better, because it is closer to the largest district, the Lye district, and it is within easy distance of Wolverhampton.

3051. As regards that distinctive mark, I think you said that, as a rule, the Government pattern was different from the ordinary one?—Yes.

3052. If that is so, why should you want any mark upon it? Surely you can tell from the thing itself whether it is Government work or not?—When we are familiar with all the patterns, we shall be able to distinguish them.

3053. Then it is in the case of the new patterns that come along that you want these samples?—That is so. Do you not see that some of the manufacturers perhaps only get an order for buckets—perhaps they have never touched anything else; then if they get something else, and the men have not made these other goods, the men do not know, unless I am able to inform them by knowing that there is some contract out. With the Admiralty we know what there is being issued. As I have already said, they send the patterns down to Birmingham, and I get a tender form, so I am able to see what quantities there are, in the same way as the manufacturers do. But with the War Office it is different, and we do not know anything at all about it.

3054. I ask you these questions, because I should be very sorry if you thought we had done nothing. I think it would have been better if you had been informed that we had been unable to arrive at any conclusion, but in point of fact we did take very great pains to come to a decision on the matter, and we found it almost impossible to arrive at a decision whether these rates had been commonly accepted?—I am inclined to think that it would be an advantage if a different course were taken when there is a complaint of this nature made, and if a public inquiry in the district was held; that is to say, if we had an opportunity of bringing our evidence before the Commissioner, whoever he was, who was appointed, as well as the employer, and if then we could have the matter threshed out face to face. As it is, I have to communicate with you as to what our complaint is, then your Commissioner makes his inquiries, and we know nothing further of it except we are told there is nothing in it.

3055. I think you ought to be informed, but do you not think there would be rather a danger, if you had a public inquiry on every complaint, of washing one's dirty linen in public, as it were? Naturally you do not want to present to the world the spectacle of yourselves and your employers engaged in perpetual strife?—No.

3056. It is better to settle these things, I think, if one can, by private inquiry, is it not?—Yes. Perhaps I used the wrong term. What I mean is, supposing there was a complaint lodged, and the Commissioner comes down to inquire, why not invite me, as representing the men, together with the employers, to give evidence before him, and bring all the witnesses we think proper? An inquiry of that nature is what I mean.

3057. That is done frequently, but it does not seem to have been done in this instance—that I grant you.

The inspecting officer frequently does meet the employees or their representatives, and goes into it with them as well as with others?—I think it would be more satisfactory then. If we were beaten in argument, we should sit down to it and say, "All right, we have been defeated."

3058. (Mr. Bailey.) Can you tell us why it is that piece-work is the standing rule in your trade rather than day-work? In so many trades we have had represented here we find it is the converse?—It is simply because it began in that way, and it has continued so up to the present.

3059. Do I understand you rightly to state that the Government work is done mainly in houses that do not pay the proper rate?—No. The majority of the work that is done is done by the houses that do pay the proper rate. As I have already said, there are only three firms that I have had to complain of.

3060. Do they have more than their proportionate share of the Government work?—I am afraid they do; that is just where the mischief arises. Other manufacturers say: "These are not paying the current rates, and consequently they have an undue advantage over us."

3061. And they get more than their proportionate share of the Government work, do I understand, having regard to the size of the firms?—Yes.

3062. (Mr. Black.) Do you think that the advantage which one employer has over another arises from anything more than the difference in his machines, and so on?—I do not think that the employer who has machinery has a very great advantage over an employer who has not; that is, if I am to accept the statements of the employers themselves.

3063. The conclusion we arrived at in the Bilston case was that the difference really was due to the greater introduction of machinery in that particular firm which made your 1891 schedule more or less obsolete. That was the whole difficulty?—If I may venture to offer an explanation, there is very little of that article made by machinery. The bottom is stamped, and that is done whoever gets the contract. If they have not got a machine for stamping it themselves, they get other firms to stamp the bottoms for them. We take that into account in the 10s. rate. What this employer did was to, what we will call, notch the body of the article with the press. A girl did that, and we said that that was worth, we will say, 6d. per dozen, which is allowing a good rate by which the employer would be able to buy a few machines in a very short time if he had constant work on this particular class of goods. We had it practically from the statement of the men themselves that that was the only advantage they had. I would like to point out that when that manufacturer had the contract before, which was some years previously, the bottoms were not then stamped, but had to be fetched up by hand, and he had to pay 12s. 6d. a dozen instead of 10s.

3064. Was your 10s. rate in force at that date?—Yes; our 10s. rate was in force then, but because he had not got the stamping done, and the men had to do that work by hand, 2s. 6d. per dozen extra was paid.

3065. In those 14 years there appear to have been considerable improvements in machinery, especially in the Midland district?—Yes, but machinery could not be applied to any appreciable extent to this particular article.

3066. What about the bending of the sides and so on?—That is but a trifle. It is not a matter of special machinery; it is just a matter of bending the sides in the rolls, or with a simple bender on the bench.

3067. If the bottom is stamped and the sides are bent round by machinery, what is there left for the skilled workmen to do?—There is a lot left for the workman.

3068. But that takes away a good deal, does it not?—No.

3069. As I understand you, formerly the bottom was set up by hand, and then the stamp came in?—Yes.

3070. Then came the machine for bending?—We took the half-crown off for the stamping of the bottom.

3071. According to you, you never put it on, because your rate stood at 10s.?—What I say was that he paid 12s. 6d. when the men had to fetch that bottom up by hand.

3072. In this particular case you did not take it up on behalf of the workmen engaged by that firm, but you took it up yourselves on behalf of your general schedule of rates, did you not?—Yes.

3073. The men themselves earned a very fair weekly wage apparently?—Yes, by working overtime.

3074. There was a certain amount of overtime, it is true?—Yes; they were working overtime a great deal.

3075. They made a very fair weekly wage on the whole?—Yes, but it was not the wage they ought to have made; that is what we say.

3076. Now taking your general points, first of all there is this one about the distinctive mark. When the contract is actually in hand, the workmen are not debarred in any way from seeing the pattern that is lent by the Government, are they?—No.

3077. There is a pattern issued to the firm, is there not?—Yes.

3078. That bears a label in the case of Admiralty patterns: so there cannot be any doubt about the workmen knowing that it is a Government job?—That is so.

3079. I take it that if it is of the special quality referred to, they are warned it has got to be specially well made, and so on?—That is so.

3080. Therefore, so far as our Admiralty work is concerned, I do not think this point comes in so much?—No, it does not, because we do get your pattern into the shops.

3081. Under our new arrangement you have had the advantage of seeing the tenders beforehand, and of seeing the list of firms and the specification?—Yes.

3082. That is a great help to you in fixing a closer price, is it not?—That is so.

3083. You are the representative secretary in the district, I think?—Yes.

3084. (Chairman.) Do you say you do not get the War Office patterns in the shops?—We have got them after we have got the contract, but we do not get an opportunity of seeing them before.

3085. (Mr. De la Bère.) I think that point of the marking will fall to the ground if you have the pattern to see beforehand, because obviously when you are at work on the thing, you know what it is?—If we could see all the patterns beforehand, we should then know exactly.

3086. (Mr. Black.) And you think that will enable you to quote closer prices when you are asked for a rate?—Yes.

3087. The fact is that you now see our patterns beforehand?—Yes.

3088. You and the employers both have the advantage now of seeing the actual patterns?—Yes.

3089. Will you still take your stand on your schedule, or will your rates vary according to the actual inspection of the pattern?—We stand on our schedule for those articles that we have there, because all those patterns we have seen and have made.

3090. So that the only variation that would come in would be in the amount of machine-work that might be done?—That is so.

3091. What would your schedule allow for that?—We leave it with the men in the respective factories, where there is any assistance given by machinery, to make a proportionate allowance.

3092. You do leave that to them as a matter of fair arrangement between the men and the employers, then?—Yes. If the employer is prepared to do a certain amount of the work by machinery, the men in the shop get together and say, "Now this has taken so much work off, that represents 6d. or 1s. per dozen," as the case may be.

3093. Your schedule of to-day wipes out the 1891 schedule, I suppose?—Yes.

3094. How about those particular mangers; do they still stand at 10s.?—They stand at 10s. 6d. now. That demonstrates that machinery has not come to the front to do much work on that particular manger.

3095. Do those particular three firms that you are not quite satisfied with now include the Bilston firm you have referred to?—Yes.

3096. You have never really gone closely into the matter with that firm as to whether there is a difference in their method of making the things, have you?—Not with the employer, because he will not go into it; that is my difficulty.

3097. Supposing that he would admit you to a conference with him, and you were fairly satisfied that there was a difference, would you by arrangement allow the workmen to make a deduction off the 10s. in order to settle a fair price?—Yes, we should do that.

3098. That might bring it to somewhere in the neighbourhood of 6s.?—I do not think it would.

3099. Still, you do not know that particular employer's facilities exactly?—I cannot say that I do—only from report, of course. I have not seen his machinery, or anything of that.

3100. About the method of inquiry; I gather that you do not mean a public inquiry with reporters, and so on?—No.

3101. Do you feel strong enough to come out in the open, as it were, in these cases? We were very often asked by Trade Unions to avoid mentioning to the employer the name of the complainant?—Of course, if I complain on behalf of the men, I am prepared to defend their case.

3102. On behalf of the particular men in the shop?—Yes.

3103. But that may place those men in a difficulty?—That was the case with this particular firm where we had the complaint with the Admiralty.

3104. The men in that case would not face it?—That is so. The Commissioner came to see me, and he wanted the names. I said: "You have got a firm here to deal with that I know to be very vindictive, and it will mean that these men will have to lose their situations if they are going to give you any evidence." The result was that when he went there the men that would have given the evidence straightforwardly were simply put in another shop, and there was a certain class of men reserved there for the particular purpose.

3105. So there might be cases in which we could not have an inquiry quite on the lines you have suggested?—I do not know; I do not see that there is any reason why you could not. I think it would be very much more satisfactory. Of course, if my men are not prepared to come forward and give evidence, there would be an end of it.

3106. (Mr. Hillier.) It is usual in your trade, is it not, for the employer, the master, to make with his men employed on this work terms for the special articles, irrespective of your society; for instance, a contractor or manufacturer makes a bargain for articles of a special character with his men, does he not?—Yes.

3107. Because your book simply deals with the ordinary patterns?—Yes.

3108. If we were to have the words "Trade Union rate" that would give you power to fix the rate on the jobs irrespective of the bargain between the master and the men?—Yes; but shall I explain what we do if we get a case of that kind? We had a case from the War Office quite recently—an article which we had not seen before. The men fix the price for that with the employer, and then that rate which they fix, if it is satisfactory after they have made the article, is reported to me, and we make that rate to apply all the way round; that is, we notify all the rest of the workpeople that a certain article has come into the district and is being made—the rate agreed to is so-and-so, and that must be recognised as the rate.

3109. With any articles that are required by the Government which are of the same pattern as commercial patterns, there would be no object in letting you know that they were for the Government, would there? For instance, you may have cans precisely similar to commercial patterns, and there would be no advantage in letting your men know of it, because they would come under your tariff, would they not?—Just so.

3110. Although they were being made for the Government?—Yes; but as I have already said we all know that when it is for the Government it has got to be well made, and that does not apply to general work. All buyers, unfortunately, have not got as good taste as the Government has for a good class of work, and it is the cheap thing that is going; consequently the cheap thing is cheaply made and quickly made.

3111. But the master knows it is for the Government, and he knows that it has to bear this closer scrutiny?—Yes.

3112. It would be his loss, would it not, if any of those articles were thrown back upon him?—Yes.

3113. The men would have been paid?—That is so.

3114. The men do not lose; it would be the master?—That is not always the case. If articles are returned and the fault is in the making, then the man is often required to make some fresh articles in their place. We have had several conflicts over that particular point.

3115. But as a rule the master would be the sufferer?—Yes, as a rule.

3116. Therefore you would not for an ordinary commercial pattern demand a higher rate because it was Government work?—When it is approaching to a commercial pattern the difference is but very slight.

3117. But still there is a difference, do you say?—There is a slight difference.

3118. Supposing the work was being done for some municipal body, would you make the Government rate apply to that municipal body?—We do, as far as we possibly can.

3119. Again, take railways; supposing the railway people wanted it, would you have a special rate for them?—We class them all as being practically equal to the Government work.

3120. (Chairman.) I did not quite understand what you said just now happened when a new article came into the district. You said you get a price made for it with the employer who has undertaken the contract, and you circulate that price, as I understand, to all the other employers saying that that is the Trade Union rate?—No, we circulate it to the men, not to the employers as yet; but we are hoping to circulate it to the employers later.

3121. It does not get on to your list until it has been generally accepted by the men outside?—That is so. I make a note of it, and keep a record of the new prices which are fixed for the new articles. Then if that article, or any fresh article, happens to go to another factory, as a rule they apply to me to know if I have heard anything of it before, and can I tell them what the price is?

3122. But you would not call it the Trade Union rate until it had been more generally accepted than by one firm, say, would you?—No. What we should say to our men is, if they have not made the article before, "This has been made at So-and-So's; the price is so-and-so; the men regarded it as being a fair job; we therefore regard the price as being fair, and you must have the same price for it." Then, of course, they would fix that price for it.

3123. And you would not allow them to fix any other?—Not below that.

3124. Is there any other point that you would like to bring out?—No; I think it has been all covered by the questions that I have been asked.

The witness withdrew.

TENTH DAY,

Thursday, 6th February, 1908.

At 32, Great George Street, Westminster, S.W.

PRESENT :

SIR GEORGE H. MURRAY, K.C.B. (Chairman).

Mr. R. BAILEY, M.V.O.
Mr. F. W. BLACK.
Mr. A. WILSON FOX, C.B.
Mr. J. H. HILLIER.
Mr. A. F. KING.
Mr. J. J. WILLS (Secretary).

Mr. HENRY WILSON HOWES, called; and Examined.

3125. (Chairman.) You are Secretary of the Printing Machine Managers' Trade Society, I think?—That is so.

3126. Have you had much experience of the working of the Fair Wages Clause?—I have been in my official position for about eight years, and being identified with, say, 2,300 men distributed over a vast area in many of the printing offices doing Government work, of course I have come in touch with the Government printing. There have been certain phases of Government printing which have been brought to our notice, executed by London master printers having establishments farther afield, which have caused some amount of inquiry and concern on the part of our membership; and those are particularly the points upon which I desire to touch this afternoon.

3127. What is the particular complaint that you wish to bring before us?—The firm of Messrs. A. no doubt is known to you all. It is a highly respected firm in which we have a large number of members employed, but they have a separate department in which there are three men employed whose wages range from 26s. to 38s. per week. That is the weekly wage these men are receiving, who are acting as machine managers. The information that has been laid before me amounts to this, that these men sometimes do night work, and they are not paid even on the wage basis in accordance with the agreement existing between the Printing Machine Managers' Trade Society and the Employers' Association; but when they are at work on night work upon the Minutes of the House of Commons, they are paid so much per forme. My information is that they are paid 10d. per forme, practically on the basis of piece-work, which is not recognised by us in any way, and never has been recognised by us in the printing machine managing part of the trade.

3128. What is it you mean by the Minutes of the House of Commons?—I understand that they are in receipt of the contract, or of a partial contract, for printing the Minutes of the House of Commons.

3129. Do you know that as a fact?—Yes; that is to say, information has been given to me by the men employed there. The matter has been laid before the overseer of the department that these men were not being paid in accordance with the standard rate.

3130. Have you made a complaint to the Stationery Office about that?—I cannot say that we have gone so far as to do that. I will make further inquiry, and then will give Mr. Wills further information upon it. Then there is the firm of Messrs. B. The drafting of a great deal of their work to a place known as Dunstable has been a matter of concern and question among our membership for some years, and they look upon it as a detriment to the employment of the men at the London house. In 1894 I was employed by Messrs. B. from May until the last week in October, and practically covering the whole of that period the men in the six machine departments in London were losing a day a week. At that particular time the firm was in receipt of Government printing contracts, and the firm at Dunstable was doing this work without any lost time to their employees. We thought at that time that that was exceedingly hard. That system of losing time while the Dunstable place is being kept in full going order has been continued for some years, and even last year the men complained to me that they were each losing a day a week. I have here the conditions which obtain in Dunstable, and I give it to you gentlemen without prejudice as a matter of information to you, in order that you may later on express your judgment and say whether that is strictly in accordance with the Fair Wage Clause and the Resolution of the House of Commons of 1891.

3131. Your exact point being that the firm have transferred work from London to the country?—There is a very large amount of this work which is being transferred to Dunstable, and our membership look upon it as detrimental to their interests.

3132. Are the Dunstable men getting paid the proper rate?—That has always been a point. The printing firm of Messrs. B. was established at Dunstable some years ago in a district which, prior to their going there, had no printerdom history; consequently, the wage rate was a rate established by the firm to their own way of thinking, and our membership say it is a rate considerably below what it ought to be. There are certain phases of the working of the firm at Dunstable which I propose to give to you. The fullest inquiry has been made into this matter, and as a member of the Executive of the London Branch of the Printing and Kindred Trades' Federation, I am able to say we have had direct evidence that there has generally been a preference given for non-society labour. The particulars I have to lay before you are these: The management of the department is with an overseer and four deputies. There are about 33 machine minders—men—running from 26s. per week; one of these men is getting 33s. With about three exceptions, the men have two machines under their charge. There is a department of female minders on piece-work. On this system these women are earning from 24s. to 27s. per week. Now, whatever may be the inroad made upon the compositor's work by women working monotype machines or machines of that character, there has been no particular inroad upon the printing machine management by women. We firmly believe that it is a class of work outside woman's sphere of life; and as the Secretary of a Union of 2,300 men, I can assure you that once every fortnight—to go a stretch, once every three weeks—men come to me and report accidents arising out of and in the course of their employment as printing machine managers. We feel, and feel very strongly, that for women to be placed upon printing machinery is a class of work entirely outside their sphere; and besides, we look upon it that this piece-work upon which these women are working at Dunstable, is a contravention both of the letter and of the spirit of the Fair Wage Clause and of the Resolution of the House of Commons of 1891. This matter has been brought before the Executive Council of my Society, and they feel that strict inquiry should be made into this question of Messrs. B. at Dunstable. While this work goes down to Dunstable to the extent it does, we feel that it is unfair, because it necessitates our men losing, as I believe they lost last year, 1907, from May to about the end of October with brief intervals, a day a week. I think, taking men at, say, £2 a week, if they lose a day a week you may say they lose 8s. or 7s. 6d., and that loss of a day brings their rate of wages down to a very low figure. They feel that there should be a strict inquiry into this matter, so that there should be a fairer distribution of this work, instead of its being concentrated at one particular spot where this low rate of wages is paid.

3132A. Do you maintain that a contractor ought not to have two places of business?—I do not contend that at all, but I do say that the wage rate of this particular district is exceedingly low, and what is more, there has been undoubtedly a preference given for men who are not identified with trade societies.

3133. Then your complaints come to this, do they—that they give a preference to non-unionists, and that they under-pay the men?—That is so.

3134. Further, that they employ women?—Yes, and that those women are put on to the printing machines at a low rate of wages and on piece-work.

3135. That has nothing to do with your complaint about the men in London losing time, has it?—I say this—if Messrs. B. have a large contract with regard to Government work, and the bulk of the work is concentrated on the spot where the wages are so low, and at the same time men are losing a day a week at their firm here, then it is to the London men's detriment to send all this work down to Dunstable.

3136. But what the London men lose, the Dunstable men gain, do they not?—Quite so, but it is very hard on the men here to realise that a good deal of the work that should be done in that department is being sent down to Dunstable, simply because it is being done at a cheaper rate.

3137. Will you take the next point you have got?—The next point I desire to touch upon is in respect to Messrs. C. at Wolverton. Although a complaint does not exist respecting the loss of time question, the Executive does complain of the low rate of wages paid at Wolverton and the objectionable system under which the Government work is executed. They look upon it as a contravention of the Fair Wages Resolution. The conditions obtaining in the machine-room are as follows: This department is controlled by an overseer and a deputy; there are about 11 machines ranging from demy to quad-royal; eight men are employed; then there are five small machines where women machine-minders are employed. There is also a separate department where there are 70 smaller machines worked by girls on piece-work earning from 8s. to 15s. per week; the only male in this department is the working overseer who assists the girls in the make-ready, in point of fact, teaches them the printing machine manager's business.

3138. This is another case of the employment of female labour, is it not?—That is so. I quite appreciate the point that this is a very big question.

3139. I do not think you need dwell upon it, as it is one of the points that has already been fully put before us.—I will only mention the fact that the employment of female labour in the making-ready of machines, is the part most strongly objected to, and is entirely contrary to the custom of the trade. I have one note here which was brought before the notice of the Printing Federation, and I will read it with your permission. This was given to me, and is based upon very reliable evidence in regard to Messrs. C. at Crewe—you may take that as being a separate firm from the Wolverton firm. It was very difficult for anyone to get near these works, or to find definite information, but the firm is run almost entirely by female labour. Three men have tried and failed to get this information. Hence it is impossible to obtain any definite details of the working conditions. My informant says: "I succeeded in getting a glimpse into the works, which are built on one floor, and I could not see a single male worker. I counted 270 hands going in at 1.30 after dinner—a number of females, a large portion of whom were little girls in short frocks, evidently just left school, ten men, and no boys. In this town almost the only industry is the railway works, and as they only employ male labour, Messrs. C. can obtain almost unlimited supply of cheap female labour. Exactly the same applies to Wolverton, which is also a town built round the North-Western Works. As evidence of the danger of this firm to the organised trades, I might mention that they have just completed an addition to the Wolverton factory which will double the present size of their works, and already they are transferring considerable quantities of work from their London firm to Wolverton." I read you that, because that has already been read before the Printing and Kindred Trades' Federation, and I presume that my friends, Mr. G. D. Kelly, Mr. Bowerman and Mr. Naylor have already given evidence on these points, and it is just probable that they have also mentioned the fact in regard to the number of women who are being engaged at the present time on these Government printing contracts, which we look upon as being very largely detrimental to the work we do.

3140. Is it only the employment of women on machines that you object to?—Yes, at their low rate of wages. I take it that if we go back to 1891, when this Resolution was adopted by the House of Commons, it is the fact that at that particular time there were no women workers upon printing machines or composing machines, or dong work which had hitherto been done by men. It is a creation since that time, and we look upon it as a menace and a danger to the men workers; and that is why I have been asked to bring these facts before you. There is no greater sin, I think, that one can commit than to attack a man in regard to his own household. I have a note here in regard to the General Post Office Printing Department, which I desire to speak to you about. A Mr. Z., one of our members, complains that he was engaged about twelve months since as a machine manager at Kensington, and was compelled to do compositor's work while his machine was running. He claims that he was dismissed owing to his raising an objection to doing this. My Executive complain that this is a contravention of the custom of the trade. I know of no instance where any of our membership to-day of about 2,300 men are doing compositor's work in any shape or form. If there is this existing in your Post Office Department at Kensington, I am sure by my raising this point to-day, that inquiry will be made into it and an alteration made.

3141. I will make a note of that, though it is not strictly within our Reference; we are only dealing with contracts of course?—I only mentioned this as supplementary. There is one other matter, which perhaps I ought to have touched on before I came to that complaint about the Post Office. I am not quite sure whether Messrs. D. of Camberwell are at present doing Government work. I have interviewed that firm several times, in fact I interviewed the men on two occasions with a view of getting them to identify themselves with the Printing Machine Managers' Trade Society. In no instance in my interview with the men could I find out that any of those men had served an apprenticeship, and in the interview I had with the firm, there was a direct statement made to me that they would not on any account place themselves in touch with me for the securing of competent men, as they desired to please themselves on that head. I take it, from the very fact that none of our members have ever been employed by that firm, that there is a preference for non-society men. I think you will agree with me that that is within your Reference.

3142. I should hardly think it was, on the strict construction of it; we are only dealing with wages?—I bring it under this head—the "Greater Uniformity of interpretation and working"; then I believe the Fair Wage Resolution says that there shall be no preference for either union or non-union men.

3143. I do not think there is anything said in the Resolution about it?—Then I say that, outside the Resolution, it would come within the wording of the contract.

3144. Is the point that you wish to urge that there should be no preference between society men and non-society men?—That is the point I wish to urge.

3145. Is there anything further?—I do not think there is anything further I desire to touch upon. It is just possible that Mr. Bowerman and Mr. Kelly have touched upon some matters which have already been before us on the Federation of the Printing and Kindred Trades; but these are just two or three points which I thought it necessary to lay before you.

3146. (Mr. King.) You have mentioned apprenticeship; is apprenticeship a condition of membership of your society?—Yes. That was formerly purely a Trade Union rule, but it has been found to work so well in our own branch of the trade, that in the Memorandum in 1905 the employers agreed that it should become part and parcel of the new agreement.

3147. Is no one admitted to membership of your society unless he has served an apprenticeship?—There are a few exceptions. There are men who have climbed by their own exertions to a point of efficiency, and if direct evidence can be given of that efficiency, then it is within the power of the Council, upon that evidence being produced, to elect the man to membership. That is done on the basis of the rules. Our first rule is: "Any person applying for admission to this society must at the time of such application have the management of a printing machine; he must also have had the management of one during three consecutive years, and have served seven years to the business." The next Clause says: "In the event of the candidate having an indenture of less than seven years, or in lieu of an indenture producing a certificate of apprenticeship, the Council, on being satisfied that he is a competent workman and has been seven years at the business, shall have power to elect such candidate." That is but fair to the man who has climbed the ladder. The rule re apprentices reads as follows, and in the last agreement of June 7, 1905, it became part and parcel of the agreement: "In an office where only one journeyman is employed, there shall be allowed one apprentice, and two apprentices to four journeymen, provided such number of journeymen have been employed in the machine room six months. There must be three additional journeymen subject to the foregoing regulations for each additional apprentice." That, I might say, is acknowledged and carried out with great loyalty by the employers of London. They feel that in an office where there is one journeyman they are entitled to one apprentice, and that in other offices where there are four journeymen then there shall be two apprentices, and that as the firm grows, with the increase of journeymen and with the increase of machinery, provided the next three men have been in the firm six months, the firm is entitled to another apprentice. This works very well, and I may say that of late years it has become quite a custom with the employers to endorse the apprentices' indentures to the extent that they have served their time faithfully and well and that they have been attending technical classes. I am pleased to say that in many instances the employers are keeping them on as journeymen, and starting them on their journeymanship with a wage above the minimum rate. Our minimum rate is 39s. This apprenticeship question has always been a matter of interest to me. I might say that at the present time I am a member of the Industrial Education Committee started at the Guildhall, with Lord Selby in the chair. We have been sitting now for some time at one of the committee rooms of the House of Commons to study this apprenticeship question and see what can be done to revive an interest in the apprenticeship question, not only in the printing trade, but in all trades, with a view of building up the standard of efficiency in all branches of British labour. That is a move in the right direction. As I told the Committee—and I shall be very pleased to send you a copy of the address I delivered at that Committee meeting—in the printing trade there is no fear. In our own branch, the number of apprentices is maintained to-day as high as it was 20 or 30 years ago; and I believe it is the same with the compositors. Consequently, seeing that all these apprentices are paving their way to journeymanship, not on antiquated machines, but on up-to-date machinery, running with higher speeds than they were years ago, we think it infinitely unfair, viewing it that these lads are going on year by year towards journeymanship, that these women workers should be initiated into the mysteries of our own work at places like Wolverton, Crewe and Dunstable. Consequently, our members feel a certain amount of concern at this movement since 1891, and I think the effort which is being made by the Industrial Education Committee is a move in the right direction, and undoubtedly would be very much to the benefit of this country and its interests.

3148. (Mr. Hillier.) You spoke about the work going into the country being to the detriment of the London machine managers; when the contracts are given out, the whole of the contracts may go to the country, may they not?—Quite so; I believe it embraces the whole of the kingdom.

3149. Therefore, it is a misfortune only to the London men if a contract goes out of London?—We cannot bar that. But there is what is known as the Typographical Association, and in most districts I believe there is an agreement between the employers and the Typographical Association that the men shall get 30s. per week. Yet women are doing work at a very low rate of wages below the minimum agreed upon between the Typographical Association and the Master Printers; and that must be a menace to those workmen.

3150. I am speaking now not of the women, but of the lower wages paid to the men at Dunstable as compared with the rate of wages paid in London; I take it that of course the wages generally paid in Dunstable are lower than they are in London?—Yes.

3151. Therefore, you would expect your men to be paid less in Dunstable?—That is so. There are many of our members who do find positions in the provinces, and it is quite within order for them to go from London to, say, Leeds, Bradford, Sheffield or York, and secure a situation there at the standard rate of the town; but it obtains in most instances that our own members, when they do go to these places, merit and secure a better wage than the local rate.

3152. Therefore, it would not be an infringement, would it, of the Fair Wages Clause for the master to pay the wages that are current in the place where the work is carried out?—I take it that if that is done, then the whole thing is accomplished; but there seems to be some effort, from the standpoint of the men, to defeat that by employing women labour.

3153. I am not speaking of that; I am only directing my attention to men and men alone. It would not be an infringement, would it, of the Fair Wages Clause for the master to pay the rate current in the neighbourhood in which the work is carried out?—I do not think we should have so much to complain of if that was done.

3154. If Messrs. B. had no printing place in London and the whole of the work was done in Dunstable, and was done at the Dunstable rate of wages, that would not be an infringement of the Clause, would it?—But my claim in the first instance was this—that the rate current in Dunstable was a fancy rate established by Messrs. B.

3155. Will the rate of wages which Messrs. B. pay to their printers in Dunstable compare unfavourably with the rates paid to other trades in Dunstable?—I could not answer that question. Is it not to be expected of me but that my train of thought should always run on printing?

3156. Your men in London complain that the work is taken to Dunstable, and therefore they are deprived of work in London?—I think if Messrs. B. are contractors to His Majesty's Government in regard to printing, this necessity for losing time, while there are tons and tons of paper coming into London to be drafted down to Dunstable in order to keep that firm on full-time and over-time, should not exist; but that some of that work should be done here in London in order to keep the London men fully engaged upon the full-rate or the rate that obtains in London.

3157. But it is not an infringement, is it, of the Fair Wages Clause to send the work to Dunstable?—I can see what you are driving at. It is a moot point whether Messrs. B., seeing they have got two establishments, should have the right of differentiating between one and the other, and keeping one going full-time and the other one losing time.

3158. I only want to ask you whether you consider it an evasion of the Fair Wages Clause?—It is one of those points which it is mentioned in the Reference there should be a clearer understanding about.

3159. (Mr. Black.) I suppose the London men never move out to Dunstable?—No; and I am afraid they would get very little chance of an engagement there if they did.

3160. The firm never make them an offer?—No.

3161. How would your Society view it if they had a chance of going?—We have tried to make headway by organising the firm in Dunstable, and I believe the Typographical Association have made great efforts, but have not met with success.

3162. You mean, in order to set up what you would call a fair Dunstable rate, as it were?—Yes.

3163. That is, a rate the men from London could accept if they chose to move down?—Yes.

3164. But the firm have not accepted that?—They have not.

3165. Have you tried to do the same at Wolverton?—The Typographical Association would be the people to operate upon the Wolverton district.

3166. Is there no tendency for the London members to diminish? You have mentioned that Messrs. C. are not running on short time while Messrs. B. are; would not men perhaps drift over from one to the other? If the man at Messrs. B.'s is always losing a day a week, would he not be rather disposed to move over to a firm where he would not be doing that? Does not your argument rather presume that there is a fixed number of men at Messrs. B.'s?—Yes, that would be so.

3167. Why should the firm keep up that number? If all their London men are losing a day a week, they could afford to run their London house on a smaller number of men?—The bulk of the men who are employed at Messrs. B.'s London house are men who have been there for years; and men, when they have been in a firm for some considerable time, are somewhat reluctant in transferring their labour from that firm on a venture to another firm just because the other firm work a full week. At the same time, they might feel very strongly about it when, to their knowledge, a good deal of Government work is being drafted down to Dunstable, a portion of which could very well be done up here and so they could be kept on full time.

3168. If it were not for that wish to stick to the old firm, if, on the other hand, the men did move away, do you think the firm would gradually reduce their numbers in their London house?—There is not the number of men working there now that there was years ago. We had at one time 40 to 45 of our men employed there; but that is not so now.

3169. Your numbers are not very great then?—Not so great as they were.

3170. (Mr. Bailey.) Have you any branch of your Society at Wolverton?—We have no branch of our Society in the neighbourhood of Wolverton.

3171. Which is the nearest branch to Wolverton?—The nearest branch would be Watford or St. Albans.

3172. Would the same remark apply about Crewe? Have you no branch at Crewe?—No.

3173. Which would be the nearest branch to Crewe, do you think?—That would be covered by the area of the Typographical Association.

3174. That would apply also to Dunstable?—Yes.

3175. You tell us that female minders are employed at Dunstable; do you know any other firm than the Dunstable firm that employs female managers?—I do not know of any other firm in Dunstable.

3176. You do not know of anybody in London who employs female minders?—I do not know of a single case in London of a woman working a printing machine.

3177. They are simply employed as feeders, are they?—In some instances, they are employed as feeders; but there are very few instances of that.

3178. You have told us that you do not think that machine managing is quite feminine work, and I think you include also making-ready?—That is so.

3179. Will you tell us please why you think that is unsuitable for female labour?—Because that is part and parcel of the machine manager's work. The machine manager works the machine, he puts the forme on the machine in its rude state, and he has to make that forme ready through the impression of the bed and the cylinder, and get it prepared for running and produce the thing in good style, so that the work is produced in a creditable manner. That is all part of his work, and is the most important work of a printing machine manager.

3180. That is part of his training?—That is part of his training from the bottom step to the top step of the ladder.

3181. Still, I may take it that the making-ready is less rough and less dangerous than the actual machine minding, the running operation, is it not?—Yes; but the principle of making-ready is from the beginning to the end a matter of the judgment of the man in charge of the machine.

3182. We had a deputation from your Society, I think it was, at any rate from the Printing Trades' Federation, some months ago?—Are you referring to the time when we met Mr. McKenna?

3183. Yes. It was stated then that one of these firms that you have mentioned had one manager to look after two machines; does that state of things exist now, do you know?—Yes, I believe so. We do that in our own Society.

3184. You do what in your own Society?—Look after two machines within the terms of the agreement with the employers.

3185. You allow that, do you?—Yes, up to a certain size. Why I mentioned that was because these men or women are looking after two machines at exceedingly low rates of wages.

3186. (Mr. Wilson Fox.) I understand you object to the employment of women in connection with these machines, on principle?—I do.

3187. It is not a question of wages at all?—No. It is outside their sphere of work.

3188. I understand from your evidence that no matter what the rate of wages is that they are paid, you would still object to it?—That is so.

3189. Do you know approximately the number of women who are employed at Dunstable on this work that you object to?—I could not speak definitely as to the number.

3190. There are men employed there too, on the same sort of work, I suppose?—Yes.

3191. But you do not know the proportion of women employed there, compared with the proportion of men who are employed there? What I want to ascertain is whether they are a small or a large proportion; in other words, I want to ascertain the extent of your grievance at Dunstable on this matter?—I am told that the management consists of an overseer and four deputies, that there are 33 male machine minders, and that with the exception of about three, each minder has two machines to look after. There are also ten female machine minders on piece-work.

3192. Now as regards the wages in Dunstable for the men—not for the women. When you speak of the low wages obtaining in Dunstable, do you mean that they are lower wages than the London wages, or are you referring to the wages in Dunstable as being too low for Dunstable itself?—The rate is considerably below the rate acknowledged by the Typographical Association and the employers.

3193. Would that be for London?—No, for that particular country area.

3194. Could you say roughly offhand what other towns are included in the area which come within the rate which you think should be paid?—I should think, according to the last agreement between the employers and the Typographical Association, the rate should be 30s. or 31s. per week.

3195. What is the nearest town to Dunstable in which, at the present moment, that rate is obtainable?—I do not recollect.

3196. (Mr. Bailey.) Would it be Luton?—Yes, Luton would run favourable to that figure.

3197. (Mr. Wilson Fox.) Were Messrs. B. a party to that agreement?—That I cannot say.

3198. It is rather important if they are breaking their own agreement; I want to know whether they are doing that?—They are peculiar people to deal with. When our agreement was discussed and ratified between the Master Printers like Messrs. Harrison, Mr. Cecil Clay, Mr. Clowes and others, Messrs. B. wrote to the Master Printers and said that whatever was done in regard to this Memorandum we were placing before the employers, they would not bind themselves; but at the same time in London they have since acquiesced in the improved conditions that were the outcome of that Memorandum.

3199. In London, I understand, then, they pay the London rate?—Yes.

3200. It is only at Dunstable that you say they do not pay the rate which should be paid in the district?—I say it is a rate which is far too low.

3201. They do not pay the rate which you think ought to be paid in the district?—That is my opinion.

3202. And which other employers pay in the district—I do not mean necessarily in Dunstable, but in the district?—My point is that they are practically the only employers in the district, and I think I have mentioned that fact. They went to a spot which had no history as a printing centre.

3203. (Mr. Bailey.) But you say the Typographical Association's rates prevail there?—They should prevail there.

3204. (Mr. Wilson Fox.) I quite understand that they are the only people at Dunstable, but then you say, I gather, that there is a defined district within which the employers and the workmen have agreed that a certain minimum rate should be paid?—That is it.

3205. And that Messrs. B. do not pay the agreed rate which other employers in the district have agreed to pay?—That is so.

3206. And you also say that they ought to pay in Dunstable that district rate?—That is so. My case is placed before you in this way: That the introduction by this firm at Dunstable of women as printing machine managers is the chief thing that we object to.

3207. Your case, putting it quite shortly as regards the men, is that there is a district in which there is a current rate?—That is so.

3208. (Mr. Bailey.) In regard to this particular firm, you say that they have a fair house in London and an unfair house in Dunstable—using the terms "fair" and "unfair" always in their technical sense?—We have always considered it so.

3209. (Mr. Wilson Fox.) As regards these troubles in the country, your main troubles are in those districts where employers go out and set up works?—What do you mean as troubles?

3210. One of the chief troubles which exists, as regards the printing trade, in connection with the Fair Wages Clause, arises from the difficulties that have arisen in country districts, where employers have gone out and set up works and paid lower wages, there being no current rate?—They have deliberately gone out there because there is a possibility of a cheaper rate.

3211. It is in those cases where the chief trouble of that character exists?—That is so.

3212. In these country districts is there any reason why your Association and the Employers' Association, both pretty strong Associations, cannot come to an agreement across the table and define certain districts in which certain rates should be paid? You do it in London?—That would be a matter for the Typographical Association and the employers. It has already been done, and the establishment of a rate is accomplished.

3213. The agreement has not been entirely successful, because you complain of Dunstable, you complain again of Crewe, and you complain again of Wolverton?—That is so.

3214. There are three places of that character that you mention, and I want to know how it is or why it is that a strong Employers' Association and a strong men's Association, such as your industry has got, should not be able to agree within certain defined areas outside London what the rate should be, instead of your having these continual difficulties arising as to whether a fair rate has been paid or not. I want to know whether you cannot do in the country districts the same as you have accomplished for London?—It is just possible that we might meet with this statement of the employers, who say "You have got no jurisdiction over the country; you are in London." In that we differ. The men in London are bound to take an interest in the provincial area, but every effort made by the London societies to improve the status of working men in the country will no doubt be met with some amount of opposition, because the London employers say, "What has the country to do with you? We have got branch establishments in the country, and surely we can pay the local rate without any likelihood of any objection being raised, because you have no jurisdiction."

3215. Do you see why something of that sort of thing could not be done, from a practical point of view? Take a county like Suffolk, where the wages for agricultural labour, for instance, are very much the same all over the county, which shows that the conditions do not vary very much within the county; excluding Ipswich, would not the rates of wages in the county in the smaller towns present very similar features?—Can you put agricultural labour on the same plane as ours?

3216. No, I am not doing that; I am only pointing out that as agricultural labour is paid at about the same rate all over Suffolk, generally speaking, the industrial conditions and cost of living in that county are pretty much the same?—Yes. I am an East Anglian myself.

3217. I take the lowest paid labour as an illustration. If you go, for instance, to Hertfordshire, you will find the agricultural wages will vary considerably, but as you are an East Anglian, I think you will agree that, excluding Ipswich, the industrial conditions throughout Suffolk would be pretty much the same. Could you not therefore agree upon a rate for every employer who put works down anywhere in Suffolk, outside of Ipswich?—The matter is being taken up already, with a view to securing rates of wages over certain districts.

3218. I take Suffolk as an easy case; you are an East Anglian, and will know the facts; I should think that is a pretty easy county to carry out such a system. One foresees this sort of trouble will go on continually wherever works are put up in a country district, unless some areas are defined and agreements come to between the parties. Could not your two associations agree between yourselves?—I do not think it would be possible for any agreement to be arrived at by which the machine-managing section of the printing trade would recognise women's work on printing machines.

3219. That is a different point, of course?—Taking the whole broad question, I think there is an agreement in existence at the present moment which was made some three or four years ago between the Typographical Association and the Employers' Association for a certain rate; for instance, assuming a certain radius right round London, say for 30 miles, it should be 30s. or 31s.; then beyond that, you would open up the question for a special agreement, so long as it did not come in where there are great centres.

3220. Do you see why it could not be done?—Wherever it is possible, it should be done.

3221. Do you think these questions about country wages will be settled until your two associations do it?—Undoubtedly the low wage conditions of which I complain are due to failure in not getting that done.

3222. Is there anything else you would like to say?—No, I do not think there is.

The witness withdrew.

Mr. William Coffey, called; and Examined.

3223. (Mr. Wilson Fox.) You are the Secretary of the London Consolidated Society of Journeymen Bookbinders, are you not?—Yes.

3224. And you come to give us some information with regard to your views upon the Fair Wages Clause?—Yes.

3225. Would you tell us what your points are—you probably will prefer to do so in your own way—and then we can ask you specific questions upon them?—I want chiefly to call the Committee's attention to the fact that our unions have an agreement with the representative body of the employers, that is to say, with all the employers who are associated with what is known as the Bookbinding Section of the London Chamber of Commerce.

3226. Does that cover more than London?—No; that only embraces the London employers.

3227. It is confined to the London district then?—

To the London district of the London unions. I have a copy of the agreement here. (Handing in same.)

3228. (Chairman.) What is the particular point that you wish to emphasise?—The particular point that I wish to emphasise is the number of times that contracts for work from the Stationery Office are given to houses that we regard as unfair; that is to say, houses not complying with the conditions agreed to between ourselves and our representative employers.

3229. Do you keep a list of them?—Yes.

3230. All that the Fair Wages Clause binds the employer to do is to pay the current rate of wages; I suppose you understand that?—Yes.

3231. Are these firms you complain of not paying the current rate?—Yes; that is the chief complaint we have to make against them.

3232. How do they evade the requirement of paying the current rate?—I think their chief method is to employ young boys in the early stages; they grow up in the firm without being apprenticed until they reach, say, 18 or 20; until then they are working at a low rate of wages, and then when they begin to grow into men and want an increased wage, they are dismissed and other young boys taken on in their place.

3233. Do you hold that the work cannot be efficiently done by these boys?—Yes, we do.

3234. Are the employers satisfied with the work that they get?—Those employers may be.

3235. Is the Government satisfied with the work it gets from them?—That I am not in a position to say. I should think that probably the officials of the Stationery Office would be the best gentlemen to say anything about that.

3236. If it should turn out that the boys do the work efficiently and to the satisfaction of the contractor and of the Government who make the contract with him, have you any substantial objection to their being employed?—Yes, I have an objection.

3237. What is it?—It is perhaps putting it in rather a curious way, but I consider it is contrary to public policy to keep boys in such a way—to grind them down to the lowest figure that they can get them for, and then turn them out into the world without any provision for the future.

3238. In fact, it is on the ground of the harm that it does to the boys that you object to it?—That is one of our grounds certainly.

3239. Is it not the only ground?—It is detrimental to the trade generally. I think this tendency of employing boys and girls, young people generally, upon a sub-section or one branch of the trade is injurious to the trade as a whole. They never teach these boys or girls to do their work thoroughly right through; they simply pin them down to one particular section or sub-section we may call it, of the trade, and they never get beyond that; then when these young people arrive at an age when they want to strike out and get a living for themselves, they are unable to do it.

3240. Could they not go on doing that one section which they have learnt?—No; because as they approach the age of manhood or womanhood they want more money, and the employer naturally will not give it to them.

3241. How do you propose to meet this difficulty: that there appears to be a certain amount of work in your trade which can be done by almost an unskilled form of labour—say by boys and girls?—I have not the slightest doubt you will find something in every trade that can be done in that way. We have attempted to meet that by drawing up a definition as to what should be the work of journeymen and apprentices, and what work might be done by what we term female or unskilled male labour. We have come to an agreement upon that, which is a fairly understandable one, and it has worked fairly well with the bulk of the employers in London for several years past now. It is only through these under-cutting methods of the houses that we regard as unfair that that has been infringed upon.

3242. Is not the action of these houses a symptom of the pressure which they feel in their business, to get unskilled work done by unskilled hands, and to leave the better work for the more skilled hands?—I should hardly be disposed to admit that, because I think that it is not due to the pressure that is put upon them, but that it is due to a disposition on the part of those employers to compete unscrupulously wherever they can get an opportunity, for any kind of work, whether it is good, bad, or indifferent. They might begin with the cheaper class of work, but they are sure to cut into the better class of work afterwards.

3243. On the assumption that we have been discussing, the better class of work does require the better class of man, and he will probably always secure the higher rate of wages; but do you not think it is possible that even the skilled workman himself has something to gain by confining himself to the skilled work and leaving the unskilled work to a lower form of labour?—There, I think, the necessity for a very clear definition comes in, as to where we are going to draw the line between skilled and unskilled.

3244. You would probably admit that it is possible to draw the line somewhere?—Quite so. We have made the attempt ourselves, as I say, and you will see in the copy of the agreement that I have given you what was the attempt that we made to draw the line between certain kinds of work.

3245. Then it is really a question of where the line should be drawn, rather than a demand that your men should do the better work?—There are certain parts of the work which we freely admit might be done by an unskilled man.

3246. It is really only a question of what parts should be done in that way, and what should not?—That is part of the question.

3247. Have you any other point you wish to mention? Do you wish to bring before us some other way in which the contractors evade the operation of the Fair Wages Clause?—I was only going to urge that it might be possible for the officials of the Stationery Office to exercise something in the nature of supervision with respect to the houses that they give work out to. I do not know whether that would be asking too much; perhaps it is. From our point of view, the proper means of entering the trade is by apprenticeship, and we have never abandoned that. There may have been some employers who have attempted in practice to do it, but as a rule the bulk of our employers still retain the old form of apprenticeship. It is manifestly, from our point of view, very unfair for a boy to have served seven years to a trade and then to come out of his time and find himself obliged, in a manner of speaking, to compete with this form of cheap labour, which is sure to be on the increase unless some kind of check is put upon it.

3248. You wish, in fact, to maintain apprenticeship as one condition of your trade?—Yes.

3249. Is that being undermined by this cheap class of labour?—It is undoubtedly.

3250. Is that tendency growing?—I do not say it is growing rapidly, but there is a tendency that way.

3251. (Mr. King.) Have you complained to the Stationery Office about these unfair houses?—Complaints have been made occasionally, but I have only made one complaint recently myself with regard to a house, though we have several houses of which we do complain.

3252. What was the answer that you got in that case?—That an inquiry had been made and a reply received from the firm. The firm apparently contended that they were doing what they had a right to do.

3253. Under your conditions, is the number of boys limited?—Yes, the number of apprentices in proportion to journeymen is limited.

3254. That is laid down in the conditions, is it?—Yes; it is one apprentice to three journeymen.

3255. You say you recognise that there is unskilled work; in the case of a fair house, would you object to any more boys being admitted for the unskilled work, or would you let the employer take any additional boys or women on for that work?—So long as they were confined to that work, certainly we should not object.

3256. You would not expect the apprentices to be put on that then?—No. We should not interfere. If the employer liked to put an apprentice on to it, and if the apprentice was content to remain on plain, common labour of that kind for a time, we should make no objection. It would be the boy or his parents who would take the responsibility of that.

3257. Even under your conditions there is no very strict limit, then, as to the number of boys which can be employed?—There is that limit of the number of boys that can be indentured to the bookbinding. Beyond that we should not say anything about it.

3258. What area does your agreement cover?—We say London; but we have not any strictly defined radius, as we did not draw up a definition. I might mention that in correspondence with the London County Council some time ago the Council, without urging on our part, voluntarily conceded to us that the radius might be 20 miles.

3259. (Mr. Black.) What is your membership?—I represent altogether three unions here to-day—my own (the London Consolidated), which has 1,250 members; the Society of Day Working Bookbinders, which has about 350 members, and the London Branch of the Bookbinders Consolidated Union, which has about 950 members, making in all about 2,400 or 2,500.

3260. You do a great deal of Government work, I suppose?—I do not hear of a great deal being done, except the contract that Messrs. Truscott do, which was formerly done at Eyre and Spottiswoode's. That is done by our men. In regard to those occasional orders for military drill-books and other books that are given out, some of our houses do occasionally get them to do. I might mention that I had several conversations with some of our employers upon this question some time ago when the matter was raised—it has been raised from time to time. Mr. Leighton and Mr. Nevett, at the time when we appeared before the arbitrator, and when we were moving for an advance of wages (that was in 1903), complained very strongly before the arbitrator about it; and I have a letter from Mr. Nevett, who is the Secretary to the London Bookbinding Section of the Chamber of Commerce, in which he also complains. He says he has got tired of tendering, and he would just as soon have his name off the list as on, because he never succeeds in getting a contract. He is complaining of what he calls the under-cutting.

3261. All I was aiming at was to find out whether the Government bookbinding that you touch is a very big thing, because you do not touch account bookbinding?—That is so; the account bookwork would not come within our scope.

3262. We have had the vellum binders' representative here. The amount of bookbinding for the Government that the societies you represent would do is comparatively small, I think?—It is, I dare say, in comparison.

3263. (Mr. Bailey.) Still, it is a largish amount?—Yes, it runs into a pretty considerable amount.

3264. (Mr. Black.) How many employers stand outside; is it a big number that you consider of unfair houses?—No, I do not call it a very big number. The greater number of the London employers are within the agreement.

3265. How many altogether would there be standing out, do you think, that you would class as unfair?—As far as my recollection goes, I should say, perhaps, a dozen; I do not think there would be more.

3266. Are there as many as that?—There might be a dozen; I cannot call the names to mind very much.

3267. That does not matter. How many would there be on the fair list and how many on the unfair list?—We have not concerned ourselves to draw up a list of unfair houses. We say it is no use for a man to apply there, as he would be sure not to be employed. On our fair list we have about 80 names, and they comprise the greater number of London employers.

3268. Could you give me a rough indication of the proportion of unskilled to skilled in a fair house, from your point of view, and in an unfair house? You say you have come to an agreement with certain houses as to what is a fair proportion between the skilled and the unskilled, do you not?—Hardly that.

3269. I know it is not quite worked out as a proportion, but it would come to that roughly, I gather?—The unskilled work would be chiefly work that is done by women, such as sewing and folding, and not very much more. From the time the book comes down from the women sewn, the various operations are claimed by us.

3270. Take any house that you are acquainted with and take their total numbers, and tell us how many would be unskilled out of that total?—I should think there would be very few, perhaps three or four out of a house employing 60 men. I am very well acquainted with the house of Messrs. A.; the number of journeymen they usually employ would be about 60; there would be 20 apprentices, and then I do not think that the persons who might be classed as unskilled would number more than five or six, perhaps.

3271. Under your rules you would take that as a fair number—five or six to 60?—Yes. Some of them would be employed carrying things about, packing shavings up, unloading vans, opening parcels, and that kind of thing.

3272. Can you think of an unfair house and give me the same relative numbers for it?—I have not any close acquaintanceship with the interior arrangements of any unfair house; but in the house of Messrs. B. there are six non-Society men working 53 hours; they are receiving 30s. to 32s. a week, and a great part of the work otherwise is done by girls on piecework, who earn from 9s. to 12s. a week; there might be 20 or 30 of those. In such a house as that they might occasionally employ one of our men if they were pressed. We had an instance at a firm, where they took on two or three of our men, or rather the men went there and applied for work. They worked there for a couple of months, and as soon as the work dropped down they were the first to be dismissed. We do not grumble at that, but we do grumble at them taking the work and getting it done at such a miserable price as they pay so frequently.

3273. (Mr. Bailey.) I think you claim, do you not, that the employment of boys and girls to do piecework leads subsequently to a great deal of unemployment?—Yes.

3274. That, in fact, the boys and girls are partially trained only, and when they grow up only serve to swell the ranks of the unemployed?—That is it.

3275. You say the proportion of fair houses to unfair houses, so far as you know, is about 80 to 12?—Yes, so far as I know, I should say it is.

3276. Do you claim that the unfair houses do less satisfactory work than the fair houses?—I am not able to state that from my own knowledge, so I would rather, perhaps, not say. I do not wish to commit myself to anything I could not substantiate.

3277. (Mr. Wilson Fox.) Do I understand that it is only in these 12 houses that you have this trouble about the employment of these boys?—It is only in those houses.

3278. I want to know the extent of your grievance. In these other 80 houses you have no trouble about the employment of boys; it is only in these 12 houses?—Quite so.

3279. And I suppose only a few of those 12 houses—or, at any rate, not all of them—are doing Government work?—Perhaps all of them occasionally; of course, I could not speak positively as to that.

3280. I will not press you on that then. You say that some of those boys who are employed by what you call these unfair houses are doing such rough work as packing shavings?—Then I was speaking generally—of the fair houses as well as the unfair houses. That kind of work would be done by unskilled men, of course.

3281. But those boys who are introduced who are not apprentices, and whose employment you rather object to, are they from the first doing quite unskilled work?—They would be boys who are kept in the shop. They would be put to the elementary parts of the work first, such as glueing the covers or something of that kind, and they would be taken on for the express purpose of doing some part of the work that we should claim as ours.

3282. Do I understand that this particular class of boys are doing very much the same sort of work that your apprentices are doing?—Just so.

3283. But you complain that they are not kept so long at the work as the apprentices are, and do not get so good a training as the apprentices get?—These boys would be kept longer on one sub-division of the work until they become pretty well expert at that particular line; but as they grow up they would learn nothing else, and they would be cast upon the world to get their living in the best way they could.

3284. Your grievance is that it is really prejudicing your apprentices, because these boys cut in subsequently and do certain work which has been done by the apprentices who have gone through the mill and have done a good many years of it, and so they do not reap the full benefit of their apprenticeship subsequently, because they have in competition with them less skilled men at lower rates of wages?—Yes, that is right.

3285. Could not these boys who are not apprentices become journeymen, with the amount of education that they get in the trade?—In many cases where they are sufficiently pushing they float about from one house to another and become fairly competent; then they do join the union and obtain their full rate of wages.

3286. (Chairman.) Do you not think it is possible that this increasing employment of boys is a kind of substitute for apprenticeship?—It might be a kind of substitute, but it is a very detrimental one from our point of view.

3287. And is it so from the boy's point of view, too?—I think so.

3288. He would be doing better as an apprentice, you think?—I do.

3289. But he would not be getting as much wages, I suppose?—No, naturally.

3290. Still, he would be getting a better education?—Yes.

3291. (Mr. Wilson Fox.) You limit the number of apprentices yourselves, I suppose?—Yes, we limit the number, and the employers do not complain of it; on the other hand they acquiesce, and we find, taking the whole trade through, that the employers do not avail themselves to the full extent that they might do in indenturing apprentices.

3292. (Chairman.) Is it boy labour or girl labour that you are most affected by?—We are affected to some extent by young-man labour, and we are affected to some extent by girl labour also—in the case-making especially: that is, in making the covers.

3293. Do you object to that on principle?—Yes, we do.

3294. That must be on a different ground to the one you took up as regards the boys, I think?—We should object to it on the ground of the cheapening and the cutting of the prices, and so depriving them of opportunities of earning their living at the trade they have served their apprenticeship to.

3295. Then I come back to the old question, which is, if there is in any business a certain amount of labour which is suitable for women, and which they can do properly, have men any right to claim it for themselves, to the exclusion of the women?—Of course, we do claim it; but looking at it from that point of view, I should say if the conditions were equalised in the payment of the wages, if the girls and women were paid equal to the men for the same class of work, I do not know that we would have any great objection. If that could be established, you would find immediately that the employers would not keep women on. Their only object in putting women and girls on to this class of work is to enable them to cut in and get contracts cheaper.

3296. You do not admit that if women can work at a cheaper rate than men, they ought to be allowed to do so then?—I do not feel disposed to admit it as a general principle.

3297. You see what the result would be of your principle if it were enforced; women would not be employed at all?—I do not see that, because we should be quite disposed, as we always have been, to agree to a definition of what might be women's work and what not. As a matter of fact, ours is one of the trades in which women have always been largely engaged in one way or the other, chiefly, of course, on the folding and sewing.

3298. Could you, on principle, define it in any other way than that woman's work is work which she can do efficiently? Can you, as men, claim anything which a woman can do efficiently and properly?—We should claim the work as a whole; that is to say, the binding of the book after it leaves the sewing we claim as a whole. It is admitted on all hands that the women could not do the work right out—there are some parts of the work too heavy, and so on. Because certain parts of the work are light and capable of being done either by a woman or by a boy, we do not agree that they should be allowed to do them, or that the employer should have the right to pick and choose, and say, "Well, you can do this little portion, while the men can do the heavier and more difficult part." We say the work as a whole should be man's work. We can pick work out like that in almost any trade.

3299. No doubt; but what I should like you to tell me is why the employer should not be allowed to pick that work out, and why a woman should not be allowed to do anything she can?—I do not know that there would be, as I say, a very great objection taken by us on that part, supposing the conditions of recompense were equalised.

3300. (Mr Wilson Fox.) Supposing the man and the woman were paid the same piece-work rate, a system under which both men and women were paid according to their output, would you object to that?—We should object to men being forced down to the women's rate.

3301. Supposing you levelled up the women's piece-work rate to the men's?—I do not see that we should have very much objection to that.

3302. Then they could be paid according to their output?—On reasonable grounds I do not see that we could object. I would like to hand in a copy of our price list, with the arbitrator's award. That will show that our employers and ourselves have been working on very good terms for a number of years, and that we have always been able to arrange our matters in a reasonable way, without anything in the nature of serious trouble.

The witness withdrew.

Mr. Frederick Charles Tolhurst, called; and Examined.

3303. (Chairman.) You represent the Amalgamated Society of Lithographic Artists, Designers, Engravers and Process-Workers, I think?—Yes.

3304. Is that a large Society?—It has a membership of 1,500.

3305. All in London?—No; there are 500 in London.

3306. Is there much Government work done in your trade?—No, very little.

3307. But you have had experience of Government contracts?—Yes.

3308. And you know of the presence of the Fair Wages Clause in them?—Yes.

3309. What complaints do you make of the working of it?—A contract has been given from a Government office for process work to a process firm, and this firm, in the conduct of its business does not pay the minimum rate to all its employees as journeymen, and they work an excessive amount of overtime at which only ordinary pay is given.

3310. In what way do they pay less than the rate? How do they explain it?—For example, the minimum rate is 45s. weekly ——

3311. Is that generally agreed on?—The majority of the firms are paying that amount.

3312. In London, you mean?—Yes.

3313. It is less in the Provinces, I suppose?—It would be less.

3314. You complain that some houses do not pay as much as 45s.?—One house in particular who accept work on a Government contract do not pay in every instance that minimum rate.

3315. Do they pay it on other work than Government work?—Yes, they pay it in their fine-etching department.

3316. Is it in some special department they do not pay the full rate?—Yes; on their line work, which is done for the Stationery Office.

3317. Have you complained about it?—Yes, we have complained to the firm. We wrote to them pointing out the position which we are occupying, stating that 45s. was the minimum rate, and we trusted that they would conform to those conditions as contractors to H.M. Government.

3318. What did they say?—Their reply is as follows: "To the Amalgamated Society of Lithographic Artists, Designers, Engravers and Process-workers. June 17th, 1907. Dear Sir,—In reply to yours of the 15th, we have made inquiries in the trade about your Society, and have been unable to find any workmen belonging to it. We have also found that neither the masters nor the men recognise an official union in this trade, and under these circumstances we must decline any further correspondence with you. As regards H.M. Stationery Office, we shall be very pleased to put full details before them if called upon to do so, and have no doubt that we can fully satisfy them. Yours truly, ——."

3319. Did you pursue that?—Regarding this letter, we have a membership of 500 in the London branch, 300 members are in this particular branch of process engravers, and we have members in every firm of repute in London. So the value of the inquiries they made is practically nil. We approached the Stationery Office on that question, and their reply was: "After most careful consideration and inquiry, the Controller is unable to take any action in this matter."

3320. You say there is not an agreed rate between the employers and the men, but in practice 45s. is admitted as a minimum?—Yes.

3321. By the majority?—Yes, that is so.

3322. You also mention something about excessive overtime being worked in that firm?—Yes. There is an excessive amount of overtime that is taken advantage of, because they only pay the ordinary rates for the overtime. As recently as last Tuesday, February 4th, two journeymen were working all night, and it is a frequent occurrence, being favoured by the conditions on which they pay the men, that is, at the ordinary time rates.

3323. They were working voluntarily, I suppose?—Subject to their dismissal. It was the order of the firm that they should do so.

3324. As a matter of fact, do the firm require it?—With their present staff they do.

3325. They insist upon it?—Yes. There are strict orders that they are to work.

3326. If those two men had refused to work, they would have been dismissed, would they?—They would have been subject to dismissal.

3327. And they are paid, you say, at the ordinary rate?—Quite so.

3328. What rate is that?—The ordinary rate of pay at so much per hour.

3329. 45s. per week?—In that department less in three instances.

3330. Is it the general practice in the trade to pay overtime at time and a quarter?—The practice in the trade is, I regret to say, an irregular one. I would press the point that many firms are engaged in the process-work, but numbers do pay that rate, and under the Fair Wage Resolution if a man's time is demanded in excess of ordinary time, then time and a quarter is the established fair rate that he should be paid.

3331. Is it established in your trade; that is what I want to get at?—It is one of the rules of our Society.

3332. Is that rule accepted by the employers generally?—It is conformed to in a number, but not in the whole of the cases.

3333. In the majority of cases, is it?—I could not say entirely in the majority.

3334. Is it more or less commonly admitted than the 45s. rate? Are there more employers who pay the 45s. rate than there are who admit your overtime rule?—More are paying the 45s. rate than are paying the overtime rate.

3335. In fact, the 45s. rate is more generally accepted than the overtime rule?—Yes. I may point out that this branch of industry is one where individual talent has to be recognised, and we only regard the 45s. rate as a minimum rate. It is not all mechanical ability; it is left to one's individual capability, and on that payment is made.

3336. Do you think that these people who are getting less than 45s. are men of less than average ability?—No, they are not. They have one man there who was receiving 55s. per week prior to his taking a situation there. The offer of the firm to him was that 40s. was all they could pay.

3337. (Mr. Bailey.) Why did he leave the old firm?—A change of workmen took place; it was through no misconduct.

3338. (Chairman.) Have you any other point you want to bring forward?—I bring this matter forward as an instance where a firm has accepted a Government contract, when the conditions that exist at the firm are not fair conditions. In regard to the reply that we received from the Stationery Office, whilst we value the attention that was given to the matter, yet as it is simply an expression of inability to take action in the matter, it appears to us that it is a morally unsound position to be in, to be unable, under circumstances of that character, to secure conditions that should be, for example, a model to the industry. The inquiries that we made showed that their rates are on a low scale.

3339. Your complaint refers only to the rate of wages and the overtime rate?—That is our complaint.

3340. Do you employ in your trade many boys and women?—There are a number of boys. Women are occasionally employed, and one firm has a number of them.

3341. (Mr. Wilson Fox.) This particular industry is a somewhat exceptional one, I suppose, because the men's capacity varies so much?—Yes.

3342. Therefore, employers would be more tempted, I presume, in this particular trade to pay men according to their capacity than they would in certain other trades where the men are more likely to be more level in their work?—That is so.

3343. I suppose that is the way the trouble comes in—that they pick and choose, and that they try to pay the best price to the best man who does the best work, and to pay the worst man according to his ability?—Yes.

3344. And that makes the wages paid not uniform?—In some firms we have members who are earning £6 a week, and other members who are earning down to the minimum of 45s.

3345. And that makes the men who are paid less grumble when they see the higher wages paid to the other men, I suppose?—Yes; but no complaint is lodged when there is not a lower rate paid than the minimum.

3346. You think that is so?—The complaint that has been lodged has been solely on the ground that there are capable workers in that firm on Government work receiving less than our minimum rate.

3347. But still there is a good deal of inequality in the wages paid?—Undoubtedly.

3348. Owing to the varied capacity of the men for this work, which is of a skilled nature?—Yes.

3349. As regards the overtime, I suppose the employer would be more likely to ask the best men, the more highly skilled men, to work overtime, would he not, when there is overtime? He would not be likely to ask the worst men to work overtime, would he?—He would study the wage; that would be one consideration, I think.

3350. But he would have to get the work up to a certain standard?—Yes.

3351. Would not the more skilled man be more likely to be urged to work overtime than the less skilled man?—Undoubtedly an employer would rightly use his judgment as to the one who was best suited for the class of work that was required to be done.

3352. Is there much overtime?—At this firm there is particularly an excess of overtime.

3353. It is one particular firm that you lay stress upon?—Yes, where the Government contract is being executed.

3354. What do you call "much overtime"? Do you mean where the men would be working one night or two nights a week extra?—In one case 52 hours a week overtime was worked.

3355. How many men?—That applies to one case. In the line department they are working generally up to 9 o'clock of an evening, and on Thursday night, January 30th, there were two journeymen who were working through the night, and also two journeymen who were working all night on Tuesday, February 4th.

3356. And they would only be paid their ordinary rate of wages?—That is the rate they are paid at.

3357. I am not defending overtime; I only want to get the facts. Do you find that the married men are rather anxious to take overtime work?—Overtime has an attraction to a worker, because of his family ties; if they are expensive, it comes in handy at the end of the week. They will do a certain amount of slavery a week to obtain that financial gain.

3358. The married men not infrequently hold themselves out for overtime, do they not, and are rather anxious to get it?—There is a natural tendency that way, because of what it brings in on Saturday. It is human nature in a certain direction; men will do themselves harm to gain their end. Legislation is the only thing which prevents many men acting contrary to their own interests and to the interests of the community.

3359. I was only trying to ascertain how far overtime is forced upon the men, or how far a certain number of the men were not unwilling to undertake it. I am not going into the question whether they are paid fairly or unfairly at the present moment; I am only wanting to find out whether there is not a certain amount of competition for overtime amongst a certain class of men?—I understand.

3360. (Mr. Bailey.) You have read a letter to us from the company concerned, in which they said that they had been unable to find any workmen belonging to your Society?—Yes.

3361. Is it the fact or not that the Society is recognised by the majority of houses in London? I am not saying whether it should be recognised or not, but whether it is?—No; the present position of the Society is not recognised by the employers as an official body.

3362. (Chairman.) But the rate is recognised, I understood you to say?—The rate is paid.

3363. (Mr. Bailey.) There has been no agreement as to a minimum rate, has there?—No.

3364. You claim, and very rightly claim, too, that you are not ordinary artificers, and that artistic merit in a man must have a great deal to do with his value; but that artistic merit would not necessarily increase as he went on?—In years?

3365. Yes; in years and in experience, too?—It would increase to an extent; when time would bring a decline of that ability.

3366. I see that your rules are headed "Manchester"?—Yes.

3367. Did you emanate from Manchester?—Yes; the Society was founded in Manchester in 1885.

3368. Am I correct in assuming that you are stronger in the Provinces than you are in London?—Yes, that is the position.

3369. (Mr. Black.) How many men do you suppose there will be in the trade in London altogether, taking both union and non-union men?—I have not formed an estimate of that.

5370. Do you know what proportion your 500 would represent of the total?—We estimate there are about 1,000, so we consider we are about 50 per cent.

3371. You think you are about half?—Yes.

3372. And yet you are not officially recognised to any great extent by the employers?—That is so.

3373. Do you think 45s. is earned as a minimum by the non-union men, speaking generally?—In the majority of cases they would be earning that.

3374. So it is not merely a rate which your Union has tried to establish, but it is a rate which is paid to a great many men who are not connected with the Union?—Yes. The class of work is such that 45s. is really a low weekly wage for it, and there is no difficulty in getting that amount.

3375. Which has the Union got hold of—the better workers, or perhaps not the best?—The better workers. It is the ne'er-do-weels and the careless ones that in no way provide for their future. Certainly there are exceptions in regard to ability, and through their self-superiority they can stand alone.

3376. (Mr. Hillier.) What are the hours for 45s. a week?—46½.

3377. In the case of those who work overtime at night, when does their overtime commence and what are their hours?—Their hours would vary from half-past eight in the morning till six, or from nine till half-past six.

3378. And the overtime commences after that time?—Yes.

3379. Now with regard to those who are working at night, do they commence early in the morning, or do they commence late in the day?—They would commence at nine the next morning.

3380. When do those who work during the night commence their work is what I want to know? There are no night shifts, are there?—There are at some houses—those houses that get plates ready for the newspapers have a proper night or late staff.

3381. In those cases the night staff would come under the ordinary rate, would they not?—Yes. They are not paid an extra rate, but their hours are shorter and that compensates them for the time of the day in which they are occupied.

3382. (Mr. King.) You say you are stronger in Manchester; is your Society recognised there?—Throughout the provincial towns there is recognition, as the employers are more in touch with the Society and its members than they are in London.

3383. But there is no formal agreement between yourselves and the employers, even in Manchester?—No, that has not been attained. Things have gone on smoothly, and it has not been pressed in that direction.

3384. Do you expect 45s. at Manchester, or less?—The minimum rate is 42s .in Manchester and in the Provinces, and as low as 35s. in Aberdeen.

3385. (Chairman.) What proportion of your members are getting the 45s. minimum?—There are none receiving less, unless there are a few exceptional cases which have not come to our notice.

3386. Then they are all getting it?—Or above. 45s. is reckoned by the majority of our members as a low rate; the average is more like 50s. and £3 a week.

3387. What proportion of the houses are paying less than 45s. as a minimum?—The rates vary so, and it would only apply in a number of houses to certain members on the staff.

3388. There appear to be a certain number of houses who do not recognise your 45s. as a minimum?—There will be a certain percentage of houses that have a few who are below the minimum rate.

3389. Are there any houses which conform entirely to your 45s. rate and have nobody below the minimum?—75 per cent., I should say, would be the average.

3390. The average of what?—I mean that 75 per cent. of the workers are receiving the minimum or above.

3391. My question was, what proportion of the firms are paying 45s. or more, and are paying no one less; in other words, what proportion of the houses recognise your 45s. as a minimum? I am not referring to the proportion of the employees, but to the proportion of houses?—I do not know what proportion that would be.

3392. You said the 45s. minimum was generally accepted by the employers, and what I am wanting to get at is the statistics on which you base that statement?—If it were simply our position as a Trade Union, this matter would not be brought forward. It is a matter of fair conditions, apart from our Trade Union position.

3393. All we have got to deal with is the payment of the current rate; you say the current rate is a minimum of 45s., and I want to know how many houses recognise that minimum and do not go below it?—I have acknowledged that our Society is not officially recognised.

3394. I am not on the question of the recognition of your Society, but on the question of this matter of fact—how many houses recognise the 45s. minimum? —Whose employees do not receive less than 45s.?

3395. Yes, that is it?—I should not think there would be amongst the whole of our members 5 per cent.——

3396. Now you are going back to your members; I want to know the number of houses?—That I could not give you.

3397. Your original statement was that the 45s. rate, as a minimum, was generally accepted by the employers; then I ask you on that what proportion of the employers have accepted that 45s. minimum?— I perhaps had better amend that. Our members receive that minimum.

3398. That, of course, is quite a different thing. You are not then in a position to say that the 45s. minimum is generally recognised?—I trust I have not misled any member of the Committee on that matter. Our Society is not officially recognised.

3399. I must repeat that I am not on that point at all. What I want to know is the number of houses who recognise, not your Society, but the 45s. as the minimum wage that ought to be paid?—I do not know the number that that would apply to.

3400. Are there any?—Yes.

3401. There are some houses which do not pay less than 45s. to anybody?—Yes.

3402. About how many houses do you think?—That would include, of course, a variety of houses, both lithographic and process. I could not give you the numbers of them.

The witness withdrew.

ELEVENTH DAY.

Thursday, 13th February, 1908.

At 32, Great George Street, Westminster, S.W.

PRESENT:

Sir GEORGE H. MURRAY, K.C.B. (Chairman).

Mr. R. Bailey, M.V.O.
Mr. F. W. Black.
Mr. H. De la Bère, C.B.
Mr. A. Wilson Fox, C.B.
Mr. J. H. Hillier,
Mr. A. F. King.

Mr. J. J. Wills (Secretary).

Mr. George Power, called and examined.

3403. (Chairman.) You represent the Midland Leather Trades Federation, I think?—Yes.

3404. What trades does the Federation cover?— The whole of the leather trades—riding saddles, bridles, harness and accoutrement work.

3405. Is that confined to the Midlands?—Yes, to the Walsall and Birmingham district.

3406. Is the whole of the Government work done in that district?—Yes; all kinds of Government work in leather are done in our district.

3407. How many members do the societies in your Federation include?—600.

3408. Have you had much experience in the working of the Fair Wages Clause?—I have represented these people now for 11 years.

3409. I mean, have you had much trouble with it? —Yes, we have had a great deal of trouble, and I will say it has entailed more trouble these last four years.

3410. The trouble has been increasing, has it?— Yes.

3411. Is it mostly on the question of wages?—Yes. The majority of the industries are not on time pay; they are piece-workers.

3412. You have got a list of piece-work prices, I suppose?—Yes.

3413. Is that generally accepted in your district?— Yes.

3414. By all the employers?—Yes.

3415. Where is it exactly that the difficulty comes in that causes the trouble?—Because the list is not accepted in all branches.

3416. What branch is it not generally accepted in? —Take, for instance, the harness makers at the present time. I have a list here of the riding saddle makers which is signed by both the societies—the employers' and the employees'. We have a complaint lodged with reference to the current rate on the making of officers' saddles. The price is based on this list which is to be in existence till 1910, and we claim an infringement of the current rate has been done of late during the winter months at Messrs. A.'s, of Birmingham.

3417. What is the nature of the difficulty?—I might say that on October 5th, the employers in our district had the pleasure of receiving a tender for officers' saddles; on October 9th we met the employers and arranged from this book of prices that that saddle was to be at the rate of 22s. piece-making; and the contracts were sent in on October 12th. This firm received a contract. They are members of this Association that I am speaking of. When they got that contract, instead of adhering to the rate agreed on, they employed labour on time pay, and sweated that labour at a cheap rate. The contract says they shall be "competent workmen"; but by employing labour on this system, they let in incompetent workmen. The principle in making a riding saddle in its proper sense is that a man to make it properly must make it through; but in doing it on this system of time pay at a cheap rate, rushing the men with the work to get it executed, they bring in a swift man who does not understand his business and a lot of it is covered up when the article is finished and is unseen.

3418. It is bad work in fact, you mean?—Yes, but it is unseen, being covered up. When the examiner takes up that article, it is out of his sight, he cannot see it and cannot find it out.

3419. Does he not take the trouble to examine it closely?—As I say, the article is practically covered up. The art in building up a riding saddle, when it is finished, is practically covered up with the pig skin.

3420. Do you think it is impossible to detect the defective work?—Most decidedly. I am a brown saddler myself and have had the pleasure of working on Government work, and I might say that for this kind of work, if it is good, as it always has been up to the present occasion, the better-class men are practically invited from the different firms to do it, because if the saddle is to be made all through, these kind of men I am speaking of would not be allowed to touch the article.

3421. Are they members of your Society?—Yes. I might say, in order to make it clear, that we have had an inquiry, and also that we had an interview with the firm. There was one obstacle placed in front of us. They said that in the event of our withdrawing those men, the onus of not executing that work would be placed on our shoulders. We should be glad if we could get anything to confirm that that would not be placed on our shoulders.

3422. Your case is that the employers are taking on incompetent workmen at a lower rate of wage?—Most decidedly.

3423. How does that time-rate compare with the piece-work rate?—We have no time-rate.

3424. How does the time-rate that these men are paid compare with the piece-work rate that you have agreed upon?—That is a question that I could not answer, because the time would have to be calculated. In the first place, we should have to get to know the length of time that the men were on it, and the wages, which would have to be shown by the wages book, which they will not allow us the privilege of seeing.

3425. But if you have not got that information, how are you in a position to say that the wages are below the proper rate?—Say that the man gets 38s. per week—as a fact that is the wages they stipulate, that the men do get 38s.; there are four men getting 38s., and in one week they turned out eighteen saddles. I can speak to that one item, but when you put the question to me a moment ago, I was of the opinion that you referred to the bulk of the order. In this particular case, those eighteen saddles should have cost that firm £20 in wages, but practically they did not cost them £10.

3426. And you account for that by the work being inferior work?—Yes, I am quite satisfied of that. My point is that the better-class workman in the shop, knowing that he would practically refuse to execute the work on this system, was not invited to work on it.

3427. Did you allow your members to go on doing this?—The obstacle was placed in front of us that they would throw the burden on our shoulders if we tampered with them executing the work.

3428. Have you complained to the War Office about it?—Yes. I have a copy of the last letter received from the War Office.

3429. What do they say; just give us the substance of the reply that you got?—This is the reply dated January 25th:—"With reference to your letter of the 21st. respecting the wages paid by Messrs. A.—— for making officers' saddles, under a contract with this department, I have to inform you that it has been represented that at a conference which is stated to have been held between the Master Brown Saddlers' Association and the Walsall Brown Saddlers' Society on the 7th October last, a piece-work price only was arranged, and that no arrangement was made with respect to the minimum day wage in the case of payment by time." That is correct, we are a piece trade; that is what we impressed upon the Government—that we are working on piece. You see that our book is a piece-work book; it is entitled "Piece-work Price List for the District of Walsall and Birmingham." The letter goes on, "I am to inquire whether you agree that this statement correctly describes the result of the Conference. If it is correct that an hourly rate is admitted for the making of these saddles, will you state what your claim is for the current rate in the Birmingham district"?—We have no hourly or day time-rate. You will see that officers' saddles are quoted in that piece book.

3430. Would you say that it is universal in your trade not to pay a time-rate to these men?—Exactly. Our employers do not acknowledge time pay—only in this instance it has probably suited them.

3431. Is this the first instance of a time-rate being fixed that you know of?—Yes.

3432. We understand that point now; is there any other that you wish to bring forward?—I have no better instance of the abuse of a current rate than that.

3433. I see you mention in your proof something about female labour?—Yes. We have a point to raise on the question of female labour being used against the men for cheapness. I should like it to be understood that we do not want to interfere with female labour being engaged, but we find the difficulty that it is used for cheapness and thereby men are thrown idle, or otherwise they have to work at a starvation wage.

3434. Are there many women employed in your trade?—They are numerous.

3435. In what proportion are they, compared to the men, do you suppose?—We will say there is one woman to every four men.

3436. Have they a time-rate or a piece-rate?—They have a piece-rate, at the mercy of the employers; but, of course, we cannot avoid that.

3437. They do not do the whole of any job, I suppose?—They do the stitching only.

3438. Does the piece-work rate cover all the operations required to produce the complete article?—The piece-work rate is to produce it in sections, not in bulk.

3439. Does it include the price for the stitching?—Yes. We have a list here which they have rejected; they will not accept any current rate whatever. Previously I have spoken of an individual trade, but we have also a piece list combined for all leather goods and for saddlery work, which has been issued and rejected.

3440. Is the rate actually paid to women much below what you have fixed for the particular operation?—Yes.

3441. How much below?—We calculate that in some instances it is 35 per cent. below.

3442. Is it work that women can do conveniently?—Some we think it is rather hard that women should be allowed to do. I will tell you the case from the employer's standpoint; he places it that the work is equally as good. Taking it from our standpoint, I think if we could put it to the practical test of two people, a man and a woman working side by side one against the other, if it could be properly supervised it would be found that the woman's work is not so durable as what the man can do. Discussing the thing as a practical point, we will admit that in the light work the woman would be swifter in some instances than the man; but taking the thing in bulk when the work is finished, the durability of a woman's work is less than that of a man's; that is, taking the heavy and the light work together.

3443. But may it not be good enough for the purpose for which it is wanted?—It is not good enough.

3444. It is not durable enough, you mean?—That is so.

3445. The women are quite unorganised, I suppose?—Yes. It is patent to everyone that since the closing of the War the trade has been very bad indeed. Previous to the War, I might say that the harness makers in our district were on time-pay, but then there was an influx of every kind of man who had seen a piece of leather in order to produce the goods wanted for our Government, with the result that at the close of the War there was, we will say, 50 per cent more labour than was required. The employers then got together and destroyed the unanimity between the men, and at the present time men have to work piece-work at any price that is offered to them on any kind of goods—it matters not whether it is Civil or Government work. They are at the mercy of the employers.

3446. Do you mean that the piece-work rates which you have agreed upon are not adhered to?—They have issued books in order to secure a uniform price, but they will not accept a uniform price; they wish to dictate their own terms to the men as to the price that they shall have for their labour.

3447. I thought you said there were agreed rates?—I was speaking then for the saddles only; now I am speaking of harness. I represent different trade societies.

3448. Is it the case that in the saddlery trade you have no general complaint to make?—No; only as regards the particular instance I mentioned.

3449. In the harness trade there is no agreement you say?—There is no agreement for a piece price.

3450. Nor for any other—there is no agreement for a time-rate?—That is correct.

3451. Then you will find some difficulty in saying what the current rate in that trade is?—Of course there must be two sides in order to create a current rate, I take it—that is, the employers and the work-people. At present they are not combined on a price, if that is what you mean.

3452. No, I did not mean that. By the current rate I mean the rate actually and generally paid. How does the rate actually paid compare with what you are asking the employers to agree to?—We are only asking for the old prices to be put into force again.

3453. That is the prices that were in force before the War?—Yes.

3454. And the employers object to that?—Yes.

3455. They want to reduce them?—Yes. I have a letter here in which the writer speaks for the whole of the employers in the district.

3456. Meanwhile, until you have come to some agreement, are they all paying the same rates?—No; each firm creates its own current rate.

3457. But some are better than others, I suppose?—Exactly. I have here a wage-book of the better firms. The wage does not average £1 a week, according to three of the workmen's books that I have here.

3458. Is the harness trade less well paid than the saddlery trade?—They are not paid so well as the saddlers at the present time, although the saddlery is not paid so well as it ought to be.

3459. Do your remarks about the women apply to the saddlery?—Not to the saddlery, but to the harness and bridle work.

3460. Is there a current rate for the women, do you suppose; are they all being paid much the same?—The women have no society whatever.

3461. But that would not prevent there being a current rate. What is the rate they are being paid?—That I could not tell you as regards the women.

3462. But they are not all being paid the same?—No.

3463. Some employers are paying more than others?—Yes.

3464. None of them, I suppose, go up to the rate that a man would get?—Not one firm in the district.

3465. (Mr. De la Bère.) With regard to what you say about inferior work, a certain percentage of the saddles are stripped when under inspection; so, I suppose, that before a very long time inferior work would be detected, would it not?—Yes; if you strip the saddle in its entirety you would detect it.

3466. You cannot strip every one, because you would practically destroy it?—Exactly.

3467. But you do strip a percentage of them, and I imagine that if you take a considerable number, the odds are that you would light on some of the inferior work; is that not so?—Undoubtedly.

3468. I do not think there would be much chance of inferior work getting through for any length of time; should you think so?—Yes, I should say there would be.

3469. Do you think the viewer would always take one that would turn out satisfactory?—No. There is no knowing what saddle he would take.

3470. Then he would find this out ultimately?—He would probably be 12 months before he would find it out; at any rate that is not improbable.

3471. Then with regard to the piece-rate, I think you said it was 22s. per saddle?—Yes.

3472. How many saddles does a man make in a week? One-and-a-half, or something like that?—Yes.

3473. Would he earn 33s.?—He would earn 35s.

3474. You put it at 35s.?—Yes.

3475. Would that be working 56 hours?—54 hours.

3476. I forget what is the ordinary week in Walsall and in Birmingham?—56 hours in Walsall and 54 in Birmingham.

3477. And for that number of hours he would earn 35s. a week?—Yes. I have worked with some men on your last contract; there were five men on that contract, and they could not earn 30s. You must understand that I have not quoted the lowest man in my estimate; I have absolutely put it on the highest basis.

3478. (Chairman.) Did you not say that these men who were engaged on time-work on that job earned 38s.?—Exactly; but I believe the question just put to me was as to the piece-rate.

3479. And you say, as I understand it, that on the piece-rate a man can earn 35s.?—Yes.

3480. As the time-work man earns 38s., why do you say he is underpaid?—He is underpaid according to the quantity of saddles turned out. These men turned out eighteen saddles in the week, and they should have received £20 for them.

3481. But still the men were actually earning 3s. a week more than the piece-workers?—I do not see it myself, when they are turning it out piecemeal. It was a system adopted by the employer.

3482. The result of that system, as I say, is that the time-workers earned 3s. a week more than you say is the proper rate for piece-work?—No; the proper rate is 22s.

3483. What is the actual amount earned?—My wage, for instance, was 50s.; I was on piece-work and I earned 50s. a week. I speak for myself now, and my wage-books will show what I have earned. I have to quote the good men I have seen as well as the middle men and the inferior men.

3484. (Mr. De la Bère.) As regards the day-work, is it not the case that it has been usual in one or two past contracts to fix a day-work rate as well as a piece-work rate?—No.

3485. Perhaps I might quote you a letter which was written by the Master Brown Saddlers' Association to you on December 4th—"Will you allow me to point out to you that there is an understanding between your society and this association that any saddles may be made by day-work either for ordinary trade or for military work, and also that this association does not recognise any minimum rate except in special cases arranged by the conference of 16th March, 1905, in which this question was gone into very thoroughly, when at your suggestion this association agreed to fix a minimum piece price and day-work for that particular contract." You do not accept that statement?—No.

3486. You received that letter, did you not?—A letter of that description.

3487. It is a letter addressed to you on December 4th, 1907, from the Master Brown Saddlers' Association of Walsall?—From Mr. Beach?

3488. That is it?—I had a copy of the letter; that is practically the contents.

3489. That rather seems to show that day-work is not altogether unknown in the trade?—We will take it that day-work is not altogether unknown. For instance, if an employer has saddles to repair, there is no price in our list for what a man shall have for repairing.

3490. This was a question of making?—That is wrong altogether. That is misconstrued.

3491. The words are "any saddles may be made"; but you do not accept that?—I do not accept that as a correct statement. That order was made piece-work—that very order that he speaks of on that date.

3492. The letter goes on, "This question also came up at the conference held on 20th June, 1906 (respecting a tender for 910 saddles), and one of the members of your deputation made a remark to the effect that day-work could not be entertained for those saddles, to which the Chairman (Mr. T. Ash) replied that it was one of the rules of this Association that employers could please themselves whether they had their orders executed by piece or day-work, and after further discussion a price for piece and day-work was fixed for that contract only"?—That is a letter sent out to suit the purpose.

3493. But this is a letter to you?—Exactly, but I would like my reply to be by the side of that letter.

3494. Have you got it here?—No; I did not think it was necessary to bring that correspondence. I say: Will you ask him to send you a copy of the minutes of their last two meetings, where we tried to overcome this difficulty of the day-rate. Ask him whether he has called a meeting of the employers to try to arrange a day current rate. The very man who said he would have it day-work defied the association. The very man that he quotes in that letter would not accept a day current rate.

3495. This would seem to show rather that day-work was not altogether unknown, and that there have been occasions on which it has been recognised?—Only under the system that I speak of.

3496. I notice these words at the end of this National Piece-work Price List—"For cutting out military work, day-work being the usual practice, we advise our members when engaged to do that branch of piece-work, to base the items on 8d. per hour for an average workman." Does that not seem to show that, at any rate in some portion of saddle making, day-work is the usual practice?—That is cutting out, that is to say, odd jobs which promiscuously come along. That is what is meant there. That would be understood by the men in the trade to mean that they would do the work, and base the price on the time that it takes them to do it at the rate of 8d. per hour. Probably they would only have an hour's work to do.

3497. Do you happen to know under those contracts where day-work was recognised, whether the rate would have worked out at 8d. per hour?—Are you speaking of officers' saddles?

3498. Yes?—No.

3499. At any rate, I think it is pretty clear that the firm you mention are not infringing any rule agreed upon between masters and men in paying day rates; is that not so?—They are infringing. They do not employ day men, but these men are on day-work for this special occasion. It is a firm that does not employ day-work, only they adopted this system on that occasion. They pay, according to this piece-work list, and I say they are infringing. Representatives of that firm sat round the table on the evening that I was present and discussed the price from this list, and a printed card was sent out to every employer from that meeting saying that the price for making that saddle under this contract would be 22s. He runs right away from that.

3500. Do you deny that they had any option in regard to introducing a day rate?—Yes. To be honourable their system should have been according to the arrangement for contracts made with the rest of the employers It is not fair for one man to adopt an unfair principle against another employer. The other employers ought to have had the same advantage, and it is an unfair advantage to take of the employers in our district.

3501. According to this letter from the Master Brown Saddlers' Association, they appear rather to take the view that the firm had not transgressed very seriously?—Why should they call a meeting then, and haul him over the coals? I suppose they have not sent you a communication on that question?

3502. No?—I guessed not. To show you the attitude taken, I have a letter here in reference to the list——"In reference to our previous correspondence relating to the National Piece-Price List, which I have placed before the last meeting of my association, I was instructed to write and inform you my association cannot in any way recognise this book, as it is not in agreement with the piece-price book arranged by conference between your society and this association, and which was signed and came into force on September 1st last." Now he is quoting this book, and he sends you a letter to say that about day-work. He ought to have written to me as secretary of the General Trades; but he deviates, and tries, as I might say, to hoodwink the system they were adopting, and he writes to me as secretary of the Brown Saddlers. The Brown Saddlers' Society is under an agreement for three years with our employers, and that is no interference whatever with the National Piece-Price List for harness and bridle work. But he quotes it here. This one book about the saddlery prices binds us down to September 1st, 1910; but not the general book. In writing to you he tries to quote the general book to cover up the fact that they are using a system of day-work to sweat the men.

3503. I do not think he quotes any book at all; it was I who quoted the book, not he?—I beg your pardon.

3504. (Mr. Wilson Fox.) You say in your proof, "We find individual firms insist on making their own current rate in this district"; would those be individual firms which are generally paying less than the other firms?—Yes.

3505. So there would be some firms paying a lower rate than the majority?—Yes. One firm may pay 6d. when the article, we think, is worth 8d., and another may be paying 5d., and another may be paying 4d.

3506. But what you would call a current rate, I suppose, would be what the majority of the employers in the district are paying, and not what is paid by the small number of employers who are paying the lower rate? Your complaint, I understand, is that a few of the firms pay a lower rate than you think ought to be paid?—The whole of the firms do.

3507. Further, you say that some of these firms pay a lower rate than the others?—Exactly.

3508. That would be a few of those firms?—Just so.

3509. The majority would be paying what would be the current rate; you may call it a fair or unfair rate, but the current rate in the district would be what the majority are paying, would it not? I am not at the moment referring to this particular contract. Supposing you went into the district and were asked to say what actually, as a matter of fact, was the current rate, would you say it was the rate paid by the majority, or what would you say? I only want to know what your view would be about that?—Our view of the current rate is that the majority of the firms should rule, but if the current rate is not a living rate, that is a different question altogether. I cannot acknowledge a current rate if the rate is not a living rate.

3510. I only want to get what your definition of a current rate is, and your reply, as I gather, is what the majority of the firms are paying?—Exactly, so long as it is a living rate.

3511. Then you go on to say in your Proof that in the Fair Wages Clause you think "current rate" ought to be "Trade Union rate"?—We think that would be the most practicable. It may be arbitrary to our employers as worded, but there seems no other protection for the worker.

3512. That would involve, I suppose, an agreed statement between the employers and the employed? You would have to get one of those piece-price lists agreed upon, would you not, in order to get the Trade Union rate?—Yes. We do not mean a Trade Union rate not properly fought out by the two sides. The Trade Union rate is like this: There are a president and a secretary of the Employers' Association, and there are a president and a secretary of the workers, and when their names are attached to it, that is what we call a Trade Union rate—not a one-sided rate.

3513. And you would have to get that agreed upon over a certain area or in a certain district?—Yes.

3514. In your case in the Midland district?—In Walsall, Birmingham and the district.

3515. Now about these women; has woman's work been increasing in your trade of recent years?—Yes.

3516. In a marked way?—Yes.

3517. You have no objection, I understand, to women's labour if the same piece-rate is paid for the same class of work, no matter whether women or men are employed on it?—None whatever. We have no objection to ladies being at work; we want to see them live.

3518. On the same class of work, I suppose, a woman's output is less than a man's?—In many instances it is.

3519. Generally speaking?—Generally speaking, taking the heavy and the light together, it is less than a man's.

3520. So that according to your view, if they are paid a less rate than the men they are doubly handicapped?—Exactly.

3521. That would be the result if your view was correct?—Exactly.

3522. In your position as Secretary, do you think you hear most of the complaints of the men in your Union under the Fair Wages Clause? Do the men come to you when they feel they have got a grievance and ask you to make representations?—Yes. I do all my representations upon resolutions of the meetings of the men.

3523. Do you think you hear most of the complaints in your trade that arise under the Fair Wages Clause?—Yes.

3524. You do get hold of them?—Yes, every one. My communications are not upon personal matters. There has to be publicity at the meetings, and on the information received at the meetings, resolutions are proposed and they come to a decision. I have here a printed list of the employers who have accepted and are prepared to pay the National Piece-Price List in the districts of London, Birmingham and Walsall. We sent the book out, and then in nine weeks' time we sent out circulars asking for acceptance, and I have a list here in print of the names of the employers in London and the Midlands who are prepared to accept this list. (Handing in same.)

3525. Did the employers agree at a meeting or did you send someone round to them?—I might say that the book was issued in the last week in July, and in October, after they had had it in their possession so long, there was a circular printed and issued to everyone on the Government contract sheet, asking them if they were prepared to have their names attached to a list of fair employers, as we were about to present it, or probably should have to come on some occasion to a board of this kind. That list shows the names of the firms that are willing to pay this price and have agreed to do it.

3526. (Mr. Hillier.) Are they paying the prices now?—They are not paying the prices at the present moment—not in bulk; but in London, some of the prices are being paid. I believe that you will have the London man here, and he can give you the details better than I can myself.

3527. I suppose the prices would vary according to the class of work that is done in the shops, because some saddlers do fine work, and others very common work; I suppose that difference is mentioned in the list?—Exactly. We have prices for producing saddles from 5s. per saddle up to 25s.

3528. (Mr. De la Bère.) I take it that your difficulty is that the firms who have assented are unfortunately still in a minority?—That is so; those who have refused it are in the majority.

3529. And the names on that list are the minority?—Yes, except that in the one instance of riding saddles the list is a unanimous list of the whole of the employers. I hand in two books, one applying to all the trades, and the other to riding saddles only. (Handing in same.)

The witness withdrew.

Mr. Samuel Davis, called and examined.

3530. (Chairman.) You are the Secretary of the Walsall Bridle Cutters Trade Society, I think?—Yes.

3531. You have heard Mr. Power's evidence; have you anything to add to what he has said?—I have nothing to add, but if there is any question you would like to put affecting the bridle trade, which I represent, I am prepared to answer it.

3532. Have you any special complaints in reference to the Fair Wages Clause connected with the bridle trade?—I have the same complaint, that the masters have refused to accept our piece-price list up to the present, and I consider myself that that is an evasion of the Fair Wages Clause, for the reason that now every employer fixes his own prices.

3533. Still, you have a current rate?—I cannot see how you can have a current rate without the two people, the employer and the employee, agreeing.

3534. The natural meaning that you would attach to the words "current rate" is the rate actually and generally paid, is it not?—I should say yes.

3535. Would you be any better off if, instead of "current rate" you had "Trade Union rate as accepted by the employers and workmen"?—I think so myself.

3536. But if there is no rate accepted, you would not be any better off, would you?—No.

3537. You would still be thrown back on what is now the "current rate," which you object to?—Yes, that is so.

3538. What is your remedy for the present difficulty?—My remedy is for the employers to meet us fair-handed at a round table conference and agree to a fixed price for the whole of the district.

3539. What is it that you want the Government to do in its contracts?—To fix the Trade Union rate of wages.

3540. As accepted by both sides?—As accepted.

3541. But if it is not accepted, what would you do then?—We should remain as we are; we should still have a grievance.

3542. Then you would not be any better off?—No.

3543. And you cannot suggest anything better than that?—Nothing better.

The witness withdrew.

Mr. William Millerchip, called and examined.

3544. (Chairman.) You appear on behalf of the National Amalgamated Lock and Key Smiths' Society?—Yes, I am the Secretary.

3545. Your first complaint seems to be on a question of sub-letting?—Yes, it is.

3546. As you know, that is prohibited under the Fair Wages Clause?—So far as sub-letting to an outside firm, true, it is prohibited; but the sub-letting that I complain about more particularly is not the sub-letting to another firm, but what is called sub-contracting. I think I define it in my proof as an employer taking a contract, then engaging one or two competent men, and then giving the work to those one or two competent men at so much per dozen or per gross, they in turn sub-letting it to other men who are working under them. In that case, whilst the employer is not relieved of responsibility with you or with the departments, yet he is practically relieved of responsibility, and the man who is the sub-contractor is really responsible for that lot of work. It is dangerous to use the word "sweating" I know, but still

I do not know that I can use any other word; it does lead to the sweating of the man employed under these one or two men who act as sub-contractors.

3547. Is that method of doing work usual in your trade?—It is not customary generally, and is only done with regard to Government contracts, and then it does not apply to the best firms. Take Messrs. Chubb's, Messrs. Hobbs and Hart, and, say, the Walsall Lock Co., Ltd., who, I believe, have now got the Admiralty contract for padlocks; they do not do that kind of thing. Still there are a number of firms who do it, and there are one or two men who go from place to place when these firms get the contract and act as foremen, as they call them in the sheet, but we call them sub-contractors.

3548. It is fairly usual then in the trade?—It is not customary in the trade, and it is not usual, only with a number of firms and with regard to Government contracts.

3549. Why is it applied only to Government contracts?—I think the reason would be found, first, in the cheaper method of production; secondly, in the employer being relieved largely of his responsibility of dealing with the individual workmen; and, thirdly, the competent men are getting scarce, owing to this system of sectional work. Competent men who can do the chief work, such as the levering, which is the most important work in the whole lock, are simply engaged on this work, and the other men do the other parts of the lock at so much per dozen under them.

3550. All those explanations would apply equally to work other than Government work, would they not?—With the exception of, say, half-a-dozen firms, there is not produced a great quantity of first-class work such as the Government have.

3551. Is the Government work a better class work than the average?—Yes. In our district the bulk of the work produced now for the building trade is cheap stamped rim and mortise locks. They are of a very cheap character, and much machinery is used. Where the best work is made, such as the work that the Government have, they certainly do a good proportion of that work, but it is confined to a small number of firms.

3552. Is the method of doing the work which you have described a method which lends itself to good work, and not to inferior work?—No, it lends itself to inferior work. In some correspondence I had with the Admiralty some years ago with regard to this question, they put the responsibility of seeing that good work is sent out on the examiners; but the method of examination, so far as I have been able to ascertain as a practical locksmith, is such that it is an impossibility for the examiner to tell whether it is good work or not—he can only tell whether it is of good finish. Of course, from the outside you can tell whether or not it is finished well or not, but you cannot tell what is in the interior when it is boxed up. When the inquiry was held in 1893 by, I think it was, Mr. Collett, who was then the Controller of the Admiralty Department, it was proved that whilst locks were supposed to differ—say, that 100 or 200 locks would differ so that not one key could take the other—a blank key would take half-a-dozen of them, because the whole interior of the lever was cut out. That is a very easy and simple thing to do, and, of course, it is very much cheaper. I have made locks for the Admiralty and also for the War Office, and therefore I know the work that is inside them. The levers must be made practically to a hair's breath, and unless you do that, one key will take others, and if one takes the other the whole of it is completely spoilt. I came across an examiner once, I think it was at Plymouth. He did not know I was a locksmith. He said he examined scores and hundreds of padlocks, and I asked him his method of examining. He said, "I get a dozen locks on a board, and I just place the keys alongside of them and run my eye along the keys. If I see two locks or two keys that appear to be alike, I just test those two." Now, no living man could tell whether a lock would take any key in that way, because the keys may be every one of them different, and yet the interior of the locks such that a blank key may take a dozen or 20 that are all supposed to differ. This system lends itself to the turning out of work of that character. Of course, if you want to unlock a lock without a key, it is equally as safe perhaps, but you see it does not prevent one man with a key getting at another's box or chest, or anything of that kind.

3553. Then you would say, first of all, that this system tends to produce inferior work, and secondly, that it tends to depress the rate of wages paid?—Yes, and it does not produce competent workmen.

3554. Why does it tend to depress the rate of wages?—Because you have one man getting a dozen men working under him in sections. I quite realise that it is too late in the day to object to sectional work, because with the introduction of machinery and newer and better methods of production, in all industries you must have and you will have sectional work, and men may be specialised on a particular department or a particular kind. But taking men working under this sub-contractor, there is no doubt they work often for less wages than if they were paid direct from the office. They can make the locks in sections if they like; we do not fight against that, and we do not object to it. If it is more advantageous to them to make them in sections, let them make them so; but let us have every man paid direct from the office, and employed by the firm. Then there will not be this sub-contracting or subletting, and the standard rate of wages will be maintained.

3555. That is your main objection to the methods in your trade, is it, that they lead to this quasi subletting?—Yes.

3556. Have you any other suggestions to make?—I am afraid that you may not be able to deal with my proposal as to giving an intimation to us. I have asked on several occasions, and I suppose the whole of the trade unionists have asked, that we should have an intimation of who had received the contract. I might explain how it works in our industry. We have no knowledge, perhaps, that a firm have received a contract until it is half completed; then if you find the standard rate of wages or the recognised conditions of employment existing in the trade are not being recognised or adhered to, it is too late, the contract being half completed, to go to a firm and endeavour to stop them completing that contract, or to call the men out. The men do not know that it is Government work until they come to stamp them; that is particularly the case with the rim and mortise locks.

3557. The evidence you gave on the other part of this question rather went to show that the Government work was always treated in a peculiar way?—I was dealing then particularly with padlocks.

3558. But now you are speaking of another kind of lock?—Yes. I am referring now to the ordinary door locks, the rim and mortise locks. The padlocks and cabinet locks are treated in the way I have mentioned, but the ordinary rim or mortise lock does not lend itself to sectional work the same as a padlock does. Often we do not know who has got the contract until the contract is pretty well completed.

3559. You want timely notice when a contractor has taken a contract; that is what it comes to?—Yes; that will be a great advantage to us.

3560. What is your next point?—We have tried from time to time to get a standard list governing the whole of the Government work. Conferences have been convened on a number of occasions with the employers, with the view of arranging a standard list that would be applicable to all manufacturers, and would be fair between employers and workmen.

3561. (Mr. Wilson Fox.) For Government especially?—Yes, because the Government work is quite different to the other work. What I mean is that you cannot compare the ordinary work for the ordinary market with the Government work except in special cases and with such firms as Chubb's. Chubb's would make a great quantity of work similar to the Government work, and so would one or two other firms. But I am speaking of the trade generally now when I say there is very little comparison between the ordinary run of work and Government work; therefore, we have tried to get a standard list governing the whole of the Government work of every kind that is made for any Department. I have here a list of the prices, not the selling prices, but the prices at which the work should be made, showing what the workman should receive either at day work or at piece-work. We proposed, if it were day work, to agree upon a minimum wage, and if it were piece-work to agree upon a standard price. On every occasion the conference broke down, because the Departments would not agree to consider any firm refusing to pay on that standard list as an unfair house, and therefore the employers refused to proceed with it. But if that were inaugurated, there is no doubt it would prevent all the trouble, as there could not possibly be any trouble if it were all placed on one basis; and I do not see that it would increase the cost at all.

3562. (Chairman.) And you say that that would be generally agreed to, you think, by the great bulk of the firms?—Yes, I believe so.

3563. Have you got anything like a standard list now?—No, I cannot say that there is anything like a standard list; for instance, even for a Government four-lever padlock, say, one firm will pay as much as 1s., 1s. 6d., 2s. or 2s. 6d. more than another.

3564. What agreement have you with the employers at present?—We have no agreement whatever with regard to Government work.

3565. Nor with regard to any other work?—We have got no agreement practically. I think I have explained that the variety in the methods of production is so great in the ordinary work that it is very nearly impossible to get a general standard list of prices for everything in the trade; but with the Government work it is possible, because the work is all of a similar character and must be produced pretty much the same.

3566. At any rate, at present there is no kind of agreement between the employers and the men?—No, and absolutely no standard prices.

3567. I suppose the bulk of them do approximate to a particular rate, do they not?—Yes.

3568. Is it mostly piece-work?—It is all piece-work practically. There are just a few men that these subcontractors employ under them who work day work, but they do the work under them, and not under the firm and are paid by them. What I suggest with regard to that is that where the men are employed on day work, no man should be employed at less than 6d. per hour.

3569. Do they not get as much as that now?—Some of them work for as low as 4d.

3570. (Mr. Wilson Fox.) How many hours a week?—55 or 60—it is up as high as 60 that they work. Well-governed firms have fixed hours of opening and closing, but there are a number of firms who have no really fixed hours, and who allow the workpeople to work as long as they like.

3571. (Chairman.) How do you propose to get over this difficulty, that there is no agreed rate in the trade?—The only permanent way of getting over it is, as I stated, that a uniform standard list should be agreed upon by the employers and the workmen. I think if the departments were prepared to recognise that, there would be very little difficulty in bringing it into existence.

3571*a*. How near it have you got?—We have prepared price lists and submitted them to the employers as I said, and we have had several conferences. They have not complained about the prices being too high—or even if they have, the price list that we submitted was not, like the Laws of the Medes and Persians, unalterable, and we are quite prepared to discuss every lock on its merits. I have no doubt whatever that a list would be agreed upon if the departments were prepared to recognise it as the standard list.

3572. Does not the Department practically recognise it now by enforcing its Fair Wages Clause?—Yes, but you cannot get a definition as to what the Fair Wages Clause means.

3573. You have a "current rate" which, I gather from you, would be paid by all except a very few firms in the business?—Yes, that is so, but very many firms that have contracts really do not pay what could be considered the current rate, that is, the rate or the wage recognised by the more respectable firms.

3574. That again is the difficulty of coming to an agreement which you have mentioned?—Yes. If you complain about that, of course they can produce evidence that certain of their men are getting as much of this kind of work as enables them to earn as much as other men are able to earn at other firms on other kinds of work; and it is very difficult indeed to bring it home to them. Whilst you are satisfied that they are dealing unjustly by their workpeople and taking an undue advantage of them in order to obtain the contract at a low price, yet it is difficult to bring it home and to get the Department to define what they mean by the Fair Wages Resolution. I have tried it many a time.

3575. It seems to me that this matter is very much in your own hands, or in the hands of yourselves and the employers, because if you can get a sufficient number of firms to agree with their workmen what the proper rates are, those are the rates which would be enforced by the departments who contract with them?—We tried to get them to admit that. If they would give us an assurance that that would be so, then the difficulty would be overcome.

3576. What Department refused to give you that assurance?—The Admiralty. I had some correspondence with them a year or two ago—I cannot say now the definite year; but at any rate Sir Henry Fowler, who is the Member for this constituency, tried all he could to get them to define what was meant by the Fair Wages Resolution. All that we could get, so far as I know and remember now, was: "We have the Resolution passed by the House of Commons, but we have to leave you to define it and interpret it yourselves. We are not here to define it or to interpret it."

3577. Would they not say, "It is for you to show what the current rate is, if you object to the rate that is being paid in any particular firm"?—What they said was—I believe these were the exact words, but I could not be certain—"We are not here to define or interpret its meaning ourselves." If we had been able to define it, and they had accepted our definition, then no doubt it would have been all right, because no doubt we should have defined it or interpreted it so as to have suited our own purpose. With regard to the keys, I ought to state that while we do recognise with many of the manufacturers it is essential for the workmen to obtain their castings or stampings from outside firms, because they are not big enough to keep casters on their own firms, and whilst we recognise that casting and stamping is largely a separate industry, and whilst many of the firms do their own casting and stamping, casting particularly, on their own premises, yet smaller firms do not, and we do not want to shut them out of being able to tender for the contracts. What we say is that when they have obtained the castings, the Department should insist on the keys being drilled and cut on the premises. This cutting and drilling is often done in small shops at the back of the people's homes, or in their own homes practically. The key trade is largely carried on in small shops, and I do not know but what you might not really call it a domestic industry. We consider it very objectionable, and we think the Department ought to insist on the cutting and drilling being done on their own premises.

3578. Do you object to this home work altogether?—Yes, altogether.

3579. But it is common in the trade, is it not?—It is, in the key trade.

3580. It would be rather difficult for you to make so drastic an alteration in the methods of doing business, would it not?—Not with the Government work, because the best firms do it already. Take the present contractors—they would never dream of sending their keys out to be done anywhere; they do them on their own premises. They have the contract for the Admiralty. Then there are Chubb's and all the others among the best firms who do it on their own premises. But the small firms get contracts and sublet the drilling and cutting, and the men do it at their own homes. There is no doubt that is another method of sweating and getting cheap labour. You have absolutely no control over them; it is an impossibility to control it. The only remedy is to eliminate it altogether. As to general subletting, I do not know whether it is done now, but there is an impression at the Admiralty that subletting in the ordinary sense of one firm taking the contract and factoring it out does not exist. Whether it does exist or not now, I know that some years ago I made hundreds of dozens of locks for the Indian Department and for other departments, and that they came through a contractor in London. I can give you the name, and then you will be able to make inquiry whether they get any contracts now or not. I have been employed on these locks for six months at a time. Where I was employed years ago, we never got a contract direct, but we obtained the work all through this firm. They sublet it to us; we got our price, so it was nothing to do with us, and we did the work. But whether it is carried on now to the same extent, I am not in a position to say.

3581. (Mr. Hillier.) Were not Messrs. A. invited to tender in the first place? Do you mean that Messrs. A.'s tender for the Government was higher than what they would do it for at one of these small firms?—I do not know what Messrs. A. got for their work. All I know is that we were able to get often better prices from Messrs. A. than we were able to get direct; in fact, we missed a contract direct, and then got some of the work, probably from this firm. We used to get in a year, I think, as much as £1,000 worth sometimes from them; we used to do a very big trade with them. I am not there now, so I do not know whether they are doing anything for that firm now.

3582. (Mr. Black.) Was that an India Office contract with Messrs. A? It was not an Admiralty contract, was it?—I fancy it was an India Office contract; at any rate they were all iron locks, and for the Admiralty they are all brass locks.

3583. Nearly, not quite. I think you were satisfied in 1893. There was a meeting then in Wolverhampton. I do not know whether you remember it, but it was reported in the papers at the time, that one of your representatives said the Society was "glad to find no middlemen were dealt with by the Admiralty"?—As you say, that will be true so far as the Admiralty is concerned.

3584. Are you acquainted with the terms of the Admiralty contract? You have not seen a recent schedule, I suppose?—I have seen a form, but I do not know whether it was a form for the Admiralty or for the War Office.

3585. Do you see that regularly?—No, I do not.

3586. You know, I suppose, that after 1893 it was provided that all work excepting the stamping should be done on the contractor's premises?—Yes.

3587. That is in our Admiralty contract, is it not?—Yes, it is.

3588. Was this sub-contracting that you speak of—letting it out to a foreman as it were—done on the firm's premises?—Yes, it is.

3589. It is not out-working then?—No.

3590. So your only complaint there is that it does not go through the wages book?—That is it.

3591. You do not think the arrangement we made so far back as 1893 is being infringed to any great extent now, do you?—I should say not to any great extent. Of my knowledge I should say you have, so far as the Admiralty is concerned, abolished the locks being made in the kitchens, bedrooms, and cellars, as was proved then at Wolverhampton.

3592. That is what we tried to do?—I think that is practically abolished now, with the exception of the keys, and I am afraid some of the keys now are made out.

3593. You think that wants a little watching?—Yes.

3594. Do not the men see the patterns when they are on a Government job? The Admiralty send out patterns for the guidance of the contractor, which are marked and labelled?—The men do not see them.

3595. What do they work from?—They work from a design provided for them by the office.

3596. And they do not see the patterns?—I should say not once in a dozen or twenty times, except at a firm similar to the firm that now have the contract. There is so much liberty and freedom at that firm. You can quite understand that where the men are practically their own masters, there is a great deal more liberty and freedom than if they were employed by an ordinary manufacturer. This is really a co-operative works, and the men own it and control it themselves; therefore, there is so much liberty and freedom that I should say those men would see every pattern that goes into the place.

3597. Do you yourself see the patterns?—No.

3598. Are you not affiliated then to the Parliamentary Committee of the Trade Union Congress?—Yes, we are.

3599. Do you know of our arrangement with them to send down a copy of the schedules?—Yes.

3600. And to permit the trade secretary or other representative to go and see the patterns?—I get a copy of the schedule, but I have never had an opportunity of going to see the patterns.

3601. You can take the schedule to the Chamber of Commerce in Wolverhampton and see the patterns?—That regulation came into operation about two years ago, I think, and so far as the padlocks are concerned, I do not think there has been any contract placed since, has there?

3602. Perhaps not?—The contract is placed for three years.

3603. But orders are being steadily placed out under it?—I think this is the third year of the contract, and they would still be made to the original samples. So far as we were concerned, we had no opportunity of seeing the samples before the contract was made.

3604. You do not come to London? You are not tied to seeing them at Wolverhampton?—Of course if we saw the samples, we should at once circularise the men and tell them.

3605. I suppose you will see them when the next contract is made?—Yes.

3606. So that will remove some of your grievances?—Yes.

3607. Now, on that point of testing for inferior work: is it not the practice, now at any rate, with the Admiralty locks to have them served in unclenched?—I am not certain, but I do not think they are all.

3608. That is so with the brass locks?—I do not think they are all delivered unclenched.

3609. It is intended that they should be?—They ought to be; that is the only way you can really test them.

3610. That is what we do?—That is the only real safeguard you have as to the quality of the work; or if that is not done, the examiner should examine them on the premises before they are clenched.

3611. Since about 1894, it has been our practice with all the brass locks to have them sent in unclenched, and we regularly clench them after the examination has taken place. Do you think if that is done, that that would really meet the point you raise about the testing?—Yes; that is the real test, there is no doubt.

3612. I daresay you know our regulation about the keys, namely, that not more than two keys out of 24 in each packet shall fit any one lock in the packet, and so on?—Yes, I know they must be different, and I know in making them it does require some skill, as they have to be made practically to a hair's breadth if you are making them perfectly and making them really differ.

3613. You think, I gather, that the out-worker system is gradually dying down?—Yes, I should say it is, so far as I know, with Government work now. There is only the keys that we have to deal with.

3614. (Mr. Wilson Fox.) I understand that it is the small firms who sublet this work?—You cannot call them large firms; I quite agree that they are small firms.

3615. Firms, I suppose, who have not much capital and have not got sufficiently large premises, and could not take the work unless they dealt with it in that way?—It does not make any difference as to their capital, because they have to find the same amount of capital, only they sublet this.

3616. It might be a firm with smaller premises and paying much less rent who could not take all these men on their own premises; I am only putting it to you whether it is not that class of firm?—Yes; but then the Government now have made a condition, in the Admiralty contracts particularly, that the work must be done on the contractor's premises, with the exception of the keys and the castings.

3617. I do not know the facts, of course, and I only want to know what the facts are; I put it to you that it is the smaller firms who have not got room on their own premises who do this subletting, because if they did not do it they probably would not be able to take a Government contract at all?—I admit that they are the smallest of the firms, but it often happens that firms with ample accommodation and room on their own premises do sublet and give work to out-workers rather than have the responsibility of getting it done on their own premises.

3618. When they give work to the out-worker, as far as the out-worker himself is concerned, does he, as a rule, take the work at a fair price?—No; it would be taken at a very low price. I think you will quite realise that a Trade Union has really no control over the matter.

3619. I understand that. Then this out-worker sublets again, and I want now to know whether the men, to whom the out-worker gives the work, the contractors not knowing at all to whom he sublets it, take it as a rule at a low price or at a fair price?—The out-workers would take it at a low price.

3620. And they let it out again at a still lower price?—Yes.

3621. Does this out-worker employ men on his own premises, or does he invariably sublet it?—He has a small shop at the back of his house, or something like that.

3622. Would he employ any men on his own premises?—Yes, one or two men, or youths.

3623. As to the point about sub-division, you said you did not like sub-division, because it did not create skilled workmen?—That is so.

3624. You suggest in your Proof that "the number of boys or learners should be restricted to, say, one to every three men"?—Yes.

3625. The principle of having learners does create skilled workmen, does it not?—Yes.

3626. So you object, on the one hand to sub-division, because it is against creating skilled workmen, and, on the other hand, you object to more than a certain number of learners although you say that the employment of learners does create skilled workmen?—What we object to is an abundance. We do not object to learners in themselves, and I think that number, one in three, would be a fair average. I do not say that we would fight against one in two, but when it comes to four learners to one man, that is what we object to.

3627. Supposing the Government work is perfectly efficiently done with a considerable proportion of learners to the men, what objection would you have to that?—No objection whatever, as long as they are paid a reasonable wage.

3628. It is purely a question of payment then?—Yes.

3629. But you do not expect a learner to be paid as much as a man who has learnt, do you?—No; but I do say that so far as the Government work is concerned, it is an impossibility for one man to do efficient work and supervise four learners.

3630. You do not however object to learners on principle?—No.

3631. Nor to the boys?—No. You must have a certain percentage of boys. As you have stated, if you are to have skilled men, you must have them trained, and therefore you must have the proper proportion or percentage to the growth and development of your industry.

3632. Up to the present, the Fair Wages Clause has been directed to wages and to hours, at least in considering the wages you have to consider the hours as a corollary of the wages. Do you want the Government to take this further point into account, and to make a stipulation limiting the number of learners and boys to the number of men employed on Government work?—I am afraid that is too big an order for you.

3633. I only raise it because you have raised it?—I do not see that I can reasonably expect you to enforce a condition of that character. I simply made it as a suggestion, but I quite agree with the Chairman that it is more a matter for us to control than it is for you.

3634. (Mr. De la Bère.) One question in regard to the sub-contracting: I take it it is not an invention or device of any particular firm, but is really a remnant of what was once a universal practice; is that not so?—Yes.

3635. It is a gradually dying out remnant of what was once universal?—That is so. 20 or 25 years ago it was a common custom; now, with the exception of the keys, it is dying out, and only takes place in regard to these brass locks, where a man can carry away in a small basket a dozen or two dozen various parts of brasswork, and take them home and put them together and bring them back again. It is only in those instances that it exists now in the lock trade. Most of the factories now have greater plant and machinery, and locks are so bulky that the men cannot take them home. In the case of the keys it still exists to an enormous extent, and practically you may say the whole of the key trade is a domestic trade.

3636. (Mr. Wilson Fox.) The firms supply the material, do they not?—Yes.

3637. And that is the distinction between this system and sub-contracting?—Yes. The firms supply the material, and the men take it home and do the work there.

3638. (Chairman.) Have you ever made a definite complaint about that system which you call subletting?—Yes.

3639. To the Admiralty?—Yes.

3640. (Mr. Black.) Since 1893?—Yes.

3641. (Chairman.) What reply did you get?—I got a reply which bears out Mr. Black's statement. It said that certain regulations were now in existence and were being carried out so far as they could be; and the Admiralty asked to be supplied, if I could do it, with a specific case of a particular firm who were doing this. The firm who were doing it at that time had completed their contract, and they lost the contract the next time, so there was no opportunity of sending up a specific case.

3642. (Mr. Black.) They were the offenders in 1893?—Yes, and they were struck off the list for some time. They got on the list again, and were carrying out the same practices. I do not think they have had a contract now for three or four years.

3643. As far as you know, the present contractors are satisfactory, I think?—I have nothing whatever to complain about the present contractors, that is, so far as the Admiralty is concerned.

3644. (Chairman.) This practice that you describe is not going on at this moment, then?—Not with the Admiralty. The firm who have the contract for the Admiralty this year, so far as we are concerned as a trade union, we have not a word of complaint about. They would adopt or carry out any suggestion that we make for improving the conditions of the men, if it were practicable.

3645. Do you not look on the conditions in the contract as sufficient to prevent this practice?—No, I do not think they are sufficient at present.

3646. Have you seen them?—I have seen them years ago, but I cannot say that I have seen them recently.

3647. I should like to read to you this section in the Form of Contract:—"The locks and keys shall be made entirely in the contractor's own factories, which shall be open at all times to anyone who may be authorised to inspect the work in progress, but in cases where firms tendering do not propose to make and file the keys themselves, it should be stated by them (a) from whom the key stampings will be obtained; (b) by whom the key stampings will be filed; and no keys shall be given out to any other key stampers or key filers without the consent of the Admiralty being first obtained." Is that not sufficient to prevent what you are complaining of?—No. It is subletting to outside firms that that refers to; my complaint relates to subletting to men employed on the same premises under the direct employment of the firm, only these men afterwards engage others under them.

3648. (Mr. Black.) You have referred to both, have you not?—Yes, I did refer to both, but I do not know that the other kind of subletting exists now in connection with Government contracts.

3649. Not even with the keys?—Only with the keys; with the locks I do not know that it does.

3650. But it may occasionally be necessary; would you object if it were done under proper conditions with the Government's sanction, and so forth?—I do not think it is necessary at all for the cutting and drilling of the keys. It is necessary for the casting or the stamping, but for the cutting and the drilling it is absolutely unnecessary.

3651. (Chairman.) The men that these sub-contractors, as you may call them, employ are not in the direct employment of the firm who contracts?—No.

3652. Though they do the work on the firm's premises?—Yes. So far as the present firm is concerned, as I have said, we have no complaint to make, and every man and every boy, so far as I know, is paid direct from the office, and there is no subletting whatever at that particular firm. That is what we think ought to be recognised and observed in the case of all Government contracts.

3653. Can you suggest any form of words which would ensure that?—I cannot, just on the spur of the moment 3654. Would something like this answer your purpose: "All workmen employed shall be in the direct employment of the contracting firm"?—Yes.

3655. (Mr. Wilson Fox.) You would still object to the home work if that were done?—Yes.

3656. Even supposing the home workers were employed direct by the contracting firm and paid by them?—I object to home work altogether, because I say it lends itself to long hours, low wages, and bad conditions in every respect.

3657. Supposing they were paid direct by the firm, would you not then get over the difficulty of the low wages if it was a fair house?—As an individual, I should object to the work being done off the premises then.

3658. (Chairman.) But you do not think the Government could insist upon that in its contracts, do you?—Perhaps not in the case of keys, but only in the case of the keys. With regard to the rest, I think they do pretty well insist on it now, so far as I know.

The witness withdrew.

Mr. Edward Latchford, called and examined.

3659. (Chairman.) You are the Secretary of the Amalgamated Society of Brushmakers, I think?—Yes.

3660. I understand you have about 560 members distributed all over the United Kingdom?—All over the kingdom from Dundee to Plymouth.

3661. What is the position in your trade; are you mostly piece-workers?—We are all piece-workers.

3662. Have you got an agreement with the employers anywhere?—Not a uniform agreement, but we have agreements in the districts.

3663. Have you an agreement in each district?—Not in every district.

3664. In most of them have you?—Yes.

3665. Then there is no great difference of opinion between you and your employers in most districts?—In most districts we are working fairly harmoniously.

3666. But in some of them you have a difficulty?—We have had, but not recently.

3667. None in connection with Government contracts, at any rate?—I cannot recall any particular one over a Government contract.

3668. What objection do you take, then, to the enforcement of what is called the current rate?—Anything might be a current rate in any district. Any one employer can make the current rate for his own district.

3669. Only if he was the sole employer in that district?—Yes, that would be so.

3670. If there were more than one employer in the district, then one of them could not make the current rate by himself?—In that case something would depend on what would be called the district. Take London; for some purposes London as a whole is reckoned as a district, but it is not considered as one district with regard to the brush trade.

3671. Are there many districts?—There are four or five that I know of.

3672. Four or five districts with four or five different rates?—There are four or five different rates paid for Government work within London—for drawn work, that is, brushes in which the bristles are drawn with wire. The term "drawn work" includes the sub-divisions boring, drawing, finishing and polishing.

3673. Have the employers in London agreed with you on a rate?—Most of them have for "pan" work, that is, work in which the bristles, etc., are set with pitch.

3674. Are not these Government contracts being paid for at that rate?—I must confess there is some complication there. Some of these firms pay trade union rates of wages for some parts of the trade, but do not for other parts.

3675. By trade union rate do you mean the rate agreed upon between employers and employed?—I mean the rate agreed upon for some parts of their work. We are cut up into so many sub-divisions.

3676. Do you mean some parts of the Government work, or some parts of the whole of the work?—Some parts of the Government work.

3677. They pay the agreed rate for some parts of it, and I suppose less than the agreed rate for other parts of it?—Yes.

3678. Do you complain when that is brought to your notice?—We have complained, but there again we have some difficulty, because we cannot always get to know what is being paid. The part that I am referring to most particularly now is the part that we call in the trade drawn work, such as shoe brushes, hair brushes, and army horse brushes. A good deal of that is given out to the men to do as out-workers, and we have some difficulty in tracing what is really paid to them.

3679. Is it done at home?—In some cases, but some employers have their men in. There anomalies creep in. Very often—in most cases, I believe—the men who take their work out to do at home have to provide the glue for glueing the backs to the brushes. That, we maintain, is really part of the material of the brush. Then out of what they are paid as wages they have to pay for shop room, and that, we think, deducts somewhat from the price paid.

3680. Why would they want to pay for shop room if they do it at home?—When I say they do it at home, I do not exactly mean they do it in their own houses. They hire little workshops. In some cases one or two will hire a little back stable for a workshop. I am referring to "finishers" (men) not to "drawing hands' (women).

3681. And that amounts practically to sub-contracting, you think?—I scarcely know what name you could apply to that. We call it outdoor work. There certainly is some sub-contracting done, because a man will take out a large quantity from the manufacturer, and he will not only have his wife and family assisting him, but he sometimes turns part of it over to another man to do. It is all booked out in one man's name, and booked back again in the same name at the manufacturers.

3682. Is there much of that practised in your trade?—In one district, the South London district, I believe it is general, if not universal.

3683. Is that the main complaint that you want to make of the working of the Fair Wages Clause?—That is the main complaint with regard to that particular part of it.

3684. That there is practically a system of sub-contracting introduced?—Sub-contracting, and, we think, sweating. We maintain that when a man takes out a large quantity of work he will, perhaps, have, as I know personally, men under him besides having his own wife and children assisting. The employer might, perhaps, come forward and produce the man's wages book, and show what a large wage the man can obtain even at the price, but he does not say what hours the man has to work to earn that.

3685. What alteration do you propose in the terms of the Clause to prevent this?—Instead of the words "fair wages," I believe the words "trade union" would meet it.

3686. How would that help you? This man whom we will call a sub-contractor would be paid what you call the trade union rate, but he would sub-let it to his wife and children; that is what it comes to, does it not?—It might do; but at present he is not paid what we consider the trade union rate of wage.

3687. He is paid the agreed rate between the workmen and the employer, is he not?—Between the workmen and that particular employer.

3688. But that is not the current rate?—That is not the current rate even for London.

3689. If you were to substitute for that "the trade union rate as agreed with the employers," would you be any better off?—I believe we should; and I believe with regard to home work the Government Factory Inspectors would then see that there is not so much sweating done as there has been in the past.

3690. Have you an agreed rate in the South London district which you have mentioned?—Not for this drawn work, that is, the work that is drawn with wire.

3691. Then, as I say, you would not be any better off if the contract required the contractor to pay the trade union rate as agreed upon, because practically there is no trade union rate, I understand?—I can hardly say that there is for these particular lines, although for that part of the general work, which is very similar to this, we have a trade union rate.

3692. Which is generally paid?—Which is generally paid.

3693. Why cannot you get a rate generally agreed upon for this particular kind of work?—I am scarcely able to answer that question.

3694. Have you tried?—We have tried in this way, that we have tried to organise the men, and we have found great difficulty in doing that.

3695. Have you tried to organise the employers? You have got an agreed rate for part of the work, so there is an association of the masters, I suppose?—I am not aware of it.

3696. Then who has agreed to the rate?—There was an association, and although I believe the association amongst the employers as such is now non-existent, the agreement still remains.

3697. And they all abide by it?—They all abide by it; we have had no trouble with it for years.

3698. And you cannot induce them to extend the agreement to these other classes of work?—I do not know that we could induce them, but in the matter of municipal contracts, if you will allow me to diverge for a moment, we have been able to bring pressure to bear and to compel them.

3699. How did you manage that?—By taking advantage of the Trade Union clause in the municipal contracts. In several cases we have represented to the committees of these municipalities that the contractor who is doing their work did not pay the trade union rates of wages.

3700. Meaning by that the rate accepted by the employers and the men?—Yes.

3701. But you have just said that in this district which we have been talking of there is no rate of the kind; how would you be any better off if you had "Trade Union rate" put into the contract?—As I said, there are two distinct classes of work that we speak of in the trade. There is pan work and there is drawn work. For pan work they have a distinct and generally agreed upon price, but for drawn work, chiefly owing to so much of it being done out of doors, it has been almost impossible to agree upon prices. The only thing we could base the price on would be work that is very similar to it which is done for ordinary sale. We should say that that should be the basis for the Government contract work.

3702. Should you say you have succeeded in that as regards municipal contracts?—The municipalities do not take any of that kind of work, or very little of it. Theirs is chiefly pan work—road-sweeping brooms. Horse brushes comprise all the drawn work which local governing bodies take, and for these we have a set price.

3703. Is not your difficulty this, that there is no agreement as to the rate that should be paid for this kind of work, and that you cannot get the employers to consent to one?—I confess there is something in that. One or two of the better class shops—I am speaking from the workman's point of view now, of course—pay a price that we have considered fair, and the men employed there are chiefly Trade Unionists. There has been no dispute there as to the price being paid for years past. That, although not formally agreed upon, is what we usually mean when we speak of a Trade Union rate.

3704. Then I see you have a further point that you want to bring forward, with reference to the introduction of cheap labour?—Yes, I have.

3705. Do you mean female labour?—Chiefly female labour.

3706. There must be a good deal of work in your trade that could very well be done by women, I suppose?—There is. There are one or two branches of it that are taken almost entirely by women. The wire-drawing and polishing, for instance, is done almost entirely by women. In recent years they have been introduced to the pan work, that is, setting the knots with pitch. That is most laborious work. To help them to do that the employers have had to employ one man to bore the holes in the blocks in which the knots have to be set. They pay him a fair wage, and employ the women simply to do the pitching and to put the knots in the holes, paying them 50 per cent. less than they would have to pay a man to do it.

3707. It is less skilled work than the men's work, is it not?—It is less skilled than doing it right throughout.

3708. If it is less skilled work, ought it not to be paid for at a lower rate?—I do not think it should be paid for at such a low rate, because assuming that a man was going to do it, he ought to earn a living wage at it. Assuming, for instance, that the employers still desire to subdivide this work for some other purpose than cheapness, I consider that the deductions which they make for the boring and the trimming off afterwards should be such as to allow the men who do the other parts to earn a reasonable living; but no man could earn a living at the price women are paid now.

3709. Therefore you think they ought not to be paid at so low a rate?—I think they ought to be paid exactly what a man would be paid and what men are paid in other works.

3710. Even though it is less skilled work and easier work than what a man does?—It is not easier work.

3711. You said part of it was very laborious, and that a man must be employed on that; but that the other was, I supposed, less laborious, and a woman could do it?—Even the part that is less laborious is very laborious. This branch that we are speaking of is the most laborious part of the trade.

3712. Still a woman can do it without much difficulty?—I would not say without much difficulty.

3713. At any rate, your objection is that a woman ought not to be paid less than a man for doing the same work in the same time?—That is exactly my contention, but ours being a piece-work trade the question of time does not count so much.

3714. Is there any other suggestion you have to make about the Fair Wages Clause; if so, we shall be glad to hear it?—There is one suggestion I would like to make, but I do not know whether it comes within your reference. That is, that there should be some notice given to the public generally, or that notice should be given so that the public could approach it in a way to know who have secured the contracts. That is where we have found a great difficulty. Contracts have been going on in some instances for more than six months before we have known who has been the successful tenderer.

3715. How do the municipalities convey that information to you?—Usually in "The Contract Journal."

3716. You see a notice there, do you?—We usually see a notice there.

3717. And that answers your purpose?—Yes.

3718. Do all the municipalities advertise in that way?—I do not know of one that does not. Some advertise in "The Municipal Journal" and some in "The Contract Journal." There is always a notice saying what contractor has secured the contract.

3719. (Mr. De la Bère.) Is home work general in the ordinary trade, or is it mainly limited to the work of Government contracts?—It is more on Government contracts than anything else.

3720. Why, do you suppose?—Because, I think, there is such a large quantity of the same thing, such a large number of the same brush, that it lends itself more easily to out-work.

3721. Would you consider brush-making a sweated industry? Would it come within the definition of a sweated industry, do you think?—In some places undoubtedly it is sweated, but generally speaking when a man is paid what we consider the trade union rate he can earn a living—not a competence, but a living.

3722. Is there much alien work employed in it—are there many foreigners, Jews, and others, employed on it?—A few, not very many.

3723. In some of the Government contracts with regard to some articles it is customary to insert a clause requiring that the goods shall be made up in the factory, and that the wages shall be paid direct to the workers; that would meet your difficulty, would it not, as regards the home-work?—The first part of it would.

3724. Would not the second also help you?—So long as home-work is done it is difficult to trace the second part.

3725. You mean that the man who receives the lump sum, as it were, is the nominal worker, and nobody else?—Yes.

3726. But, at any rate, the first part would help you?—Yes.

3727. It would meet your object?—It would meet our case very considerably.

3728. Of course, one has to consider whether a clause of that sort will not throw the trade out altogether; I mean, not only might it affect the employers, but it might throw out a very large number of deserving people who are accustomed to work at home. How do you think that would be in your trade?—I believe it would affect some of them.

3729. Would it affect a minority or a majority?—It would affect a minority of the trade, but a majority of a particular district. The practice is so old, it has been handed down from father to son, and it is really looked upon as part of the trade; hence our difficulty in getting information.

3730. I suppose what it comes to is that in some districts the trade would be ripe, as it were, for such a change, but not in others?—Yes, I think that would be the case.

3731. (Mr. Wilson Fox.) I suppose these home-workers would themselves object to the change?—I am not so sure of that; some undoubtedly would.

3732. These men, for instance, who take their work home, and whose wives and families help them, would they object, do you think? If they were told that in future they will have to do their work in the factory and not at home, and that their wives and daughters might not take any part in the work, would they object, do you think, or not?—I believe some of them would.*

3733. Have you many of that class of men in your union or not?—I only know of one out-worker in our union, but he does not do that class of work.

3734. So it would not affect your union at all?—It would not affect the union.

3735. You would not lose any support from the men in your union if that change was made?—I do not anticipate anything of that kind at all.

3736. The men who do it are outside the Union?—Yes.

3737. (Mr. Black.) What kind of brushes are made mostly by your people? There are one or two trade unions, are there not, in the brush trade?—Yes.

3738. Where is the dividing line between your society and, I think it is, the United Society of Brush Makers?—There is no difference whatever as regards the trade. Why there are two unions in existence is because one embraces also the sick, superannuation, and several other benefits, and the other does not.

3739. Do you not work together when it comes to trying to arrange prices with your employers?—Yes.

3740. But in spite of working with the other trade union, you have not made much success in getting prices arranged?—The prices which are in existence now to a large extent were in existence in 1872, and they have remained practically stationary.

3741. That is the view that Mr. Porter hinted to us, I think?—I knew he brought it before you, so I did not trouble to bring it.

3742. You and he work together?—Yes.

3743. You seem to represent rather a different aspect of the question to what he brought before us. I do not think we heard quite so much from him about this home work?—That is possibly because he and I represent different branches as workmen. He does one part of it and I do the other. The part I have been dwelling most upon is the part I am directly concerned with.

3744. That is the drawn work?—Yes.

3745. What kind of brush would that be?—All kinds that are drawn with wire—the Army shoe-brush, for instance.

3746. What would be the sort of brushes that he takes?—He would take brooms—all kinds that are set with pitch.

3747. Are the conditions better, do you think, on his side than on yours?—They are distinctly better. They not only earn a better living, but it really is easier work.

3748. You do not seem to know of any specific cases on Government contracts of this home work, I think?—I know of plenty, but it is one thing to know and another thing to be able to prove.

3749. Actually on Government contracts?—Yes.

3750. You are not asking the Government to help you on your work for the private trade?—No.

3751. You are dealing now purely with the Government contracts?—Yes; and chiefly that part of the Government contract work that is given out.

3752. Until you can organise your own people you will not make much impression on the employers, I think, will you? Is that not about how it stands?—I am afraid that is it.

3753 (Mr. Hillier.) Your union is strong, is it not; you have got members spread all over the districts?—Yes.

3754. And it is your men, or, at any rate, men belonging to your union, who are parties to the prices that are agreed upon by the masters and the men?—In so far as they are agreed, we are parties to it. We are not asking for any alteration in the prices that have been agreed upon; we simply complain that the prices which are agreed upon are not paid.

3755. A brushmaker's work is cut up into divisions, is it not?—Unfortunately, it is.

3756. It is all sectionised?—Yes.

3757. And there is no one who makes a brush throughout?—That is so.

3758. Is that not the reason why home work is done, and why so much of the drawn work is taken out, whether it is Government work or private work? Is it not a general thing that that should be taken home?—No, not for private work; there is some done in that way, but it is not the general practice in private work.

3759. Harking back to prices, your Society being strong, surely they could fix the prices for this drawn work, could they not? I think you say there are no prices fixed for the drawn work?—Not for the Government work.

* Note by witness on revise.—I have since been told that they would object, because it would be absolutely impossible for them to earn a living, at the prices now paid, in the factory hours.

3760. Are there for private work?—I believe they could fix a price without raising the price, because if all firms paid equal to what the best of them pay, I do not think we should make any complaint.

3761. I suppose there would be a difficulty in many cases, because in the drawn work the prices would vary considerably with the class of brush, and would depend upon how much the trained worker was required; for instance, the length of bristle in the brush would be a factor in determining the price of the brush, would it not?—That would, but that would not affect the Government work.

3762. But the Government work is not all of one pattern; there are various patterns and various grades?—Yes; but the one pattern is always alike all the way through, and there is such a large quantity in the Government work that really it amounts to what I said before.

3763. If there is no difficulty, surely it is a matter for your trade to settle the question of prices with the employers?—If the men are not all in our Union, how can we do it? The men who have been trained in the trade do not get the opportunity to do the work so much as we think they should, on account of this sub-division.

3764. I suppose you are referring to where women do the work?—No, I am referring now to the part that is drawn with wire. We recognise that that particular part, the drawing with wire, is women's work; but other parts, such as the boring and the finishing, are men's work, and men do it still to a large extent.

3765. (Chairman.) Is there anything more you would like to add?—There is one point, and that is with regard to the boring. A good many firms employ boring hands—men who bore the holes at the contractors' factories; others, we find, buy the boards with the holes ready bored in them. That we think hardly gives a man who employs his own workpeople a fair chance.

3766. Is that customary in the trade?—It only applies to certain firms, but these certain firms are generally successful in securing Government contracts.*

3767. Would that come under the head of subletting?—I rather think it would.

3768. Have you ever made that complaint?—Our Society has not, but I know that the United Society has.

* Note by witness on revise,—The insertion of a clause similar to that referred to in Q. 3,723 would, in my opinion, meet this case.

The witness withdrew.

Mr. Alfred Masters, called and examined.

3769. (Chairman.) You represent the Bone Brush Makers' Trade Protection Society, do you not?—Yes; I am the secretary.

3770. Have you had much experience of the working of the Fair Wages Clause?—Yes.

3771. Have you had many points in connection with it on which you are not satisfied?—Yes.

3772. Have you rates agreed upon with your employers?—Yes.

3773. In all cases?—In all cases where they recognise the trade union.

3774. But there are employers, I take it, who do not recognise this agreement?—That is so.

3775. Are those the employers that you complain of chiefly?—Yes.

3776. Not the others?—No.

3777. Some of these employers who do not recognise your agreement get Government work, do they?—Yes.

3778. Are they alone in their district?—No; there are others within half a mile or three-quarters of a mile.

3779. You find that they do not pay the rate of the district?—That is so.

3780. Have you complained to the contracting department?—Yes.

3781. Did you get satisfaction?—They told me that if we had made such complaints, and could prove them, they would make inquiries, but the difficulty was in proving them. The people who worked at the place were so frightened to speak that we gave it up, and did not make any further complaint.

3782. You mean the men who were being employed by the firms who did this?—Yes, the men on the firms.

3783. You could not get the evidence from them as to what their wages were?—Not then.

3784. Have you got that evidence since?—Yes.

3785. Have you brought forward your complaint again?—No. I have only got the information within the last week or two—since I made up my mind to come here.

3786. What do you propose to do now? You will pursue that complaint, I suppose, now that you have got sufficient evidence to go upon?—I expect we shall, but we have not definitely made up our mind to do anything. I have brought the evidence to lay before you; I have the workers' books here.

3787. We do not want to go into any particular case; we only want to get illustrations of the difficulties that you have found in the working of the Clause. Have you applied to the firm that is employing the people?—No.

3788. It is a question of piece-work rates?—Yes.

3789. And they are not paying the same as the other firms?—That is so.

3790. Are they paying very much below what the other firms are paying?—Very much—from 12 to 20 per cent.

3791. Have they got a Government contract at this moment?—Yes, for Army tooth-brushes.

3792. You do not know what the explanation is likely to be, I suppose?—Simply that they will not pay the rate, and they will not employ union men.

3793. How long have they been Government contractors, do you know?—Seven or eight years for tooth-brushes.

3794. Have they always paid the same rate?—Yes.

3795. As I said, I do not think we can go into the merits of the particular complaint, because we could not settle it if we did. It is sufficient to take it from you that in this case, at any rate, there is a firm engaged on Government work which is not paying the agreed rate in their district?—That is the case.

3796. Is there any other point you would like to bring forward?—Simply I say the true remedy would be to accept as fair wages that which has been accepted by masters and men as such, and has become the agreed standard in the district.

3797. I think you will find that Government departments generally would say that that was the current rate, and if you could prove that that rate was not being paid I think you would find that they would enforce it. On that assumption you have no further complaint to make, I take it?—No. We shall see that this complaint is made.

3798. (Mr. De la Bère.) In your Proof you say "that 29,000 brushes were tendered for by fair houses in August, 1907, not one of whom received any orders, and this has been going on for years." I think a year or two ago you sent, to the War Office, at any rate, the names and prices of the employers who pay the recognised trade union rate of wages, and those, I take it, would be recognised as fair houses?—Yes.

3799. You probably know who has this contract for 29,000 brushes?—Yes.

3800. I think I am right in saying that their name appears on this list of fair employers?—No, it does not.

3801. Then I must be wrong?—On that list they are only for wood-work.

3802. They are fair for wood-work but not for the bone-work, is that it?—Yes.

3803. It is rather curious, is it not, that your society should, as it were, give a certificate to a man as being fair for one particular branch of the trade and should hold him unfair for others?—In the list that is issued by the Brush Makers' Society the bone-work is distinctly kept apart from the wood-work, and that firm's name is not amongst the list of fair employers in bone-work.

5804. Did he do bone-work at the time the list was made?—Yes. That list, I think, is about two years old, and for seven or eight years he has been having the contract.

3805. I think this is the first instance we have had of an employer who is certified, as it were, as fair for one class of work and condemned as unfair for another; but that is the case, is it?—Yes. It is especially the case with regard to women. He pays them 4s., whilst the other firms pay 4s. 6d. and 5s. That is for the poorest class of work that is done in the East End—brush-drawing.

3806. To what do you attribute the difference of teatment which he apparently accords to the wood brush makers and the bone brush makers? Why should he be less fair, to use your term, to one than to the other?—Because the bone brush makers are not strong enough to enforce their rates.

3807. In the early part of your Proof you seem to hint at some discrimination between union and non-union men; have you ever complained of that?—I do not quite gather the idea.

3808. You speak of several firms "who do not employ union men, solely on the ground of the rate of pay"; you imply there, do you not, that the contractor discriminates between union men and non-union men?—No. He refuses to employ union men because he will not pay the rate of wages. He has no union men in the bone department.

3809. Has he refused them as union men?—No.

3810. But he fixes a rate of wage which precludes union men coming in; is that it?—That is so.

3811. There is no charge against him of discriminating and of saying: Because you are Union men I will not have you?—No. I have our minute book here. We have two men who have been expelled from our Society with the loss of all benefits because they were obliged to accept work at Messrs. A.'s at 8 or 10 per cent. under.

3812. (Mr. Wilson Fox.) You say the true remedy is to accept as fair wages that which has been accepted by masters and men as such and has become an agreed standard?—Yes.

3813. So that the most practical step that you take as a preliminary to getting a proper state of things is to get the employers to agree with you upon a list?—We have a list agreed and signed by the employers, and Mr. A.'s name was on that list until about eight years ago, when there was an advance of wages; he would not give that advance, but the other employers all did.

3814. The words you use in your Proof are, "and has become an agreed standard"?—Yes.

3815. (Chairman.) In the other section of his work that employer does give the standard rate?—Yes.

3816. (Mr. Black.) When you say that an employer pays less for drawing Army tooth-brushes than is paid by other firms in the same district for the same work, do you refer to the Army pattern tooth-brush or to tooth-brushes generally? Might that not make a difference? Is it not the case that a brush with, we will say, an oval head is rather more troublesome to shape than one with a square head?—Yes.

3817. Is there not more machinery comes in, perhaps, in the one case than in the other, and would that account for the difference in the price that you mention in your Proof of 6d.?—Undoubtedly the Army tooth-brushes are much easier to make than the ordinary brushes.

3818. The Army tooth-brush is a very simple square brush, with a square head and flat handle, is it not?—Yes; but all the other firms pay exactly the same for the Army brush as they do for the ordinary brush.

3819. If the Army takes a brush that is very easy to make, the Army ought to have the benefit of that, ought it not; if it is really easier to make?—I should hardly say so.

3820. If you were arranging fresh prices and you had the patterns laid out in front of you, would you not say "That is comparatively simple." "This has more machine work on it." "That is a much more difficult brush," and would you not arrange your schedule of prices accordingly, and would not the employer expect you to get 6d. per gross more or less accordingly? Is the 6d. a very large difference if it is a much simpler brush?—But that simpler brush is made in the ordinary work—plenty of them. They are given out—the easy and the hard together.

3821. I suppose the Army contract is for a very large number of the simple brush?—Yes.

3822. And not for an assortment of simple brushes and more difficult brushes?—That is so.

3823. It seems to me that the Army ought to get the benefit of that, if they are enlightened enough to go in for a very straightforward brush?—We should not even grant that, because even then it is exceedingly hard work on them to get 6s. a day

3824. That is raising another point now. There is a real difference between the brushes, is there not?—There is a real difference in the type of brush.

3825. Have you been speaking of a London factory, or have you been taking a country factory?—Messrs. A. are a London firm, but I believe they have moved a factory down into the country.

3826. But you are not raising any question on that point; you are dealing only with their rates in London?—That is all.

3827. (Mr. King.) Have the majority of employers accepted your rates?—Yes.

3828. Do you only represent London?—I only represent London.

3829. And you say the majority in London have agreed to your rates?—The great majority.

3830. (Chairman.) Is there anything you would like to add to what you have said?—No.

The witness withdrew.

TWELFTH DAY.

Thursday, 20th February.

At 32, Great George Street, Westminster, S.W.

PRESENT:

SIR GEORGE H. MURRAY, K.C.B. (Chairman).

Mr. R. BAILEY, M.V.O.
Mr. F. W. BLACK.
Mr. H. DE LA BÈRE, C.B.
Mr. A. WILSON FOX, C.B.
Mr. J. H. HILLIER.
Mr. A. F. KING.
Mr. J. J. WILLS (Secretary).

Mr. JOHN THOMAS MORRISON, called and examined.

3831. (Chairman.) I think you are the Secretary of the London Saddle and Harness Makers' Trade Protection Society?—Yes, and Secretary of the Military Harness and Accoutrement Makers' Trade Union.

3832. You have nothing to do with the Midland organisation, I suppose?—Nothing at all—excepting that we are co-operating with them in the National Piece-Price List for Government work.

3833. Is yours a large Society?—We have about 350 members at the present time.

3834. All in the London district?—Yes.

3835. Are there many employers doing Government work?—I suppose there are not more than five or six in London.

3836. It is only with those five or six that you are concerned, in fact?—Yes.

3837. It is work for the War Office, I suppose?—Yes.

3838. What has been your experience of the Fair Wages Clause; has it done you any good?—Yes, it has. It has stopped in a measure the cutting-down prices that have been existing for some considerable time; but, unfortunately, at very quiet times, the contractors for Government work utterly ignore the Fair Wages Clause, and do not comply with it. We only know at the present time of one instance of an employer in London complying with it. That is an employer who works for the Government.

3839. What do you mean by not complying with it?—They pay any price they like. They are paying, in some instances, 25 per cent. and 50 per cent. less than the Fair Wage price.

3840. What do you call a Fair Wage price?—It is based on 8d. per hour.

3841. Why do you fix that as the fair price?—As an outcome of the Sweating Inquiry in 1888 and 1889. Mr. Nepean, who was then the Director of Contracts, made arrangements by which a list should be prepared for the workmen. It was found in that Inquiry that sweating was so rampant that the permanent officials were fully convinced that the case was proved that sweating existed to a fearful extent by the employment of sub-contractors, and so they got out a list of prices with the employers and with the workmen founded upon the basis of 8d. per hour. I have one list here, and it is the only one, I think, we have left amongst us (handing in same). Mr. Nepean, in giving his evidence to the Committee, said this—I am quoting from the majority Report of the Committee: "Mr. Nepean has now issued price lists to govern all contracts for War Office stores in the harness, saddlery, and accoutrement trade. He hopes to get from the employers a statement of the wages they pay to their hands according to a system which he explained—'I have not the least doubt that the masters will be able to come to some sort of idea of what the fair price is to pay for the various operations in the production of that equipment, and that they will be able to tell me, by positive statistics, what is the average rate of pay—not the highest rate, of course, which any special workman or workwoman can get, but the average rate of pay that men and women can respectively earn. Having got that, I then propose to take the workingman's own view about it, and to ask him whether he agrees with the views of the masters; and, if he does not agree, I propose to put the workman and the master in conference, and that they shall concur in something they can present to me as a clear agreement in the trade as to the prices to be paid. I do not want to regulate them myself, but, if possible, to induce masters and men to regulate them for themselves. Then when our tenders are issued for accoutrements, or for harness and saddlery, we shall have this result, that the man of capital will be probably the man who will be able to carry the contract, who undoubtedly is the man better able to do it, and he expects to get better work for better wages.'"

3842. What is the date of that?—1890.

3843. On that did you come to an agreement with the employers?—There was no agreement with the employers other than this. We produced a list, a copy of which you have there, and a number of the employers paid it.

3844. Without any formal agreement?—Yes, I have a letter from Mr. Nepean stating that he was negotiating with the employers.

3845. Since then, they have departed in some respects from that list, have they not?—Very much so.

3846. But you have never had an agreement?—No, never.

3847. So you are hardly in a position to say that that is the current rate at this moment, are you?—Yes. In my own trade we have never had a written agreement, but we have had an agreement with the employers who have met us in conference. We have never had it stamped or anything of that sort, but it has been kept on both sides.

3848. This is not an agreed price list at this moment, is it?—It has been evaded.

3849. You can hardly call it evaded if it was never in force?—But it was in force.

3850. It was only in force because it was generally accepted at the time by the employers?—Exactly.

3851. They have now declined to accept it; is that not the position?—They have evaded it in this manner: The accoutrement trade is in a very difficult position. At one time there is a flush of orders, at another time men are practically walking about for months unable to get anything to do; and the employers take such advantage of the poverty of the workmen that they can place any numbers they like upon the article which they want made, and the men, through hunger, are driven to accept this price. Unfortunately they did not keep themselves organised as they should have done, and they could not resist these encroachments.

3852. (Mr. Wilson Fox.) Did they never strike in consequence of those encroachments?—They had several minor strikes, but they never had funds to maintain them, and so the men gave up their points in the majority of cases.

3853. (Chairman.) Does it not amount to this, that there is no agreement at this moment, and that the employers pay lower prices than they used to?—Yes, they do pay lower prices.

3854. Might that not be merely a reduction in wages and nothing more?—Certainly it is a reduction.

3855. But they are all doing the same, I understand?—With the exception of one. There is only one employer in London who does Government work at the present time, who is keeping the Trade Union conditions.

3856. By Trade Union conditions you mean your list, I presume?—Yes, that list. That, I might say, is brought about because our organisation, the Saddle and Harness Makers of London, is a powerful one. This employer is a legitimate saddle and harness maker, and we, owing to our combination, are enabled to keep the price up there.

3857. You probably know that the Fair Wages Clause does not compel the contractor to do more than pay the current rate, and that it would not compel him to pay a rate which may have been fixed by the Trade Union many years ago, and which is not now acted upon?—We understand the current rate to be the rate that is in practice obtained in the particular district. The particular district of London covers 20 miles as we take it. In my own organisation we look to the employers to pay the rate of 33s., which is our minimum, or practically 8d. per hour; and if they do not pay that they are regarded as unfair employers.

3858. It is quite possible that they are not infringing any provision of the Fair Wages Clause if the rates that they are paying are what may be described as the current rates?—We submit that our rate is the current rate, because it is agreed upon between the Employers' Association and our own Association.

3859. I thought you said there was no agreement?—There is an agreement by conference, but not in writing.

3860. Is that verbal agreement in force to-day?—Yes.

3861. I am afraid I must have misunderstood you. I thought you said there was no agreement?—I am speaking for two trades—the London Saddle and Harness Makers, and the Accoutrement Makers.

3862. Does this price list that you gave me first belong to another trade?—That is for the Accoutrement Makers. The members of my own trade work at the accoutrement trade when their own trade is very quiet, and they only do that through dire necessity.

3863. Then the position in the accoutrement trade is different to what it is in the saddle and harness makers' trade?—Yes.

3864. In the accoutrement trade there is practically no agreement between the employers and the men at this moment; is that so?—Other than the acceptance in 1890 of that list which I have submitted to you.

3865. Which acceptance has been practically, if not formally, withdrawn, I suppose?—It has not been withdrawn; it has never been withdrawn by the workmen.

3866. But it is no longer accepted by the employers?—That is so, excepting one.

3867. Coming to the saddle and harness makers' trade, there is a formal agreement, I understand?—Yes.

3868. And that is acted on?—Yes; it is agreed to in London.

3869. Then you have no complaint in regard to that trade?—Only as to the evasion of the contractors who work for the Government, and who do not pay our men the Trade Union rate.

3870. That is the agreed rate?—Yes.

3871. How many of them are there who pay that, and how many who do not?—There is only one out of about five or six in London who work for the Government who does pay that rate.

3872. That is in the saddle and harness trade, is it?—No, that is in the accoutrement trade.

3873. I want you to keep the two trades separate?—In the saddle and harness trade, if any employer worked for the Government, he would pay not less than our minimum rate for day work, of 33s. per week, and he would comply with this National Piece-price Book for Government work.

3874. In the saddle and harness trade you have no complaint, I understand?—Only that our men working for Government contractors do not get the regular price; they do not get the rate of 8d. per hour.

3875. In no case?—Except in one instance, and that is a firm in the south-eastern district, which pays 8d. per hour.

3876. Notwithstanding this agreement then, there are certain firms who do not act up to it?—That is so.

3877. Though they have accepted it?—Yes.

3878. Have you made any complaint to the War Office about their action?—No, we have not. I lodged a complaint against one firm in the City for not complying with the Trade Union conditions, but we had such difficulty in getting evidence to establish our case, though we knew it was correct, that we could not push the matter more forward.

3879. In fact, you have not been able to complain, for want of evidence that the proper rate has not been paid?—That is so since the Sweating Inquiry finished their work. We used to be able to get a case up, as we used to be able to get the workmen's books: but now the firms find the books, and they will not allow them off the premises.

3880. What kind of books do you mean?—A man's weekly book, showing the work that he would do, and the money that he would receive.

3881. Is he not allowed to take the book home?—No; it is the property of the firm.

3882. In the accoutrement trade, the case is that practically there is no agreement?—There is no agreement.

3883. What is the current rate? Is that much below the rate in your list?—Do you mean the rate that they are paying?

3884. Yes?—In some instances, it is 50 per cent. below. I can give you instances, if you will bear with me for a moment. One firm, for preparing and finishing, pay 7d. and 8d. an hour, and for breast collar stitching 1s. 2½d., the National Piece-Price Book being 1s. 8d.; and for neck straps they pay 3d. each for stitching, the National price being 4½d. Another firm pay 6d. each for preparing, the book price being 10d., and for stitching 1s. 6d. each, the book price being 2s. 7d.

3885. Those rates are being generally paid, are they?—These rates are what individual firms pay. There is not a uniform rate; different firms pay different rates. They make their own terms, on account of the inability of the workmen to force their demands. I may say that strength has been taken away from them by women-labour ousting the men from employment.

3886. The employers are not associated, I suppose?—No.

3887. They act independently?—That is it.

3888. Should you say that what you have just been quoting represented the rate generally paid now?—Yes; that is the rate that is generally paid now, or at any rate was paid last year.

3889. That becomes the current rate, does it not?—We do not admit it as a current rate. The employer enforces it upon the workman, as he is compelled to accept it through want of food or anything of that sort.

3890. Still, it is the rate generally paid?—Yes, it is the rate generally paid.

3891. With the exception of one firm?—With that exception.

3892. One firm, I understand, is an exception in both of those trades that you are representing?—The firm is not an exception in the harness trade, except as a Government contractor, paying Trade Union rates in civil and Government work.

3893. Is it the same firm?—Yes, it is a harness maker; but on account of the harness trade being hit so very hard through the introduction of motors, that has reduced our trade quite 50 per cent. Some of the employers have gone in for Government work, and they retain their harness makers and brown saddlers to do this work.

3894. You mentioned that the employment of women is increasing; is that so?—Yes. At one shop in 1906 they had about 100 women. A bill was outside the factory, which I saw myself, wanting women. They were paying them 3d. per hour. They had on at that time about 80 women, against 16 men, stitching.

3895. They only do certain parts of the work, I suppose?—They do work which men used to do. They do very heavy work. Women do a portion of the work, and they have to pull in what we term the threads. It is made of 5-cord brown hemp. We say, as workmen, that it is impossible for women to do it. I have here a ball of hemp which is made into the 5-cord thread. We say that a woman has not the strength to pull in that thread. (Handing in samples of thread and hemp.)

3896. Is that so, as a matter of fact?—It is so.

3897. She cannot do it?—She cannot. Just imagine the strength required to pull that in! You have to pull it in below the surface of the leather. If you try to pull in a thread of that sort—I have never tested the weight—it takes about as much power as a man has in his wrist to pull it in.

3898. If you are right in saying that she cannot do it, how is it that she does it?—She does it, but it is not done properly.

3899. Not well, you mean?—No; it is not done so that the work is done as it should be done.

3900. But it is done sufficiently to pass the inspector's examination?—Yes. They have got a system of crushing the stitches; they have been known to put them under rollers to crush them flat. Of course, any practical workman would detect that in a minute. You can imagine that stitches, even on your own boots, if they were laid upon the surface would not have the wear in them that they have when they are pulled well into the leather. It is the same with any portion of harness.

3901. I suppose the inspector takes care of that, does he not?—He should do.

3902. Are there many rejections that you know of?—I do not know the percentage of them.

3903. What remedy would you suggest for the difficulty that you are in, in the accoutrement trade, for instance?—I would suggest the enforcement of the Fair Wage Clause, the enforcement of those prices which the War Office accepted in 1890, and a proper supervision when any complaint was made. At the present time, if there is any complaint made, very few workmen feel satisfied with the way in which it is conducted. We do not question the integrity of the gentleman who makes the inquiries, but we say that anybody sent from a Department should be accompanied by some practical person who would be able to point out to him the glaring, misleading statements that are given to him. He cannot correct them himself, because he does not know exactly where the sore lies. We have a very big idea, which amounts to a conviction that the clause against sub-contracting is evaded at the present time. But we cannot prove that, for the reason that the workman, who is called the foreman, in instances draws so much per week, and then he draws a balance at the end of a period. We have instances where two men have been engaged in one room working upon precisely the same article, and one has been paying 14d. for three and another one has been paying 10d. for two. When the attention of the one who was paying less than the other was called to the fact that the others were getting the benefit of a higher price, he immediately went to the other one and the work was stopped. Of course, we can only conjecture that these men are making money out of the stitchers. These men are very fond of women labour, because they can get them to do it at any price.

3904. Were those two men who did the stitching in the direct employment of the firm?—They did not do the stitching, they did the preparing and finishing; they got the work ready for the stitchers.

3905. Were all the men who were on the work in the direct employment of the firm?—Yes.

3906. Where does the sub-contracting come in, then?—We consider it is through the bonus which these men get. These men fix the price, which is a profit upon the price they say they will take out this work for, and they employ their own stitchers, though the firm pay them, simply to comply with the Clause in the Government contracts, because the Government contracts say that the workman shall be paid direct from the firm.

3907. And he is?—Yes, he is.

3908. But you think that the foreman keeps back something that the workman ought to have?—We believe that the firm keeps back something, and eventually pays the foreman. For instance, I might undertake to do a dozen pairs of traces at so much; I am going to pay my stitchers so much, and I am getting a profit out of my stitchers. The firm pays the stitchers and I draw so much a week, but then when the article is completed I get the balance. That is how we believe it is arranged; only, as I told you, we cannot prove it.

3909. (Mr. Wilson Fox.) The foreman gets his money whether it is done inside or out?—That is it.

3910. (Chairman.) And he does it as he likes?—Yes.

3911. (Mr. Bailey.) Is it the foreman who quotes a price in the case you gave us for a dozen pairs of traces?—He prepares them and finishes them; the stitchers do the other portion.

3912. (Mr. Wilson Fox.) Do you think he employs outside assistance?—He must not give the work off the premises, but he employs them in the shop.

3913. He employs them as he likes, does he?—Yes; he engages them.

3914. (Chairman.) You said just now that one of your remedies was that the contractor should be compelled to pay according to a list which was drawn up in 1890?—Yes.

3915. But you cannot stereotype that list for all time, can you?—We consider we can, because that list has never been withdrawn and it has never been negatived by the workmen.

3916. No; but it has been negatived by the employers, and that is the point?—It has been negatived by the employers, but still we hold that it is the list in existence and that there is no other official list in existence.

3917. But it is not agreed upon?—It is not agreed upon.

3918. Do you propose that the War Office should enforce a list of prices on the contractors?—I may say that this National Price List, which is one agreed upon by the whole of the organised workers in the United Kingdom, has been accepted by a number of the employers within the last month. I have a list here.

3919. (Mr. De la Bère.) We heard last week that it was not accepted?—Some of them do not accept it, but I have here a list of the employers who do accept it.

3920. (Chairman.) What is the relation between that list and this one of 1890?—We have taken the 1890 one as the basis.

3921. And you have made a new one?—Yes; we have amplified it and brought in more articles than there were on the first list.

3922. Do you say the new list is generally accepted?—It is not accepted by the bulk of the employers.

3923. Is it your suggestion that the contractors should be compelled to pay according to that list?—Yes.

3924. Though it has not been accepted by the bulk of them?—Yes.

3925. That would be rather a difficult thing to do, would it not?—I do not think so, seeing that the War Office accepted that list in 1890, which we submit is still in existence, though it has not been enforced on account of the lack of organisation among the accoutrement makers. But now this list is under the organised workers of the United Kingdom we shall enforce it.

3926. From the moment that you can enforce them generally, of course, they would become the current rates, but how can you ask that it should be enforced when it is not generally accepted?—We submit it is accepted.

3927. But not generally?—No; but we have got it accepted in London—by seven employers in London alone.

3928. I thought you said there was only one?—I was speaking of that old Army contractors' list, but I do not know that these employers that are on the list of contractors have ever had one of those old lists.

3929. Then the two complaints you make are, first of all, the underpayment of wages, and, secondly, sub-contracting?—No; we do not enforce the point of sub-contracting, because, as I told you, we cannot prove that.

3930. But you complain of it; at any rate, you suspect it?—Yes, we believe it to be in existence, and we believe that is the reason why women are engaged. At the present time there are not a dozen workmen in work in Bermondsey, out of a matter of 70 or 80 to be found in the streets of Bermondsey. Unfortunately, the half of them are in the workhouse, and women are in the workshops working at the present time. Where the employer gets a woman to work for about 3d. per hour, the men are bound to accept almost women's pay or starve. The employers prefer the woman, because she will take the work at any price. The men have been working on Government work, and they have not been able to earn more than 4½d. per hour. One man is working on one particular very hard piece of work called trace attachments, and I think his balance comes out at about £1 5s. for 50 hours, or something like that; then, out of that, he has to pay, unfortunately, for the hemp which he uses to put into the employer's material, which costs him on that particular work 1s. 9d. per week; it costs them generally about 1s. 6d. per week for hemp.

3931. (Mr. De la Bère.) I do not know whether you are aware that this old list, so far as the War Office is concerned, ceased to operate almost immediately after the passing of the Fair Wages Resolution?—That was soon after 1891, was it not?

3932. It was considered that the Fair Wages Resolution, as it were, superseded the previous endeavours which had been made to arrive at some fixed rate of wage and that this went rather beyond the actual wording of the Fair Wages Resolution. Therefore, I think, from about 1892 or 1893 the War Office ceased to compel contractors to agree to it or to endeavour to get them to agree to it?—I never heard of that.

3933. You did not know that?—No.

3934. It is so; it was dropped or ignored in the harness and saddlery trades, and shortly afterwards in the accoutrement trade?—This is the first intimation I have had of it.

3935. Among other things, one of the reasons for dropping it was that the parties concerned were altogether in disagreement as to what the work in the accoutrement trade should be valued at; that was one of the great difficulties we found in securing any fixed rate?—On which side was that—on the employers' side?

3936. The Trade Union tried for 8d. per hour—I think that was the price; the masters reckoned it at about 4d.; and the War Office considered that 6d. was a fair rate, which would not be open to the charge of sweating: So there we had three different views as to what the rate was?—I never heard anything of it before. I was president of the Accoutrement Makers at that time, and never heard anything of it then.

3937. Did you have any communication from the War Office regarding it?—No.

3938. It has never been referred to or alluded to at all by the War Office since about 1892 or 1893. I only mention that, because it appeared to me you were under the impression that it still held good, and that we are still endeavouring to enforce it. We have not attempted to do so for 14 years?—That is news to me.

3939. As I say, the main reason was that it was considered that the Fair Wages Resolution had superseded it, and as the Fair Wages Resolution said nothing about fixing rates of wages, but left it entirely to employers and employed to settle between them what was the current rate, it was not considered that a Government Department was justified in fixing rates themselves?—6d. per hour never governed the wage of the saddle and harness makers, because our rate in 1891 was 30s. minimum and in 1901 we raised it to 33s. Our piece-prices have been in existence now (I am speaking of saddle and harness makers) since 1874. We never heard anything of it, and the saddle and harness makers would not be classed as accoutrement makers.

3940. No, and I kept them distinct. I told you that the harness and saddlery trades were dropped quite early. At any rate you have not heard anything of this for 14 years?—No.

3941. (Mr. Wilson Fox.) You said just now that the motor industry had cut into your trade very considerably. May that not have been the reason why there was this reduction of wages of which you complain?—No. There has been no reduction of wages in the legitimate harness trade since the motor business has come into operation.

3942. But you complain that the employers have not kept up to the agreement which you say was made, and that there has been a reduction in the wages?—Yes, in the accoutrements.

3943. I am only endeavouring to find out whether the motor trade which has cut into your business has, in your opinion, anything to do with the reduction of wages owing to the employers not having the same amount of work to give out, nor the same amount of business. Apparently you do not think that that has had any effect at all on the reduction?—Not the slightest.

3944. How has it affected your trade if it has not affected wages? In what way has it affected your trade?—It has driven men out of employment. There is not the number of orders there were, but we have still maintained our standard wage.

3945. And have not taken a lower one?—No. No employer has suggested it even.

3946. I thought that some of the firms, if I rightly understood you, were paying a lower rate of wage?—On accoutrement work.

3947. But only on accoutrement work?—Yes.

3948. On the other class of work, although there has been less work, you say the employers have never attempted to lower the wages?—That is so.

3949. Not at all?—I have not heard of one reduction or attempted reduction.

3950. Now as to this work which women do. Whether they ought to do it or not, do they take any work home with them; do you know any cases of that sort?—Not to my knowledge.

3951. They do it all in the factory or the workshop then?—It is all done in the factories.

3952. That is so everywhere, is it?—Yes.

3953. You have never struck against reductions of wages, have you?—We have had no occasion. The accoutrement makers have refused to work. At one place they refused to work in one instance because women were given work.

3954. I am only talking about wages. When there have been reductions of wages below what you think was a fair rate, have you had any strikes in consequence?—The men have struck against it, but they have not been out any time, for the simple reason that they have not had any funds to keep it up.

3955. So they have gone back?—Yes.

3956. Have you struck at all against women's work?—No.

3957. You have not?—No. The men have protested, and I believe they have sent to the Government a protest "against the practice of Government contractors in the above trades giving preference to female stitchers, thereby displacing men from their legitimate employment, whilst women whose husbands are engaged in other callings, and young women living at home with their parents are filling mechanics' places at wages that men cannot keep a home together upon."

3958. With regard to these men who are out of work, men who are accustomed to work in leather and so on, is there any opening for those men in the motor trade where there is so much leather work?—There is not such a great deal of leather work required in the motor trade.

3959. The whole of the inside and all the motor accoutrements are leather?—The inside is a different trade altogether. That is a trimmer's trade.

3960. I am asking whether it is not possible for men with a knowledge of your trade to adapt themselves so that they can go in for the motor-work?—Some of them have gone in for what they term budget work in motor work, that is, the leather hoods and things; but there are not many of them, as that is a coachbuilder's trade.

3961. At any rate, they are not all in the workhouse?—Our men are not.

3962. I mean all the men who have gone out are not in the workhouse?—No.

3963. (Mr. De la Bère.) Are you speaking of your own or the accoutrement trade?—I am speaking of the accoutrement trade. I only know of one in my own trade who has gone into the workhouse.

3964. (Mr. Wilson Fox.) I only want to know how far your men can adapt themselves to the new circumstances that come along?—This is quite a coachbuilders' trade, and if they did adapt themselves to it, they would pretty well fill the coachbuilding trade. I suppose we have six or eight of our men working on motor work at the present time. There is not a great deal of work in that.

3965. You do not think there is?—There is not a great deal of work in it. The work looks bulky, but it does not take a great deal of time to do.

3966. I thought all these motors were fitted up with leather work inside?—The inside work is the trimmer's work; it is entirely different to what they call budget work.

3967. I want to know how far your men, if they were without the means of livelihood, could adapt themselves to some other trade?—They would have almost to serve an apprenticeship to that, because it is almost a new trade, at any rate, it would be a new trade to them.

3968. (Mr. Black.) The system you spoke of seems to be a kind of bonus system or premium system; but you do not recognise that?—No.

3969. It is not a custom in the trade?—No.

3970. You do not know whether that custom appears in the wages book?—I could not say.

3971. It might be a legitimate thing, might it not, to pay a bonus for getting work done more quickly; but there is nothing of that kind, you say?—We do not look at it as a legitimate thing. We look at it that it places the foreman in the position of sweating labour in order to get this bonus.

3972. The bonus, I suppose, is not shared by the workpeople in any way, but they are the sufferers? The actual workpeople do not get any share of that bonus?—Nothing at all.

3973. Are you sure of that?—I am certain of it.

3974. And you do not think it is in any way a legitimate system?—No, I do not think so.

3975. There is nothing that the foreman provides, I suppose, for which he would be entitled to a bonus or premium?—Nothing.

3976. With regard to your suggestion that the Government inspector should be accompanied by an expert, do you mean someone you could provide from the Union?—If necessary.

3977. Would the firm admit him?—The firm under the conditions of their contract are bound to accept the people that the Secretary of State may appoint. He might appoint an official of the Union to go with one of the officials of his department to inquire into it. The difficulty is that if the official goes to a workman, and asks the workman any question, and that question should lead up to the detection of some irregularity, that workman is spotted at once; whereas we, as officials, would be informed of these little things and we should be able to tell them. If I might just illustrate it, I could show you.

3978. You could not say that very well at the works, could you? You would want to tell the inspector beforehand the points to be on his guard against?—We should say to him, "Just look here; we want you to look at this." Some little time ago, we had a case with a Government contractor who was on the contractors' list and took out a contract for the London County Council. We knew that he did not pay the Trade Union rate. The County Council sent one of their officials down there, and he came back and said he had examined the books of the workmen, and he found that they were in receipt of the Trade Union rate of wages. When that was communicated to me, I went and saw the Chairman of the Committee and I said, "You have gone to the wrong port, Sir, to find out the irregularity; you went to see so-and-so and so-and-so, did you not?" He said "Yes." I said, "They are preparers and finishers; they are men who are getting a good wage. If you will go to such-and-such men who are stitchers and examine their books, you will see then where our complaint lies." They went to these men, and they fined this firm in four instances where the Fair Wages Clause had been evaded. The firm had only shown them the books of those men that were taking the proper wage, and they had kept back the poor wretches that were being sweated. Of course if anybody had accompanied that official from the Department, they would have said "No, don't look at these men's books and be satisfied, but look at the other men's books"; and the officials would have discovered it then.

3979. But you did not in that case accompany him?—We succeeded in that case, although we did not accompany him.

3980. Your point is practically met by your giving a little information to the inspectors beforehand?—Yes.

3981. I think that is a simpler matter than going with them?—Of course we do not blame the official from any Department, because he does his best undoubtedly, but he does not know where to put his finger on the sore.

3982. (Mr. De la Bère.) In the case of the stitchers' wages, was it explained, when you made the complaint, that it was a question of the wages that the stitchers were getting?—Yes, in fact I sent them one of the stitchers' books—and I have it at home now. But of course the firm put them off, and said they were paying the rate.

3983. Have you found similar cases at all in regard to any of the Government contractors?—Yes, there is one firm does it to-day.

3984. I mean cases where the inspector has been put off?—Yes this firm two years ago. A man was discharged from there because he was accused of giving me certain information. A question was asked in the House of Commons; inquiries were made, and the statement was accepted from the firm. They never interrogated the man at all, and they never investigated the man's case from his standpoint. They never asked us, but they accepted just the firm's statement, and the man was victimised.

3985. You have not had a case on a Government contract where the inspector, on receiving a complaint of one particular class of workers, has been satisfied with looking at the books of another class?—No, honestly we have not.

3986. (Mr. Hillier.) What is the number of men in your Society who are receiving the higher rate of wages? You say that your new scheme has been accepted by a number of firms; I want to know how many men are employed by those firms?—For Government work?

3987. No, generally?—I do not know one of our members in my own trade organisation who is getting less than our recognised rate—unless they are men beyond years—and, of course, we should not enforce that they should get the minimum rate even; we recognise that those men should work a little under that.

3988. How many men are employed by the firms who have accepted this new rate?—I should say roughly about 120 or 130.

3989. Then I suppose about 200 are working for firms who do not accept it?—Yes, but those firms that do not accept it are not on the Government list, and have not had a copy sent to them of the National List for Government work.

3990. In the accoutrement branch, it is piece-work, is it not?—Yes, for stitchers. Preparers and finishers are generally paid by the hour or day.

3991. Are the low rates which are paid by the firms caused by women being employed upon the work instead of men?—Undoubtedly. I can give you instances.

3992. (Mr. King.) Could you tell me a little more about the workmen's books. I think you said that up to the time of the Sweating Committee you were able to examine the workman's weekly book?—Yes.

3993. What did the Sweating Committee recommend that stopped that?—Direct payment by the firm. Of course, a workman for his own protection could keep a copy of the book.

3994. Did the Sweating Committee recommend that the workman should not be allowed to take his book home, or anything of that sort?—No, they did not recommend that; but the firm, to stop men from having evidence of that character, found the books themselves.

3995. Used the men to find the books?—The men used to find their own books.

3996. After the Sweating Committee, the employers did not like the kind of evidence that the men were able to produce?—Yes.

3997. And they themselves found the books?—That is it.

3998. Are the wages in those books carried into the wages books of the firm that our inspectors look at?—I do not know.

3999. Could our inspectors see the weekly books?—Yes; they have power under your contract to inspect the books.

4000. The weekly books are part of the wages books?—Yes.

4001. (Mr. De la Bère.) The wages book which the firm keeps on behalf of the workers is open to the inspector, is it?—Yes, and I take it that he would inspect the individual books, if necessary.

4002. Is the distress which, undoubtedly, I think, has been experienced among the accoutrement makers, in any way connected with the change in the pattern of the accoutrements? When the War Office gave up the buff accoutrements and turned to brown leather, did that affect the case at all?—No, I should say not. Men's labour has been supplanted by women's labour.

4003. Would the wages be the same in both cases, that is, will the wages which applied to buff accoutrements apply also to the brown leather?—I do not think so, because there would be more preparing in the ordinary brown leather than there would in the buff. The buff, I take it, would be sewn coarser.

4004. Has that materially altered the case at all, do you think?—It has, I think.

4005. (Chairman.) You object on principle to the employment of women in your trade, I gather?—No. We say women should have the right of employment, but we do not want them to undersell us in the labour market.

4006. They ought to be paid the same rate for the same work done in the same time?—Exactly. There is one woman who is known to work in Bermondsey, whose husband is foreman in one of the big markets over there getting a salary of a matter of £2 10s. per week. She is kept in full employment, while men are walking about the streets. That, we consider a grave injustice. We have instances of women being kept at their work to within two or three days of their confinement, and it has been known for women to be confined in the workshop even. We say such a state of things as that is not right.

4007. There is a good deal of work, I suppose, in the trade that they could do quite well?—Yes, they can do some of the work, but the majority of the work, speaking as a practical workman myself, I say the women cannot do efficiently.

4008. They cannot do the whole of it?—No.

4009. But there are sections of it that they can do?—Yes.

4010. Ought they to be paid for that limited part of the work at the same rate as a man who can do the whole?—Yes.

4011. But it is a less skilled part of the work, I suppose?—No. They could do, for instance, what we term the lighter stitching, that is, upon thinner articles of leather. They can do it and men can do it, and some of them in certain instances can do it equally as well as the men. They being capable of doing it equally as well as the men, we say they should have the same price for it in fair competition.

4012. (Mr. Wilson Fox.) You are talking entirely of the same piece-work price, are you?—Yes. For instance, in my own trade if a woman does work—and there are certain portions of the work which some of the women do—she is paid the same as the firm would give to a workman to do it. There is one case I had to investigate only last week—a case of saddles. Our price would come to about 30s. practically for that article. The firm that has had the contract pay their men—it is an unfair house as we term it—23s. for doing it. The men in turn, to supplement their wages, employ a woman to do a certain portion of the work, and they pay her 3s. 2d. for what we, as Trade Unionists, would pay a woman 9s. 6d. for doing. That is how the men augment their wage, and how the employer gets this particular portion of work done at a cheaper rate through sweating the workmen, and the workmen sweating the women. That is what we object to.

4013. Supposing a woman is pulling cord through like this, which you say is very hard work, I assume she would take much longer than a man who is doing the same job?—Yes, she would take longer.

4014. And therefore, if she was paid the same rate as a man, she would earn less in the time?—She would earn less in the time.

The witness withdrew.

Mr. Robert Charlton, called and examined.

4015. (Chairman.) You represent the National Amalgamated Society of Enginemen, Cranemen, Boilermen, Firemen and Electrical Workers?—Yes.

4016. Is that Society on the North-East Coast?—Yes, and in Scotland. Our general office is at Stockton-on-Tees. I am the Scottish organiser resident in the West of Scotland, and substantially conduct the affairs of the Society in that part of the country.

4017. How has the Fair Wages Clause affected the men in your trade?—It has affected us at the Q. Works in this way—that the rates and conditions of the men of our class who are working there are below what are paid to the men of our class in other works in the district.

4018. Is there a general agreement between your Society and the employers?—There are several agreements, and many tacit agreements. In the conduct of our affairs with the employers in the district, we necessarily have a large number of agreements with the employers individually and collectively. There is one matter, which may be regarded as an agreement, which is acted on by the employers in the district very generally, in fact, at every place excepting Q. That was the outcome of the arbitration we had. The arbitrators' decision was that our men are to be paid time and a half for all the work they do between the hours of 2 o'clock on Saturday and 6 o'clock on Monday morning. At Q. the men are simply getting bare time.

4019. Is that your complaint, that the accepted overtime rate is not being paid?—That is one of the complaints. Another complaint is that the rates of the men for doing particular work are below what is paid in other works.

4020. Is there a general agreement about rates of wages?—There is to this extent: In negotiating with an employer we take as a basis what is the average in the district. The rates for particular jobs are not all the same, and so we always take the conditions at that particular job into consideration in fixing the rate that is to be paid. Perhaps you would like me to give you some rates with comparisons between the works in the district.

4021. Yes, please. Are these piece-work rates that you are going to give us?—They are time-rates. Our men are all paid time-rates, and we have practically no piece-workers. The figures I am going to give you now are for the early part of 1907, and I may inform you that the rates I have got I know to be correct, but I have found it very difficult indeed to get the rates for the work, as perhaps I will have an opportunity of explaining to you as we go on. At Q. the rate paid for steel pit crane drivers was 6s. 2¼d., at A. 6s. 5½d., at B. 7s., at C. 6s. 5¼d., at D. 6s. 5¼d., at E. 6s. 6d. (by the way E. belongs to the same firm as Q.), and at F. 6s. 1½d.

4022. Are those all in the same district?—They are all in the West of Scotland. The last rate you will notice is a lower rate than the Q. rate. The explanation is that at F. the men on this job have a bonus of 1d. for every 16 tons that is turned out of the melting shop, and that gives them a considerably higher rate than they have at Q. Then on the soaking pit cranes, at Q. the rate is 5s. 0¾d., at A. 6s. 5¼d., at B. 6s. 1d., there are none at C., at D. 6s. 3½d., at E. 6s. 7d., and at F. 6s. 1½d. Then for boiler feeders the rate at Q. is 5s. 3¾d., at A. 7s. 2½d., at B. 5s. 8½d., at C. 6s. 1d., at D. 5s. 9½d., at E. 6s., and at F. 6s. 6d. Then the boiler firemen get 4s. 8½d. at Q., 5s. 2d. at A., 5s. 2d. at B., 5s. 10½d. at C., 5s. 1d. at D., 5s. 4d. at E., and 5s. 1d. at F.

4023. I notice that there is a good deal of difference between all those?—Yes, there is.

4024. There is no uniform rate at all?—No, there is no uniform rate. As I said before, all these jobs are fixed up according to conditions. For instance, at one place the cranemen may have three, four or five (perhaps not as many as five, but there may be one, two, three or four) furnaces to work; and in another place he may have less or more—he may not have more than five, but he may have from four downwards. At one place there may be two cranes for six furnaces or five furnaces, at another place there may be eight furnaces for two cranes. We have to take that into consideration. According to these conditions, the rates are fixed, and in making a comparison these things are taken into consideration.

4025. As the circumstances differ in all these cases, it is rather difficult to compare their rates, is it not?—It may be to an outsider, but it does not appear so to us. You see if we are prosecuting a claim for an advance in wages with an employer, and we quote the rates for a given job, the employer, if the conditions are different, and to his advantage, naturally tells us so. We have, as a matter of common-sense, to take the thing into consideration. But, apart from that, we have a Board of Arbitration and Conciliation in the West of Scotland, and all these works that I have mentioned here are affiliated with that Board, excepting Q. Any difficulty that may arise, if we are not able to amicably settle the point with the individual employer, is submitted to the Board and it is there decided. The bother with Q. has been that the management there would not recognise the Union, and the men have been absolutely unable to submit their claims to the only one that they could submit them to, namely, the management, with a view of having similar rates for practically the same conditions that they have in other works.

4026. Have you ever complained to the Admiralty about this matter?—Yes, I did. I beg to call your attention to this newspaper cutting, which is dated December 19th, 1906: "In the House of Commons this afternoon, during question time, Mr. O'Grady asked the Secretary to the Admiralty whether he is aware that the firm of Messrs. Z———, Government contractors, Glasgow, do not at their Q. Works conform to the Fair Wages Clause by paying the recognised district rate to enginemen, cranemen, boilermen, and firemen, and also to steel smelters in their employ; that the firm have refused to consider a petition submitted by the men's Society requesting the recognition of their Society; that men have been dismissed who, through their Union, requested the observance of the district rates; and what steps he proposed to take to ensure the observance by this firm of the Fair Wages Clause. Mr. Lambert said that in answer to an inquiry made by the Admiralty, this firm stated that the recognised district rate was paid to the workmen, and that no men had been dismissed who, through their Union, requested the observance of the district rates. As a matter of fact, no such request had ever been made to them. They were willing to recognise the workmen's Union when such recognition was desired by the majority of the workmen employed in any branch of the work. (Mr. O'Grady.) Does this answer apply to the Q. Works? I understand in Glasgow they do conform to the Fair Wages Clause. (Mr. Lambert.) My answer has special reference to Q." I might say we have no difficulty whatever with the firm except at Q.

4027. We only deal with particular instances of infringements of the Fair Wages Clause as illustrations of the system, and we are trying to arrive at some method of improving the working of the Clause. Have you any general suggestion to make from that point of view; I mean, would you alter the words of it or the interpretation of it, or the working of it?—I can hardly give an answer offhand to a question of that kind. The Government intention obviously, as expressed in the Resolution, is that firms who are doing Government work should pay fair wages, and give fair conditions to their workmen; yet here you have a case where a firm, who I may say generally is a fair firm who recognises Trade Unions, and has recognised our own Union for years, and we have never had any difficulty with them except at one works. I may say that only about two years ago this works was purchased by this firm and re-opened, it having been closed. Notwithstanding all our efforts to get the men of our class in the works—and I may say we are not the only ones who are affected in this way—notwithstanding all our efforts to get their wages and conditions up to the level of the district, we have failed to do so. We have approached the Admiralty as indicated in the cutting, and I have come down here to-day, in response to your invitation, to submit our views and to show you what our difficulties have been.

4028. You seem to be at issue with the firm and with the Admiralty too, on a question of fact, which is whether the firm is paying the current rate of the district or not?—Yes. If I could show to you that the information which Mr. Lambert had from the firm, or if I could reasonably satisfy you that that information was not correct, it seems to me that that would inspire you with a feeling that there was something atwist with the Clause as it at present stands.

4029. I want you to tell us exactly where you think the twist is. You know the words of the Clause, do you not?—I have read it a few times, but I have not got it with me.

4030. Substantially they are that the Contractor is bound to pay the rate current in the district where the work is carried out. Can you suggest any other form of words which would make it easier for you to get what you want?—I am afraid not. It is not so much in the wording as in the actual practice—the compelling of the thing to be carried out. For instance, it has been suggested to us that this Clause only applies to actual Government work, and we have been asked, I believe—I have not myself, but we have been asked at the Head Office—to state how long our men at a particular works were working on Government orders, a thing which it is absolutely impossible to accomplish.

4031. Who has asked you to state that?—I understand that the Parliamentary Committee of the Trade Union Congress was in communication with the Admiralty; I do not know that definitely, but I think it came about in that way.

4032. They were asked to find out how long your men were engaged on Government work?—Yes. It is impossible to get that. Take, for instance, the man in the steel-pit crane. He may be working steel ingots, but he does not know what they are going to make. With those steel ingots they may make guns or armour plate, or lots of things out of them, which may or may not be Government orders.

4033. Apart from the merits of the particular case which you have brought forward, have you any suggestion to make to remedy the difficulties that you have encountered?—One remedy, I think, is that if the Government were, shall I say, more watchful to see that the terms of the Clause were carried out, and if more energy or earnestness was displayed in the matter, things would be very much improved. Or, if in a case such as I have indicated, you have one works in a district which is non-Union, and if at least the men are willing and anxious to have the same conditions as apply in other works, if they wish to join a Union so that they may carry out the same methods as are employed in other works in the district, but at that particular place every obstacle is put in their way that they possibly can, and they go a long way towards intimidating the men from joining the Union—then, ultimately, that is the reason why we fail. As a matter of fact, I can supply reasonable proof that men have been dismissed because of their desire to get the Union recognised in that particular works.

4034. In what way would it be recognised?—By the firm consenting to use the same methods as they do in other works. That is, if the men think they are underpaid, they approach their foreman or manager, and if they cannot settle, they approach him further through their Trade Union representative. At Q. the management have refused to recognise that course.

4035. As regards the Union?—Yes.

4035*a*. Do they employ many Union men?—I am afraid they do not now. We formed a branch of our Union for these men at the latter end of 1905, I think. In that works at that time there would be something over 60 men of our class. We had 49 of those men join our Union, and the management was so antagonistic that we know, though I cannot supply actual proof of the fact, that the management had a paper sent round amongst the men asking them to sign that paper, which was to the effect that they did not want the Union. I met Mr. Z. himself on this matter, and told him the men did want the Union. As a matter of fact, we asked the men to sign cards, and 31 of those men signed cards, and sent them in to Mr. Z., stating that they did wish to have the Union, and to be affiliated with the Board of Conciliation. Despite that fact, we were unable to secure that recognition.

4036. Generally, your evidence is that they object to the employment of men belonging to the Union?—Yes. I ought to say the manager at Q. does; I do not say that Mr. Z. does, because he does not. Might I say further that this is not the only firm we complain of. It is the only one I mentioned when I wrote to the Secretary of this Committee, but my general office asked me to mention another. They had omitted to inform me that they wanted this other matter raised here.

4037. You need not go into specific cases except as general illustrations of your difficulties, and we do not want names of particular firms. We only want to know generally the kind of difficulty you have met with, and any remedies which you have got to suggest for it. We cannot consider the details of complaints that you have made against particular firms in particular cases?—I am sorry that I had not thought that you were wishing to have suggestions for remedying or, perhaps, re-drafting that Clause. I have not really thought about that.

4038. You see, all those other questions that you are discussing you must settle with the Admiralty or the Department that is contracting. We cannot settle any question of that kind, of course?—There is one suggestion that I can make most certainly: that is, that if the Government will not advise and recommend firms doing Government work to recognise the Trade Unions in every district, when the men wish it ——

4039. You could hardly make that a condition in a contract, could you?—Yes, I think it could be in a contract. The Government already lays it down that a firm doing work for the Government shall observe the Trade Union wages and conditions in the district.

4040. I ought to point out to you that the Clause in the contracts now says nothing about Trade Unions. All it says is that the employer shall pay the current rate in the district. You would carry that a little further, I gather, and say that the employer ought not only to pay the current rate, but the Trade Union rate, whatever that may be, and that he ought to recognise the Trade Union?—Yes, in negotiations between the firm and their men on wages questions. I think that would very much simplify the whole matter, and prevent many more or less bitter disputes and feelings between the firms and their men. In the case of Q., when I met Mr. Z., I knew there was a good deal of bitter feeling between the manager of the works and the men, because of his bitter opposition to any organisation amongst the men. In this newspaper cutting, it is said that Mr. Lambert has been supplied with the information that no demand was made for the district rates. That is not correct, because when I met Mr. Z. along with his Q. manager, Mr. Z. put the question to me. His words were: "There is no question of wages in this matter, is there?" I said, "Yes, there is, Mr. Z.; most certainly there is a question of wages." And I gave him certain instances, as I have given you them to-day, showing the difference in rates at Q., and even at his own other works at E.; so that it is not correct to say that no demand has been made for the rates.

4041. I am afraid we are getting into the details again, which I want to avoid?—There is another firm in Glasgow where we have had some trouble. It is a firm that pays only from 21s. to 22s. per week for electric crane drivers, whilst in a works almost adjoining the standard rate is 24s., but that firm are Government contractors. We have been in communication with the Federation of Trade Unions, and with the Parliamentary Committee of the Trade Union Congress on this matter, and they cannot help us, unless, of course, by the drastic measure of a strike, which we never resort to if we can possibly help it. The only thing left to us now is to get this matter so altered, as I said before, as to bring some pressure to bear upon the firms through this contract Clause, so that they would agree to meet the officials—the men's representatives. Then it would be made much easier and better, and more satisfactory.

4042. Is yours a strong Union?—Yes.

4043. How many members have you?—We have just on 4,000 members. We have some 1,700 in the West of Scotland, and the rest are on the North-East Coast, leaving out the Tyne, and the West Coast at Barrow and Workington. At the A. Works every man of our class is a member of our Union. At B., C., D., E. and F. there are a few who are not in; but substantially these are well organised works, and there are very few men who are not in the Unions. We have no bother at all with these firms. We have never had a strike in Scotland, we have always been able to negotiate with the employers; and although we have had many differences and that kind of thing, we have always been able to settle without any strike.

4044. (Mr. Hillier.) Your complaint against the firm in this particular instance is that they will not recognise the Trade Union officials; is that not so?—Our complaint is that they do not pay the rates current in the district.

4045. But the rates vary considerably, and you said that you could not get the rates fixed because you could not bring about a meeting between your Trade Union and the manager?—In the rates I have given you, in every case the Q. rate was lower than every other rate.

4046. Are there any special circumstances at Q. that would justify a lower rate being paid?—None that I am aware of.

4047. Still you make a complaint that the manager of that works would not recognise your Society?—Yes. I might say that if the manager had done so, there would have been no complaint, as we would have been able to arrange matters.

4048. But you do not say they would not have recognised the complaint of a workman employed by them, do you?—Workmen will not make a complaint.

4049. They have not made a complaint, I suppose; but they would make a complaint if they had grounds, would they not?—They have grounds, but they will not.

4050. Why?—Simply because they believe they will get the sack if they do.

4051. (Mr. Black.) How far is Q. from E.?—Seven or eight miles.

4052. Is it in a different type of district?—No.

4053. It is not in a more rural district, or anything of that kind? Is it not farther out of the town?—It is farther out of the town; E. is in Glasgow, and Q. is in the country. As a matter of fact, Q., you may say, almost adjoins D. An Oxford cricketer would throw a cricket ball in twice, easily, from Q. to D.

4054. Local conditions are a little bit different at Q., are they not? It practically claims to be a district by itself, I suppose?—No, it is in the district; it is certainly in the district so far as wages and conditions are concerned. There are no local or geographical reasons why Q. should not pay the same rate as Glasgow. As a matter of fact, some of the men at Q. travel to and from Glasgow in order to get to their work at Q., and they pay train fare for it.

4055. Are there any other works at Q. besides Z.'s?—The D. Works.

4056. What did you say the D. rates were compared with Q.?—They were 6s. 2¼d. at Q., as compared with 6s. 5¼d. at D.; 5s. 0¾d., as compared with 6s. 3½d.; 5s. 3¾d., as compared with 5s. 9½d.; and 4s. 8½d., as compared with 5s. 1d.

4057. Who was at Q. before Messrs. Z.?—The present manager's father.

4058. What rates did he pay?—They were always low rates.

4059. Mr. Z. is carrying that on apparently?—Yes. Mr. Z. took it over, and I may say before this place closed down—which is about five or six years ago—the steel smelters had a strike there over a wages question.

4060. The Q. Works never have paid the Glasgow rate, have they?—No.

4061. Then it is not any innovation of Messrs. Z. there; the manager is simply carrying on the custom of the place?—Just so.

4062. Only you have not been strong enough to establish the Glasgow rate?—Only that Z. is a Government contractor.

4063. If Z. was not doing any Government work there, would you accept those rates?—I would not be here to-day. There would be no complaint to be laid before you here to-day. We certainly would not accept the rates at all, though.

4064. Do you know if Z. does Government work at Q. You cannot really tell, I suppose?—Yes, I do know.

4065. In preparing the material or in carrying the job right through?—In preparing the material.

4066. Which is employed at E.?—In some cases; in other cases it is moved up from E. to Q.

4067. There would be a good many other men at Q. besides those you are interested in?—Yes.

4068. Is there any big Trade Union that takes up this question—the Boiler Makers, for instance, or the Amalgamated Society of Engineers?—No. Generally in steel works the boiler makers and engineers do not count for much because there are very few of their men.

4069. Tell me one of their strong Unions?—There are the Steel Smelters and the Amalgamated Steel and Iron Workers.

4070. Do they get fair wages?—No.

4071. So that you are all in the same boat, are you?—Yes.

4072. Has that been the custom of the district?—Yes.

4073. To pay low wages?—Quite so. One may say that the Amalgamated Society of Iron and Steel Workers are expecting to be invited to give evidence to this Committee.

4075. (Mr. Wilson Fox.) You read out a list of firms which pay different rates of wages, and you said that there were real, practical reasons why there should be a variation of rates as between these firms, because one man might have more furnaces to look after than another. Have you made any definite inquiry and come to any definite conclusion whether or not there are practical reasons why Z.'s pay a less rate than the others?—Yes.

4076. Have you inquired of the men employed there?—Yes.

4077. What did they say?—That there is no reason why Q. should not pay as high rates as they do at E.

4078. Have you ever got out a list of the number of furnaces which the men at Q. are in charge of, as compared with the number of furnaces at all those other works that you have mentioned?—No, I cannot say that I have ever made out a list of that kind.

4079. Would it not be essential to do that?—I have that information at home in my desk, and I could supply it to this Committee if you desire to have it. Unfortunately I did not bring it down with me to-day, or I could have supplied it at once.

4080. I only want to know whether you have done it, because it seems to me to be at the bottom of the whole question whether Z.'s do or do not pay what you call a fair rate. You have got that information?—I have.

4081. So that you have made that inquiry?—Yes.

4082. Now about Trade Unions: Supposing an employer in your industry has got Trade Union workmen in any proportion in his works, would he refuse to see a Trade Union leader on behalf of those Trade Union men?—They have at Q.

4083. Entirely?—Yes.

4084. If the Trade Unionists there had a grievance, they would not see a Trade Union leader on their behalf?—That is so.

4085. Has an application been made by the Secretary of a Trade Union to be heard upon a particular grievance of the Trade Unionists, and has it been refused?—Yes.

4086. I do not mean on behalf of non-Unionists, but on behalf of Trade Unionists employed there?—It has been refused.

4087. Do you suggest that the Fair Wages Clause should go so far as to compel an employer to allow men to join the Union, supposing that it could be proved that those men wished to join the Union? How is the Fair Wages Clause to be amended so as to carry out what you desire?—I cannot say offhand.

4088. (Chairman.) It is the recognition that you want, is it not?—Yes.

4089. (Mr. Wilson Fox.) You mean only that they should be compelled, supposing they had 30 Trade Unionists in their works, to treat with the Trade Union representative on their behalf?—I should say that if a majority of the men of a particular class in a works indicated their desire for representation by a Trade Union official, the employer should grant that privilege.

4090. "A majority of the men"?—Yes.

4091. Would you still leave the employer free to employ Union and non-Union men as he chose?—That is a matter that the men will settle for themselves. If the men in a works have two or three who refuse to join their Union, I do not think it is a matter for any one to interfere with, except we made representations of that kind to the employers and got the matter settled.

4092. I thought that one of your complaints was that Z.'s employed such a very large number of non-Union men as compared with other employers, and that you had something in your mind—some scheme—by which that could be rectified through the Fair Wages Clause?—I hope I did not imply that in what I said.

4093. I only want to be quite clear what you mean?—You will remember that I said at one period we had 49 out of 60-odd men in our Union. The reason that there were not over 60 was simply because the other men were afraid at the time, and, so to say, they were waiting to see which way the cat jumped. If it had been all right, they would not have been long in coming along also. The trouble that we had has resulted now in there being practically none of our class in the Union, and they have become afraid. As I said before, I am quite satisfied in my own mind that eight of our members were victimised because of their desire to get the Union recognised there.

4094. Let us assume for one moment that the men in the works are afraid to join the Union; could you rectify that in any way through the Fair Wages Clause? Is it not very difficult to prove, in the first place, that the men are afraid to join the Union?—It might be difficult to prove, or it might not.

4095. Supposing you could prove it, what would you propose?—Supposing I could prove that the men were afraid to join the Union?

4096. Supposing you could prove that in a particular works 30 men would like to join the Union and were afraid to join the Union, what would you propose?—There would be some reason to show why they were afraid to join the Union, and it would all depend upon what that reason was.

4097. Could the Government do anything?—In this case at Q. I do not think the manager, or as a matter of fact any other employer, would have objected to the Union had it not meant that by recognising the Union that would increase his labour cost by raising the rates of his workmen up to the level of the other men employed in the district. I suppose, being a manager, it would make it more difficult for him to show his capabilities as a manager. I suppose it will be a virtue for a manager to run his works at the least possible cost.

4098. But you do not think the Government could do anything on the point I have mentioned—the Government could not assist the men to join a Trade Union, could it?—It is a matter like this——

4099. The Government might assist them in getting the current rate of the district, but that is another thing?—No.

4100. They could not help the men to join the Union, could they?—No; and I did not wish to infer that.

4101. (Mr. De la Bère.) Did I understand you to say that at Q. there was an objection to meeting the Union officials?—Yes.

4102. In what capacity did you see Mr. Z.?—As a Trade Union official, as a man whom he had met on occasions before, and because there was a question of his E. Works being involved.

4103. In point of fact, he did meet the Union officials?—Mr. Z. did, yes.

4104. Really the whole of your difficulty, it seems to me, arises over the question whether Q. is in the Glasgow district or not?—Not at all; there is no doubt about that. Q. is in the district of the West of Scotland. The men in the steel works in the West of Scotland are members of our Union. We are recognised by every firm, too.

4105. Do the men all receive a rate founded on the same basis?—Yes. You can compare the rates I gave you.

4106. I suppose you know that some Government Departments, if not all, require a contractor to show no preference either to Union or non-Union men?—Just so.

4107. Does that not go a long way towards meeting your difficulty? If a contractor is required to show no preference either to one or the other, a man, at any rate, ought not be a marked man by joining the Union?—He should not be. If he is, then there would be a general complaint.

4108. I understood you to say that some of the men were afraid to join the Union?—Certainly, by reason of the action the firm took in trying to keep the Union out. I have not the least possible doubt that every man of our class who is at present working at Q. would have been a member of our Union had it not been for the intimidating tactics employed by the manager at Q.

4109. In other words, at Q. you would hold that there is a distinct preference shown for non-Union over Union men?—Yes.

The witness withdrew.

THIRTEENTH DAY,

Thursday, 27th February, 1908.

At 32, Great George Street, Westminster, S.W.

PRESENT:

Sir GEORGE H. MURRAY, K.C.B. (Chairman).

Mr. F. W. Black.
Mr. H. De la Bère, C.B.
Mr. A. Wilson Fox, C.B.
Mr. J. H. Hillier.
Mr. A. F. King.
Mr. J. J. Wills (Secretary).

Mr. Willie Milnes, called and examined.

4110. (Chairman.) You represent the National Glass Bottle Makers' Society?—Yes, I am the General Secretary.

4111. That Society is common to the United Kingdom, I see?—Yes.

4112. Where are the principal centres of your trade?—In Yorkshire.

4113. The trade is almost entirely there, is it not?—Almost entirely.

4114. Have you got an arrangement with the employers about the rates of wages to be paid?—Yes. We have a Joint Board of employers and workmen to arrange a price list and wages.

4115. Practically, are all the employers in it?—A very large majority of them are.

4116. Is there much Government work in your trade?—Yes, I think there is.

4117. Have you found the Fair Wages Clause useful?—Yes; I think it has assisted us.

4118. Have you any suggestions to make for amending it?—No, except that I think it would be of assistance if the secretaries of Trade Unions were supplied with a list of the firms who had contracted for Government work. I think that would enable the secretary of the Union to see at once that the firms who had contracted for the Government work were employing Union men, and paying standard rates of wages.

4119. Do you find, as a rule, that they are paying the agreed rates?—Yes, in the large majority of cases. There is only a very small proportion outside the Union who are not paying the standard rates.

4120. Then you have no complaint to make really, except that you would like to know whenever a Government contract is placed?—Yes, we have complaints to make. A small minority of the manufacturers who are outside the Employers' Association have been making Government work, and this small minority have not been employing Union men, and have not been paying the standard rate of wages. That is our complaint. Another complaint is that we believe we have very good proof that some manufacturers who pay the standard rate of wages, and who contract for Government work, purchase a certain portion of the work from abroad. These goods come into England in a case, the case being marked according to the Trade Marks Act, the goods are unpacked in their own factories, and then they are repacked, and the probability is that they are sent on as their own manufactured goods.

4121. That would be a case of sub-contracting?—Yes, that would be.

4122. Have you complained to the Departments interested in the contracts in either of those cases?—We have been trying for the last two years. We have been making complaints, but we have not got to the right committee until the present time. We have made no headway. We have complained to the different Departments, and we have been placed upon the Parliamentary list of Unions to which contract forms are sent, but we have never, until the present moment, reached the right committee which our complaints could be brought to.

4123. Have you complained, for instance, to any Government Department that there were employers who were not paying the agreed rate of wages?—No, I do not think we have—at any rate, not to any special department.

4124. Have you complained about the sub-letting?—Yes, we have written to complain about the sub-letting.

4125. What answer did you get to that?—I do not remember the answer that we got to that. It would be about two years ago when this very glaring case occurred.

4126. Was the answer satisfactory?—We did not know which Department it was for, although we knew that it was Government work.

4127. I doubt whether this Committee is in a position to help you much. The first thing you must do, if you think there is any infringement of the Fair Wages Clause, is to complain to the Department which deals with the contract. All this Committee wants to know is, what suggestions you can make for amending the Clause itself so as to make it more effective for the purpose in view?—Those are two very important items that will assist us. When any contract for bottles is made, if the secretary of the Union could be informed who has got the contract, that would assist us. Then, secondly, I do not know how this Committee could assist us with employers who employ Union men and pay the standard rate, but who adopt the measure of buying some portion of their goods abroad, because they can be bought cheaper abroad—for instance, some of the phials—and have them brought to their own factory and then unpacked. This glaring case occurred two years ago at Castleford. A manufacturer there had a large Government order and made a large portion of it within his own firm, but he got some quantity from abroad. This was brought to his factory, unpacked there, and then placed in the warehouse. The inspector examined this work, and seeing it in the warehouse with the rest of the bottle goods, had the impression that it was manufactured on the premises, and so it was passed and sent up to the Government. It is small light ware, and the carriage is very cheap. They can buy it very cheap from Germany and elsewhere abroad. They are small half-ounce phials. Some of those bottles were in the contract. The manufacturer made the medicals and the larger ware at home, and these smaller ware he bought abroad. Another instance occurred only last week. I wrote to a manufacturer asking if he could give me any information, and he wrote me as follows: "Dear Sir,—In reply to your letter of the 20th inst. re Government contracts and Fair Wages Committee, I have not a deal of information, but you are only too welcome to what I have. Some two months ago, we were asked by the Admiralty to tender for their flint glass bottles, and we sent our London representative to the Admiralty to view their samples. When he got to the sample room, he met A. & Co.'s representative there, who said to our man, 'What are you doing here?' in a tone implying A. & Co. had a sort of claim on the order. Of course, as you know, A. & Co. employ non-Union men, and I have the impression that this firm usually get a portion, at any rate, of the Admiralty order for flint glassware." That is what a manufacturer wrote to me last week.

4128. I do not quite see what your complaint is on that?—Our complaint is that this firm of A. & Co. apparently do a lot of work for the Admiralty, and they do not pay the standard rate of wages.

4129. That again does not concern us directly. If your complaint is that a particular firm is not paying the standard rate in a particular case, you had better makes a complaint to the Department which is concerned with the contract, and send them such evidence as you can produce in support of what you say?—Yes; but do you not see our difficulty? We should have to get to know, first of all, if this employer does not employ our own men, for what Department the goods were being made, which would perhaps be difficult to do; but then when we got to know that, we should be able to submit it to this Department who had given the contract out.

4130. That complaint is not against the substance of the Fair Wages Clause, is it?—It is if he is not paying the standard rate of wages.

4131. But the Clause already binds him to pay that rate of wages?—Yes, but he is not doing it.

4132. Then, as I say, your proper course is to apply to the Department which is making the contract. We cannot help you, I am afraid. All we want to know is whether the Fair Wages Clause works properly, and if it does not, what remedies you can suggest to make it work better?—That is our most valuable suggestion. If we had known that this firm was making under a contract with the Government, and if we had known that direct from the Department itself, we could have dealt with it straight away. The probability is that we get to know of these things perhaps a month after, when the order has been completed and everything has been done.

4133. Practically, the only suggestion you have got to make is that you should have early information about the placing of a Government contract in your trade?—Yes, I think that is our suggestion. Another suggestion is this: We have been informed in writing by a certain Department that they do not make any contract for bottles, but that they buy them from merchants in London as they want them. Now these merchants in London are not buying home-made goods, that is, they are not buying goods manufactured in England, or at least only some portion of them.

4134. Why should they?—The probability is that they buy them cheaper from abroad.

4135. Do you object to that?—It depends on what the conditions were under which they were made abroad.

4136. Would you say that all supplies bought abroad ought to be made under the same conditions as the competing supplies which are made at home?—There is only this objection—that if these merchants were supplying goods to the Government, and they were signing on the contract for them that they would not sub-let, or that these goods would be manufactured under fair conditions, our opinion would be that this would be a violation of that contract.

4137. But I should think probably in the case that you mention there is no such provision in the contract; is there?—In most of the forms we have had sent down for the goods, there is that condition.

4138. But in the instance you have last given, they were bought from a merchant without a contract, I understand?—There would be no contract made there. We think contracts ought to be made, because these merchants, who, I understand, are buying a portion at home and the rest abroad, get them as cheap as they can possibly get them.

4139. (Mr. De la Bère.) In paragraph 1 of your proof, you say that three firms, where non-Union conditions prevail, are making bottles for the Government; are you sure that they are Government bottles?—We know that they are. There is a special mark on each bottle that has to be made for the Government.

4140. Is there a special mark for each Department?—No. I think it is a special mark for the Government, one single mark, and not a special mark for each Department.

4141. And you have no means of finding out what Department they are for?—No, we have not.

4142. Mr. Steadman supplies you with information as to the firms on the list, does he not?—Yes.

4143. And you get a schedule at the time of the tendering?—Yes. The strange thing about it is that we have had those lists for twelve months, and we have never had a single list for bottle-ware; they have all been for glass-ware—for tumblers and for shades on board ship, for lamps, and all that kind of thing—but not a single one for bottles.

4144. You mentioned just now a certain case where the inspector had seen imported bottles and had not recognised them as such, and had presumably passed them as home made?—That is correct.

4145. Do you happen to know to what Department the inspector belonged? That is a case probably where you could trace the order?—I do not know what particular Departments these goods were being made for.

4146. What Department did the inspector belong to?—We only know that he was a Government inspector who came down to inspect the whole of these bottles. He came down and inspected them on the works.

4147. I do not know whether it exists in all contracts, but in the War Office bottle contracts the contractor has to state the place of manufacture on the tender form; consequently if he manufactures the bottles elsewhere—not necessarily abroad, but if he sub-lets it elsewhere—that is certainly infringing the terms of his contracts?—To confirm that, let me say that we on our side, the workman's side, brought this up before the Joint Committee of Manufacturers and Workmen. This particular employer was represented at that meeting, but we did not use his name. I wrote to a manufacturer last week about the matter, and he said, "The only item I can emphasise is a case I think you are already aware of, which was made public property at one of our joint meetings, viz.—that a certain firm—I will not mention names—down Castleford way, had sent in to the Government foreign-made medical ware, small sizes. Doubtless you will remember all particulars." This manufacturer referred to the matter as being brought before the Joint Board.

4148. (Chairman.) What was the result?—We never brought it to a head. This is the first opportunity we have had of approaching the Government in a direct way.

4149. (Mr. De la Bère.) Were they medicine bottles?—Yes, they were. The goods that were imported were small flint phials. They are made very cheap abroad, and they are imported very cheap on account of the carriage being very light. It would not have paid him to have bought the medical bottles abroad, but it would pay him probably to buy the small flint phial ware abroad. He is having the best goods made at home, and buying the cheapest from abroad. These were brought and unpacked, as I have stated, on the premises of the firm.

4150. (Chairman.) Of course, it is always open to you in those cases to write to all the Government Departments who are likely to be contracting, and to call their attention to it?—Yes; but of course that leaves the onus upon us of finding out the Department that requires bottles. If there were any employer who was so unscrupulous as to adopt this kind of thing, it would be difficult to stop it. The only thing would be to prove it, and to bring it before the Department.

4151. That is what I was suggesting to you; and if you are not quite sure which Department it is, you might write to two or three?—Thank you.

4152. (Mr. Black.) The foreign bottles are not themselves marked, only the packing cases, I understand?—Only the packing cases. That is our difficulty under the Trade Marks Act. There is a lot of bottles imported from abroad that are being sold as English-made bottles. Manufacturers buy those that they can buy cheapest from abroad, and unpack them upon their own premises, and then impose them upon the public by mixing them with their own manufactured goods.

4153. So long as we bought foreign bottles, knowing we were getting foreign bottles, you do not raise any objection, do you?—No, we would not.

4154. That would be a reasonable thing to do, would it not?—Yes.

4155. You should understand, when you get these schedules at the time that we are asking for tenders, that so far as the Admiralty is concerned, we should allow you to go and see the patterns. That is part of the new arrangement; and if you care to send to our Admiralty pattern rooms you can in that way get acquainted with the forms?—We do not know when they are making contracts. I did not know that this contract was being made with the Admiralty until a fortnight ago.

4156. You are on Mr. Steadman's list, are you not?—Yes, but I have never received a contract form for bottles.

4157. Who is the secretary of your district? Does he not receive the schedules?—I am the secretary, and I have received all the schedules I have here, and more which I have at home, but within the last eighteen months I have not received a single schedule for glass bottles.

4158. Yet you know an order has been placed?—This manufacturer writes me a fortnight ago that he has been asked to contract for Government bottles, and his representative went to the Admiralty Office to see the samples, and when he went there he saw Messrs. A.'s representative.

4159. You did not get the schedule in that case?—No. In regard to your statement that we should be able to see the patterns, of course that would mean that we should have to go to the cost of coming down here to see the patterns, and that would not assist us, I think, unless we know who is going to make the goods. We should not require to see the patterns so long as we knew who was going to make the goods.

4160. What we do is to send out a list of the persons whom we are going to invite to tender, and we say, "You can produce this schedule, and at a certain place"—not necessarily in London, for I think we send patterns down to the Midlands—"you can see those patterns"?—May I ask you a question? How is it that you send out to those people and invite them to tender? Why is that done? Do you not think that you may be inviting some firms to contract who are not paying the standard rate? In fact, Messrs. A. must have been invited to tender, and they are not paying the standard rate.

4161. Of course, that might happen, but we should see that they did pay it if they got an order?—Thank you.

4162. (Mr. De la Bère.) In regard to the standard rate, is that practically uniformly agreed upon, or is there a considerable minority of employers who have not adopted it?—I think there will not be 15 per cent. of the men outside the union who are not being paid at the standard rate.

4163. Is the rate uniform throughout the country, or does it vary in districts?—It is uniform right throughout the country where our men are employed.

4164. You say Yorkshire is the centre for your trade, but there are other places where bottles are made in large quantities, are there not?—Yes.

4165. Do the same rates apply elsewhere as apply in Yorkshire?—Yes, the same.

4166. Are they accepted by the employers who are situated elsewhere?—Yes.

4167. And not merely by the Yorkshire employers?—No.

4168. They are accepted throughout the trade generally?—By the employers in London and Glasgow—North and South as well.

4169. Do you place any restrictions on the admissions to your union?—No.

4170. None at all?—None at all. We are anxious to get every man in, and we make it as easy as possible.

The witness withdrew.

Mr. John Chater, called and examined.

4171. (Chairman.) You represent the Coventry Engineers and Allied Trades Federation, I think?—Yes. The Federation represents ten societies engaged in the trade. I am the chairman.

4172. Is that a purely local society?—No, it is a National Society; but the local branches are formed into a federation for combined action in maintaining conditions of labour already secured in the district before the federation was formed.

4173. You have sent us some suggestions for the alteration of the Fair Wages Clause; perhaps you will go through them and state them in your own words?—Shall I start with the preamble? "There shall be kept at the offices of the Department allotting such contracts a list of the rates of wages, hours of labour, and conditions of employment to be paid and observed by firms tendering for Government contracts."

4174. That would be rather a difficult thing to do, would it not?—I think we suggest how the list is to be compiled later on.

4175. Then, perhaps, you had better go on to Clause 1?—"The list shall, in the first instance, be settled by the Department allotting such contract, and shall be based upon the recognised standard rate of wages, hours of labour, and conditions of employment in the particular district or districts in which such Government contract is to be executed."

4176. Supposing there were no recognised standard rate of wages, what would you do then?—We have a further clause to deal with that.

4177. This list would have to be made out before the contract was granted, would it not?—To get an original list made out, if there is any difficulty in arriving at what should be the recognised rate in the particular trades, we suggest that the Treasury should appoint a committee that should hear evidence from both employers and employees, and settle what is to be the recognised rate.

4178. What I want to know is whether this list is to be of general application, and is to be made without reference to any particular contract, or whether it is to be made for the specific contract which is about to be placed?—The difficulty about that is that you could not have one list for the whole country, the rates of wages in the various districts fluctuating so. For instance, if you place a contract in London the rates of wages, perhaps, are 38s. 3d. per week for skilled engineers, whereas if you place it in Derby is it only 32s., and so on.

4179. That is what I was coming to. Suppose there is a contract of that kind, the Department, of course, does not know who is going to get it; do you suggest that they ought to have a list already drawn up of rates of wages in all the possible districts where the contract could be executed?—That is our suggestion.

4180. That would be rather difficult, would it not? How many districts, do you suppose, there are doing the same work as you are doing at Coventry?—I think there are departments of ordnance, excluding the Government's own workshops, in some 13 or 14 places that we have knowledge of.

4181. Do you mean that the War Office, for example, ought to draw up, before the contracts are placed, a list of the rates of wages to be paid at all the different places where the contracts might be carried out?—We only roughly suggest that; but should there be any difficulty in the way it may, by mutual arrangement between the employers and the employees in the different districts concerned, be drawn up and submitted to the Department, and then, should there be any dispute as to what is the recognised rate, we venture to submit that arbitrators should be appointed by the Department. The reason I suggest that is because in some districts we have what we trade unionists claim to be a recognised standard rate of wages, and some employers pay above that standard, in order to attract the best men they are capable of getting. Therefore, you could not base it upon the higher rate that those employers pay. Then some firms would exclude trade unionists entirely from their employ, and get labour at, say, 3s. or 4s. cheaper; and yet we do not want it based upon the lower conditions.

4182. Have you found any practical difficulty in getting the current rate of wages enforced?—In this particular district we have... We have a particular firm there that is now deliberately—and it is doing it every day—refusing men work at the gates simply because they ask for the standard recognised rate of wages, and he tells them that he will not give them that, but he will give them 4s. lower, on the ground that he does not want society men, and he is determined not to have them.

4183. Has he got a Government contract?—Yes.

4184. Have you complained to the Department about it?—The difficulty is we cannot get to know the Department, nor can we get to know whether he is contracting direct from the Government. The firm is affiliated with a large syndicate—A. B. and Co.; it is a subsidiary firm; and as to whether it is A. B. and Co. that have the contract or not we cannot get any knowledge. We have inquired from the Department, and they have acknowledged our letter—that is over six months ago—simply acknowledged it—"Your letter has been received."

4185. What is your remedy for that difficulty?—Our remedy is that these suggested clauses should be adopted, so that the Department, in placing the contract, shall have these clauses embodied in the contract saying that the recognised rates of wages, hours of labour, and conditions of employment agreed upon and kept by the Department in their list shall be observed by the contractor; and there should be further clauses pointing out the penalty on its being proved to the Department that the contractor has been guilty of a breach of that contract.

4186. Now will you go to Clause 2?—Clause 2 provides for different changes. The list can never be made stationary, to serve for a lengthened period, but it must fluctuate from time to time as the state of trade alters the conditions of labour in the general engineering trades. Clause 2 provides for that by saying, "This list may be revised from time to time, so as to keep it at all times in accord with the conditions as specified in Clause 1. Applications to revise the list can only be made by duly accredited representatves of the employers or employees, and the Department, when such application is received, shall appoint a Contracts Committee to hear both sides, and decide whether such alteration or alterations may be made. No alterations may be made to any list which will bring the working conditions of employment on Government contracts in any district lower than the standard paid by other employers and recognised by other employers as standard conditions of employment in that district."

4187. If the employers and their workmen have agreed to a variation you would not then submit it to the Department to decide whether it ought to be made, I suppose?—Not if they have agreed; only we should have to notify the Department of the change, so that that change could be embodied in the contract.

4188. Then we come to Clause 3. Could you give us the substance of that?—"Where in any trade there are no recognised standard conditions of employment as specified in Clause 1, the Contracts Committee shall be empowered to frame such as may be deemed necessary, and particulars thereof must be given to the contractors and representatives of the workers in such trades before the contract is allotted." That is to provide for semi-skilled labour. In the engineering workshops now, owing to the introduction of automatic machinery, there is a class that is being largely recruited from the ranks of unskilled labour. What you may term labourers in the engineering shops get a slight technical knowledge taught to them of how to mind these automatic machines, and eventually how to grind tools and that sort of thing. The difficulty with these contractors is that they are paying them only 1s. above the ordinary labourer's wage of 19s. per week, while, let me point out, the Government dockyards and ordnance works pay their labourers, I believe, 28s. per week. This firm pays theirs 9s. below the standard. Then this class of labour that they employ on these machines eventually become semi-skilled—we call them semi-skilled because they are an intermediate class between the unskilled worker and the skilled mechanic—and they only give them 1s. difference in the rate of wages as compared with the ordinary unskilled labourer who sweeps the floor up.

4189. You do not object to a difference, but you think they ought to be paid higher than they are?—Yes.

4190. You do not claim the full skilled rate for them?—No; we cannot do that.

4191. But you think that the rate which is paid now is too low?—They are paid 5d., and we suggest at least 6½d., or something of that sort—some intermediate stage between the skilled mechanic's wage and their present wage. Why we say that this would have to be done by the Contracts Committee or some body like that is that a large number of these men, owing to the low wages, are completely unorganised, as they cannot afford to pay to any trade union. The standard of living in our particular district is very high for men with what you may call large families and receiving 19s. a week. Then you must consider the excessive house-rents that we have to pay—for a house with three bed-rooms we have to pay 6s. 6d. a week, so that it utterly prevents a man receiving this wage from paying the ordinary contributions to a trade union. We shall have to provide for some recognition of these men by mutual agreement somehow; and if that fails, we suggest that representatives of the Department should settle the rate of wages for these particular men.

4192. Clause 4 is not very material, I think; will you go on to Clause 5?—"Systematic overtime on Government contracts shall not be permitted. Overtime on such contracts can only be allowed in times of emergency, or when the contractor has been hindered from executing his contract by causes beyond his control. Any contractor resorting to systematic overtime without notifying the Department and satisfying them that the reasons requiring such overtime to be worked are as laid down above, shall be liable to be removed from the list of contractors for such Department." The reason we suggest that is that systematic overtime, owing to the firm that I have previously mentioned always having insisted upon it in their works, is a curse to the City of Coventry at the present time. They are the largest firm in Coventry, and it will influence other firms to work their men systematic overtime. We complain of the systematic overtime for many reasons. Owing to the lack of housing accommodation a lot of us are compelled to reside away from the centre of the city, and that necessarily means that we have to get up at five o'clock in the morning to go to our work, and we do not return home till late at night. We have to work till half-past 8, 9, 10 and 11, according to the particular requirements at the time. When we leave home in the morning we never know at what time we are going to get home at night, and it is of frequent occurrence with our men that we bid our children "Good night" on Sunday night and send them off to bed, and we never see them again till the following Saturday afternoon. We say, as working men, there are higher possibilities in life than that, and that we ought to have sufficient leisure time for self-improvement and study. We are forming a branch of the Workers' Educational Association, and we cannot make it succeed without we have sufficient leisure time. We think that Government contractors doing the nation's work ought to set an example to private employers; but we provide that in times of emergency, or if the contractor's work is done under conditions of pressure that he cannot prevent himself, that on notifying the Department, and the Department being satisfied, the men shall be required to work. Surely that provides for all contingencies.

4193. Is overtime paid at time and a quarter in your trade?—In this particular firm the men have been on dispute about their overtime rates for twelve months. The firm will not pay according to the recognised code of conditions for overtime, with the result that the federation gave the firm fourteen days' notice that from February 16th of last year the men would not work overtime. This firm has suspended or discharged a lot of foremen and a number of men for no other reason than their refusing to work overtime, and as fast as they can. The very idea of the works manager in offering men lower wages is that he gets men in at lower wages, who are non-Unionists, and he sees they can do his work, and so he gradually, day by day, drops the skilled workers and organises the thing so as to employ these others.

4194. My question was. what is the rate of overtime paid in your trade? —The rate for overtime laid down in our district is time and a quarter for the first three hours, and time and a half if required to work all night after the first three hours.

4195. Do you say that is generally paid?—About 83 per cent. of the firms in Coventry pay those conditions.

4196. Then, if overtime is paid at a higher rate, there is no great inducement to an employer to work overtime?—The inducement in this case—at least, we believe it is an inducement, and I am speaking from personal knowledge of what I was told by the manager when I was engaged there as foreman of a department—is this: I asked him what wages I was to offer to men I engaged. He says: "Tell them 36s. and plenty of overtime." We contend that the very mention of that is the reason why they work overtime—simply to prevent the organised workers thinking that their day wages are too low, they offer them any amount of overtime so as to keep them satisfied at the week-end with the increased wages owing to excessive hours, and so preventing a man from trying to get a higher living wage.

4197. If the employer pays time and a quarter and time and a half there is no great inducement to him to use overtime; so why does he do it?—That I cannot understand.

4198. He is competing very likely with the man who does not use overtime at all, and who therefore gets all his work done at the ordinary rate?—That may be so. It is one of the anomalies of the situation that this particular shop has a large naval shop where the machinery is partially lying idle, and the men who are engaged during the day have nothing to do, and yet they are compelled to work overtime with the rest of the shop, but some of the work from the other departments which are overcrowded is work which could be easily transferred to this department. Those are things that we cannot possibly understand, but we say it is a systematic attempt to break up our recognised conditions of labour by a particular firm. They are trying to form a local federation and to force it on the other firms.

4199. It is not the general practice in your trade, then?—No.

4200. It only refers to this one firm?—It is the general practice in the motor and cycle trades, as they are partially season trades, we may say. Suppose the early part of the year starts with fine weather, there is likely to be a huge demand for cycles and motors, and so the men have to work all hours right on to August Bank Holiday. Then we have a slack season for the rest of the year. In the general engineering trade, the machine-tool trade, overtime is largely allotted upon orders; that is, if they have a large demand on certain depôts for articles that would have to be delivered within a specified time, and they have not sufficient stock in hand, of course the men have to work.

4201. What I was coming to was this: Do you not think that as a general rule the fact that the employer is practically compelled to pay a much higher rate for his overtime than for ordinary time is a sufficient check on the practice?—It is not. Let me point out that some employers have distinctly told me, when having a charge position in the shop, that a certain machine which is laid down in the shop—a turret lathe, we will say, costs a lot of money. Such a machine costs £600, and they want to work it every hour the electric motor is running, as they cannot afford to have that amount of capital lying idle and not producing anything. So it must be kept running.

4202. Could he not do that by employing two shifts, or three shifts?—That is what we have suggested to this firm, but they will not do it.

4203. Would that not be the ordinary way of meeting that difficulty?—That would be the best way undoubtedly.

4204. And would that not be the ordinary practice in the trade where they have got a very valuable machine that they want to keep running all the time; they would not work it by overtime, would they?—Yes; that is the evil of it.

4205. Is that a general practice in the trade?—The general practice.

4206. What employers do it?—The majority of them. We have had a steady fight about this. If you have noticed the reports of the Trade Union Congress last year and the one held at Bath the year previous, you will have seen that the Parliamentary Committee have drawn up a resolution, and that they are holding a conference of engineers and all allied trades with a view to holding public meetings in every district of the kingdom and of circularising all the trades, and making a determined effort to stop this systematic overtime. We do not complain of occasional overtime as it is required. We recognise that that must be done according to the employer's orders or the state of trade, or something like that, in urgency cases or emergency cases; but the systematic overtime, year in and year out, we do complain of.

4207. What do you suppose is the average number of hours worked in the shop you are speaking of?—The number of hours averages 65, but the men never know what they are going to make between 65 and 90 hours when they go in on Monday morning. Those men are habitually kept on all night, and then, after being kept on all night, and possibly having made up their full week's pay in three and a half days, say—their average week on which their overtime rates are based—they are sent home for the rest of the week and to wait for the next job coming round. So they lose the whole of their overtime rates simply because they have not made above the normal hours on which the overtime rates are based.

4208. As a matter of fact, at the end of the week, they have not worked more than a normal number of hours, I suppose?—That is only occasionally the case. The regular practice of this shop is to work 65 hours per week. The men are required to work 65 hours and longer if required.

4209. But, as a matter of fact, do they work longer?—Yes. And I have already pointed out very often they do, and sometimes, as I have pointed out, they are dropped on occasionally now and again and kept waiting for the next job. The men have complained about that because they could just as easily be found something else to go on with instead of losing their overtime rates.

4210. What number of hours on an average do they actually put in?—They average it at 65.

4211. I thought that you meant that they work a great deal more on the average?—Cases like that happen. This firm employs an average number of 2,000 men, and the average number per week who may work two or three all-nights in the week will not exceed, say, 25 to 30 in any one particular week. So that you see it is only now and again when they have a sudden spurt on a trunnion or a bearing or something of that sort in the mountings that those men on that particular portion of the work will try to work all the hours possible so as to get it away to some other department where it has to undergo some other process.

4212. How many of those 65 hours are paid at the ordinary rate, and how many are paid as overtime?—The firm pays on 53 hours for the week's work.

4213. Then if they work 65 hours in the week, they are paid 12 hours' overtime?—Yes.

4214. Probably at time and a quarter?—Yes.

4215. Therefore, they are increasing their cost of production by that much?—Yes.

4216. But that does not prevent its being done?—It does not prevent its being done, and certain departments that are not organised are frequently kept at work on Saturday afternoons and Sundays. We do not allow our men to work at less than time and a half on Saturday afternoon, and double time on Sunday; so they do not ask our men to work, but they ask those who are unorganised and the poor unskilled men.

4217. So some of those 65 hours might be paid for at time and a half, or double time?—I am pointing out that they ask the unskilled workers, because they only pay them time and a quarter rates. Our men will not work on Saturday afternoon and Sunday without demanding extra.

4218. And so they do not employ them?—They do not employ them, but they drop upon these others.

4219. Then your sixth suggestion is that "Any contractor refusing to meet duly accredited representatives of the men, who may desire to discuss any alterations, amendment, addition to, or deletion of any of the conditions on which the contract is allotted, in regard to the standard rates of wages, hours of labour, conditions of employment, and overtime rates, shall be notified to the Department, who shall order the Contracts Committee to make an award after hearing representatives of both parties." It would be rather difficult to put conditions of that kind into a contract, would it not?—How are you to get at them? This firm steadily refuses. I may say that they met four deputations from the Headquarters Executive Councils of the various societies, including Mr. G. N. Barnes, M.P., of the Engineers; Mr. Charles Duncan, M.P., of the Engineers, and several other duly accredited representatives of our Headquarters Councils here in London. They have met the firm on three or four occasions to discuss these grievances that we have with them. I may say those representatives met them without any concession whatever being obtained, and it is with the greatest difficulty that we have held the men in check now for two years from withdrawing their labour from the firm. We have steadily refused them permission from the Executive Council to withdraw their labour. I, as chairman of the Local Federation, have, on three different occasions at mass meetings of the men held in the City of Coventry to discuss these grievances at the Engineers' Clubhouse, had to rule out of order resolutions from the men demanding that an ultimatum should be sent, on the ground that they had not first obtained the consent of the Executive Councils of the various societies affected. I have refused to accept such resolutions. But the firm, on being appealed to to meet a final deputation of representatives of the headquarters' officials to settle this overtime grievance, in the first place, wrote acknowledging our letter and wanting details of what we wished to discuss. We sent them that, and they have never acknowledged that letter. That was written on October 21st last, and we cannot get any reply, and the manager has told us that even if the headquarters' people sent their representatives the head of the firm will not meet them. We think in that case there ought to be some remedy for such a state of affairs.

4220. What is your seventh suggestion?—"Should it be brought to the knowledge of the Department that any contractor or contractors engaged on Government work, shall, for no other reason than they are members of any Trade Union, or local officials of any Trade Union, who may have been endeavouring to negotiate with them as laid down in Clause 6, refuse such members of Trade Union employment, or prevent them obtaining employment elsewhere, the contractor shall, on its being proved to the satisfaction of the Department that such victimisation of a worker or workers is due to the cause laid down above, be fined the sum of £50 and be liable to have such contract made null and void and have his name removed from the list of firms tendering for Government contracts for the period of five years." That seems rather a drastic clause. We do not for a moment have any idea that this Committee could accept a clause like that, but we wish to emphasise the fact that this firm is victimising men. I may point out that when I was a foreman for this firm some four years ago, I left the firm when I went to take charge of a department at some works at Rugby. They complimented me on the character given me by this firm. The manager said they had never had a better character with the men in their employ. I have never worked there since, so in regard to my character as a workman they cannot possibly have anything against me, because, as I say, I have not been in their employ since. Being out of employment recently, and being still out of employment, I sought the aid of the Coventry Labour Bureau that is organised and established by the City Council for the registration of the unemployed in Coventry. I was given there a card—I have it here, if you like to see it—by the superintendent of the Bureau, who informed me that this firm had telephoned down to his place asking them to send up mechanics of the particular grade to which I belong. I was given a card to the particular foreman of the department and sent up. I accordingly went up and saw this foreman, who told me that if I would call again the next morning at 10 o'clock—this was on the Monday night about 7—he would look round and try to get some work, and would be pleased to give me a start. I may say this foreman knew me personally from having been there before. When I went there at 10 o'clock the next morning, the manager came out with a card in his hand, and says: "What do you want here?" I says: "I am after a situation, sir." He says: "You won't get one here. I would not have you at any price; the best thing you can do is to clear out—clear out of the town altogether." That is serious for me, and it is simply because I am chairman of this Federation, and we cannot get this dispute on the overtime settled.

4221. Your point would be met, I think, by a provision in the contract that the contractor should give no preference to either unionists or non-unionists, would it not?—Scarcely so. This firm would plead that they do not now. That is the difficulty. He will say that he never asks a man at the gate—and he does not—whether he is a trade unionist or not.

But shortly after cautious inquiries are made in the shop by some of the workpeople who, I am sorry to say, owe their position in the workshop to the influence of this manager, and they soon find out whether a man belongs or not. Then they test him. They order him to work overtime; naturally the man has to refuse, and he is soon marked then.

4222. All that goes to show the difficulty there would be in bringing home any breach of that clause?—I can prove that the superintendent of the Coventry Labour Bureau sent me up after a vacancy that was telephoned down to him that they had. I can prove from the firm at Rugby that I had an excellent character as a workman for such a vacancy. I have worked for that firm supervising men, doing similar work, and I have a character from there, and yet they order me off the premises like a dog.

4223. Still, it would be rather difficult to prove it, would it not?—It is rather difficult to embody it in a clause I will admit. I might tell you there are other three foremen who have been victimised for no other cause than belonging to the union. Another foreman has been reduced from a foreman's position to a charge-hand; and numbers of men have been discharged. They do not discharge them for refusing to work overtime. They ask them to work overtime, the men refuse to go on after the ordinary time, things go on smoothly for a week or two, then some fault is found out with their work. The examiner finds it two thousandths of an inch too small or something, and the men are discharged. The next day, however, the inspector sees the particular article for which the man has been discharged, and it is passed under the contract, and eventually goes to Woolwich, showing that it is not scrapped. That is what we complain of. We can prove cases where it has happened that work for which men have been discharged for scrapping has eventually not been scrapped, but has passed the inspectors.

4224. Your last clause is merely to take precautions that the others are enforced?—Yes.

4225. (Mr. De la Bère.) Of course, you realise that these clauses form a very large addition to the contract?—Yes, I do.

4226. They are rather of a penal nature, and they would very much swell the penal clauses which already exist in the contract?—That is quite admitted. Let me say, however, that these clauses, owing to the short notice, for which we ask your consideration, have been very rapidly prepared.

4227. Of course, they also involve taking a great many steps before a contract is placed which are not taken now, do they not?—Yes.

4228. How long do you suppose it would take to go through the procedure which is laid down here to draw up a list of wages and then to come to an agreement with the various parties when there was any case of difficulty or doubt?—If both parties meant business they could have lists in the hands of the Department within six months; but if one or other of the parties do not mean business it may last six years.

4229. In the meantime, what is to happen to the contract?—We admit the contracts must go on until we do get some alteration in the form of the Contract Clause.

4230. Supposing these were adopted in the Contract Clause and we proceed to take these steps, as you say that in certain cases that it might be six months before we arrived at an agreement, how about the particular contract for the particular things we wanted, and which we are waiting for?—We do not want to suggest that the Department should delay ordering necessary supplies at all. We simply say that from the date these recommendations are agreed upon any contracts issued following that date should have these clauses embodied. Contracts already in progress must be governed by the old conditions, necessarily.

4231. I understand that; but these clauses require in certain cases where there is difficulty or doubt a certain amount of negotiation between the parties concerned, do they not?—Yes.

4232. While that is going on do you propose that no order shall be placed?—No. It can be placed under present conditions till we can arrive at a settlement.

4233. In future, I mean?—I can only say that we have no suggestions to offer as to what should happen at the time.

4234. Have you difficulties generally in the trade, or is it mainly with one particular firm?—There are two firms employing large numbers of trade unionists and seven firms employing a limited number of trade unionists that we have difficulties with out of a total of 93 firms in the city.

4235. What strikes me is that this is rather an elaborate arrangement to lay down in the contracts on account of a difficulty which has arisen in regard, as I gather from you, to one particular firm?—Yes; but I would like to point out that a lot of men who are working on that particular firm have knowledge of the conditions in other parts of the country. Large numbers of men have been drafted in to suit the requirements of this firm from Vickers Maxim at Barrow-in-Furness, from Armstrongs at Elswick, and from Erith.

4236. How do you mean that they are drafted in?—When they became slack in those particular shops this firm advertised, and the establishment of this ordnance works being a new departure in Coventry, necessarily they have given preference to the men accustomed to that particular work.

4237. To pass to the overtime, do I understand rightly that that prevails generally in one particular department?—In two shops—the light machines and the heavy machines—although in the naval shop the men have nothing to do during the day. It is a recognised part of every man's duty that he shall work overtime; it is part of the conditions of his employment.

4238. It seems an extraordinarily wasteful way of conducting their proceedings?—I will tell you the procedure when I was there. The men used to ring in on one of those American clocks. There is the key on one side, you ring your clock, and you go out on the other side where the keys are hung up according to the numbers on the boards. By 5 o'clock every evening the men in my particular department who desired an evening off had to ask permission. I had to take their names and numbers and send them in to the manager at the works office. If he objected to a particular man going that evening he would cross his name out. Then, you understand, every man is supposed to ring out when he goes out at tea-time. Those whose names were crossed off, together with those who were compelled to stop, had their boards folded over and locked, so that they could not get their keys to ring, and you do not get paid until you do ring in.

4239. I take it your contention is that overtime is being worked irrespective of the amount of work that is to be done?—That is what we complain of. The firm were notoriously slack at this time last year, and yet they absolutely kept the men working overtime; in fact, our disputes started in a period of slackness.

4240. You mentioned just now that probably not more than 25 men would be engaged overtime, as a rule, in those shops?—Over the 65 hours; every man must work 65 hours.

4241. Would there generally be as many as 25 working over the 65 hours?—Very often more. The worst of it is that our men are not there to always see them, and it is only occasionally that we do see them. We do go up and look occasionally.

4242. Knowing that just at present ordnance work of all sorts is rather short, and there is not much ordnance work doing, I am rather surprised to find overtime should be worked at all to any extent; and that rather puzzles me?—That is what surprises us. We are aware that ordnance work is short.

4243. (Chairman.) It is really done in lieu of working two shifts, or three shifts, is it not?—When they first came to the town they endeavoured to have a night shift.

4244. And they now do it by overtime?—Now they do it by overtime.

4245. It is really a device for getting more out of their machines, is it not?—I am afraid it is so.

4246. (Mr. De la Bère.) There can only be a very limited number of those machines, and they cannot employ any very large number of men on the particular machines that you have alluded to?—In the ordinary course of things, leaving this dispute about the overtime out of consideration, every man who is working a machine during the day is expected to put in two hours' overtime at least during the night, and is liable to be called on for a longer period if they require him. He must put in the two hours as part of the conditions of employment by the firm, whether he has really got anything to do or not. Actually men sometimes have to stand by their machines doing nothing, waiting for the next stage of the work to come round to them. That is another grievance of the men that now the firm has abolished piece-work they have fixed time limits on the work based upon the piece-work prices, and so when a man does eventually get his work his time dates from the time when he is told he is going to have the job, and not from the time when he gets it. He may be waiting two hours for the job, flogging a dead horse, to use a vulgar expression, and he has to pull those two hours up, that is, he has to speed the machine up so much so as to pull those two hours up. If he is below the time limit, fault is found with him by the foreman when his card is checked.

4247. (Mr. Wilson Fox.) The time and a quarter, and the time and a half, I suppose, was agreed upon by your Trade Union?—Yes.

4248. And it is not the pay you object to, but the hours that the men work?—Yes.

4249. Have the men objected much to these long hours of overtime?—They must have objected to them when they have for over twelve months refused to work overtime at all, in spite of the pressure, and in spite of men being victimised.

4250. Did they strike—I have not been in the room all the time?—They have struck on the overtime question since February 16th, 1907, when the men, by a resolution passed by themselves at a public meeting of the men only concerned, decided to work no overtime whatever at that particular factory.

4251. Do the men work overtime at other factories?—Yes.

4252. How much overtime do they work at other factories? You say these men work two hours' overtime each day all the week through; taking the other factories in Coventry where they are working overtime, and where the men have not objected, I want to know how much in a week on an average does a man work overtime in those other factories in Coventry?—The time laid down by the federation is that he is not allowed under any circumstances, except where permission is given by the federation to the employer in cases of urgency or breakdowns, to work more than 15 hours' overtime per week. If he works more than 15 hours he is brought up and fined for it.

4253. That is how many hours a day?—That is three hours a day for five nights a week. It excludes the Saturday.

4254. This particular firm is the chief offender, you say?—Yes. I have not mentioned it yet, but they do not really pay the proper overtime rates, and that is the cause of the difficulty. He does not pay the time and a quarter and the time and a half owing to the peculiar hours this firm starts work in the morning. We have laid down for the whole district that each day shall be paid by itself; that is to meet the difficulty that I have already pointed out of men having to work long hours for a portion of the week and eventually being laid aside for the rest of the week, thus losing the whole of their overtime rates. Then, again, the men, if they are locked out a minute in the morning, have to lose five hours, and if they lose these five hours, as they compel them to make the full week before they commence their overtime rates the men really have got to work three nights overtime, that is, six hours, for the bare day-money, thus avoiding the overtime rates.

4255. Do the men come to you with most of their grievances in connection with the Fair Wages Clause?—Yes.

4256. You hear most of these grievances?—Yes.

4257. You have the opportunity of hearing such grievances as the men may have in connection with the Fair Wages Clause?—Yes.

4258. So you are in a position to make representations to the Departments concerned when such grievances arise?—We are in a position to do so. We have detailed information, but the difficulty is to get to know which particular Departments to make them to.

4259. I was only asking whether you were in a position to have the information; I understand that you do get it?—I have got it here if you like to look at it.

4260. (Mr. Black.) You did write to one Department, I think you said, and you got an acknowledgment only?—We did not write direct as a Federation. It was to the headquarters' Council, to the Executive Council of the A.S.E. that we wrote. We also wrote to Mr. Steadman's Parliamentary Committee, and requested him to bring the matter forward. He simply acknowledged the letter.

4261. You do not know what Department was written to?—We do not, and we do not know whether the contract was obtained direct from any Department, or whether it was obtained from A. B. & Co.

4262. That does not matter, if it is Government work?—Certainly not, but the difficulty is that if we write to a Department they perhaps reply that the firm has not got a contract from them—neither would they, if they had got it through A. B. & Co.

4263. But the sub-contractors have to observe the conditions of the original contract?—That is what we say, and what we are trying to urge upon this Committee.

4264. I do not think that point matters very much. Are not the engineering trades of the country pretty well organised?—Yes. We are pretty well organised in Coventry. We have 3,753 in ten Societies in this particular district belonging to this Federation.

4265. There is a national agreement, is there not, between the employers and the Trade Unions?—Practically 83 per cent. of the firms in Coventry abide by our conditions as drawn up by this Federation. Every employer has had a copy submitted to him, and has notified to the Federation that he will adhere to it.

4266. Apart from your own arrangements, there is practically a national agreement, is there not, which has been drawn up within the last twelve months or so?—Do you refer to the terms of settlement recently revised?

4267. Yes?—It is so. We suffer from this that we are under worse conditions (through Coventry not having a branch of the Employers' Federation in Coventry) than what the men in the federated districts are.

4268. The employers are not federated in your district then?—No, they are individuals.

4269. Then the firm you complain of has never come into this general arrangement?—No; that is the difficulty.

4270. So all the engineering trades are alike in difficulty with this particular firm; you have all got a grievance against them?—Yes.

4271. All your engineering societies, I mean?—Yes.

4272. Is there any other big engineering firm in Coventry apart from the cycle and motor works?—Yes, there is a well-known firm of machine-tool makers.

4273. What are their conditions?—They observe our local conditions.

4274. What were the conditions of that firm at Rugby that you worked at?—That firm is rather peculiar. In the electrical trade they employ such a large amount of unskilled labour, but for all skilled mechanics they observe our conditions with this difference, that in the Rugby district the rates of wages were 3s. a week lower than those obtaining in Coventry; but when they took our people on they observed our local conditions, and so the Coventry men who worked at Rugby were paid the Coventry rates in order to get us to supervise the machinery.

4275. You do not object to the general rate of wages paid by this Coventry firm, do you, apart from the overtime question?—Not if they would recognise our rate of wages.

4276. It is more the conditions you object to, is it not?—It is more the conditions and the attempt to beat down the rate of wages, as I pointed out, by steadily endeavouring to get men at 4s. a week less.

4277. And employing machine-minders in place of skilled men?—Not machine-minders. They are getting really competent mechanics. We must admit that there is many a skilled mechanic who is outside this Trade Union, and possibly more skilled than what we have. We must admit that. Those men do not see eye to eye with us, and circumstances from time to time drive those men to take employment on the terms offered them by the employer because they have not the Union to support them while they are out.

The witness withdrew.

Mr. WILLIAM SHARROCKS, called and examined.

4278. (Chairman.) You represent the Staffordshire district of the Boilermakers and Iron and Steel Shipbuilders' Society?—Yes.

4279. I am not quite sure from the note you have sent in whether you understand what this Committee is doing. We are not investigating complaints against particular firms with a view to arriving at a decision or conclusion on them. We are only trying to find out from you what amendments or alterations you would make in the Fair Wages Clause in order to carry out more effectively the object of that Clause; so that we only want general illustrations of the difficulties you have found in working it. Have you found the Fair Wages Clause of any use to you?—Not at all. It is a dead letter in my district.

4280. Have you rates of wages generally agreed upon?—Yes.

4281. With all the employers paying about the same?—I may say that the Trade Union and the employers, as a rule, all over the country have districts, and rates of wages for each district. The district that I am now in—the Staffordshire district—includes Salop, Warwick and Worcester; and most of the employers have agreed upon the wages, a list of which I have got here for you, gentlemen. While Staffordshire is the lowest paid, so far as our industry is concerned, we have employers that we are complaining of, doing Government work, and doing it now, who are paying a matter of 10, 15 and 20 per cent. less than that agreed upon between the employers and our members. I want you to understand that the wage in Staffordshire for boilermakers is a matter of 20 per cent. less than what is paid in Manchester, Liverpool, and on the North-East Coast, yet whilst it is so low there we have employers that I complain of, who are doing work for the Government, and paying actually 10 per cent. or 20 per cent. less than the rates agreed upon by the employers and our Society.

4282. Have you complained to any Government Department that that is being done?—Yes, I have complained, and I have asked for the names of the different firms who are doing this work, but I cannot get that information, although I know we have firms in the district doing Government work.

4283. When you find a case of their paying 20 per cent. below the agreed rate what do you do?—I complain. If you will allow me to explain, I may say that our Corporation—the Wolverhampton Corporation—I am a member of the Council—had a Fair Wages Resolution similar to the Government Resolution, but we found that employers were evading it, and that we could not prevent them, so I got a resolution moved like this (handing in print of resolution passed at the Trade Union Congress) on our Corporation, and I got it passed, and that resolution prevented the employers from evading our Fair Wages Resolution as they did when it was similar to the Government one. We could not prevent them from doing that at first, but under this resolution we have prevented them. I may tell you, gentlemen, that we advertised for a boiler, and Mr. A., of Wolverhampton, was the successful tenderer for it. When the resolution of the Baths and Parks Committee came before the Council I objected, and it was referred to the Baths and Parks Committee, and I proved that he was not carrying out the spirit of the present Fair Wages Clause whilst he had been doing work under the old resolution, which was similar to yours.

4284. In what respect do you think that your resolution is an improvement on the Fair Wages Clause?—Yours speaks of the wages paid in the execution of this contract should be those generally accepted as current in each trade for competent workmen in the district where the work is carried out. These firms evaded that by saying that although my district is composed of Staffordshire, Shropshire, Worcester and Warwick, Nottingham and Lincoln, they were not in the district at all, as they had a district of their own. And in regard to that part of the Fair Wages Resolution which says that they shall have competent workmen, we have agreed with the employers in reference to who is a competent workman, and that competent workmen shall still have this work. But Messrs. A. say, "No, they are not competent workmen." No matter what industry it is, you will find that they can put handy men to do work that ought to be done by skilled artisans. Mr. A. pays to our members in his employ a matter of 2s. or 3s. a week more than the district rate—more than is on that list which I have here; but to the others he pays a matter of 6s. or 8s. less. He only pays the extra money to a few, but he says, "So long as I pay the standard rate of wages to the men employed on this work I am carrying out the contract," no matter how much less he is paying to the whole of the other men on his works.

4285. But what improvement does your resolution effect on the Fair Wages Clause as it stands?—It says that they shall pay to the whole of their workmen such rates of wages as are recognised by the Trade Union; 95 per cent. of the employers in the country pay according to that list. I may say, further, that the employers as a rule are in favour of a Fair Wages Resolution that will prevent unfair employers from getting the work. They want them to toe the line.

4286. Your point is that your resolution prevents their distinguishing the half-skilled from the fully-skilled workmen?—Yes. Under the Government Resolution they must only pay the competent workmen for the work that they are doing for the Government. So you might be an employer paying the rates agreed upon to the whole of your employees, while the employer next to you might say, "I am only going to pay them to those engaged on this work, and still I shall be carrying out the Fair Wages Resolution." We say they ought to pay them to the whole of their employees.

4287. Whether they are on Government work or not?—Yes.

4288. You also object to their distinguishing between one man and another on the ground that one of them is less skilled than the other?—Yes.

4289. Those are your two points, are they not?—Take it that you are employer A, and you are carrying out the spirit of the agreement agreed between you (the employer) and the Trade Unions of the country, and that you are paying competent men for doing the work. Of course, there is certain work in all trades which a handy man can do, and the employer can pay him what he likes; but you are carrying out the spirit of the resolution and of the agreement made between the fair employers and the Trade Union. But the firm next to you is only paying the men on this Government work what they are compelled to pay, and the result is that you do not stand an equal chance along with that firm in tendering and estimating for a contract.

4290. Is there any other point that you have got in your mind?—There is the question of the district. When I was before the Committee on May 13, 1907, I gave evidence with reference to the wages paid in Birmingham, but there are employers who try to evade it, and to say, "We are not in the Birmingham district." My district extends from Stoke-on-Trent to Worcester, and although it is only called the Staffordshire district, we do include Worcester and Birmingham; but some of the employers in Birmingham say, "We are not in the Staffordshire district, and we are not going to pay the Staffordshire rate of wages." Then the other employers, when they get to know that these people are getting hold of Government work, do not like it. I have got a letter from B., and a number of other employers, who think these men ought to pay the same rate of wages as they pay, so as to give them an equal opportunity in tendering for work. On Friday last I saw Mr. B. and Mr. C. at Birmingham, and they said to me, "We cannot have a look-in. There is Messrs. D., they got this work; Messrs. E. they are doing this work; and we cannot have a look-in. If you do not do something on this matter we shall have to reduce wages and pay the same rates as they do."

4291. How are you going to define a district?—That is already defined. The employers in Manchester and the Trade Union have defined the Manchester district as including Manchester, Oldham, Bolton, Bury, Rochdale, Horwich, and Dukinfield. Then Liverpool, Birkenhead, Warrington, and Garston are defined as another district.

4292. Your answer, then, is that the district is as defined by the employers and the workmen; is that so?—Yes.

4293. What limits have the employers and the workmen decided on for the Staffordshire district?—We have a few employers who are not in favour of industrial progress and peace in the country, for whereas 90 per cent. of the employers have agreed the other 10 per cent. have not.

4294. Do you mean that 90 per cent. of the employers in Staffordshire have accepted your definition of a district and 10 per cent. have not?—That is it. There are one or two firms that will not agree to it, and who pay 2s. or 3s. a week less. But they have got some work from the Government—making tanks and boilers for the Admiralty; and I was told by Mr. B. only the other day that if something was not done with a view either of making these employers pay the standard rate of wages or of preventing their getting Government work, the others would have to reduce the wages.

4295. Have you complained to the Admiralty about that?—I wrote to the Admiralty some time ago, and I wrote to the India Office in reference to some work done for them, but I cannot get any reply.

4296. Have you got a reply from the Admiralty or the War Office?—No.

4297. You state you had a complaint against a firm which had a contract with the Admiralty and the War Office?—Yes. Our general secretary, Mr. Cummings, of Newcastle-on-Tyne, has complained to the Admiralty, but they will not give him the names of the firms that are doing the work. I may tell you, gentlemen, that I got to know this particular firm was doing the work from an inspector. I hope and trust you will feel that you can in some way modify the Fair Wages Resolution. The resolution I have handed to you has been backed up by a number of Trade Union congresses; it has been passed in London, Leicester, and Edinburgh—it has been passed unanimously; and I have given it to all the employers in Manchester and Staffordshire, and they all agree to it and say it is very fair and that there is nothing wrong about it.

4298. Do you think you would have no difficulty in enforcing it if you had it put into the contract?—If that resolution was passed it would at once prevent unfair employers getting hold of this work. If you would kindly read that resolution you would see that they would have to pay to the whole of their workmen such rates of wages as are recognised between the fair employers and the Trade Unions.

4299. As it appears that you cannot get the Fair Wages Clause enforced, I do not see how you are going to get your new clause enforced?—The only way would be a Resolution of the House of Commons on your recommendation.

4300. I mean, how you would get it put into practice when you had got it passed?—We should have no difficulty in putting it into practice. I have given you an illustration, as far as the Wolverhampton Council is concerned. As I said before, we had a similar resolution to the Government one, and the unfair employers came in and did work for our Corporation. Then I got the resolution amended, that they must pay or cause to be paid to the whole of their workmen such rates of wages as are recognised between the employers and the Trade Union. Then I proved, when I met Mr. A. before the Baths and Parks Committee, that he did not pay to the whole of his workpeople the rates of wages as agreed upon between the employers and us; and the result was that they cancelled the order.

4301. Take that question of the definition of a district; you have got a firm now that you have complained against because they say that they have made a district for themselves. How are you going, under your resolution, to make them conform to your definition of a district?—If they have to conform to the wages as agreed upon between the employers and the Trade Unions, they would have to come in. They could put themselves wherever they liked, and they could say they were either within or without the district. The resolution I trust you gentlemen will suggest to the Government will be that any persons estimating or tendering for Government contracts must pay or cause to be paid to the whole of their workmen such rates of wages as are recognised or agreed upon between the employers and the Trade Union. Then the district does not matter; they can be either in the district or out of it.

4302. But the particular firm that you are mentioning would probably say that they are not in the district?—They would say so simply because of the question of the wages. I say, "Why are you not in this district?—Here you are so many miles from Birmingham and so many miles from Dudley, but you are nearer to Birmingham than you are to Dudley." They did not recognise Birmingham, and the reason of it was that Birmingham was paying these wages, Dudley was not, and, of course, they wanted to be in Dudley where they need not pay these wages.

4303. Have you any other suggestions you would like to make?—I think the only suggestion is that if you want anything more definite in reference to enforcing the spirit of the resolution that was passed, I can only mention this: This firm of Messrs. A. say they are not in the Staffordshire district—that whilst they are in Staffordshire they do not recognise that they are in a district where wages and hours of labour are agreed upon between the fair employers and us. If we could get a resolution passed that anyone doing Government work must pay or cause to be paid to their employees the rate of wage that is agreed upon between the employers and the Trade Union, then they would have to pay that wage, and they could be in any outside district they like. By paying the rates of wages of the district I do not mean that they would pay anything like what they do in Manchester, where a riveter gets 35s. 6d., a holder-up 31s. 6d. and 32s. 6d., a plater 39s. 6d., and an angle-smith two guineas. In Staffordshire what we have agreed upon is 25s. for the holder-up, 30s. for riveting, 36s. for plating, and 38s. for angle-smiths. That is the minimum. We do not say that by passing this resolution we should put all employers on an equality so far as the wages are concerned, because we should have different wages in different districts; but we should compel employers, whatever district they were in, to conform to the wages agreed upon for that district between the employers and the Trade Union.

4304. (Mr. King.) Will you tell us when the Wolverhampton Council adopted this Clause in their contract form?—It would be about four years ago, as near as I can tell you.

4305. The Clause as we have it here is: "The contractor shall pay the rate of wages and observe the hours of labour recognised and agreed upon between the Trade Unions and the employers respectively"; but there is nothing about paying all their employees at the same rate?—That is agreed upon between the employers and the Trade Union; that is all that we want.

4306. I thought you wanted these words in—that he should pay the whole of his workpeople not less than the Trade Union rate?—That would cover it. I might say that I moved that resolution, and I have here the agenda for the council meeting, from which you will find that place was given to the case of Messrs. A. on April 8.

4307. Have you a copy of the resolution you moved in the Council with you?—No.

4308. Is this resolution you handed in the one?—No.

4309. That is the Trade Union resolution, is it not?—That is the resolution I moved at the London Congress, the Edinburgh Congress, the Bristol Congress, the Bath Congress, and a number of other Congresses. That has been passed at those various Congresses.

4310. But not by the Wolverhampton Council?—The Wolverhampton resolution had a different wording to that.

4311. I still do not see how you would bring a contractor to book who said that he was not in your district, assuming we adopted these words. You simply say that he shall pay the Trade Union rate of wages of the district, but what is to be done if he says, "I am not in any district; what wages am I to pay?"—We have various districts agreed upon between the employers and the different Trade Unions as to wages to be paid and the hours to be worked in those districts.

4312. Do the districts of your Society cover the whole country; in other words, is the whole country mapped out into districts?—Yes.

4313. And there is not a single inch of the whole country that is not in some district?—That is so, and every district has its delegate or representative. I am the representative of Staffordshire and the Midland Counties, and my district takes in Peterborough, Nottingham, Leicester, the whole of Staffordshire, Derby and Coventry.

4314. But you have not the same district rate all over that district, have you?—There is the minimum. We have a higher rate at Coventry; there they pay 35s. as a minimum for rivetters.

4315. Then this district that you are mentioning now is not a district fixed for the same rate of wages? It is a minimum, say, for the riveting in the whole of the district I am speaking of, but they pay more at Nottingham—they pay 34s. there. What we say is that this is the minimum, and I hope you will understand me on that. I am only asking that employers shall pay the minimum. At Coventry they pay 36s. for riveting, while in Birmingham the minimum is 30s. We say we want them to pay the minimum. I go as far as Kidgrove, and the man from Manchester takes Northwich. The minimum at one place is 32s. and at the other 34s.

4316. Is that admitted by the employers?—Yes, that is admitted by the employers. The principal employer at Northwich pays 34s., though he is only a few miles from Kidgrove, where I go to, and we only pay on a minimum of 32s.

4317. (Mr. Hillier.) What would happen if a firm started works in a district for the first time? How would you settle the rate? Would you say that that district must come in some other district?—If it was in Staffordshire.

4318. If it was in the county. If works are started in a district for the first time, what would happen about an agreement between the employer and the workmen? Would the employer who started the works in a particular town where there was no rate in existence make a rate with his own men?—If I understand you, you tell me that a man starts within 30 miles of Manchester; if he starts within a radius of 30 miles from Manchester, the representative would go to him with reference to the rates of wages, and tell him that he would be expected to conform to the rates of wages paid in Manchester and within a radius of 30 miles of Manchester. If he came to Staffordshire, I should expect him to pay the minimum of 30s. Although the wages in Manchester would have been 34s. or 35s. 6d., if he came to Staffordshire we should expect him to pay a minimum of 30s. for a riveter, 25s. for holders-up, 36s. for plating, and 38s. for angle-smiths.

4319. (Mr. Black.) Do you never get any debatable ground at all on this question of districts? Take the district between Dudley and Birmingham; is there not sometimes a little bit in dispute as to whether it is in Birmingham or in Dudley?—That is so.

4320. So your arrangement does not get us away from that difficulty?—The resolution will do so by saying that they would then have to pay the rates of the district as agreed upon between the employers and the employed. If a certain price was agreed upon, Dudley would have to come over and conform to the resolution, as it would be in that district.

4321. Are you trying to level Dudley up to Birmingham?—I am.

4322. Would it be fair to the firms who claim Dudley should have a rate by itself separate from Birmingham?—That is what we complain of. We say it is not. You might say that the moment you go out of Birmingham you are in Dudley. I have quoted Messrs. ——, who are in Smethwick. This firm is only a mile and a half from Messrs. ——, and they say they are in Dudley. Why? simply because they are paying less wages than they would have to pay in Birmingham, and less than Messrs. —— are paying in Smethwick.

4323. Speaking now of the Dudley district, do you admit that Dudley is a separate district from yours?—We do not.

4324. Some of the Trade Unions do?—Not that I know of. We do not recognise that. That would not do, because if we recognised that we should sow the seeds of discord between the employers and Trade Unionists.

4325. It is the case, I think, that some Trade Unions do recognise a Birmingham rate and a Dudley rate, and a doubt comes in as to the district in between sometimes, just where to draw the dividing line?—If you gentlemen will allow me, I shall be very pleased to send you copies of the letters from the various employers in the different trades who say that Dudley is in the Birmingham district. I did not know this question would be asked, but I will send up the letters from the various associations saying that Dudley is in the Birmingham district. That is where we contend there is a grievance with the employers. The employers themselves say, "Why should I have to pay these wages when they are paying so much less at Dudley?" I might say that I met the London County Council some years ago in reference to a firm at Oldbury, which is between Dudley and Smethwick. This firm said: "We are in Dudley." I got a map of Birmingham, and I supplied it to the Special Committee appointed by the County Council. Sir William Bull, I believe he is now (I think he has been knighted since), was the chairman of this Special Committee. I proved to this Committee that Oldbury was in Birmingham, and, indeed, I satisfied this Special Committee of the London County Council that both Oldbury and Dudley should be in the Birmingham district. The result was that the firm in question had to comply with the rates of wages agreed upon between the employers in Birmingham and our Society. I may say that I ran up against a gentleman the other week who was complaining, and he said: "The sooner I take a little shop outside there the better." We have no dispute and work in harmony with over 90 per cent. of the employers, and, I think, gentlemen, you will see that it is very unfair upon a number of employers who pay a certain standard rate of wages—and we only ask for the minimum—when one employer says: "I am three miles away from you, and I shall not conform to that Resolution." We have, as I tell you, Manchester, Liverpool, London, the North-East Coast, the Clyde—all our districts allotted out; but in Staffordshire, and when I say Staffordshire I include Worcestershire and round about Dudley, we have more bother there, and more discord with the employers than in the whole of Great Britain outside. We have no such thing as any bother in Belfast, we have none in Dublin, we have none in Barrow-in-Furness, because the employers recognise that they are in a district; all the employers recognise it, with the exception of these employers I have told you about, gentlemen. The North Staffordshire Railway Company the Great Western Railway Company, they recognise this district,; and I say it would be very hard for one or two small firms to upset that Resolution, because upsetting it would mean a reduction, and it would sow the seeds of discord between the employers and our members. I hope you, gentlemen, in formulating a Fair Wages Resolution, will give no consideration to those employers who upset the peace and progress of the country. I would respectfully ask you to consider that.

4326. (Mr. Wilson Fox.) Your Union of Boilermakers is a very strong Union, I think, is it not?—Yes.

4327. And it is very highly organised?—Yes.

4328. You say that you have very few troubles except in Staffordshire?—Yes.

4329. You find, I suppose, that most of the employers in the country conform to the agreements which they have made with the Boilermakers' Society?—That is so.

4330-1. Taking the Staffordshire district, I do not quite understand why there is this trouble. Was not this district agreed upon between the Trade Union and the Employers' Association?—Might I try and explain it? For some time we had not any representative in Staffordshire, and Staffordshire has been a district that has been neglected. I went from Manchester to Staffordshire, and since I have been in the Staffordshire district I have conferred with the employers, and most of the employers have signed and agreed to these wages, and these wages, as I say, are the minimum wages. The employers have complained as much as we have about a number of these employers getting work from the Government and municipal bodies although they are paying less wages.

4332. What I understand is this—I may have misunderstood you—that the district had been agreed upon, but certain employers said they were not within the district?—That is so.

4333. And then came the trouble?—That is so.

4334. It looks as if the district was not sufficiently clearly defined, if some employers are in a position to argue that they are not within the district. If the district had been clearly defined between you and the employers, how is it that some of the employers can argue at all that they are not in the district?—In reply to that I would say that you gentlemen sitting round the table here, we may take it each of you agrees, from Kidgrove right away to Worcester, to pay a certain rate as a minimum wage; you agree to that; the North Staffordshire and the Great Western are paying more than that, and Piggotts and Tangye and other firms are paying it, too, but now another firm steps in and says, "We are not going to comply with that."

4335. That is a different thing. They say they are not parties to that agreement. It is not because they argue they are not in the district; it is because they say, "We will not agree to what the other employers have agreed." In other words, they will not agree to a district at all; is that not the point?—When I dealt with the case of Oldbury he did not say the question was a question of paying; he said he was not in the Birmingham district nor in the Staffordshire district. He said he was in Oldbury, and Oldbury was just on the borders of Worcestershire. But since that he has come round, and is paying the minimum wage.

4336. He evidently did not agree to what the other employers defined as a district; he was not in the agreement at all?—No.

4337. That is the point?—That is so.

4338. And he would not be a party to that agreement. If the majority of the employers are paying a certain rate, whether you call it a Trade Union rate or not, at any rate, it would be the current rate in the district?—Yes.

4339. It would be the rate which the majority of the employers are paying in the district?—Yes.

4340. Therefore these other men, whatever district they may call themselves, are not paying the current rate?—That is so.

4341. Have you made any complaint about these employers to the Public Departments when you have found that particular employers are not paying the current rate in the district?—Yes. I made a complaint to the late Government—to the War Office. I went with one of our members, and then I wrote to Earl Cawdor when he was First Lord of the Admiralty. While I was writing to Earl Cawdor in reference to this matter the late Government resigned, and I let the matter stand over until the present time. I wrote to several Departments in reference to it.

4342. If you got the words "Trade Union rate" put into the Fair Wages Clause, instead of the present words "the current rate," you would be met with exactly the same difficulties and exactly the same problems as you are met with under the words you have got at present, would you not?—I do not see that at all. How would that be?

4343. You say you have got an agreement with the employers in the district to pay the Trade Union rate?—Yes.

4344. And some of them do not pay the Trade Union rate?—Not among those that have agreed to it.

4345. But some employers do not?—Some do not.

4346. Supposing the Fair Wages Clause at the present moment said that employers had to pay the Trade Union rate you would be in just as great a difficulty now, supposing that the Clause stood in the amended form, as you would have been if the Clause simply referred to the current rate in the district?—No.

4347. Supposing this Committee had been the means of altering the Clause so that it stood that the Trade Union rate shall be paid, as some employers are not paying the Trade Union rate, according to you, at the present moment, how would you propose to deal with the situation then?—If an employer did not pay the Trade Union rate he would not be allowed to do work for the Government. We have already defined it, so far as our little affair is concerned.

4348. Then your remedy is to complain to the Public Departments?—Yes, that is so.

4349. You are fortunate enough in your trade at the present moment to have the Trade Union rate paid to most of your men throughout the country?—With the exception of my district, the Trade Union rate is paid. I can safely say to you, gentlemen, that 95 per cent. of the employers pay the Trade Union rate. In regard to the other 5 per cent., I have had letters from F.'s and others complaining about those employers in my district getting the work at lower rates and wanting to know how they are able to do it. Messrs. F. asked me to supply them with the rates of wages. I supplied them with the rates of wages, and then I got a letter wanting to know if nothing could be done with the view of stopping the men who are paying less than the rate of the district. If they pay the minimum 30s. we do not object, but where they are only paying 28s. then I think you will agree with me that the other employers have a ground of complaint.

4350. You are a particularly strong union, and you have only a comparatively small number of employers to deal with who do not pay you what you consider to be the proper rates; do you strike against those shops; have you withdrawn those men?—We have not got any men in.

4351. You have not got any men in them at all?—With the exception of Messrs. A.'s. We have got men in Messrs. A.'s, and they are paying these men more than the 30s. a week in order to comply with the resolution. When they came before our Council they said, "We are paying your members more than the standard rate." I said, "That is so; but while you pay our members 2s. above the standard rate, you are paying the other men 4s. below it." I have got it all here if you gentlemen would like to see it.

4352. But still they are paying your men the rate?—Yes, that is so.

4353. Therefore, so far as your union is concerned, you have no general complaint to make on that ground?—Yes, we have. For instance, you are Mr. A., and you are employing 60 men, and you are paying six men 2s. over the standard rate; and here is this other gentleman who is employing 60 men and he is paying all those men the minimum of 30s. That means that you are paying six of your men 32s., but you are paying to the other 54 men 4s. or 6s. less than the standard. This other gentleman then will say, "We have got a complaint there."

4354. Are the men who are receiving less pay inferior workmen to the others?—They are good workmen—workmen that could go into a shop and earn their living.

4355. They are not as good as your men, I suppose?—We have had to bring some of our men away that they were paying this wage of 28s. to. I can assure you, in reference to this matter, that I have complaints from employers. I have got letters in my pocket now from employers in reference to the wages which are being paid, and wanting to know what is being done in this matter.

4356. Generally speaking, are these men who are not in the union as good as the men who are in the union?—They can do the work.

4357. But are they as good?—I consider that when a man has served his time to the trade—and we all consider the same—that man can do the work and ought to be paid the minimum wage. We have no maximum, and all we ask is that each individual firm should pay the minimum wage.

4358. I do not know what the facts are, and I am only trying to find out whether, looking at it from the employers' point of view, there is any justification that these men should be paid a less rate; and, therefore, one point that I put to you is that perhaps they are not as good workmen as your men. I do not know anything about it, and so I should like to hear from you what you say upon it?—In my opinion, most of these men are as good men as the Trade Union men; they can do the work and they turn out the work. They do the work, there is not the slightest doubt about it, and they ought to be paid the same rates of wages as are paid by other firms.

4359. (Mr. De la Bère.) It would be to the advantage of these men to enter the union, would it not, because that would settle the difficulty?—Yes, it would be to their advantage. I may say as an illustration that things have been falling off there, and that they know that if they are not in the union they cannot go outside Staffordshire. Four came to my place the other day, and I sent them to situations; but had I known where they came from, I tell you candidly they would not have gone. They found work was getting slack, so they joined and then they brought me their card showing that they were members. They joined us in order to be sent away. I sent them to a place where it was no use going unless they were in the union. I sent some of them to Peterborough. I may tell you, so far as the employers are concerned, that previous to holding the position I do now I was the District Secretary for Manchester, and I could get a lot of references from employers. I have never had discord, and I have never cost our society one farthing so far as disputes are concerned, and I have been used to arrange everything satisfactorily. With reference to these complaints I can assure you, gentlemen, the employers are complaining to me; in fact, more than the men are. I have letters from Manchester saying that some tenders have been asked for in Manchester for boilers for India, but the orders have been given out of Manchester, and they want to know whether they are in my district. I wrote to Mr. John Morley and others, but I could not get to know. Then I had letters from Messrs. F., wanting to know how these firms could take and do the work at rates that put them out of the market. The fact of the matter is, that it is because they are paying a matter of 6s. or 8s. a week less than Messrs. F. That is how it is.

The witness withdrew.

Mr. Albert Robert Burns, called and examined.

4360. (Chairman.) You come here as representing the Birmingham branch of the Union of Saddlers and Harness Makers?—Yes.

4361. Do you find that the Fair Wages Clause in your district is not being acted on?—The object of the Fair Wages Clause is defeated as far as Birmingham and district is concerned.

4362. How is that?—There is a difficulty for the masters to recognise what fair wages really are. We had a basis up to the year 1902 of what we called a fair wage. Since 1902 there has been a decline in wages. The masters have shown a want of confidence in each other, and the consequence is that they have continually been competing against one another until wages have gradually dropped down until it is really a starvation existence.

4363. Is there no agreement between the employers and the workmen?—Not at present.

4364. But there was?—There was previously to 1902.

4365. And it has been gradually departed from?—Yes.

4366. I suppose you would not have much difficulty in saying what the rate currently paid was, would you?—At the present moment you could not very well say. I have some instances here showing how prices differ for the same work performed at the same period. For instance, in October, 1905, at Messrs. A.'s they paid for trace-pieces 1s. 5d., 9d. being for preparing and 8d. for stitching; and at the same time at Messrs. B.'s they paid 1s. 0½d., 6d. for preparing and 6½d. for stitching. For wire traces in February, 1906, Messrs. A. paid 3s. 6d., 1s. 6d. for preparing and 2s. for stitching; and Messrs. B., for the same period, paid 3s., that is, 1s. 6d. for preparing and 1s. 6d. for stitching. I could show you instances where the prices have shown a great reduction. In 1902, when the prices were agreed, the men could get a reasonable living. For instance, at C.'s, Birmingham, for breast collars 3s. were paid for preparing and 2s. 6d. for stitching, making a total of 5s. 6d.; whereas in 1905 the prices had gone down to 1s. 3d. for preparing and 1s. 3d. for stitching, or a total of 2s. 6d., which is less than half what was paid previously. At the present time there is a contract out for rifle buckets. The workers get 1s. 10d. for making, and there is more labour required for this latest pattern than was required in the previous pattern for which the workers received 3s. 6d.

4367. I do not think we need go into the question of the fall in rates. What I want to get at is: What is the current rate to-day? I suppose you would have no difficulty in settling what that was, would you?—Yes, that is really the difficulty. Even at the present time, pretty nearly each firm has got its own prices.

4368. If you averaged them you could tell pretty well what the current rate is, I suppose?—In some of the factories for the same work at the same price, it sometimes averages half the wages in another firm, the system which one factory has being preferable over the others. In one instance, you might say a man may receive work out, say, rifle buckets; and in a particular instance the firm is paying 1s. 10d. for them, and he may average from 22s. to 24s. a week. In another factory, where the facilities of the working arrangements are not so great, the wages would not average half that, for the simple reason that the mode of working is not so convenient, and not so well placed, and the majority of tools which they work with are not really up-to-date.

4369. What is your remedy for this?—The remedy is to have the fair wage placed upon a national basis. There should be an agreement between the masters and the men as to what should be the price to be paid upon all Government work.

4370. Do you mean that there should be a uniform rate of wages all over the country?—Yes, for all piece-work, and 8d. per hour for day work. We used to base our piece-work on our price-list, and I have got here our original price list, which was in existence in 1902 and for six years previous to that.

4371. How do you propose that the Government Departments which make these contracts are to get this uniform rate settled?—I should suggest that the Government should appoint a representative to call the masters and the workpeople together for the purpose of forming a price list. The masters have no confidence in each other, and although we have their sympathy, their sympathy does not really amount to anything material. We believe that their sympathy is really genuine, but through their mistrust in each other they cannot help themselves. I have here the price list that we have at the present time—it is the latest price list which we have worked out, and it was only made out last year. Two firms in Birmingham have told us that if we can give them a guarantee that the price list will be adhered to by other firms, they are willing to adhere to it in their particular houses. Two other firms have agreed to deal with all the work on the basis of the price list.

4372. Your real difficulty is that practically there is at present no rate that you can call a current rate anywhere?—That is so.

4373. And that you propose to remedy by the Government bringing the employers and the men together and agreeing on a price list?—That is exactly the position. I think that would be the remedy.

4374. Have you got any other suggestions to make?—No. My position is that at the present time the way in which the Fair Wage Resolution is applied to our trade in particular does not meet the case, for wages have continually gone down, and there certainly wants some remedy or some amendment.

4375. (Mr. De la Bère.) Did things go pretty smoothly down to 1902?—Yes, apparently.

4376. What do you suppose has been the cause of the falling away since that time?—It has been the competition amongst the employers undoubtedly. The trade itself, speaking generally, has not been so busy, and there are several reasons why it has not been so busy.

4377. I suppose we may sum them all up really as slackness of trade?—Yes.

4378. In regard to your remedy, that involves, I think you said, a uniform rate throughout the country?—Yes.

4379. Some of the witnesses we have had here from the other trades have discountenanced the idea of a uniform rate, and they have said that in their trade, at any rate, it would be impossible. Would that not rather involve a special Fair Wages Clause for your trade?—I do not think so. I think if there are any instances—and I believe there are instances—where employers pay above what is recognised to be the Trade Union rate of wages it would in no wise interfere with those, and that masters who require the best workpeople would still pay above that rate for special work.

4380. In your trade you would have the same rate paid throughout the whole country—everywhere?—Yes, as a minimum.

4381. In other trades they do not suggest that, but they think that there naturally would be a distinction between the rates in various parts of the country?—The only thing that I can say in that respect is that they fail to recognise that they simply encourage competition in the trade, which is going on continuously, and competition always means the lowering of prices and the lowering of rates of wages.

4382. You think that quite irrespective of local prices and local rents and all that sort of thing the rates should be uniform?—Yes.

4383. (Chairman.) One difficulty about that would be that a man living in the middle of London would get the same wages as a man living in the middle of a rural district?—Yes, exactly.

4384. What inducement would there be to him to live in London, then?—Only that his work would call him here. If he could get out into the country I should certainly advise him to go. I think it would be better for him individually, and I think it would also be better for the nation at large if you could spread the people more over the country.

4385. Are you going to fix the uniform rate at a rate which would cover rent and cost of living in London?—I do not think that should be taken into consideration in the Government's circumstances.

4386. Would you not take into account rent, for instance, as an element in fixing wages?—It does operate, I believe, generally; but I do not think it should be allowed in these instances, because wherever it was given out that the cost of living in the district should be a basis for fixing prices, that only means that where those districts have less rent and less cost of living they generally get the preference in the contracts, and that means that wages in the other places must necessarily go down owing to the fact that there are more people out of work and they do not get their fair share of the contracts.

4387. (Mr. Wilson Fox.) Looking at it from the employer's point of view, when he was tendering for a contract the contract would tend to go to the employer who could make the best terms. Supposing the employers had to pay the same rate of wages everywhere, the employer who had to pay less rent and less rates and taxes would be in the best position, would he not?—Undoubtedly.

4388. And the work would tend to go towards those districts?—Yes. It may possibly operate in that way.

4389. That is the way it would tend naturally to go, would it not?—Slightly. There would be a slight preference.

4390. Is it a slight preference? If he pays a low rent and low rates and taxes compared with the high rents in the towns and the high rates and taxes and certain other extra costs which you do get in a large town, would he not be in a better position to tender in the country districts?—Under my scheme, which I propose, he would really have the advantage, because under the present system which is in operation, where the rents and rates and taxes are highest, they have been asking the employers to pay more in wages rather than less. By a uniform state of price list the employers, say, in London and elsewhere, where the rents and taxes are highest would really have the advantage over the present system.

4391. I should have thought the work would have gone where the employer had the greatest margin, which would not be in the large towns, and therefore that your trade would be split up all over the country?—Such is not the experience.

4392. I do not know. It has not been brought into operation, and I only put that to you as a possibility?—The fact is that in London and in all large towns where the rents and rates are highest there, usually, they have the best system of working, and they get the highest rate of wages.

4393. Do you think that an agricultural labourer should be paid the same rate in every county?—I do not understand the technicalities of their business.

4394. I am taking your point that the rate of wages for making a saddle should be the same everywhere?—If a man performed a certain sort of work in one part of the country, I should say that his work was just as valuable in another part of the country as it was in the place where he was located previously.

4395. Quite irrespective of any other circumstances?—Exactly.

4396. Quite irrespective of his surroundings?—Exactly.

4397. And quite irrespective of the cost of production?—Yes.

4398. (Mr. Black.) You will still have to allow for the differences in the machinery in the different factories, would you not? So you could not get an absolutely uniform scale?—We should be prepared, of course, to meet the employers if they introduced any machinery which performed part of the work which is being done at the present time. We should be prepared to make certain allowances and reductions on a fair basis.

4399. (Chairman.) Then your list would cease to be uniform?—No, not a bit. I presume the price for machinery would be applicable to the whole of the trade.

4400. Yes, but all the employers might not care to introduce it?—That will be their look-out.

4401. (Mr. Hillier.) Then you would vary the prices according to the newest phase of machinery, irrespective of what the other men do. For instance, a new labour-saving machine may come in and you will alter your price to meet the advantages of that machine?—Yes.

4402. Then there would be no stability of prices?—I propose in the synopsis of my evidence that a conference should meet, say, every five years and during those five years should there be machinery or any new system introduced, that should be brought forward at the ensuing conference and rates should then be laid down for it, and specifications made for the work which was to be performed by certain machinery. That would then apply to every master throughout the whole trade.

4403. Supposing a machine was introduced immediately after some contract was placed, are you going to delay the alteration in prices for five years?—Yes, unless a special conference is called. If it was agreed between the masters and the men that a special conference was necessary a special conference could be called for the purpose of considering that.

4404. Is not the fixing of the rates rather a question as between the employers and the employees? Why do you want the Government to do that?—The difficulty has always been that in dealing with employers each employer will, of course, do his uttermost to defeat his fellow-employers by introducing fresh schemes and ways of production. That is really done with the sole purpose of trying to defeat one another with the object that they can get the business. By employers, who tender for contracts, adopting our method and working on a national basis, they and we should be really defending the whole body of employers as well as the work-people.

4405. Then there would be practically no competition?—Practically no competition; it would bring the competition down to a minimum.

4406. (Mr. King.) How would you suggest orders should be placed if there was no competition and if everyone tendered at the same price?—There is always competition amongst employers so far as their ability as business men is concerned. As I have just pointed out, in some instances men can earn twice as much money on the same article at the same price at one firm as they can do in another firm. It is a matter of management, and a man who is a keen business man and a good manager would undoubtedly be able to hold the sway over those who are not good managers or good business men.

4407. Then your object in putting wages on a national basis would be defeated, would it not? I thought your object was to prevent competition?—My object was to prevent competition for wages, and that would not interfere with wages at all. I am talking about the working arrangements inside the factory and not of interfering with the wages.

4408. The wages would be fixed uniformly throughout the country?—Yes.

4409. Every other condition would be variable?—Yes.

4410. (Mr. Wilson Fox.) Including the price of the article?—That does not touch us at all.

4411. But it makes a great deal of difference to the man who manufactures, does it not?—Yes; but, of course, we can only depend upon the manufacturers always pointing out these things to us. We are not supposed to know anything about the prices of materials.

4412. (Chairman.) Have you anything else you would like to suggest?—No.

4413. (Mr. King.) Has your latest price-list been agreed to by any firm?—It has been agreed to by two in Birmingham and favoured by two others, if we can give them a guarantee that it will be adopted.

The witness withdrew.

FOURTEENTH DAY,

Thursday, 5th March, 1908.

At 32, Great George Street, Westminster, S.W.

PRESENT:

Sir GEORGE H. MURRAY, K.C.B. (Chairman).

Mr. R. Bailey, M.V.O.
Mr. F. W. Black.
Mr. H. De la Bère, C.B.
Mr. J. H. Hillier.
Mr. J. J. Wills (Secretary).

Mr. Stanley C. Straker and Mr. Edward Unwin, called and examined.

4414. (Chairman.) (To Mr. Straker.) You are Chairman of the London Master Printers' Association, and a member of the Council of the Federation of Master Printers and Allied Trades of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland?—(Mr. Straker.) Yes.

4415. And you, Mr. Unwin, I think, are a Vice-chairman of the London Master Printers' Association, and a member of the Council of the same Federation?—(Mr. Unwin.) Yes.

4416. You know generally the question that this Committee is inquiring into, do you not?—(Mr. Straker.) Yes.

4417. It is to see if any improvement or amendment can be introduced into what is known as the Fair Wages Clause in Government contracts?—Yes, I understand so.

4418. Does your firm of C. Straker and Sons, Ltd., do any contract work for the Government?—We do a little, but not very largely.

4419. Mr. Unwin, does your firm of Unwin Brothers, Ltd., do any Government work?—(Mr. Unwin.) Scarcely any; you may say practically nothing.

4420. Then you are hardly personally interested in this question?—(Mr. Straker.) The Fair Wages Clause in Government contracts is very often taken up in a very large number of municipal contracts, of which we do a great quantity.

4421. Are the clauses in municipal contracts on the same lines as the Fair Wages Clause?—I do not think they are on exactly the same lines; every municipality has its own form.

4422. Are the municipal clauses more stringent than the Government Clause, or less stringent?—Some more, some less; there is no unanimity at all.

4423. How do you find it works practically; does it suit your arrangements?—There are some of the municipalities whose work we refuse to tender for, but in the case of others we do tender.

4424. You do not object to the Government Clause as it stands, do you?—No, I think it is a fair one.

4425. One of the first difficulties with which we have been confronted is, as you know from Mr. Wills' letter, to define what is the rate current in each district. The difficulty arises in this way, that though, generally speaking, your Association and the Trade Unions have working agreements, those working agreements do not cover all the districts in the country, and there may be districts in which there is only one master, and he is paying a special rate of wages; what are you to call the current rate of wages in that district when there is only one master in the district; that is the difficulty?—I do not see why that difficulty should arise. I will give you an instance. Some years ago we established a factory in a district, and we then were the only printers in that district.

4426. (Mr. Bailey.) Where was this?—It was at Redhill. It is a good many years ago now. We made our own scale of wages, which was based on what was supposed to be reasonable. I suppose you would call it the current rate; at any rate, it was what you could get workmen for. That scale of wages was satisfactory to everybody for some years. After some four or five years, perhaps, we were informed that there was a higher rate of wages being paid by Guildford, which was the nearest centre where there were some few printing offices. We had a sort of meeting with the people of the Union or whoever they were, the executive, and we fixed a rate for ourselves at Redhill, which was not the Guildford rate, but it was agreed to as being fair. But it was our own rate, and we practically kept to it.

4427. (Chairman.) It was agreed to by the men, was it?—It was agreed to by the men.

4428. Had they a Union or were they non-Unionists?—It was the Guildford Union, I imagine, who did that. In a large number of country places they are not Union men.

4429. Of course, Guildford and Redhill would be very much in the same district?—Yes. Every district has a contiguous centre, or something like a contiguous centre, where the rates might be said to be reasonably the same, or at all events they could be compared.

4430. One of the suggestions that has been made to us is that in the case of an isolated works being set up the current rate should be assumed to be the rate in the nearest centre?—I do not agree with that contention. When a new district is formed by the setting up of a printing office there, presumably that printing office is a more modern one than are to be found in the nearest place; the conditions are better, and I suppose, generally speaking, living would be cheaper in an isolated country district. People do not put a new printing office in a town now; all the tendency is to go into the country.

4431. That is a tendency which is making considerable progress, is it not?—Very great progress.

4432. Is it the tendency to set up isolated works?—I think so, with the idea of getting a supply of labour.

4433. You find no difficulty in the Redhill case at any rate in agreeing on a rate?—Not the slightest.

4434. This was the statement which was made to us (Q. 191): "There are many districts where there are no printers, and therefore no current rate for printers. Many of the contracting firms in London, being in a large way of business and having plenty of capital, have put up branch establishments in districts that have either a low rate or no rate at all. A large firm in London may conceivably set up a branch establishment in a quiet country town where there are no printers; they may set up a large establishment there and employ a large number of operatives and determine what they shall pay those operatives, which, of course, becomes the rate of the district, there being no other printers in the district"?—That is so. It does become the current rate of the district naturally.

4435. But, of course, that is not the current rate in the ordinary sense in which the phrase is used, nor, I should think, in the sense in which it is used in the Fair Wages Clause. A current rate rather implies that there are other employers than the one employer in question, and that they have agreed upon the rate between them, or that, at any rate, they all pay what is substantially the same rate?—Supposing a man has already put his office in a country district and another one comes and puts an office there, the second man is naturally practically bound by the rate that is paid by the first man, and he frames his wages scale on that basis.

4436. Quite so; but the difficulty arises before the second man appears and when the first man has the field to himself?—How does he fix his rate?

4437. That is one of the things I want to know?—He fixes his rate simply, I suppose, on what he thinks is reasonable. He takes all the attendant circumstances into consideration. He knows that if you go to a place round Manchester you have practically to pay London rates, and that if you go to an entirely rural district you pay a rate which is framed for a rural district. The Typographical Association, which is the country Union controlling the whole of the country, has various rates in many centres. As I say, the Manchester rate is within a shilling or two of London, but if you get into a very rural district it is 5s., 6s., or 8s. perhaps below London.

4438. Does not this practice of setting up in isolated places in the country practically deprive the men of the advantages they ought to get by collective bargaining, and by this condition that work under a Government contract should be paid for at the current rate, which, as I say, implies something more, I think, than a rate fixed by one individual?—If the rate of wages is to depend upon the power of a Union to force an employer to pay it, it does; but if, as I consider, the rate of wages ought to depend upon supply and demand, it does not, because that is the final determining cause. If you put up a place in the country, and you fix a rate of 30s., and after six months you find you cannot get workmen, you naturally pay 32s. or 34s. That is the real cause.

4439. Of course, if you are to fall back upon what you call the rate fixed by supply and demand, you might just as well have no Fair Wages Clause in these contracts at all. The object of that Clause, I imagine, is to prevent the unrestricted operation of the law of supply and demand?—I did not think so, and I should not have thought that was the object of the Clause.

4440. Do you agree with Mr. Straker on those points?—(Mr. Unwin.) I think I would qualify it. We have had experience in two cases of country factories, and we took up the wage which we found near us. Take our first, Chilworth, which some of you gentlemen may know.

4441. That is in the same district Mr. Straker was speaking of, is it not?—Yes. We took up an old paper mill there. There were very few people living there, and there was no printing office nearer than Guildford. I think we were rather under the Guildford wages, because we found that cottages, and so on, would be cheaper there. That is a point I would rather impress on the Committee, namely, that circumstances govern these cases. Mr. Straker rather hinted, I think, at the difficulty we would be in with a hard and fast line, as we might then have to pay a certain wage in a certain district, which would be shillings more in the man's pocket than the same wage in the district where that particular wage came from. Therefore, while I see your difficulty, I hesitate to establish a hard and fast rule that the nearest district should be arbitrarily the determining factor in the wage. While the law of supply and demand is a law I do not approve of, I rather think that in the end it will cure itself, if a man chooses to do what is wrong in the sense in which we are talking.

4442. What should, in your opinion, be the determining factor in a case such as your Chilworth case, for instance? How should a rate be fixed in an isolated shop like that?—I think by judgment between the master and the men. If at Chilworth we had attempted to take simply the hard law of supply and demand, and had cut our wages, I think we should not have got our men at all.

4443. You do not think you would?—I do not think so; at any rate, not for any period. It works its own cure in my opinion.

4444. You suggest that the rate agreed upon between masters and men is the result of the law of supply and demand, and that it does, in fact, conform to it?—Coupled largely with public opinion, which is upon you. You cannot do wrong nowadays in respect of cutting down; that is my contention.

4445. What do you mean when you say you cannot do wrong?—I am an employer of non-Union labour, but the Union people would be quick to find out if I was doing something which offended them; they would be smart enough to find that out, and it would come out in course of time. So I say it cures itself.

4446. Do you think that would apply in an isolated district just as it would in London?—I think it would. Our second place is at Woking village, which is some distance away from the Woking which has been created by Woking Station. There was no printing office there at the time, and we bought an old paper mill there. We are working there pretty much on the same rates of wages as the Guildford rates.

4447. May I ask, if you do not mind telling me, how your wages in these places compare with your London wages?—They are generally about 20 per cent. less. I am speaking now of the skilled labour.

4448. That is, of compositors and machine minders?—Yes. There is not quite that difference with the machine minders; it is more with the compositors. I think the Guildford wage is 30s. or 32s., but I am not quite certain. Do you know, Mr. Straker? (Mr. Straker.) It used to be 32s., but I do not know what it is now.

4449. (Mr. Bailey.) Would the non-Unionist men get as much as the Unionists?—(Mr. Unwin.) Certainly, in our establishment.

4450. (Chairman.) Do you employ both indifferently?—We are quite willing to employ Unionists, but the Union are not willing that they should come into our office, except they come as spies for their own purposes, and of that we have had frequent instances.

4451. Then you have no Union men practically?—None in the composing room.

4452. Have you any for the press work?—Speaking now of London, in every department but the composing room we have Unionists. But we have found we cannot work our printing office in the composing room under Union rules; that is, the "London Scale."

4453. I notice the allegation is made in another form at Question 200: "A large London printer will set up a branch in a district which is not under the control of the extra-metropolitan Unions, with the result that he fixes his own rate." That is the complaint. Your answer is that practically he does not, but he fixes a rate which is agreed to by his workpeople, and they are contented with it?—I must say that would be the answer. (Mr. Straker.) I am sure that is the answer. (Mr. Unwin.) If he attempted to do otherwise it would be cured in a twelvemonth.

4454. Another point that was raised was that in the Fair Wages Clause, whether in Government contracts or any other, you should include other conditions besides wages—generally speaking, what are called Trade Union conditions—which would include hours of labour, I suppose, and various rules about apprentices, and so forth. What have you to say on that point?—(Mr. Straker.) The conditions are so very varied that I think it would be very difficult to include them.

4455. Where you have an agreement with the men, I suppose, the agreement does cover matters of that kind, does it not?—I suppose it would.

4456. Do any existing agreements that you can think of include other matters besides wages?—The agreements include a great number of matters, and many of the agreements or so-called agreements contain points that are very greatly in dispute, even although they are supposed to be in the agreement.

4457. But they are either agreed upon, or not, I suppose?—I do not think that is so; they are not exactly agreed upon, but they have been forced upon the trade, perhaps, and they are a constant source of dispute and irritation even now.

4458. I think that the demand in this case would not go beyond conditions that were generally agreed upon?—If they are generally agreed upon, I suppose we can hardly object.

4459. Do you see no reason for distinguishing, so far as the Fair Wages Clause is concerned, wages from other conditions of labour?—The Government Fair Wages Clause has always had a grand advantage and a grand piece of justice—that is, it distinctly provides that there shall be no difference between Union and non-Union labour. If you insert in your Clause "conditions agreed upon with the Trade Union," you are going to cut away at once the whole method of making a trade efficient, you are going practically to prevent piece-work in the large majority of places, and you are going to prevent your making any such arrangement as giving a bonus to increase their efficiency; and you are also in the case of new machinery coming forward (which is strongly discouraged by Trade Unions) going to put a great difficulty in the way of employing it. The Government in making no difference between non-Unionist and Unionist labour, in my opinion, is doing a most admirable thing, but if you put in "Trade Union conditions" you are going to spoil it at once.

4460. Not necessarily, would you?—I think you would.

4461. Even provided they are conditions which are generally accepted on both sides?—Yes. A non-Unionist house cannot accept a Union condition.

4462. Then a house which employed no Unionists could not conform to that requirement?—It could not conform to the Clause if you put in "Trade Union conditions."

4463. What do you say to that, Mr. Unwin?—(Mr. Unwin.) Most thoroughly I confirm that. I am, as I said before, employing non-Union men; but Mr. Straker could give you, I am quite sure, an hour's evidence on the point you have raised. I have got one instance here from my own place which bears on the point exactly. It is going back a long way, but still the same principle, as I think Mr. Straker will admit, applies to it. On one Saturday, at one o'clock, we had to set up a voting list. The establishment hands—that is, time hands—were put on it, but it was found necessary during the afternoon to have some extra hands. There were some piecemen there, and we in our place asked them to join the others, which they did. At that time I should tell you there was a Society, I will not say spy, but missionary in the place, and that compositor acknowledged that he set up 12s. 9d. worth of type, amply paying him. In a Society house he could not have done it; we should not have been able to draw the men in to our assistance, and we should have had to do the best we could. It is somewhat difficult to explain the conditions to you, I think, but that will give you a very good idea. We have in the composing room what is called the London Scale; it is full of intricacies, many of which are antiquated and obsolete, coming in between you and your customer at every turn. Ours happened to be a very miscellaneous business when we broke from it in 1872; but up to that time we were constantly irritated by conditions which did not mean putting money into the men's pockets. For instance, the head of the compositors would come to you when you were quietly doing your work, perhaps, and say: "You must not do that in that way!" "What is the matter?" "This must be done so-and-so." That is the thing. While technically he may be right according to the London Scale, yet this is so upsetting, that the London printers in Society offices to-day who have to bear with it, say to me that I ought to be very thankful that I am non-Society. I have no quarrel with the Society except on that point. That is why I strongly urge that the present wording of the Fair Wages Clause leaves the door open for a man, who will work fairly in the spirit of the Union, to employ non-Union men. If, therefore, the Committee still desire to continue the freedom to employ Union and non-Union men alike, you must not put in the words "Trade Union conditions." That is my judgment.

4464. Might not the same thing apply to wages?—No, I think not.

4465. The Fair Wages Clause at present binds you to pay the same wages to Unionists as to non-Unionists; that practically fixes the non-Unionist rate at the same as the Unionist rate, I suppose?—It is not a question of wage. I am speaking now of the thousand and one intricacies coming into the detail of how you should carry out your work in your office. Mr. Straker's, being a Society house, he can perhaps speak more strongly than I can upon it.

4466. Your firm's connection, you think, would be destroyed by having to conform to conditions of that kind?—I am certain it would.

4467. Do you find yourself much hampered by these conditions?—(Mr. Straker.) We have always been a Union house, but these conditions are extremely unfair and vexatious, unquestionably.

4468. And you do not thoroughly accept them, I gather?—No, we do not. We try to get out of them whenever we can. For that reason, I say where contracts have a very severe penalty clause on the top of a power to make you employ Trade Unionists only, we decline to tender; and I believe that several other houses do the same.

4469. Do you happen to have a copy of whatever document the agreement is recorded in?—The agreement with the Union do you mean?

4470. Yes?—The principal agreement is what they call the London Scale of Prices for compositors' work.

4471. That is confined to wages, I suppose?—No, it is not confined to wages by any means. It is a most voluminous book and consists of some 60 to 80 pages. Probably you can get it, but I have not got one with me. That has been supplemented by many other agreements from time to time.

4472. Is that what is called the London Bookwork Scale?—The London Bookwork and the London Newspaper Scale. (Mr. Unwin.) It is more for jobbing, is it not? (Mr. Straker.) I do not know about that. (Mr. Unwin.) In our business printing offices differ so much. Some offices may come here and say: "The Scale does not touch us at all; we employ none but time hands, and therefore the Scale does not interfere with us." I could not conduct my business to-day on Society lines. I speak under Mr. Straker's correction, but I think it very frequently happens that a Union house divides its compositors into what they call "ships"—companionships—putting a man over each dozen men. I think I am right that if companionship

A is at work on a certain piece of work, companionship B must not touch it. In my place we have companionships in that sense, that is to say, we put A in charge of a dozen men and B in charge of a dozen men. The difference is this: I have got a piece of work to do which is too much for companionship A, A goes to B and says, "Lend me two or three men," two or three men come into his place, they give him the two or three hours' work necessary, and then go back under B again. I can see no harm in that to the men; but in a Society office you simply cannot do it, and you must not do it, because you are liable to lose a piece of fat, as it is termed, or to give a piece of lean. I submit that that is not in the interests of business.

4473. But you find no difficulty as long as this requirement is confined to wages?—Not at all.

4474. You do not object to that?—No; I actually do it. (Mr. Straker.) I think you will find that uniformly all the employers are willing to pay the rate of wages. I do not know of any case where there is any question about the wages.

4475. But there would be a good deal of difference of opinion, I take it, the moment we got beyond that into other conditions?—There would. You would render it impossible for a large number of important offices to take Government work.

4476. The next point is whether the contracting firm should be compelled by an amendment of the Fair Wages Clause to apply that Clause practically to the whole of its business as well as to the business that is included in the contract; what do you say to that?—I think it largely depends on what the Clause comes out at the end. If the Clause is dealing with wages only I should not think anybody would object, because you can hardly differentiate on that point between one workman and another, at any rate, I cannot.

4477. A good many allegations have been made to the effect that it is not uncommon to differentiate, and that when it is known that the work is Government work, or work subject to one of these Clauses, there are different rates of pay from those which apply when it is other work that is being done. But you do not know of any such instances, I gather?—I have never heard of the practice in our trade, but I have heard of it in the clothing trade.

4478. And you would not be likely to hear of it, would you say?—I would not say it is impossible, but I very much doubt whether it is possible. (Mr. Unwin.) It would not be allowed. (Mr. Straker.) No, not in any Union house. (Mr. Unwin.) The Union committee would be down upon us directly.

4479. I was coming to that, Mr. Unwin; would that apply to a non-Union house?—No; excepting as regards the good opinion which one feels it is necessary to have among one's neighbours. Mr. Straker and myself are members of a federated Union, and if I were not to behave fairly in the spirit of the London Scale I should hear of it, distinctly.

4480. Even as regards your non-Unionists?—Certainly.

4481. Then I think we may take it that, so far as the printing trade is concerned, there is not very much in that statement?—(Mr. Straker.) I think so. I have never heard of such a thing.

4482. A good deal of objection has also been taken to the employment of women, which I gather is growing, the objection being that they are paid at a lower rate than men. I suppose they naturally are, because nobody would employ women if they were not paid at a lower rate; what do you think?—That is so; they are paid at a lower rate.

4483. Therefore, if it is required that the wages of the woman for the same work done in the same time should be the same as the man's wages, it would end in the exclusion of the woman altogether, I suppose?—Certainly, because the woman would be more expensive. You will not find a woman as cheap as a man if you are paying her the same wages. Women come and go more readily, and they want more accommodation. You get a staff of women together, and then they either get married or they leave you. With men it is nothing of the sort. I should very strongly object to a bar being placed on the employment of women; for their particular work they are better than men probably.

4484. Of course the reply would be "We place no bar on the employment of women, provided you pay them at the same rate as the men"; and your answer to that would be that at that rate you could not employ them at all, I suppose?—Do you mean to say that the women are not to be employed for what you may call women's work? You are not dealing with compositors, I take it?

4485. I imagine that is the only work they could do in a printing office?—Take the monotype machines, which are quite a new invention. A woman operator on a monotype is very much better than a man. In my opinion, although the London Society have so far been able to prevent women operating linotype machines in London, the day is not so far distant when that is going to break down.

4486. Would a woman work one of those machines better than a man?—Absolutely.

4487. And make more at it at piece-work?—Absolutely, I should think.

4488. Have you, Mr. Unwin, any experience of the employment of women?—(Mr. Unwin.) Yes, in a small way in our factory. The point Mr. Straker has touched upon is that a woman cannot do all that a man can do. I have no objection to pay a woman for the work that she does at the same rate as I pay a man for that.

4489. At the same rate?—Yes. The point is that a woman compositor has to be helped. She is a typesetter, and as a typesetter she is cleaner and better than a man; but she is only to be paid a portion of a man's wages, because there must be a man to take her type from her and finish it up.

4490. Because she only does a portion of his work?—Precisely.

4491. What is there besides the actual typesetting involved in composing?—We call it making it up into pages and locking it up in the chase, which involves manual heavy liftings, and things of that kind—pulling proofs, for instance, and what I should call the harder labour.

4492. I suppose a woman might do a good deal of that?—I do not think it is work that a woman ought to do. (Mr. Straker.) We employed some women at Redhill, but we would not let them do that sort of work at all. We did not find it a profitable thing, although they were not paid the same as the men, so it was discontinued. I do not know of a very large number of women being employed in actual typesetting.

4493. Are they mainly employed on these machines?—On these machines they are employed almost universally in the country.

4494. (Mr. Bailey.) Both the monotype and the linotype?—Not the linotype, I think.

4495. But they are capable of working the monotype?—They are. (Mr. Unwin.) You will get more evidence about that from the country. We have none in London.

4496. (Chairman.) Why should they not work the linotype?—(Mr. Straker.) I do not know. The linotype is more particularly appropriate to newspapers, and the Factory Act prevents you working beyond a certain length of time; but in the ordinary daytime there is no reason why a woman should not work the machine as well as a man.

4497. As a matter of fact the women do not?—In London an agreement has been come to with the Union expressly prohibiting it.

4498. What was the reason for that, do you happen to know?—For the agreement?

4499. For the prohibition against women doing linotype work?—There was no real reason. It has arisen from the fact that it was a sort of give-and-take arrangement when the machines first came into operation.

4500. It was a compromise with the men, I suppose?—The first agreement was that the operators on the machines in London were to be members of the London Society, and that naturally barred women right away.

4501. There is no reason in the nature of things why a woman should not work a linotype machine, is there?—Not the slightest. (Mr. Unwin.) There is one condition (and Mr. Straker will, I think, agree with me that it is so), that a linotype operator must be a linotype operator only. The machine may be standing still, and I may be able to give him a piece of composition, but "No," the Society says, "you must not"; and so I must pay that man to be idle. Is that not so? (Mr. Straker.) Yes; that is one of the great conditions causing a tremendous lot of irritation.

4502. I do not follow?—The Union agreement with the men provided as one of the conditions of it that a linotype operator was to be a compositor—that you were not to take a man off the street or employ a typist. In regard to the typist he would probably make a more clever linotype operator than a compositor would, in my opinion. When we first made an agreement, to which I was a party, with the men, it was understood that the man was to be a compositor; and it was tacitly understood, though not expressly understood, that he was to do composing work, or be able to do it. But now they have read into that agreement that no linotype operator is allowed to leave his machine when there is no work for the machine, and consequently he has to sit idle and you must call on somebody else.

4503. And he may not work at composing?—That is so; although, mind you, one of the conditions of the Scale expressly says he can. But in practice they absolutely refuse it, and we are at loggerheads over it. That condition is an agreed condition, and yet they refuse to do it. (Mr. Unwin.) One other thing about women. You must not forget the state of their health; the point comes in that they have to be absent at periods.

4504. Of course, you do not get as much work in a year out of a woman as you do out of a man—there is no doubt about that; but I should imagine that the ordinary rate of wages for a woman is a great deal below what her relative efficiency, as compared with a man's, might entitle her to ask for?—That may be, but I cannot say.

4505. You do not employ them, I suppose, or do you?—Yes, we do employ them. I do not think myself that we pay them less because they are women, except so far as they are inefficient.

4506. On piece-work rates, you would pay them the same?—As type setters?

4507. Yes?—No. There again the man who is on the piece is able to finish the work.

4508. Should they be paid at the same rate for what they do?—I am willing that they should.

4509. You do not think that practically a woman is paid at a much lower rate than a man, even having regard to the relative efficiency of the two, do you?—I am afraid I cannot answer it in that way, because I do not know other people's business. But so far as we are concerned, we are endeavouring to pay them what I should call a fair rate, comparing it with the work that they do.

4510. And taking as a standard the rate which a man gets?—Yes.

4511. Do you agree, Mr. Straker, to that?—(Mr. Straker.) I really do not know much about the employment of women as compositors. If the employment of women were prohibited by this condition, I suppose it would only apply to compositors. Of course, women are employed in the binding and folding operations to a considerable extent; I do not know whether the Clause would cover those. (Mr. Unwin.) There are a number of things which you must take into account before you can fix a woman's rate of wages as against a man's.

4512. Because you are never exactly comparing two like things?—That is so.

4513. There is always some little difference between the two?—Yes.

4514. Both in the amount of the work and in the character of the work that they do?—Yes.

4515. The next point I should like to ask you a question upon is whether there should be liberty to employ unskilled or partially skilled men on work which the skilled men claim for themselves. The statement made is that though the full rate of wages is paid to the highly skilled man, he is relieved of a good deal of the more irksome or less difficult part of his work, which is given to a man paid at a lower rate; that is objected to on the ground that the skilled man cannot become a skilled man unless he is master of the whole work, and unless he does it in practice. Have you anything to say on that point?—(Mr. Straker.) I cannot see any reason for such an objection myself. You naturally, whatever your work is, give a man work which he has specialised. Take binding work for example; there are perhaps four or five processes in making books, but we do not let one man do the whole of the book, as it would be a terrible waste. A man takes the leather and pares it, and then it is passed forward to another man who makes the case, and another man does the blocking, and another man puts the book in the case. One man probably could do the whole of it, but if he were to be allowed to do it, it would be a very inefficient way of doing things.

4516. It is really a question of the sub-division of labour?—Exactly.

4517. And of specialisation?—Yes.

4518. And that, I suppose, tends to increase rather than otherwise?—I should think so. In an efficient factory, I do not think one man would be allowed to do the whole of one particular sort of work.

4519. The tendency being that he should confine himself more and more to one part?—The larger the factory, the more it is so, no doubt. If you employ 100 men, naturally you put five to six on one part of the work and ten or eleven on another, and let it flow through, instead of letting the whole thing be done by one man.

4520. Do you think there is anything in the view that a man is a less skilled workman owing to his concentrating his attention on one particular process?—I should have thought he would be a more skilled workman in that particular process. No doubt men are more or less—more perhaps—being kept on one class of work—as you say, it is sub-divided; and that naturally makes a man more skilled in the particular work that he is doing.

4521. But you would not say that he was a less skilled workman on the whole, would you?—No, I should say he was more skilled, because he is specialised. Everything is specialised nowadays. A doctor specialises directly he gets into anything of a position, and every trade or profession does. Even printers themselves do. There are very few houses that do absolutely everything, and there are certain houses that have devoted their attention to one particular class of work, and have gone right ahead on that particular class of work.

4522. May it not also be rather an advantage to the workman that he should be encouraged to apply himself to the more skilled parts of the work if he can do them, than to the others; I mean might it not tend to raise the level of wages generally so far as that principle was carried out?—If a man found that the paring of the leather for a book is worth 30s. a week, and putting the leather cover on is worth 40s. a week, he would probably do his best to get the leather-covering part of the business.

4523. And the more you carry out that principle, the more he would probably be able to earn by his skill?—That is so.

4524. Because he would not be wasting his time on less highly paid work?—That is so.

4525. Do you agree?—(Mr. Unwin.) I concur in that. I think it should be noticed that some of this unskilled labour has been drawn into the Trade Unions. It occurred to me, as I read your Clause 5, that it seemed to be provoked by the thought that the less skilled labour was being employed to the detriment of the Union labour; but now practically we have got the labourers in a Union, so I do not think that jealousy amongst the highly skilled men should prevail.

4526. In your business, is the semi-skilled labour as well organised as the other?—It is so. We get it now right down to our machine labourers—machine boys they used to be called. We have no department that is not governed by the Unions. (Mr. Straker.) That is so. (Mr. Unwin.) There was a case only recently where the Society stirred up strife, and as a consequence, although it referred to the composing-room, nine Unions called their men out of that place. (Mr. Straker.) They took every man out of that firm. (Mr. Unwin.) And they started "peaceful picketing," which, had you gentlemen seen, perhaps you would not have passed your Clause about "peaceful picketing" quite so easily.

4527. No doubt, as you say, the view on that point was prompted by the idea that these less-skilled people are not so highly organised, and are not so able to insist upon keeping up the rate of wages as the others. You would have no objection, I presume, to notices being given out of the firms that obtained the contracts?—(Mr. Straker.) No, I should see no objection to that. It is a usual thing with some local authorities to publish the list of contractors.

4528. And there is no objection to that?—I should not think so; would you? (Mr. Unwin.) I do not see why it should be done any more than it is done now. It is unnecessary publicity.

4529. But you would not object to any amount of publicity, I suppose?—(Mr. Straker.) If I got a contract I should not object to the fact being published.

4530. I do not of course mean publishing the details of the contract, only the name of the firm—that such-and-such a firm has obtained a Government contract for such-and-such work?—(Mr. Unwin.) I should agree to that.

4531. It has also been suggested that schedules of the rates of wages paid and the hours of labour observed should be posted in the works where Government business is being done; would you object to that?—(Mr. Straker.) I do not know that I should particularly object to it, but I think it would cause some strife and trouble perhaps in a factory.

4532. I suppose it is pretty generally known among all the classes of men that are employed in one factory what the others are getting?—I do not know about that.

4533. The posting of these schedules would not give the men any more knowledge, I mean, than they now have, would it?—If you take one class of employees, for instance compositors, they all know what they are going to be paid, that is to say, they all know the Trade Union rate. I think every class like that knows its own minimum rate. But I do not know that one class knows the minimum rate of another class, and I do not think that machine-minders know what compositors get paid, and I think the warehouse people and the cutters may not know what the binders are being paid.

4534. Do you see any objection to this proposal?—(Mr. Unwin.) I think it is quite unnecessary. The contractor signs a contract with the Government to abide by the Fair Wages Clause, and if the Government have any suspicion that that is not being carried out, they have the right to inquire. This, it seems to me, would be giving us needless trouble. I do not know whether the idea is that it should be posted for the employees to see; but it would be posted in some place where other people could see it, thus exposing the details of our business, which is quite unnecessary.

4535. Probably the suggestion was due to some idea that without a published schedule of that kind the man himself would not know whether he was being paid what he ought to get; but I should think it is not very likely that there would be any failure to complain to the Government Department concerned for want of the knowledge that the man was not being paid at the rate which he was entitled to?—A complaint by a man, or men?

4536. By the men?—I should have thought that all needful complaints could have been made under the present system. What you mean by inspection is Government inspection, I take it, not Trade Union inspection?

4537. Probably if it was published in the way suggested it would be open to the inspection of anybody who could see it?—I am speaking now of pay-sheets and wages-books.

4538. That official inspection of pay-sheets and wages-books would only be by the Government Department, certainly, and I imagine that that is so already. You would not refuse permission to a Government Department to see your books, if there was any complaint that you were not paying the proper rate, would you?—I imagine a printer would be only too glad to justify himself.

4539. In fact it would be the best means you could adopt for justifying yourself, would it not?—Yes.

4540. (Mr. De la Bère.) With regard to that last point, perhaps you are aware that in some Government contracts already provision is made that the firm's and workers' wage-books, together with the details on which they are based, of all workers so far as relates to the tender, shall be open to the inspection of the authorised officials of the Department? That has been in existence in some contracts for many years, and I do not think there has been any complaint of anything wrong under it. So far as you are concerned, would you be prepared to accept that?—Certainly.

4541. And you, too, I suppose?—(Mr. Straker.) Yes. I think it is specified.

4542. (Mr. Bailey.) In regard to the firms which go out of London, they go out for one reason, I suppose—on account of cheaper wages, do they not?—Cheaper wages and better factories.

4543. That would mean cheaper rent?—Yes.

4544. Do you think the increased cost of transport would neutralise to a very considerable extent the advantage of going into the country?—It would neutralise it to the extent of the cost of the transport.

4545. But, on the whole, you think it is better?—On the whole I should say it is, for a certain class of work. You cannot do all work in the country; for instance, you cannot print newspapers in the country.

4546. Obviously. The larger newspaper offices, I believe, are worked under Trade Union rules and conditions, are they not?—Not all of them.

4547. Not the largest of them, "The Times," for instance?—"The Times" is not; "The Times" is a non-Union office.

4548. "The Daily Telegraph?"—That is a Union office. "The Sportsman" is a non-Union office. There are a good many non-Union offices.

4549. As to the Trade Union conditions about which Sir George Murray was asking you, the conditions I take it that you rather object to are comparatively minor matters, although they are, of course, important enough in themselves. To take as an instance the machine-minder, I believe he is not allowed to pull a press, is he?—No. Then he must not lay-on his machine while his boy goes outside for two minutes, but the machine has to stop. A machine layer-on must be a machine layer-on now, and nothing else; they have got their own Union.

4550. The general conditions which I understand the witnesses had in mind were such conditions as those which relate to wages; that is to say, that a man should not be employed more than the Trade Union number of hours for a weekly wage?—Yes.

4551. And that he should not be required to work more than a certain number of hours overtime every week?—That has not been agreed to.

4552. It has not been agreed to?—No, distinctly not.

4553. But so far as concerns those Trade Union conditions which relate to wages, directly or indirectly, do you think there would be any great objection to adopting those?—Not as to wages; they have been agreed to.

4554. I do not mean only as to wages, but anything which indirectly concerns wages; nor do I mean the internal economy of the printing offices; I mean anything that concerns the amount of wages that a man shall get?—Wages and hours of labour, are, I think, quite within that; but wages and hours of labour only.

4555. You made a remark just now—I think it was you, Mr. Straker—that machinery is strongly discouraged by the Trade Union?—Yes.

4556. We have had a witness here who told us that they by no means object to labour-saving machinery; but that is not your experience?—My opinion is to the contrary. Not only is it not my experience, but the way in which the London Society dealt with the linotype is a most illuminating example.

4557. Are there any women employed in London, so far as your experience goes?—As compositors?

4558. As compositors?—There are one or two offices where they are employed; but I do not know that they touch Government work.

4559. In regard to sectionising the work, that does not apply, as the Chairman said, very much to the printing trade, I think; and in the printing trade it is perfectly recognised by the Union, is it not, that certain work may be done by a woman?—It may be perfectly recognised, but it also is not perfectly recognised in many cases.

4560. Not, for instance, in regard to the folding and stitching?—In regard to the folding and stitching, I should say it is so.

4561. Those are the processes I had in mind?—And also where you come to case-making, the commoner sort of binding.

4562. As to sectionising, the objection applies rather to other trades than to yours; but it is to the effect that they could not countenance the heavier part, for instance, of a compositor's work which was left over by the women, being done by labourers. That is the sort of sectionising, I think, they had in view. As regards the publication of the names of the persons who obtained contracts, are you aware that at the Stationery Office we post the names of the contractors outside the Office?—No, I was not aware you did. I have seen my own name, and a good many other people's names, published in the trade papers, but I have never seen that notice outside the Stationery Office.

4563. That is not the sort of thing that you think would be objected to by the houses?—No, I should think not.

4564. As regards the posting of schedules of rates of wages, do you see any objection to the posting of the mimimum rates?—Do you mean posting the minimum rates in your own office?

4565. In the contractor's own office, that is to say, that the compositors are paid sums not less than so much?—Of course, it largely depends upon the form. I held a contract some time ago in which there was one of these clauses that I must post these rates. I naturally posted them. It caused me no end of vexation, because I could not explain to the various sorts of labourers who were about the place, some of them non-union and some of them union, that the work they were doing was not the work that was provided for by this schedule; and in consequence I had an awful lot of trouble. Personally I do not see very much objection to it, but I think it is interfering with the liberty of the master, I must say.

(Mr. Unwin.) You speak of conditions which indirectly affect wages. That is a point we have been trying to emphasise. Many of these conditions do indirectly concern wages.

4566. Are you referring still to the conditions mentioned just now as to the division between one class of skilled labour and another class—as to what shall be done, for instance, by the machine-minder and what shall be done by the compositor; or as to the rule that a machine is to stand idle whilst the boy is away?—That is one of a thousand points. My point is, if conditions could be defined as having to do with the current rate of wages, the number of apprentices, the number of hours, and such broad conditions—personally, I do not think we should object to that. But if you put in the words, "Trade Union conditions," immediately in the composing room it brings in the London scale for compositors, which is full of a thousand-and-one intricacies, which do interfere indirectly with wages. The conditions as to apprentices differ in London and the country, and the latter, in my judgment, are not such as should be made binding on the contractor.

4567. That is what I wanted to get at. I was rather wanting to find out in what way you would limit the words "Trade Union conditions"?—In my proof, I say, "But unless those conditions are defined, they might be held to cover many of the intricacies of the London scale, which interfere so much with the economical carrying out of work, that their enforcement would distinctly, in my judgment, compel the non-Union office to become Union." (Mr. Straker.) Or else to refuse Government work.

4568. (Mr. Black.) I think in one of your replies to the Chairman you said you objected to strengthening the Clause imposing Trade Union conditions, if it were accompanied by a penalty for the infraction of the Clause; would you accept that same Clause if there were no penalty?—I do not remember saying that; I certainly did not mean to say it.

4569. You seemed to lay great stress upon the fact that there might be in some of the Clauses a penalty attached to them?—No.

4570. I rather got the impression that you did not object to the Clause if there were no penalty?—No. I think you must have misunderstood me, or I cannot have made myself clear. If the Clause is there, I do not think I would disagree with any penalty, provided we could carry out the Clause.

4571. But you would observe the Clause just as much if it were with the penalty as if it were without it?—Absolutely. I think what I said was that I had a case the other day where conditions were insisted upon with a very heavy penalty. If you insist upon conditions, it may be a question of dispute as to whether you are observing conditions or not, and if that is accompanied by a heavy penalty, you naturally prefer to refuse the work.

4572. (Chairman.) I do not think we need ask you any more questions; if there is anything that you would like to add, we should be very glad to hear it?—I do not think there is anything else, except to emphasise the objections we have to the conditions—that is the great thing we feel—which are, generally speaking, being made more stringent by the Unions; and we are forced by circumstances to accept them or not.

(Mr. Unwin.) I should very distinctly object to a list of "Fair Houses" being drawn up and published, because of the fact that the Trade Union construction of the word "Fair" is most unjust. There is already a list of unfair houses published by the London Society of Compositors under that title in which my company figure, and quite recently there has been litigation with the Society by another firm, who I believe successfully secured a judgment as to the illegality of issuing such a list.

The witnesses withdrew.

Mr. William Fraser and Mr. Thomas Richards, called and examined.

4573. (Chairman) (to Mr. Fraser.) I think you are one of the managing directors of Messrs. Neill and Co., Ltd., of Edinburgh?—(Mr. Fraser.) Yes.

4574. And, Mr. Richards, you are secretary of Alexander Thom and Co., Ltd., of Dublin?—(Mr. Richards.) Yes.

4575. You have heard the evidence that has been given this afternoon; I do not know whether I need take you over the same ground again—perhaps you can put into your own words what occurs to you on the different points. Do you see anything in that difficulty about the current rate?—(Mr. Fraser.) It does not affect us in Edinburgh at all. There are not any printing offices outside the large cities that would take Government contracts, I think.

4576. Then practically you would have no difficulty in saying what the current rate is in Edinburgh, or in any district in the neighbourhood?—No, I do not think so. There is no difficulty with that in Scotland.

4577. Are all the printing houses in Edinburgh?—No. There are printing houses in Glasgow, Perth, Aberdeen and Edinburgh.

4578. I meant, are there none of the Edinburgh printing houses outside the town?—They are all inside the city boundary.

4579. Is the scale the same in all the towns?—No.

4580. Which is the highest?—Glasgow. They have a strong Trade Union at Glasgow. Then Edinburgh is next, and Perth and Aberdeen are about equal, I think, but I am not quite certain about it.

4581. You have developed the employment of women a good deal in Scotland, have you not?—Yes. We began at the time of the strike in 1872, I think it was. We had composing machines of our own, and we brought in girls to work these machines. They have gradually spread, till they are employed in setting type all over the town—and that not only by machines.

4582. Then practically the whole of the composing is now done by women?—The larger proportion of our compositors are females.

4583. Do you retain male compositors?—They do the advertisements and they look after the girls, and they do any more difficult work occasionally. These compositors are all on time; they are not line compositors, that is, they are not on piece. The girls are half and half—half on time and half on piece. We have about 100 girl compositors.

4584. What does the expert girl make on an average?—She begins at 3s. 6d. The highest has about 35s., but she is an overseer. The average is about 16s., 17s. or 18s.; we have several at £1 and several at 23s.

4585. What is the rate for male compositors?—32s.

4586. Then you might say that the women's rate is rather more than half the men's?—Yes, but then they only do the setting-up of the type, and either very experienced girls or experienced men make it into pages and impose it, or make it up into sheets. Our girls set Greek, Hebrew, Algebra, indeed, anything you like; they are all well-trained girls.

4587. How long does it take to train them?—Their apprenticeship is for three years, but they are not very expert immediately after the three years.

4588. Is there any work the whole of which is done both by men and by women?—Do you mean where they complete their work?

4589. Yes?—There are some departments done entirely by the girls.

4590. How does their work compare with the men's work?—They are paid fixed wages, but they do not do so much as the men in the week, so they cannot get as much money. Their rate per line is not the same as a man's; their corrections are heavier, and that kind of thing; they make more mistakes.

4591. So that you cannot really compare the two; you have got no data on which one can go?—That is so.

4592. Could you go so far as to say that for the same work done in the same time and in the same way they are practically paid the same money?—Pretty nearly, I would think.

4593. Then there is not very much in the allegation that they are undercutting the men?—No, I do not think there is. If we had not girls we would have machines, so we are not taking away men's work. We have no type-setting machines at all, or type-casting machines—nothing of that kind.

4594. It is all hand-set, then, is it?—Yes. Most of our customers will not take machine-set type. We set the better-class novels and scientific work; and our customers do not like the machine-set type.

4595. Do you use much boy labour?—No. We have just a few apprentices—about four apprentices, I think, or five, perhaps. We have two unskilled men who carry formes and that kind of thing, but that is the only unskilled labour we have.

4596. What have you to say on the subject of "Trade Union conditions" being imported into the Clause, as well as the rate of wages?—Our men are mostly Union, so they would only work the Union number of hours.

4597. Then you would not object to a condition of that kind?—No; it would not affect us very much.

4598. Because you practically work under it now?—Yes.

4599. Should you object to the other condition alluded to, namely, that a contractor should be called on to act up to these conditions and rates of wages on all his work as well as on Government contract work?—It would not affect us; but I would say that the Government have nothing to do with it. I know of a case where there was a Government publication done in one office, and when they were working on it the men were paid 7½d., and when they were working on other work they were paid 6½d. Naturally the men took as long as they could on the work that was paid at 7½d., and that handicapped the employer in another way.

4600. That house was not working under the scale, I suppose?—I am not quite certain how this agreement was come to, but it was arranged by the Stationery Office, I expect, that they were to have been paid full wages—it must have been full London wages.

4601. Was this not a London house?—No, it was done out of London.

4602. (Mr. Bailey.) Was it a recent contract?—Our case overseer was in this office, and he told me about it.

4603. Then you do not know when the contract was?—No; but it was about ten years ago, I should think.

4604. (Chairman.) Practically you would not be affected at all by an extension of that condition?—I do not think so.

4605. On the question of the employment of unskilled labour: has anything occurred to you?—We could not let the men decide which work was to be given to which man.

4606. But under your agreements I suppose they do?—No; we decide which work is to be given to which man.

4607. And you do not recognise any rule that a man should not do this or that or the other?—No; you could not possibly do it. The idea would be that each man when he came out of work should put his name on a slate as he comes out, and if you get a piece of music or something to set, you would have to give it to the top man on the slate. That would not do at all, because only a few men can set music, and only a few men can do a table, and only a few men can do anything out of the way. Any man can do this kind of work (pointing to proof), which is solid, straight-on work; but for anything out of the common they must be trained specially. Take an advertisement, for instance; they could not do it, as they have no taste. The men who set advertisements are paid more than the usual Trade Union rate, generally speaking.

4608. Under your arrangements, you would not admit those regulations we were referring to just now?—No, we would not.

4609. Such, for instance, that a man who worked a linotype machine could not be allowed to compose?—He ought to be allowed to do it.

4610. You would not recognise a regulation of that sort?—No.

4611. (Mr. Bailey.) Do you recognise it?—We have not got the machines, but if we had, we would expect the man to make himself generally useful.

4612. (Chairman.) There are some machines in Edinburgh, I suppose?—Yes, both monotypes and linotypes.

4613. But you have no practical experience of them?—No, not at present. If the girls are forced out of the employment, we will require to put in machines.

4614. How do you proceed to fix the rates for the girls and the women?—It is a case of demand and supply.

4615. Nothing else?—We have a fixed rate for an apprentice. She begins at 3s. 6d., and she rises to 7s. after three years; after that, she is paid so much per 1,000 letters lifted. Then after that, if she wishes to go on time, we take her average wages and give her that sum, which is gradually increased by a shilling or so every year or second year.

4616. Are these girls at all organised?—No. Most of them get married when they get about 20.

4617. You do not keep them very long, then?—No, that is the trouble. There are some who stay a long time—there is one who has been with us for 35 years—but then those are old maids, of course. There are a good few of them, unfortunately.

4618. Do they lose their skill as they get older?—No. They generally rise to a superior post and become overseers or sub-overseers. Our place is divided into eight sections, and one of these girls is at the head of each of these sections. They are also advanced to be readers, that is, correctors of the proofs.

4619. You would not object, I presume, to a notice of your having received a contract being given?—We think that it is quite sufficient as it is, when it is posted up at the Stationery Office. We do not quite understand what the men wish. Do they wish it advertised in "The Times"?

4620. No; they wish to obtain the information for themselves; that is all?—They have plenty of Society men always going about, and they can easily go down to the Stationery Office to look at the notice. I do not see that there would be much harm in doing it.

4621. Then as to the publication of the rates of wages and the hours of labour?—The hours of labour are already posted up under the Factory Acts; from 8 to 8 is the limit; that is posted up. The rates of wages we would object to posting, because if one girl who was getting 7s. got a rise to 9s., the other girls at 7s. would naturally want a rise too.

4622. That provision can naturally only apply to cases where there was an agreement about the rates of wages, and where there was an organised Union; it would not apply in your case, because the wages are purely discretionary, I suppose?—If a girl is not pleased, she just goes to some of the other printers in the town. There are between 800 and 900 girls who are compositors in Edinburgh.

4623. (Mr. Bailey.) And how many men, do you know?—Over a thousand. There are also girls employed in Perth and Aberdeen.

4624. (Chairman.) Mr. Richards, have you any remarks you would like to make on any of those points?—(Mr. Richards.) As far as the present Fair Wages Resolution is concerned, we find it acts admirably. It is fully comprehensive, and any objections that the men make at any time have, of course, to be met, and they are soon arranged. We find that the Masters' Society and the Trade Union get on very well together, and are quite capable of settling any questions that may arise. At the time when we had no Masters' Society, when it was allowed to die out, the Trade Unions rather took advantage of us, and several things crept into their conditions and rules which we had to acquiesce in, although they were very much to our disadvantage.

4625. Have you had many difficulties under this Fair Wages Clause?—No.

4626. None at all?—There was at first some little difficulty about apprentices. Apprentices are an unfixed quantity generally, but now we have arranged the number with the Society there is no further trouble.

4627. You are entirely a Society house, are you?—We are. We find we cannot work half and half.

4628. And therefore you have a regular agreement with them on all points, I suppose?—On all points, yes.

4629. And you practically find no difficulty in working?—We find no difficulty whatever. I have stated in my proof that we have started a country printing office, if that may be interesting to you.

4630. I should be very glad to hear what you have got to say about it?—We are peculiarly situated in Dublin with regard to Societies. Dublin is controlled by the Dublin Typographical Society, which is a Society solely for Dublin, and the rest of Ireland by the Typographical Association. When we started a small country printing office, we arranged with the Typographical Association what the current wages were to be, and they were fixed at 31s. This printing office, I may say, is some few miles out of Dublin.

4631. What would the Dublin rate be?—35s.

4632. Then it was 4s. under the Dublin rate?—Yes. The nearest town to Maynooth, where our country printing office is, is Naas, and there the wages are set down in the Typographical Association Official Record at 24s. for 56 hours. At Maynooth the hours are 52.

4633. So they are below the rate at Maynooth?—Yes.

4634. And that rate again is below the rate at Dublin?—4s.

4635. That is a very considerable variation in places so close together?—It is. We were starting there afresh, and I suppose the Typographical Association thought they might as well make the best terms they could. We were in their hands. We could not have started an establishment there at all without coming to terms with them and fixing a rate.

4636. But you had no difficulty in coming to terms with them, had you?—No. I may say we get a little advantage with regard to piece-work. We use this country establishment chiefly for book-work—novels, and work of that class. We are under a great disadvantage in Dublin with regard to the piece-rate, because the compositors, according to their rules, will not make up the matter—they simply set it up at so much per 1,000, and then it is handed over to the establishment hands to make up into pages. The general rule with regard to plain matter is that it is worked by companionships; they take the work, the line hands set it, some of their number see that it is made up into pages, and they charge for it as completed work. In Dublin, the plain matter rates are, in consequence of the Typographical Society's rules, so unfavourable that we cannot compete with outside towns. We always find ourselves at a disadvantage.

4637. And you had no difficulty in fixing the rate when you did establish your new office?—No, we found no difficulty whatever.

4638. Do you think that the difference in the conditions justifies a difference of 4s. a week?—Yes, certainly. They would save that on rent alone.

4639. Is rent so very high in Dublin?—Yes, it is. The men have to live in tenement houses to a great extent, the rent of small houses being beyond their means.

4640. Have you any difficulty about the employment of women?—No, we do not employ women compositors at all. In the binding establishment and in the warehouse, of course, we employ them.

4641. Have you any differences of opinion about the class of labour that you should employ for any particular work?—No. Printers, you know, are not all highly skilled. There are two classes of printers, one called newspaper hands, who are trained on newspapers and set nothing but solid matter; and properly trained compositors who have been taught to do jobbing, tabular work, and everything. Newspaper hands for the most part are unable to do tabular work, and, therefore, they have a difficulty in getting employed on the establishment—the 'stab. They have to content themselves with piece-work. Piece-work is a great advantage in this way, in that it allows these newspaper hands, as well as the old men and the unskilled or slow, to obtain employment. If you insist upon the piece-work earnings being up to the 'stab earnings, we shall have to cease to employ piece-men, and they will have to join the ranks of the unemployed, or seek superannuation from their societies.

4642. In your binding business, I suppose you find more difficulties on those points?—There are some things on the margin line which are a little difficult of adjustment, because although there is one

Consolidated Society which controls the best part of England and Ireland, yet they allow in practice a certain amount of latitude to their individual branches, and the branches vary very much in practice. In some towns a girl would be allowed to do certain work, and in another town she would not.

4643. I suppose the tendency is to specialise or to sectionise more and more highly?—We find that some men are more skilled in one branch of the work than others, and, of course, we do our best to give them plenty of what they are skilled in.

4644. You do not have any disputes with the Union about it, do you?—No. There have been slight disputes as to what is girls' labour and what is men's labour—some points on the border-line.

4645. Do you see any reason why women's labour should not be defined as any work that they can do properly?—No; I should be very glad to see it defined that way.

4646. Is that how you would define it?—I would like to see it defined that way, but it would not suit the Trade Union; the Trade Union claim certain work as men's labour.

4647. Do you recognise that claim?—We have to arrange the matter. We would rather not recognise it sometimes, but we have to.

4648. Is the tendency to extend women's labour and unskilled labour, which is less highly paid than the standard Union rates require?—No, it is more the other way. Work that used to be done by women and unskilled labour has now to be done by members of the Trade Union. There is some simple work in binding that we think girls can do just as well as men, and ought to be allowed to do, but we are not allowed to employ them on it. For instance, if you wanted to put a piece of cloth on the back of a book in wrapper binding the men must do it, but if you put paper on it the girls may do it.

4649. Do you recognise all those rules?—We have to. We think they are unfair sometimes. We think the women should be allowed to do some of these simple operations, but, of course, you can understand that Union men want to monopolise as much as possible everything for their own members.

4650. Do you use much what I may call semi-skilled labour among the men, or are they all paid about the same rate?—No, the compositors are all paid at the same rate. Women compositors are not allowed, and the apprentices are limited to six, no matter how many men are employed, while in places in England one apprentice is allowed for every three men. All the establishment hands are paid the current rate of wages, and the line hands according to the conditions of the Society.

4651. And you have nothing below those rates?—No.

4652. Have you no persons that you might class as labourers?—We have labourers who carry the formes about, but that has nothing to say to the question of doing the work.

4653. In fact, may we say that the printing business is not much sectionised?—It is sectionised. For instance, in setting-up a piece of bookwork, when you come to a table, the man who sets the plain matter would like to do the table, but he is not sufficiently skilled to do it. Questions have been raised with regard to what we call line work, but when they come to a piece of table they cannot do it, and it has to be given to an establishment hand. A table is paid more for in proportion than plain matter.

4654. You would not like to see the Trade Union conditions, even though you agreed upon them, embodied in the Fair Wages Clause, as far as contracts are concerned, would you?—I would not. You see if the conditions are inserted in the Resolution, it will be the object of the Unions to make the conditions as favourable as they can to themselves; and in our local Society they might have a meeting and decide that the conditions were to be altered favourably to themselves, and then inform us masters that the conditions for the future would be so and so. You will see the position we would be placed in as Government contractors.

4655. You would have some weapons that you might use in self-defence?—Yes, but still I think it would place us rather at a disadvantage, and certainly if there were no Masters' Association in Dublin, we should have to submit.

4656. And yet at present you have got those conditions practically operative?—Yes. We are both working amicably together.

4657. Then why should you object to the conditions being enforced under a clause in the contract?—Because we might be taken advantage of by additions or changes. If the Masters' Association were to die or to become less active, as it has done in the past, the Trade Union, which is always on the qui vive and always on the look-out to see how they can improve their position, might make some new rules which we should have to swallow, and thus be placed at a great disadvantage.

4658. But you would not be any worse off, would you, because those conditions were enforced by a clause in the contract; they might make all those alterations now?—We should not be worse off with the existing conditions, but "Trade Union conditions" have a tendency to become more stringent, and if inserted in the Fair Wages Clause would give the Unions a leverage in establishing new rules or conditions, that may have been adopted in a few small houses under pressure, which we must compulsorily submit to or give up our contract.

4659. But you are in the same position now, are you not—you must compulsorily submit to them or give up the work?—No, because we do not accept any conditions we have not agreed to. We can fight the Unions on even terms. In the past when there was no Masters' Society the conditions were gradually made more and more onerous.

4660. But now you are able to resist them?—Yes, and we think that the present Fair Wages Resolution is perfectly fair for both sides.

4661. You think it covers conditions as well as wages?—It must cover conditions as well as wages.

4662. It does not do so in express words, does it?—No, but in practice we find it covers everything.

4663. Do you find that complaints are made on other points than wages?—No.

4664. You have had very few complaints, in fact?—Very few.

4665. (Mr. Bailey.) You talk about the unfavourable position in Dublin with regard to the way in which the work has to be done; does that in any way account, do you think, for the high price we have to pay for our work in Dublin?—I did not know that you did have to pay a very high price for your work in Dublin, but the piece scale certainly is very much higher in Dublin than in other towns.

4666. Do the Trade Union insist upon piece-work being paid in such a manner that a man may earn rather more than he can on 'stab wages?—No, I admit they cannot earn so much on piece as the establishment wages. The piece-work hands in Dublin are really the inferior hands; they are hands who cannot get employed on the establishment. They get paid the full piece-work rates in accordance with the rules of the Society, but being less skilled or slow, they do not make the full establishment wages.

4667. I see you say that you have considered it an unwarrantable interference that the wages sheets and books should be subjected to official inspection; do you think that would apply to those portions of your books and sheets that relate to the Government only; would you object to those portions being inspected?—We think that if any question arises, and you ask us about it, our word should be sufficient. We would rather not have our wages sheets looked at, because there are many things on them that do not concern the Government contract.

4668. I am not considering now the question of Messrs. Thom and Co.; one is quite willing to accept your word in an ordinary way?—Thank you.

4669. But take the case of a firm which has not the reputation of yours, do you think such a firm could reasonably object, if they were challenged as to the wages they were paying their men, to the inspection of their books so far as those books related to the Government work done?—No; if you had reason to doubt or suspect their honesty.

4670. (Mr. Black.) In the last paragraph of your Proof, Mr. Fraser, you say that you protest against Trade Union officials having power to scrutinise wages books, but you presume that the suggestion is that wages books should be open to Government inspection; and you add, "However, personally, I have no objection, provided safeguards are inserted to prevent scrutiny, except upon a specific complaint with due notice given." Might I ask you the exact significance of those words "with due notice given"?—(Mr. Fraser.) We mean if there was some particular case that they want to look up about, or something of that kind.

4671. You say that as well; that is covered by the words "upon a specific complaint"?—There is not much significance in that.

4672. I mean, at any time if the inspector paid you a surprise visit, he could see your wages book on a specific complaint?—Yes; but he should not have a general right to come and look at our wages book, whenever he happened to wish, unless there was some cause. We think there should be no such right.

4673. He should only be able to do so on a specific complaint?—Yes.

4674. What are the real grounds for your anxiety, apparently, to get rid of the men? You say that if you had not women you would have machines?—The men are so greedy. For instance, a page with an illustration in it—a solid page with a picture—the men charge as solid type; and if the page is a little bit bigger than an ordinary page, they will charge extra for putting that page in, besides charging it as setting up so many thousand letters. Of course, we could not agree to that kind of thing. Then if there is a half-page of table, we have got to pay a whole page for it, which is double the price of a half-page of the ordinary type.

4675. I think you said in reply to the Chairman's questions that you did not regard the women as very much more economical than the men?—They are more economical, but they are not so satisfactory, because they are always going off for sickness of some kind, or their mother is ill, or something of that kind. That is the greatest trouble—their mother is ill constantly.

4676. Making all those allowances, you still find them more economical than men?—Yes.

4677. (Mr. Hillier.) Mr. Richards, do I understand that your objection to the inclusion of Trade Union conditions in the Fair Wages Clause is that that would be an incentive to the Trade Union to make further conditions?—(Mr. Richards.) Yes, I say that that might happen, and we would be placed in an unfavourable position, having taken a contract on the conditions prevailing at the time, if they were altered to our disadvantage. You see, we would have no choice but to accept them or give up the contract.

4678. (Chairman.) Is there anything you would like to add on the general question?—(Mr. Fraser.) I do not think so; there is nothing else that I know of.

4679. Have you anything further to say, Mr. Richards?—(Mr. Richards.) With regard to the third point that you have brought before us in your letter, that is, with regard to the Fair Wages Clause applying to all work that might be carried on in an establishment, that does not affect us at all, I may say, but in some companies or firms there may be a number of trades carried on; for instance, in addition to printing and binding, you might have box-making, or work of that kind. I do not think that the Fair Wages Resolution should interfere with any arrangements the firm might make with their box-makers, and the same with the other trades that they carry on. You see it might suit you to have Society hands for the Government contracts, but if you are carrying on other trades, which you had to cut very closely, you might have to make special arrangements, and I do not think you should be interfered with with regard to them. I am not speaking on behalf of our own firm, but looking at the thing generally.

4680. As I daresay you understand, that suggestion grows out of a proposal that the Government should practically keep a list of what the Trade Unions would call fair houses, by which they mean houses which deal on these terms for all their work, and that they should not give a Government contract to any house that was not on that list. Have you anything to say on that question?—No. My objection would not apply then. But I can see that the box or bag trade might be carried on by some printers, and if that is quite apart from the other trades for which the Government contracts are held, there certainly would be no objection.

4681. Do you think it would be reasonable to draw up such a list?—If you take the Clause as it is suggested in the letter, I think it is too comprehensive. It is to apply "not only to work forming the subject of the contract, but to all work carried out by the contractor," that is, if he carried on other trades there, it would govern those as well as those he is contracting for.

4682. But you think it would not be an unreasonable thing that the Government should ascertain the character of the houses that they put on their list of contractors in that respect?—I think they are quite right to do that, and I think it is a very admirable thing to do.

4683. You would not object to the classification of houses into fair and others?—No, certainly not.

4684. (To Mr. Fraser.) What do you say to that?—(Mr. Fraser.) We would object, because we would not be classed as fair, seeing that we employ females. You would require to open a printing office of your own in Scotland if you put that Clause in, because there is not a Government contracting house in Scotland that is fair, except a single house. There is not an Edinburgh firm that is fair in that sense.

4685. (Mr. Bailey.) The printing trade in Scotland, in fact, is in altogether a different position to what it is in England?—Yes.

4686. (Chairman.) Do you mean that the Unions are less strong in Scotland?—The Compositors' Union in Edinburgh is not very strong, and we do not consider it much. We make agreements with them, but they are not strong.

4687. You have taken the strength out of it?—With the girls, yes. In Glasgow they are very strong, and you dare not have a girl reader or anything of that kind, whereas we have five girl readers—that is to say, correctors

The witnesses withdrew.

FIFTEENTH DAY.

Thursday, 12th March, 1908.

At 32, Great George Street, Westminster, S.W.

PRESENT:

SIR GEORGE H. MURRAY, K.C.B. (Chairman).

Mr. R. BAILEY, M.V.O.
Mr. F. W. BLACK.
Mr. H. DE LA BÈRE, C.B.
Mr. A. WILSON FOX, C.B.
Mr. J. H. HILLIER.
Mr. A. F. KING.
Mr. J. J. WILLS (Secretary).

Mr. GEORGE MACFARLANE, called and examined.

4688. (Chairman.) You are a Past President of the National Federation of Building Trade Employers of Great Britain and Ireland, and you are in business in Manchester, I think?—Yes.

4689. You have read the letter that we addressed to the Employers' Parliamentary Council, have you not?—Yes.

4690. I will ask you to make any observations that occur to you on the different clauses in it. First, do you object to the insertion, in lieu of the expression "wages current in the district," of anything like "Trade Union conditions," even if they are agreed upon between the employers and the workmen?—No, I do not object to the conditions that are agreed upon between employers and workmen, provided it is clearly specified where those conditions obtain. For instance, as an illustration, if what was going to be done was in Manchester, it would be an easy matter to state in the specification and schedule that the wages, hours of labour, and other conditions that were agreed upon between the employers and employees in Manchester would be the wages and conditions that would have to obtain under your contract.

4691. What we want to get is some general expression which would cover the circumstances of all contracts. You can easily see the inconvenience that would arise if every separate contract had to have a different schedule of prices and conditions inserted in it?—As an actual fact, all contracts are subject to their own conditions. There is no contract for building but what varies in its conditions as to materials and as to many other things.

4692. But under your proposal it would vary for each of the tenderers for that particular contract, because the wages and the conditions of labour vary all over the country, as you are aware?—Yes.

4693. Therefore you could not put out a tender form which would be applicable to all builders in all districts in the country, and at the same time attach a schedule of wages to it?—You could not have one phrase that would comprehend all that, but you could obtain, as is obtained now by the Board of Trade, the wages and hours of labour that are current in the part that the building is going to be erected in. Of course, there are a very large number of places throughout the country where there is no organised agreement between employers and employees.

4694. Are there?—Yes.

4695. I thought in your trade agreement was pretty general?—It is mostly in the large towns, but there are plenty of villages—villages not with what you might call a large population, but with a fair population—where there is a recognised wage but no signed working rules. It is the signed working rules that are important.

4696. Do you attach more importance to those than to the wages?—The wages are always included in the working rules as one of them. There is the time, there is the overtime, and there are the various conditions that we enter into with our men.

4697. You do not see any difficulty, then, in putting out a tender for a building and inserting all those conditions, or a reference to them?—If you are going to build in any town where there are agreed conditions at work between the employers and employees, it is easy to make a reference to that town as the town under whose rates your job is to be carried on. If there is no such thing as an agreement in the smaller places, the country places, then you would have to obtain the current rate yourself and specify it. In that way you would not harass the employers there by having their men taken away because somebody was going to pay a bigger figure, and it would be fair to the district.

4698. Do you think you could find in every district a current rate without any difficulty, even if there was no agreement?—Yes.

4699. How would you arrive at it? I am assuming a case in which there is no union, or not a strong union?—You would have to find out who are the builders there, and you would have to get to know from three or four of them what the wages were; if they coincided, then you have the wages.

4700. But suppose they did not?—Then you would make up your mind what to do between them; and that is the difficulty. What is the use of saying that it shall be according to the Trade Union? That is all a one-sided thing, you know; and you may as well say according to the employers, and never mind the Trade Union.

4701. By "Trade Union conditions" was meant as agreed upon between employer and employed?—If that is in your mind that exactly expresses my views.

4702. And you would see no objection to that?—No, I do not think in fairness there would be any objection to that.

4703. That answers your purposes as being sufficiently definite?—Yes.

4704. Then as regards the demand that those who contract for the Government should pay the current rate, not only for Government work, but for all work that they do, what do you say to that?—It is one of those things that may be ideally very nice from a certain point of view, but it is thoroughly impracticable. It would bring about a great amount of inquisition and friction and disturbance, and one would never know where it would lead. It means that not only must the employer submit himself to these conditions, but even in regard to any place in the world where he received goods from he would be liable to be brought to book for everything they were doing. That is a big order.

4705. That is a difficulty which applies to the present Clause in Government contracts?—Does it? Of course it applies to Corporation contracts as well, only they say that it is the district of the area in which the works are being carried on. If it is restricted in that way, that is not a very large affair, because it means where the job is going on.

4706. Should you think that in practice there is much variation between the wages paid on Government work and the wages paid on other work?—Not at all.

4707. Then you would not see very much difficulty in asking a contractor to give an undertaking before he gets a contract that it is his practice to pay what we describe as the current rate for all his work?—No, that should be asked; but to make it a condition of the contract, and to bind him to it, would be a large order, as I say. It could not be carried out; it is impracticable.

4708. I thought you agreed that you might ask him, and if he said "Yes"——?—In a general way you may expect that he will do it. But the work may be in some part of the country. I may employ a man on a job out of Manchester altogether, and at lower wages. Then the Trade Union may come in and say, "You ought to pay this man Manchester wages"—as sometimes they do. I say to them: "You have no right to ask that; I pay the wages of the district, and that is good enough for you." I know that on several occasions where I have looked it up, the rules themselves say you have to pay so-and-so; there the bother comes in, and as soon as you open the question you have disturbances and friction.

4709. If you took a job in another district than your own, would you pay the wages of the district where the job was?—Yes.

4710. Without regard to the Manchester wages?—Yes.

4711. That is the rule, is it?—It is understood with some Trade Unions, but not with all. Some make a disturbance about it; and it is there often that friction comes in. It is a matter of opinion; there is no rule.

4712. Under the Government contract rule I imagine you would be required to pay the wages of the district in which the work was being done?—Yes, but not more.

4713. Not if they were higher?—Not if they were higher. You have to pay the wages of the district, and if I send a man from Manchester I pay the Manchester wages to the man I send, and where the wages are higher in the district to which the man is sent I have to pay the higher rate, not the Manchester rate.

4714. You have to pay the higher rate?—That is what they demand. It is not always done, then friction comes in. We say: "We send those men, we pay their railway fares, we pay them for the time of going backwards and forwards, we pay them for their lodgings, and that comes to more than what you are asking us to do." Of course, in these matters it is not so much the various points themselves, but those that they lead up to which are of importance, and the friction that they bring.

4715. A point has been raised on which we should like to know your opinion, that is, whether the standard rate, if there is one, in any particular trade, ought to be paid to all the workmen engaged on the job, however little skilled they are, or however highly skilled they are. It has been objected that contractors pay perhaps a portion of their men the standard rate, and that they underpay the rest on the ground that the rest are not doing the standard class of work. What do you think of that?—That does not often obtain. It will obtain where there is no strong Union, and where the arrangements are loose between employers and employed. As a rule, Trade Unions insist on having the same wages paid to the good and bad alike; they say it is the minimum wage.

4716. It was not so much a question of good and bad that I had in my mind as of a distinctly separate class of labour; for instance, you would all have labourers as well as skilled workmen, would you not?—Yes.

4717. There may be grades between the wholly unskilled labourer and the skilled workman, and you might have a half-skilled man who might do the rougher part of the skilled work, perhaps?—Yes, that would be possible.

4718. Is he to be paid the same rate as the skilled man?—As the man that can do the better work? No. For instance, in concreting there are grades; there are the men who do the topping and so on; they get higher wages than the men who wheel the barrows and mix the concrete.

4719. Is there a Union in that business?—Yes, in some towns.

4720. Do they recognise these distinctions?—Yes.

4721. Then, in that case, it would be a distinction recognised by the men?—It would be a distinction recognised by the men and by the masters.

4722. But there may be cases in which a dispute might arise on the point, may there not, whether a man is a fully skilled man or not?—Disputes arise upon everything that you can dream of. You are never sure where a dispute will come from.

4723. Are disputes on that point a common cause of difference, do you think?—They may be occasionally a cause, but you could not call it a common cause.

4724. Take the case of the cabinetmakers and joiners?—We have a great deal of friction there.

4725. How do you deal with it, as a rule?—We are unable to deal with it.

4726. Which is the higher-paid of those two trades?—The joiners, as a rule, are the higher.

4727. Suppose that a complaint is made that you are using a cabinetmaker for joiners' work, how would that be disposed of?—We have trouble in Manchester about that at the present time. The delimitation—the demarcation rather—of the work is really a question for the architect. We have, which is a very annoying thing to builders, often enough to do the carcass, then the floors, and then the other heavy work in the building. We have brought in afterwards a cabinetmaker to do the dado boarding and some of the lighter class of work that the joiners consider as theirs. There is friction at the present time on this demarcation of work which the cabinetmakers want to do and the joiners want to do. As a rule, the cabinetmakers' work is considered lighter and not so substantial and not so well made as the joiners, and they are not so strong a trade as the joiners, and consequently it is cheaper. The whole thing turns on the price. You can get the cabinetmakers to do the work cheaper than the joiners do it.

4728. Would you consider it an evasion of the Fair Wages Clause if that was done to a large extent, and cabinetmakers were employed on what joiners might be employed on?—I should. Cabinetmaking is, strictly speaking, furniture making, and what you are talking of, the joiners speak of as "pilfering their preserves."

4729. But there is no short and simple way of settling it, is there? You have to go into each question on its merits, have you not?—There is no short and simple way of settling it. This trouble has been on in Manchester for a number of years, and we have not been able to settle it yet.

4730. You have very little piecework in your trade, I think?—Very little. We have none in the building trade in Manchester, you may say, except carving and such work.

4731. (Mr. Hillier.) It has been considered an evasion of the Fair Wages Clause when contractors send men into the country away from home, and although they pay them the wages of the district from which they have been sent, and pay lodging and other extra expenses, still the rate per hour has been less than the rate in the town that they have been sent to. That is an evasion, is it not?—Let me be sure that I follow you. I will repeat what I think you have said:—An employer sends men from his own town, and he pays the wages of the district, which I presume would be lower, he pays the railway fare and he pays lodgings, and the whole amounts to less than the wages that he would be paying at home.

4732. No. When I put the whole of it together, it is less than the current rate of the town in which the work is being performed?—For instance, plus the railway fare?

4733. Yes, I am taking it plus the railway fare?—And plus lodgings and plus time lost in travelling. Such things may happen, but it is very remote. I never knew it.

4734. It has happened. At Norwich the rate of wages is, say, 8d. per hour; a firm at Norwich send men from their workshops into London to work, where the rate is 10½d. Is that not an evasion of the Fair Wages Clause?—It is not what the Trade Unions consider as the Fair Wages Clause; but I do not know that you could say that he is not paying the wages of the district.

4735. I am taking the wages of London, where the work is performed; that is the district?—Yet those men are getting more than they would have got at home.

4736. That may be, but they are getting less than the London rate?—That is a very debateable thing. I should not like to say that a Fair Wage Clause should include within its scope points like that, where there is such a remarkable difference in the wages of London. Workmen are sent to Manchester, and they are quite satisfied with the Manchester wages. The agreement is with Manchester, and they get all these extras, and there is always a lot of overtime, and the like of that, which comes in and makes men quite satisfied with what they are getting.

4737. Those men would in that case be getting a lower rate than the rate current in the district; would that not be an evasion?—I should not like to say it was an actual evasion.

4738. Then with regard to the half-skilled men you were telling the chairman about, like the men dealing with the concrete, they are general labourers and they rank as labourers, do they not?—Yes, pure and simple.

4739. They are a grade of labourers according to the work that they perform?—Yes.

4740. The complaint is that you get in, as it were, the half-skilled man to take the place of the skilled man—I mean the mechanic or tradesman. I will put a concrete case to you: for instance, a joiner may be using a machine, say, for tenoning; then you get a man who is not a joiner, but something better than a labourer, to do that work which is properly the labour of the joiner?—That would not be me.

4741. (Chairman.) You would not allow that as legitimate, would you?—I should never think of doing it. The man would be sure to injure himself, to cut his fingers, or some brutal thing might take place.

4742. (Mr. Hillier.) Still, if these half-skilled men did do it, would you consider that an evasion?—I consider that the work of tenoning can only be done satisfactorily by skilled men, and that it is simply absurd to talk about sending unskilled men to do it.

4743. In the building trade there is no such use of the half-skilled, is there?—I do not know of any. There are some machines, such as engineers use, which are self-acting and which a man can watch and look after pretty much the same whether he is skilled or not; but in regard to the machines that are used by joiners in the joiner's shop the men must be skilled—in fact, we usually pay our machinists ½d. an hour or sometimes more beyond what we pay to the other workmen.

4744. With regard to the distinction between joiners' work and cabinetmakers' work, the points that I think difficulties have arisen on are in regard to such things as presses, cupboards and bookcases—those are the cases which I think are debateable ground. Of course a joiner can make a press and he can make a bookcase?—Yes.

4745. But he is not so skilled as a cabinetmaker, and he would take a much longer time to make those things?—Yes.

4746. Just the same as it would take the cabinetmaker a very much longer time to make a door?—They do make it though, and they go a very slim way about making it sometimes.

4747. But still, that is the distinction, is it not, that internal decorative work and light portable work are considered cabinetmakers' work?—Anything appertaining to the nature of furniture is cabinetmakers' work. Joiners claim school furniture as being their work, but house furniture is cabinetmakers' work.

4748. Why should the distinction between school furniture and house furniture be made?—I am afraid you will have to ask me an easier question; I cannot tell you.

4749. (Mr. Wilson Fox.) Do they raise any question about office furniture; do they make any distinction there?—I have not heard a distinction made about office furniture. They consider they have a right to make tables.

4750. Who do?—The joiners. This question of the demarcation of labour between cabinetmakers and joiners is purely a workman's question and it does not come from the employers. The employers are brought in, but there is no initiative on their part; it is the act of the men themselves.

4751. (Mr. Hillier.) There is no piecework allowed by the Union in building, is there?—No, we have no piecework.

4752. You told the Chairman, I think, that the rate of wages and the conditions of labour might be stated in the tender; but would that not be almost impossible? When you invite tenders the tenders may come from many different districts, so that you could not embody the rate of wages in the tender; but, of course, the tenderers do know the rate of wages in the district that they are working in?—I will put it this way: You will never get a tender without issuing specifications and quantities; you have a schedule of quantities for the special job. That has to be prepared by somebody, and those who apply for that schedule send for it and pay so much, as a rule—a guinea, or two guineas, or whatever it is. All the conditions, so far as they are reasonable should be contained in that specification and schedule before a man tenders at all, and then every one would be put on the same footing.

4753. But you must remember that labour is a fluctuating item, and the others are fixed conditions?—What is it that is fixed?

4754. The quantity of the material can be fixed?—The quantity can.

4755. And the quality of the material too—the description can be fixed?—Yes.

4756. But with regard to the labour, you could not fix that, unless you fixed it at a rate that was as high as the highest paid in the different towns which the tenders have been invited from?—You could fix the minimum rate.

4757. But then if that minimum rate is below the rates that are paid in the districts it would be unfair?—I should say that could never be done. But you could ascertain before you fixed your schedule what the prices current were.

4758. There may be two different rates—one paid by the contractor in the district in which his workshop is placed, and the other the rate paid in the district where the building operations are carried on?—How would you fix up a Fair Wages Clause for that?

4759. You do not object to a Trade Union rate as agreed between employers and employees, do you?—No.

4760. That would govern it?—No, it would not govern it, because you are going to a place where there is no fixed rate.

4761. But where there is a rate it would govern it?—Yes.

4762. Where there is no fixed rate, the rate would be the rate current in that particular district?—Yes.

4763. The builder knows what the current rate is?—He may and he may not.

4764. It would be part and parcel of his duty to find that out, would it not?—I consider that where there is going to be a Fair Wages Clause inserted, where a man is to be bound under penalties to carry out those conditions, there should be a real endeavour to put that down, so that there shall be no two readings of it.

4765. Could you suggest how that could be done?—I suggest it in my proof.

4766. That is impracticable, I think?—I do not think it is impracticable.

4767. (Chairman.) Take this case: say there is a building going to be erected in London and you are going to tender for it, and several other people are invited to tender for it; some of that work may be done in the London district and some of it you would probably do in Manchester, while other contractors would do it elsewhere?—Yes.

4768. How are you going to insert in that contract a schedule which will cover the wages to be paid for all that work, which is to be done in different districts in the country?—Considering the extraordinarily wide field that is covered by the different work that is carried on in building, I think it is scarcely possible to get any definition that will cover it at all. For instance, in Birmingham there are the locks to be made, and you must even go to Norway for your timber. Is the timber sawn under proper conditions? Then you must go to some place where they are doing the floor-boards probably. Are these things being done under proper conditions? You would have to follow it up I don't know where, if you are going to get everything into its scope. You have got to define something that can be understood by everybody that is tendering.

4769. (Mr. Wilson Fox.) They will not let you use ready-made joinery from abroad now, will they?—They are doing it now in the Manchester Infirmary.

4770. I thought they always struck when you used ready-made doors and window-frames?—They are sending us specially-made doors from America.

4771. Are they made there under fair conditions?—There is a difficulty in following up these things. You would want to follow up all those things. What a staff that would mean! It is an impossible thing.

4772. I thought they did strike against doors and window-frames made in Norway and in Canada?—So far as I know, there is no reputable builder who ever does that in contract work. He could not do it in contract work, because the contract would not allow him; but in regard to speculative work, such as the cottages which they are building, these things are used daily. There is nobody can interfere there, and they can get men to work for them and to hang them.

4773. (Mr. Hillier.) What do you think is the proportion of workmen in Trade Unions in the building trades?—I do not think there are 25 per cent. of them Trade Unionists.

4774. Not 25 per cent.?—I do not think so. Most of them are in the large towns, and they work for builders. Then, in addition to that, there are hundreds of other people who employ joiners—mill-owners and all types of folks that employ their own men. These men do not belong to a Trade Union at all; they have to work different hours, and their conditions are altogether different. Then a number of men are also employed in the country villages and so forth. I have not the statistics at my finger's ends, though I had them at one time, but I do not think there is much more than the 25 per cent. That is my view.

4775. (Mr. Black.) How do you define your Manchester district? Is it a radius of a certain number of miles?—We have a proper definition, and we have a radius that is clearly and definitely defined.

4776. What radius is it?—On the one side it is Levenshulme, and away up to Gorton——

4777. Then it is not a complete circle?—No. It is defined as between the men and the masters.

4778. You do not get any little town on the borderland that may lap into it?—No, we avoid that.

4779. You do not get this kind of thing (pointing to diagram)—a complete circle that might go into a town that pays a different rate?—No; we do not do that sort of thing. We are extending our borders now. Since there is a probability of Levenshulme and Gorton coming into Manchester, the men, at the last meeting we had with them, suggested that the area should be widened, and we practically agreed to it, and there is a map being prepared for that purpose.

4780. You follow a kind of municipal boundary line?— We follow a natural boundary as near as we can—roads, and the like of that.

4781. You do not take a mathematical circle?—No, we do not. We do that in the matter of walking time. We take a radius from, say, the Town Hall or the Exchange, whichever it is—I forget which it is now—and according to that a certain time is allowed them after the starting hour before they start on work. But that is an altogether different thing from the wages.

4782. You do not get troublesome debatable districts, really?—No.

4783. It is either one district or the other?—Yes, we have no debatable ground like that.

4784. (Mr. Hillier.) When there is an agreement between the employers and the men at Manchester, if you are taking in any other town or enlarging your boundary, do you consult the builders in the district that you propose to enclose?—Yes. There is an understanding before the rules are signed or anything of that sort that all shall have a voice in it.

4785. (Mr. Black.) Supposing that some of them would not come in, and they preferred to keep to the Levenshulme rates, say, then you would get into a difficulty?—They must fight their own battle then.

4786. (Mr. King.) Assuming it is impossible to put the rates in the invitations for tenders, would you think the best plan would be to insert a provision that the Trade Union rates when agreed upon must be paid, and if there is no agreement the current rates must be paid?—Yes. I would urge for clearness and definiteness that the wages should be named. There is no difficulty in getting that.

4787. If there is only one firm in a district, how would you fix the current rate, or how would you expect us to fix the current rate?—One house will define the building line in a street; if there is only one builder, you have got to take him.

4788. Even if we know that he is underpaying his employees, we are to take his rate as the current rate?—Of course, if you know something that you think is wrong, I should not say that that would be an advisable thing to do.

4789. But how are we to get the current rate?—You must be going into some wilderness of a place if there is only one. He must be having a splendid time of it, and he must be getting all the cream of it himself.

4790. In paragraph 8 of your proof you say there would be no objection to the publication of the names of the contractors; will there be any objection to the price being published?—You mean the amount of the contract?—No; publish both, decidedly.

4791. Do you not think that might be objected to by some firms?—Not as a rule. It is generally picked up in the building papers, and you do not know about it. It can be published in the "London Gazette."

4792. In your last paragraph you say, "Contractors naturally resent anyone prying into their books for prying's sake, but should a bonâ fide charge be made," and so on; who is to decide whether it is a bonâ fide charge? The man who makes the charge thinks it is bonâ fide or he would not make it probably?—As a rule, these charges are not made by the men, but the men have appealed to their Union, and the Union takes the case up. If it is considered a bonâ fide charge——

4793. Who is to consider it? Who is to settle that?—I should say the parties to the contract.

4794. That would be the Government, would it?—The Government inspector.

4795. The Government Department?—Yes.

4796. If the representative of the Department says, "I find no reason to think there is any bad faith on the part of the men," would that be sufficient for you?—Whoever the Government appoints to inquire into the subject, if he considers it is a bonâ fide case for investigation, that man's judgment should be taken.

4797. (Mr. Wilson Fox.) In your industry the rates are usually agreed upon by the Employers' Association and the Unions, are they not?—Yes.

4798. Therefore, in your particular industry, what the workmen call the Trade Union rates are usually paid, I mean they are agreed rates?—They ought to be.

4799. Let me put it in another way: In most parts of the country in the building trade there are agreements between employers and employed as to what rates should be paid?—Yes.

4800. If those are honourably observed by both parties to these agreements, the Trade Union rate is usually paid?—Yes.

4801. Therefore, as regards your industry, it would not very much matter in practice whether the Fair Wages Clause referred to Trade Union rates or to current rates?—Not in practice, where there was an agreement between the men and the masters.

4802. There are, no doubt, districts where there are no agreements, but I am taking your industry as a whole; it is an industry which generally has agreed rates?—Yes.

4803. Do I understand that if an employer in some country district in Lancashire gets a contract to build a house in Manchester and he brings his men in there from his district, in your opinion he would be entitled to pay them, plus the lodging, the same rate as he pays them in his country district?—Of course, that is debatable ground, and the workmen resent it.

4804. Is that done in practice?—It is done sometimes. We had a case near Manchester at a place called Altrincham which is under Manchester rules. A gentleman came from Cambridge to do some work and paid the men that he sent the Cambridge wages, and they worked Cambridge time; but the men of the district that he employed on the job he paid Manchester wages and they worked Manchester time.

4805. That is exactly the point I was going to put to you. Under such circumstances as that there were two sets of men working on different wages, although they were doing the same work?—Yes. It is a very foolish practice, and I myself do not approve of it.

4806. What would be the position of an inspector from the Government who came down, finding that going on and applying himself to answer the question whether the current rate of wages was being paid on that particular job?—You could not say in such a case as that that the current rate of the district was being paid to all the men in the district.

4807. (Mr. De la Bère.) Your recommendation practically comes to a fixing of the rates of wages by the Government, does it not?—No, it is only fixing the rate upon the work you are going to do yourselves.

4808. But it is fixing the rate of wages on the Government contracts?—Where there is no rate recognised between masters and men.

4809. You go rather further than that in your proof, do you not? You say the Government ought to ascertain the current rate of wages and to specify the rates which they require to be paid?—What you would have to do would be to specify the town. The reason I have brought that up was because you mentioned something about the nearest town. You say it has been suggested that the rate of the nearest town where there is a Trade Union rate should be enforced; but that is a very vague description.

4810. In this recommendation of yours, I gather you advise that the Government should actually fix the rate of wages on a Government contract?—It can be put that way, but, as you say, if he was doing it in Manchester, the Manchester rate of wages would obtain on the job, and if he was doing it somewhere else, those wages would obtain. These are illustrations of what I mean.

4811. Would that have any effect on work other than Government work so far as the employer was concerned? Would that be likely either to raise or lower the wages he was paying on other than Government work?—No.

4812. It would not affect them?—They would have to be governed by their own conditions.

4813. Supposing that while the Government contract was in course of completion a rise in wages took place, what would happen?—The man would have to pay them, or he would not get workmen.

4814. You would not consider that the Government, having specified certain rates in the contract, the employer had a claim to come down on the Government for any rise in wages, would you?—That would be a point for the Government to consider.

4815. At any rate, supposing there was a fall in wages, would you consider that the employer was bound to give the Government the benefit of it?—Decidedly. It would be just the same as penalties. If you impose a penalty you must give a bonus. The thing ought to balance both ways.

4816. After all, Trade Unions are only human; whose interest would it be to withstand an excessive demand for a rise in wages? The employer would have no interest in withstanding such a demand, would he?—If there was a strike on his job?

4817. If there was a demand, we will say, for an increase of wages by 50 per cent. on a Government contract after the contract had been entered into, whose interest would it be to withstand that?—It would be both your interests to withstand that.

4818. It would be the interest of the Government, but it would not very much matter to the employer, would it?—No, not if you were to pay them.

4819. He would get the 50 per cent. out of the Government under your suggestion?—Yes, under my scheme.

4820. The only person then who would have any direct interest in withstanding such a demand would be the Government?—Yes, that is quite true, if the conditions are such as you say.

The witness withdrew.

Mr. William Francis Wallis, called and examined.

4821. (Chairman.) You are the managing director of Messrs. G. E. Wallis and Sons, Limited, Maidstone, and you are appearing here on behalf of the Master Builders' Federation?—Yes.

4822. I think you have read the letter that we addressed to the Employers' Parliamentary Council?—Yes. That was the letter, I presume, that was sent to me.

4823. You have had considerable experience of Government contracts yourself, have you not?—Yes, we have been Government contractors for over thirty years.

4824. And I understand you have never had any difficulty arising over the Fair Wages Clause?—No, we have never had any at all.

4825. I suppose that is really due to the fact that the building trade is very well organised on both sides, is it not?—Yes. In our part of the country it has been organised since about 1876; in fact, the whole of the time we have been Government contractors we have had organisation and agreements with the men. We have always adhered to the agreements, and there has been no friction.

4826. You have had no difficulty in those circumstances in saying at any time what the current rate of the district is, have you?—No. It does happen that at the present time we are working in a district where there is no current rate of wages. In our contract on Salisbury Plain there is no current rate of wages at all; but there is a certain difficulty in getting men, and we find we have to pay from ½d. to 1d. more than what they would get in the nearest town.

4827. What would the nearest town be?—Salisbury or Andover.

4828. How does that rate compare with the rate that you pay in your own district?—It is practically the same. The rate in the western counties at such places as Salisbury Plain and Andover is a little lower than it is at Maidstone, but we are paying on our contract at the Salisbury Camps ½d. per hour more than they get in the towns.

4829. And you did that because you could not get labour any cheaper?—It was necessary to entice them to come away from the town into the country.

4830. Do you think that would generally be the case in a district where there was not a current rate already; would you have to pay more as a rule in such a case?—Yes. We always have to do so when we go into country places. Three years ago we were building Blackdown Barracks, and there we had to pay ½d. per hour more than the rate at Aldershot, which is the nearest large town. The men were required, as the contract had to be carried out within a certain time; business was fairly good, and the men were not slack.

4831. There is no suggestion, then, at any rate in the building trade, that it is possible for an employer to evade the Fair Wages Clause by undercutting the rate owing to there having been no current rate fixed?—I could not go quite so far as that. For instance, if we had had an extra year to do our contract in we should probably refuse to pay anything more than the rate of the nearest town; and if we had found there was an overplus of workmen, we might even have found it worth while to pay less; that is to say, we might have got our men in sufficient numbers at less than the rate. It all depends upon the supply and the demand.

4832. Had you ascertained all these facts before you took the contract?—Yes. We always have to form an opinion. Sometimes our opinion is not correct; but we have to judge as to what the rate of wages will be. That is one of the first inquiries that one makes when going into an outlying district—what is the rate of wages in the nearest town. Our experience is that if it is a large contract you invariably have to pay rather more than the rate of the nearest town in order to get men to come, that is if business is brisk. If business is slack, of course workmen will come any distance.

4833. In a case like that, what arrangement do you make about lodging money and so forth?—We make it a rule never to pay lodging money on large contracts, or to pay lodging money at all, except to one or two perhaps of our staff—the foreman and the time-keeper. Those are the men you usually send there; they are on your establishment so to speak, and you pay them what extra cost they incur in moving to the job. But you never pay anything in that shape to the ordinary men who are set on. There is your rate of wages, say 8½d. per hour, and the men have to find their lodgings and their travelling and everything else.

4834. I gather that you would not object to substitute "the Trade Union rate as agreed upon" for "the current rate"?—I should have no objection at all. I think it is essential that the rate should be one agreed upon, because we do not recognise the rules a Trade Union may impose upon its men in any way, except so far as they are agreed upon between our Association and the workmen's Union. They have many rules which I have no doubt they enforce upon their own members which we know nothing at all about. All we are concerned with is just the rules which are agreed upon, and are printed and circulated amongst all our members on either side generally.

4835. What proportion of the men that you employ belong to some Union or other?—It varies very much. Of the workmen we are employing at Salisbury Plain, I do not think there would be one man in ten a Trade Unionist; of the workmen we employ in Maidstone, there are perhaps three out of five—rather more than half; and of the workmen we are employing at Shorncliffe I suppose there would not be more than three or four out of ten—35 per cent. perhaps. It varies in different parts of the country. As a rule, the nearer you are to London, the stronger and more powerful the Trade Unions are, and the larger the proportionate number of men who belong to them.

4836. That would be rather an objection to forcing Trade Union conditions, at any rate as apart from wages?—Yes.

4837. The proportion of Trade Unionists is comparatively small with you, I gather?—Yes, especially in those outlying districts where we do Government contracts. I have no doubt that within the next five or six years the conditions will alter very much down in the Salisbury Plain district, because houses are constantly being built in the district, which means that the workmen will become settled inhabitants, and when they become settled inhabitants they meet together and form these branches of Unions. So that the tendency is always towards Trade Unionism.

4838. I understand you would have great objection to enforcing the condition that the contractor should not only pay the current rate on his Government work, but on any other work that he may have to do?—Yes. I think it puts more upon the contractor than he can fairly be called upon to undertake. We could not guarantee, for instance, that the parts we could get from Glasgow, say, were made by men who were being paid the fair Union rate.

4839. I was not thinking so much of sub-contracting then as of people in your own direct employment?—I do not quite follow then.

4840. I am supposing it was made a condition that the whole of the men in your employment had to be paid the current rate not only on the particular Government work that the contract was concerned with, but on all the work that you did for other people?—Surely that is not feasible, is it? If I were doing work for the Government here and for Mr. Brown there, what right has anyone to say, What wages are you paying on Mr. Brown's work; and then go and report me to the War Office because on the work I was doing for Mr. Brown I was not paying some men quite so much? I am only putting that as a hypothetical case, because, as a matter of fact, we always pay it—every man gets the full rate of wages wherever he works for us.

4841. It has been suggested to us that there is a certain amount of evasion of the Fair Wages Clause going on in that way, and that an employer says to his workmen: "You shall have the full rate for this job, which is under a Government contract, but you must be content with a lower rate for the rest of the work." You do not think there is much in that?—As far as I am concerned, there is absolutely nothing. I do not think it is at all possible to impose a clause of that kind. There might be totally different circumstances. I can quite imagine we might take work for somebody else, and it might be work which could be very well done by unskilled workmen, or by the less skilled workmen in a particular trade; and just for that particular job we might perhaps depart from the established rule, but it would be rather extraordinary to be called upon and reported because we happened to be doing a contract for the War Office.

4842. Perhaps the suggestion would take this form—that the Government ought not to give a contract to any firm which is not in the habit, or which will not undertake to say that it is in the habit, of paying the full rate to all the people that it employs?—I should have no objection to that, because it is exactly what we have always done ourselves. It only means levelling up to our level.

4843. And you do not think any good employer would object to it?—I do not think so; but, on the other hand, I do not think that the Government could, if they made that condition, by any possible means enforce it.

4844. You mentioned just now the employment of half-skilled or unskilled men to do work which, I suppose, skilled men might claim as their own; do you regard that as a legitimate practice? I mean as complying with the Fair Wages Clause?—I do not quite follow what you mean. Of course, there are cases when a man who is not a skilled plumber, for instance, might be set to do a little bit of plumbing work; but I do not quite see what that would be an infringement of. No one would put him to plumbing work of a first-class quality. He might be quite able to do the work he was set to do, although not a qualified plumber in other directions. Much of the work which would be undertaken by a plumber is of a very easy description, and some of it is what a lad could do. For instance, tacking lead to a door. Any boy who could finger a tack and handle a hammer could do that. It is just possible that one or two jobs might be done under certain circumstances, if there is not a plumber available and one does not want to send a plumber out; a little thing like that, I should think, would hardly be called a contravention of any rules.

4845. Assuming that the current rate in the particular district for plumbers was, say, 10d. per hour, and for the kind of work that you are describing you could get a man to work for 8d., the workmen would probably complain; they would say, "The current rate for plumbers is 10d.; this man is a plumber, and therefore he ought to be paid 10d."?—I daresay they would, but then it would not be for plumber's work—it would only be for a portion of the work which is usually done by plumbers. In our district we do not get complaints of that sort, and we very seldom do it; but I believe up in the North and so on a man, instead of driving a tack through a piece of lead and have done with it, will wait about an hour for a plumber to come and do it, which is rather exasperating very often to an employer.

4846. But you can see, can you not, that there is a possibility of evading the clause by devices of that kind?—I do not think the evasion would be more than petty—that is to say, not worth legislating against.

4847. But might you not have a large amount of work done in that way?—No, you could not.

4848. Might not the rougher part of the work be done by a half-skilled man?—I do not think so, and I cannot see that it would, as a rule, in any job, or that it would be to the employer's own benefit to do it that way.

4849. Except that he might get a man at 75 per cent. of the wages that he paid to the skilled man?—But you cannot get it with the class of work that I was suggesting that any ordinary man might do which really belonged to a plumber. The amount of tacking required on this piece of lead is perhaps only the 100th part of the amount of labour required. I was thinking more of some petty infringement which workmen, if you are on bad terms with them, are sometimes only too glad to take up and make the most of.

4850. Is there no large class of work which you think would come under the possibility of being done in that way?—I do not myself believe in using what some people would call handy men—men who do a little bit of plumbing, and a little bit of carpentering, and a little bit of glazing, and so on. I do not believe in that class of men at all. I think jacks-of-all-trades are always masters of none. I do not think in my experience that there is enough of that to make it worth while making regulations upon.

4851. It has been a great deal pressed upon us, I do not know so much in the building trade as in others, that the clause is being evaded in that way, and the defence of the employer always is, "This man is not a fully qualified workman for the whole of this job; I employ him on a limited portion of it, which does not require much skill, and I consequently pay him at a lower rate." That is the case that has been put to us?—There seems to be no reason really why he should not, if he was confined to that particular portion of the work which did not require great skill. But that is one of the things which do not seem to come within my experience, except, as I say, in a very limited way indeed.

4852. On the whole, your evidence is that the Fair Wages Clause works very well?—That is so. We have had no friction, we have made no complaint ourselves, and we have had no complaint made against us.

4853. You are quite satisfied with it?—Yes.

4854. And you do not see how it can be improved?—No, I do not.

4855. You do not object to it in principle, I suppose?—No, I do not object to it in principle. I think it is a very good way to level up rather than level down, myself. I never object to other people being compelled to carry out principles I carry out myself—that is to say, to act fairly and squarely.

4856. It puts all employers on the same level?—Yes, that is what it does.

4857. (Mr. Wilson Fox.) You know what the current rate is in most districts, I suppose?—I cannot say that I know, but we always do know.

4858. I do not mean that you know now, but you can easily ascertain what the current rate is in most districts?—Yes, we always ascertain that; we generally get it through our secretary.

4859. Your secretary would know, and it would be only in quite exceptional cases that you do not know, and those, I take it, would be cases where there is no current rate?—Of course, in the country jobs they are away from the towns, and there is no current rate. I could not go down to build a prison or a barracks ten miles from the nearest town, and reckon on what might be the country rate of a village—5d., or 6d., or 7d. You could not possibly reckon on being able to carry on a contract and get your labour on those terms.

4860. But those are really exceptional cases?—Yes.

4861. In those particular cases there is neither a current rate nor a Trade Union rate?—There is neither a current rate nor an agreed rate.

4862. There is neither in those cases?—No.

4863. You say you pay the current rate on Government work, and you also pay the current rate on your ordinary work?—Yes.

4864. Therefore, a firm, if there are such firms, and it is alleged that there are in some parts, who pay their men less on ordinary work than on Government work are really paying less than the good employers in the district?—There are firms in all towns who will not join the Masters' Association, for the reason that they hold themselves free, for instance, if there should be a slackness of work to make their own bargains with their workmen and to pay anything that they can get the men for.

4865. As a general rule, would it not be difficult for a builder, without his men striking or making a considerable fuss, to pay men working on the same establishment different rates for the same sort of work? Here are some bricklayers, say, being paid so much an hour, and they are told they are given that much because it is Government work, and at the same time, on another job, bricklayers working the same hours every day are being paid ½d. less for similar work. Would many employers be able to do that without creating very considerable friction?—They would not be able to do it undoubtedly, because they would be bound to pay one rate as a rule in the same locality if the Government contract and one of their other contracts were in the same town.

4866. I am assuming they are both in the same town?—They would not be able to have two rates of wages under those conditions.

4867. (Mr. Black.) When you spoke of taking advantage of slackness of work to get men at low wages you were not talking of a district where there was an agreed rate, I take it, but you were talking of Salisbury Plain or something like that?—I was talking of a place where there was no agreed rate.

4868. You could not attempt it where there was an agreed rate?—No; that would mean a strike or something of that sort.

4869. But if you had been paying a higher rate before the slackness occurred you would be setting up a rate that it would be difficult to depart from, would you not?—As a matter of fact, I think if we had chosen, during this past year, we could have got our men at a lower rate, but it would have meant setting on other men and getting rid of a lot of men who were used to the district and used to the work, because they would have jibbed at the reduction, and we concluded it was not worth while.

4870. You would have been accused of lowering the rate?—Yes, although there was no agreed rate.

4871. You yourselves had created one, as it were, by starting there; you had established a rate?—Yes.

4872. For these outlying jobs do you do much work at your central place at Maidstone? Do you prepare much material there, or is it all done on the spot?—The bulk of it is prepared at Maidstone.

4873. And sent out there?—Yes. But that applies really to one class of work only—that is, joinery work. The masons' work, as a rule, is prepared at the quarries, and the iron work would come from Birmingham, and so on. It depends on the size of the contract. If there is enough joiners' work to make it worth while we set up a little shop. For instance, at Salisbury Plain we have put up a little joiners' shop, and fitted it with machinery.

4874. I suppose there is no disposition to put those workshops outside a certain district for the sake of getting lower wages?—No, and there would be no advantage at all in it, because you would have to cart all your stuff to and fro, and then there would be the supervision, so that you would lose more than you would gain by a smaller rate of wages.

4875. There is not a movement of that kind going on in the building trade, is there?—No, not that I am aware of.

4876. It is not like some of the big printing houses which go down into the country?—No. We are on quite a different footing to anything of that sort.

The witness withdrew.

SIXTEENTH DAY,

Thursday, March 19th, 1908.

At 32, Great George Street, Westminster, S.W.

PRESENT:

Sir GEORGE H. MURRAY, K.C.B. (Chairman).

Mr. R. Bailey, M.V.O.
Mr. F. W. Black.
Mr. H. De la Bère, C.B.
Mr. A. Wilson Fox, C.B.
Mr. J. H. Hillier.
Mr. A. F. King.

Mr. J. J. Wills (Secretary).

Mr. John Cuthbert Bailey and Mr. Francis Ralph Benham, called and examined.

4877. Chairman (to Mr. Bailey): You are the chairman of the Staffordshire Potteries Manufacturers' Association, and you are connected with the Royal Doulton Potteries, Burslem, I understand?—(Mr. Bailey.) Yes.

4878. And you, Mr. Benham, are a member of the firm of George Jones & Sons, Limited, of Stoke-on-Trent, earthenware manufacturers?—(Mr. Benham.) Yes.

4879. Is there much Government contract work in your trade?—(Mr. Bailey.) Yes.

4880. Whom do you contract for chiefly?—For the Post Office (insulators and things of that kind), for the Woolwich people for Army pottery (jugs, mugs, bowls and things of that kind), and for the India Office.

4881. Have you personally much experience of it?—Yes, I have.

4882. What is your impression of the effect of the Fair Wages Clause in your contracts?—We look upon the present Fair Wages Clause as a matter of form, as it has never been acted upon or taken any notice of at all. I am the general manager of Messrs. Doulton's Potteries at Burslem—it is the same firm as you have in Lambeth; they have works in Staffordshire. We have supplied the Government with many thousands of pounds worth of goods, and we have never been called upon to show our books or anything of the kind; so we have looked upon the Clause as a matter of form.

4883. There has been no complaint made by your workmen as a matter of fact, then?—Not the slightest.

4884. And yet there is not anything which could be called a current rate in your trade?—There are many rates of wages; indeed, there is an enormous number. I may say that the conditions vary very much. There are old works and modern works. In the old works the conditions are that the potter may have to fetch and wedge his own clay, and to do certain things of that kind for himself, whereas in the modern works everything is done for him.

4885. And all that tends to produce great variations?—Yes. Then, of course, there is great variation in the qualities.

4886. Your wages are all paid in the form of piece-work rates, are they not?—All ware is made at piece-work rates; the only day-wage people are such people as warehousemen and people of that kind. Even the artists are all paid piece-work rates.

4887. Are your work-people organised?—To a certain extent. We have got a dispute on at the present time. There are not many in the Trade Union, but a large number of those have proceeded so far as to give notice that they will come out on 25th March next.

4888. Would you be able to say, for instance, what is the current rate for any particular job?—I could not tell you for a single article except the oven-men's wage, which is 5s. per day at present. That is pretty general, as I think Mr. Benham will agree with me. (Mr. Benham.) That is what you might say about the only fixed standard that we have, I think, among the better class of manufacturers, who pay the fuller price; they expect their work better done, and, of course, they charge more for their goods than the lower, or cheaper, men who use cheaper and more incompetent workmen and pay accordingly.

4889. Is Government work a good class of work in your business?—(Mr. Bailey.) The Post Office work is, but not the Woolwich contracts for the Army; the bowls, the plates, and those sort of things are rather of a cheap quality.

4890. Suppose a complaint were made that whatever you were paying was not a current rate, how would you meet it?—If the Government took serious notice of it we should probably meet it by declining next time to tender.

4891. How would you set to work to prove that you were paying the current rate?—We should first of all ask what is the current rate. (Mr. Benham.) The only thing, I submit, you can do is to take a dozen houses of the same standing and see what the average prices paid at those houses were. You could arrive at the current rate in that way.

4892. What would be the effect of that? Would the prices be found to be fairly uniform?—They would be found to be fairly uniform on the whole. You would find, perhaps, on one particular line that one house was a little bit higher than another, but in something else which they made they might be a little bit lower. The probability is that the average would come out very much the same, although the firms would certainly vary more or less in regard to the prices paid for the individual articles. For instance, you might find that a set of bowls were a little more and plates a little less at A's works, and plates a little more and bowls a little less at B's works. The first-class standard houses pay pretty much the same, that is, it would work out to the same average wage at the end of the week probably.

4893. But practically the Fair Wages Clause is inoperative as far as your trade is concerned?—(Mr. Bailey.) That is absolutely so. (Mr. Benham.) Absolutely.

4894. It is rather curious there has never been any complaint, or any question raised in your trade. Are all your people quite contented; do they never grumble?—(Mr. Bailey.) I do not say they are contented, because, as I have just mentioned, they have given us notice now for certain advances from 25th March next. Curiously enough our answer to that has been, "We will meet you, and we will fix a minimum wage below which no manufacturer shall go." One of the things they ask for is a 15 per cent. advance owing to the increased price of fuel, bread, and one thing and another, they say. Our answer is that it is perfectly absurd to ask for a general advance when there is as great a variation in the prices paid for the same article in the district as 1s. 9d. at one factory and 3s. at another.

4895. For practically the same thing?—For practically the same article.

4896. And made in the same way?—It is made in the same way. But then that would not represent the earnings of the men. I know both firms where these two articles are made. One firm is a very common factory and turns out a common class of goods, and has copied the shapes of the other better-class firm. Probably that firm maintains that their workpeople get practically as much as 1s. 9d. as the other firm's men do at 3s. One firm wants to make nothing but first-class work, and for the other anything will do, as it is an imitation. So it does not follow that the difference would be noticed in their wages.

4897. As manufacturers you would be in favour of the principle of the Fair Wages Clause, I suppose?—Personally, I should, if the Government went further and simply agreed to pay our manufacturers' prices. I think it is rather unfair for the Government to say that a contractor shall pay certain wages which the Trade Union might fix, and which the manufacturer might not agree to, and if he does not he shall not be allowed to contract. On the other hand, he must compete with his fellow-manufacturer for the contract and cut his price as low as possible.

4898. The object of the Clause is to put all manufacturers on the same level, so far as regards the wages which they pay. It is assumed that they all pay what is the current rate, which is not, as you suggest, the rate demanded by the Trade Union, but the rate generally paid by the majority of the people in the trade?—In my judgment there will never be in the potting trade in our day a uniform rate all the way through; the conditions vary so much at the different works. (Mr. Benham.) The quality of the article varies so extraordinarily. (Mr. Bailey.) Both the quality and the conditions of the work vary. (Mr. Benham.) We have some of that work on hand now. A sealed sample is sent down, and it must be exactly like that. Now you can make it like that so that it will wear and stand general hard usage; and you can make it like that at a great deal less cost, and it will be practically useless in a few months. But whoever passes it will not reject it on that ground. If it is a fraction too small or a fraction too wide, or anything of that kind, a matter over which we have no control, he may reject some, but he will not be able to reject them on the other ground, because he will not be able to find it out. So that where it is merely a matter of taking the lowest tender it generally means a lower rate of wage, a lower quality of work, a lower class of goods, and a less satisfactory article.

4899. This variation in quality in fact appears in the rate of wages paid?—Yes.

4900. I do not quite follow your suggestion about the Government paying the manufacturers' prices. As I have said, the object is to get competition among manufacturers, but on the basis of what may be called the current rate of wages. That allows room for competition in respect to all the other conditions that enter into the business, the rate of wages being substantially the same in all cases?—My point is just this: The Government recognise the Trade Unions, and no doubt this is the day of Trade Unions and of masters' unions. The Government would say, by a strict interpretation of the clauses, that no master shall pay less than the Trade Union rates: I reply, then the Government should agree to pay the Masters' Association prices.

4901. The current rate does not mean the Trade Union rate, unless it is accepted by the masters?—A Trade Union rate is what is said here—the contractor is to be obliged to pay the Trade Union rate of wage. (Mr. Bailey.) And then conditions as to apprentices and a limitation of the number are interposed.

4902. At any rate that does not apply to the current rate, which is the phrase in the Fair Wages Clause?—(Mr. Benham.) It would not apply to the current rate. There can be no objections to the current rate if it is properly arrived at and fairly acted upon. What we object to absolutely is the suggestion that is contained in these clauses that we should pay the Trade Union rate of wage. (Mr. Bailey.) And accept Trade Union conditions. (Mr. Benham.) Yes. The Trade Union may be a mere minority, as they very frequently are, of the whole trade. They may have issued a set of rules and prices which the trade have never accepted, but if you are to take a Government contract you must pay that Trade Union rate of wage which they have fixed. It has nothing to do with us. Then it is suggested further on in this Clause that that condition should run throughout the whole factory. (Mr. Bailey.) Even for other work. (Mr. Benham.) The result would be that no one except perhaps it might be one or two who specialised on the matter, would take any Government contracts at all. This suggestion is not, I think, that we shall pay an agreed rate of wage, but that we shall pay a rate of wage arbitrarily fixed by any Trade Union of whatever size or character it may be. If that were adopted a manufacturer would then find that to take a Government order for £2,000 or £3,000 he has got to alter the whole conditions of his working and accept what has not been generally accepted, but what some small Union has tried to get accepted and what is merely illusory—he must accept all that before he can undertake any Government work. I am afraid at a first glance at the things that we shall put them all into the waste-paper basket; we cannot do that.

4903. But you would not object to a formula such as this, would you—the Trade Union rate and conditions, so far as agreed upon between the employers and the workmen?—Not only would I not object to it, but I would ask for it.

4904. Do you say the same, Mr. Bailey?—(Mr. Bailey.) Yes. (Mr. Benham.) I would ask for it as a protection for everyone. I have the deepest and strongest objection to this suggested Trade Union Clause; in fact, it is an absolute impossibility and absurdity. It would mean that a Trade Union had fixed a certain rate and certain conditions of working to which a firm taking Government contracts must conform. There would then be no acceptance of contracts, practically, except there might be one or two people who would lay themselves out for it. Supposing now one of us was inclined to fall in with such an idea, and were to work our works on the lines laid down by the Trade Unions, quite apart from anybody else's prices, quoting that higher rate to the Government which would enable them to pay those prices and conditions, there is no guarantee that that works would have the order next year. There would be another competition thrown out. In the meantime the man has disorganised his works, he has put in a lot of machinery to enable him to do a certain amount of the work in a certain way in order to meet certain requirements. If that had taken place in the trade generally we should understand that that thing was going to go on; but the Government says, "No; you must send up some fresh tenders every year." Therefore, nobody can possibly take that risk and make any such arrangements as those, because they have no guarantee whatever that the work will be continued to them beyond the present year. Having adapted their works to these new conditions they cannot alter it back again. It therefore seems to me that to act upon anything like the suggestion contained in these Clauses would simply amount to prohibiting the execution of Government contracts altogether for the general business world.

4905. But so long as the rate of wages and the conditions are agreed upon by both sides you would be satisfied; and you will not object to any formula which will cover that, will you?—If we had got a formula that would cover it, and that only, I do not think you would find that any of the better class manufacturers would object to it.

4906. Let us go one step further: would you object to its being made a condition in the contract that the rates of wages and the other conditions should extend to the whole of a manufacturer's business, or would you say that it should only extend to the contract work for the Government?—(Mr. Bailey.) I should most certainly object to its extending to the whole of the business. (Mr. Benham.) I should object to that altogether, for this reason: most of us have not got one sort of work but we have other sorts of work in the same factory; and while it might be possible in the earthenware, for instance, to come to such an agreement, on the china portion of the work there might possibly be no such arrangement possible. Very well, then, we cannot take any Government contracts.

4907. What do you mean by "any such arrangement"?—Any such agreement as to the prices in contracts which you say should be enforced on the whole works. I do not think it is possible, and I do not think it is practicable.

4908. But as a matter of practice, I suppose, that is what you do, and that you do not have different rates of wages and different conditions for work other than the Government work?—Probably the position we should find ourselves in would be this—I am speaking of our own trade purely and simply—we make not only earthenware but china; but there are no Trade Unions in the china business, and there are no associations of masters practically in the china business; they all deal with their own private arrangements, and the conditions are so entirely different in every factory that there could be no uniform fixtures. Therefore, while on the earthenware efforts are being made, as Mr. Bailey told just now, to form some kind of mutually agreed upon prices to prevent the undercutting of unscrupulous people —— (Mr. Bailey.) May I just say one word here? I want to lay stress upon "minimum prices." It is practically accepted and realised between masters and men that you cannot get a uniform price; so we put a bottom into it, as they say, and have minimum prices. (Mr. Benham.) But you could not apply that to the whole business; it only applies to the section with which you are dealing. (Mr. Bailey.) No doubt, when a minimum price is fixed, the Trade Union would be the very first to object to our paying it. They would say, "You are a firm who ought to pay more than the minimum." So you will see the nature of the difficulties which are in the way.

4909. Do you have much difficulty in your trade on the question of apprentices and unskilled labour?—We have a difficulty now with the sanitary branch of the trade. A new process has recently been adopted, which is really an old process adapted to a new kind of industry—it is sanitary casting instead of pressing. We have a dispute with our men now. Part of this work is merely filling a mould with slip, which is liquid clay. At the old-fashioned works they would do this out of a jug; they would probably carry their slip into the shop in a tub and take a jugful out and fill the mould. At a modern factory they would have a big tank up at the top where it was pumped, and there would be pipes all over the place, and all the men would have to do would be to turn on a tap and take up a rubber tube. This process merely requires filling the mould with the slip and allowing it to stand for so long, and running it out, then carrying the mould with the cake of slip adhering to it all round, putting it into a stove, and ultimately bringing it out and transferring it then to a skilled man, who takes the mould to pieces, fits up the different parts (that is what we call fettling) and so makes it ready for the oven. That is the skilled part of the work. The main objection to our employing unskilled workmen to do even the filling of the moulds is simply because they see that by this process and by the division of labour some men will be thrown out of employment, because one skilled man and one unskilled man will probably do as much work by the new method as two or three skilled men do now by the present pressing method.

4910. Probably that is a general tendency in your trade?—It is a general tendency. This process was first introduced in Germany. (Mr. Benham.) I was going to say it is a question of German competition. (Mr. Bailey.) The probability is that these sanitary men will go on strike on 25th March next, one of their principal objections being the use of the unskilled men, and another being the number of hours that they shall work for a test. We have agreed thus far with them: First of all, they say, "We want a voice in fixing the prices for this new process." We say, "All right, we will give you a voice. We asked you, in the first place, to make them, and you refused." They tried to kill the process altogether by refusing to allow any of their members to have anything to do with it, and then boycotting those who did work it out. They found that we were able to get men from the agricultural districts to do the unskilled work and also to get a few skilled men to finish the work. So they find now that it is no use objecting to it, and therefore they are now saying, "We want a voice in settling these prices." We say, "All right. We realise that it is penalising your labour; we know it is hard lines on you when a new process comes in, and some of you probably will be thrown out. But we offered you the work in the first place. What sort of voice do you want?" "We want a test made." "All right, we will give you a test on these lines—£2 a week for a month, and you shall work and be taught by one of our men who have learned the process. After that you shall work against so many men of the master's selection, and if we cannot mutually agree upon a price, we will refer the matter to arbitration." The whole dispute now has come to how many hours the men shall work during the test. They say, "We shall only work 48 hours." We say, "You must work 53 hours." The eight-hours' day has got into the minds of our men as well as into the minds of the miners, and they all claim that eight hours a day is sufficiently long to work. We shall insist upon 53 hours per week, and if they refuse to accept that they will go out on strike on 25th March next. (Mr. Benham.) 53 hours is about the average working week of the district, is it not? (Mr. Bailey.) There is no average number of hours in the district. (Mr. Benham.) But practically it will amount to that. (Mr. Bailey.) It is all piece-work, and I am afraid the whole district is very lax, and there is a want of discipline. It is not like the cotton trade, where they have to be at the factory when the machinery is started. That is, they simply come when they like. The married men come early and the single men come late. That is our experience; in fact, so much so, that our foreman will always ask a man, "Are you married or single?" If he is married he will engage him. If he is single, he will get a married man if he can, and he will only take a single man if he cannot find a married man.

4911. (Mr. Wilson Fox.) Is it not the case that the question whether those men shall work 48 hours or 53 hours in the week is now the sole point in dispute; does not the whole thing hinge on that one point?—With the sanitary men, certainly.

4912. (Chairman.) The tendency to sub-divide labour more and more is quite inevitable, I should think, is it not?—Most certainly it is, and I do not see how you can avoid it with the foreign competition that we have to cope with.

4913. Might it not have the effect of raising wages, even for the more skilled men?—It would generally, but not in the sanitary branch, because the sanitary potters are paid at least 50 per cent. more than the ordinary potters, owing to the fact that the men are able to get pretty much their own prices for these large pieces of sanitary ware which are not difficult to make, but which only a few people make. To-day the competition is so keen that a sanitary man, if he agrees to work 53 hours in the week can earn £3 10s.—I will say £3 to £3 10s.—and he can earn that easily, indeed, there are some of our men who can get £4 a week, but they might be looked upon as exceptions. In the general trade, they are not paid anything like the rates that would enable them to get the same amount. We say there is no more skill in making sanitary ware, than there is in the general trade, but the men have enjoyed these high wages so long and they have got rather a strong Union, and therefore they fight every step we make to reduce those wages. How that works out can be fairly illustrated in this way: We are able to ship to America any amount of general earthenware, which pays a 60 per cent. duty, but we cannot send a single pound's worth of sanitary ware, because the American potters do not pay their sanitary men any higher rate than they pay their general potters. I do not think that this would have the tendency of increasing the price of the sanitary workmen.

4914. Speaking generally, I think you would agree that the more you confine the highly-skilled men to the most skilled work, the more his wages are likely to rise?—I quite agree with you. (Mr. Benham.) That is undoubtedly the case.

4915. Therefore, this sub-dividing tendency is quite as much in the interests of the skilled labourer as in the interests of anybody else?—Certainly. (Mr. Bailey.) I agree. But there are special circumstances to be considered in the sanitary branch. (Mr. Benham.) Although that is exceptional in the sanitary branch, I think Mr Bailey will agree with me that the arrangement he speaks about is the standard way of working our other departments. Take a plate, for instance: all that the plate-maker does is to form a plate on the mould—he is the skilled plate-maker, and he has an attendant, a boy, or it may be a woman, who takes this mould from him and places it where it is to be dried, who removes the thing from the mould when it is dried, and who takes it to another wheel alongside and trims off the edges and smooths the plate over and prepares it for the oven. No plate is ever made in any other way. According to one of these suggested clauses, these men might contend that none but a skilled man at the Trade Union rate of wages should make these plates. If they were to succeed in that way, we should not be able to supply outside of Great Britain, and we should want a strict barrier of protection to keep the trade in Great Britain. We could not supply a plate at all anywhere else; no country would take it.

4916. In fact, your labour is already highly sub-divided?—Yes, it is the same thing with the person who puts the print upon a plate or upon any ware. The skilled man simply takes the impression and a woman assistant does the next. (Mr. Bailey.) Or a little girl. (Mr. Benham.) She stands there to cut the paper off. If any of these clauses that are asked for were adopted, as I said before, Government contracts would simply have to be declined, as we could not entertain the idea.

4917. I gather from what you say that practically your workmen are objecting to a further sub-division which you have just introduced?—(Mr. Bailey.) Yes, they object to it where it does not exist and where it is being first introduced.

4918. You do not object to the publication of the names of the contractors, do you?—I do not see any objection to that.

4919. Are they published already?—I do not think so.

4920. Do you see any objection to it, Mr. Benham? (Mr. Benham.) There is an objection to it, though perhaps it would not occur so strongly with the Government contracts as it might, and does, in fact, with contracts which are given out by, say, a county council for its lunatic asylums. The county council on its lunatic asylums took the line which the Government have generally taken on sending their contracts direct to the manufacturer. To a large extent heretofore, those contracts have been sublet by a middleman either in the Staffordshire neighbourhood or in London; and in consequence of the publication of the names of those people who have taken some of those contracts direct, the trade—that is the middleman who formerly had those contracts—have withdrawn all their custom from particular houses.

4921. They object to the municipality going direct to the manufacturer?—Yes, that is my own experience. It is the middleman, of course. I know one case not very far away from where we are where the contracts were sent out to the manufacturer direct, and we took one of those contracts. It appeared to be all right and satisfactory. There was no difficulty about it, but they published the name. We had not known that previously one of our customers had supplied these things. He immediately wrote, "We cannot do any more business with you, and we shall close your account." So a man with a good business in the country could not afford to take that contract on the condition of his name being published, if the names are in the habit of going into the hands of those who had therefore been the middlemen. I hope you understand the point.

4922. Perfectly. Is it not generally recognised that a manufacturer is entitled to contract direct with the consumer?—No. (Mr. Bailey.) No. If a manufacturer were to supply an hotel in London, he would soon hear about it. (Mr. Benham.) You cannot do it.

4923. Would that apply to Government contracts?—I do not know whether it would apply so much to Government contracts as it would to others, because the Government have been longer in the habit, you understand, of applying direct to the manufacturers, and the trade have really begun to accept the fact that the manufacturers do supply to the Government direct.

4924. I thought it was generally accepted, and I am rather surprised to hear what you say?—It is not altogether so. The only reason that I can see for which there would be any objection to publish his name is that it would have a very considerable tendency to damage the contractor's business with his ordinary customers, who would object to his taking these contracts direct. (Mr. Bailey.) I may say that we never quote for such contracts for that very reason. (Mr. Benham.) We have had to give up several. (Mr. Bailey.) The reason why there has not been any difficulty is because we have realised that we shall get into trouble with our customers, and therefore we never quote for workhouses, asylums, or anything of that kind; but we do quote for the Government, because it is practically accepted now that the Government will buy direct and do buy direct.

4925. Then a good deal of your objection would fall to the ground if it were recognised that the Government always dealt direct with the manufacturer?—(Mr. Benham.) Yes, and if it were realised that it was so; but it is not realised to that extent at present. We have a certain number of contracts, but we did not want to do anything. The fact was they came to us and asked us, but I said, "No, this is too troublesome for me; you have very strict conditions." The thing is bound to pass into the hands of people who are not in the trade, and who do not know the trade operations and conditions, and who ask you to fulfil a condition which is very often impossible. Then the things are returned on your hands although they have been made specially, and they are of no use for anyone else. You are told that for some reason they have been rejected. So I did not have anything to do with it until a while ago, when one gentleman from the War Office came down to the district, and he came to me amongst others. He went all over our works; I explained these things to him very freely and very generally, and in the end he said, "I fancy that we should like to have you on the list." So we put our name on the list, and since then we have had a few of their contracts, and it has been more satisfactory than it was before. But if the publishing of the name caused any feeling on the part of the London people I should at once have to say "No, you must not take up any more Government contracts."

4926. (Mr. De la Bère.) I think the middleman is pretty well aware by this time that he has not much chance of Government work?—You can have no idea how tenacious the middleman is unless you come in contact with him personally. They may know that themselves, but the middleman is like the dog-in-the-manger; he may realise that he could not do it himself, but he will not allow you to get it. That is the only objection we have to the publication of the contractors' names.

4927. (Chairman.) Of course, you understand that it is nothing more than the publication of the name of the firm?—Quite so.

4928. And a very brief account of the thing, but there would be no details?—I understand there would be no details; but it is the name of the firm—that is the point.

4929. I think you agree generally with what Mr. Bailey has said, and therefore I do not think I need take you over that ground again?—Quite so.

4930. (Mr. Black.) When you speak of a man drawing a minimum wage, do you mean a minimum schedule of piece-rates or a minimum weekly wage?—(Mr. Bailey.) A minimum schedule of piece-rates.

4931. I should like you to help me on one little point, though I do not know that we need go very deeply into it. In your proof you say that the Government should "allow the competition for contracts to be one of quality only"; but Mr. Benham tells us that the Government inspector cannot determine the quality, and so we should get into a hopeless situation if we adopted your suggestion?—(Mr. Benham.) He cannot determine the quality. (Mr. Bailey.) He could determine it if he went on the lines that the shipping companies do. They test the goods not by the price but by what is broken on the round trip. They say, "It does not matter what the price is if it only costs so much per round trip, then those are the cheapest goods." The Government do not do that.

4932. We have not got the round trip in the same way to test it by?—No, you have not; but you can take what it costs per annum.

4933. We do look at it very much from that point of view?—I should like, if I might be allowed, to make a suggestion with regard to Government contracts—I do not know whether it may be out of order here. Very often there is a good deal of red-tape about them, in this way: They send us a sample with a stamp or seal on it, and we must make it like that and nothing else; we may not suggest a better thing. I will give you one illustration. A bowl that is bought in hundreds of thousands at Woolwich is made of such a shape that if you nest one in the other the foot does not rest on the bottom, but it touches the side. We have pointed that out to the Government, and have told them that they get a tremendous lot of breakages in consequence, and that we also have a tremendous lot of breakages, because they say, "You must deliver these things at Woolwich, whole, at your own expense, and we shall reject all that are broken." Now I have seen them at Woolwich piled very high and split all the way down simply because they will carry out their own idea in that way, whereas we could make a bowl with a foot that would rest on the bottom. There are things of that kind continually occurring, and I often think that if some manufacturer that you could thoroughly trust were consulted with regard to those he would make a wonderful change.

4934. The pattern, no doubt, was made by a manufacturer in the first instance?—Exactly, and probably it may have been gradually altered. I have known that when we have sent in 5,000 bowls, 2,000 have been broken for that very reason, so we have never quoted for that particular contract since. I do not know whether it has been altered since, but at that time this bowl was made by a wrong method. It was made by the old method, which we call the outside method, whereas it could be made much better by the inside method. But "No," they say, "We will have that, and you must not alter it at all, that is our pattern."

4935. Could you not make the same by the inside method? The contract does not describe the method of manufacture, does it?—(Mr. Benham.) No. (Mr. Bailey, drawing a diagram.) Let me show you what I mean. Here is the bowl; if the foot comes that way you could not make it in a mould in this manner, because it would not draw out, and then if you nest the bowls the foot comes here and wedges there, instead of resting on the bottom. We should suggest to you to allow the bowl to be made that way with a straight foot—this is what the whole of the trade think—and that you should have that foot wide enough to catch here. Then you could pile them up any height, and there would be no danger of breakage.

4936. I am interested in the Navy, and we attach great importance to a prominent foot, so that a big-handed bluejacket can get a good grip. The basins are turned bottom upwards on the mess table, and we want the man who takes them up to be able to get a good grip?—I can only tell you that they would be made much cheaper this way, and I think that would more than compensate for any other little disadvantages there may be.

4937. We do not want a man to let it slip in his hand?—(Mr. Benham.) We can make the bowls so that they will nest even with the foot that you speak of.

4938. In the Navy the nesting is of very great importance, because all our racks on board ship are built for a certain number?—We have made many thousands of these bowls with a large foot. It is the Army bowl that we are talking of. (Mr. Bailey.) I have seen a pile of Army bowls split after you have got them and paid for them. A large percentage of them would be split just by their own weight.

4939. (Mr. De la Bère.) Have you ever suggested an improvement?—Most certainly, and been snubbed for doing it.

4940. Did you write, or did you merely suggest it verbally?—I wrote some years ago, and I went to Woolwich about it.

4941. (Mr. Black.) As regards the Navy bowl, I do not know whether you know our pattern. As I have said, we attach great importance to the nesting, because all the ships' racks are built that way?—I think if you were to try some bowls made in this way you would find that they could be made much cheaper. Excuse me for urging you to do so. If it is made in this way, we must make it upside down with a profile that goes over and in there. That is a very old-fashioned way, and very much more expensive.

4942. I think what we attach most importance to is having more depth in the foot so as to give a good grip?—You can have them as deep as you like.

The witnesses withdrew.

Mr. John Allen, called and examined.

4943. (Chairman.) You represent the National Federation of Merchant Tailors, I think?—Yes, I do.

4944. Is that an association of employers?—Yes.

4945. Not of merchants, but of tailors, I suppose?—The term "tailor" includes the journeyman tailor and the master tailor, and when we had to give a name to our association we called it the National Federation of Merchant Tailors, going back to an old name, just to differentiate between the master and the men.

4946. It means master tailors?—It does. We have members in Scotland, where the master is known as a clothier, and is in that way distinguished from the journeyman tailor.

4947. Have you much experience in Government contract work?—No, I have not, and I have said in my synopsis that we have not; but we have an interest in this question, because we think that whatever is done in connection with Government contracts will have a reflex influence upon everything else in the trade. Government ought, perhaps, to show an example and lead the way a little bit, and then others will follow. We are interested in that way, and we are interested on public grounds also. We have no animosity to the working-men's Society—far from it—we are the greatest friends with it; but we would not like their views to prevail in the tailoring of the country. They have a way of working which certainly never lends itself to contract work. One man wants to take a job, as he calls it—a coat, or a vest, or a pair of trousers—and make it right through himself. He will take the assistance of the machine and allow something very trifling for what the machine does, but he wants to make the garment right through himself. For contract work that should be done economically, factory work is, in our opinion, better. We consider that factory work ought to be well paid—it ought to come out at the end of the week just the same good pay; but these men would sooner take the coat and spend three or four days over it, as they do, and very frequently want to get a good week's wage at the end, and if they do not get it they blame the master and blame the log for it.

4948. I gather your view is that in your trade labour must be very highly sub-divided?—For contract work not very highly, but it ought to be a little bit so. I am perhaps taking a rather poor view of the business I am associated with. It is one of the misfortunes of our business that there is nothing very high about it, and the result of that is that poor people get into it, and that is how we have all the sweating and all the trouble that we are all trying to do away with.

4949. But you agree that the Fair Wages Clause is sound in principle, do you not?—Yes, I do. But there you raise the point, What is fair wages? I notice in this statement that was sent to me that they say, "where there are works set up in a country place"—and a very appropriate place for works is a country place if you can make cottages. If you can make a garden city anywhere, that is so much for the benefit of the whole community. Take, say, a garden city where there are some works up; there is no Trade Union, perhaps, in that place, and they want to go to the nearest town to take the rate prevailing in the Trade Union in that nearest town. Any tailoring Trade Union there was in that town would probably be working on a principle that did not at all apply to the factory system which will be introduced into this garden city if there was a factory there; so we are up against that point.

4950. How would you deal with a case of that kind; how would you propose to fix the rate?—I think that the employer and the workpeople ought to agree upon rates of pay, and I believe it ought to be put up on the walls. I agree with the two last statements absolutely that I notice here. On this paper it is said that certain witnesses have asked for facilities for ascertaining the names of all employers who are successful in obtaining Government contracts, etc. We believe in that.

4951. You would not object to that?—Not at all. Let everybody know who is getting the work, and let the work-people find out anything shady or wrong, if there is anything shady or wrong, because the Government would have to employ an army to do it; but let the Trade Union or the workmen or anyone who is of right mind do it. There are companies of people now that we call Social Service people; I belong to a little one, and I am supposed to do anything I can for the benefit of my fellow man. Let us help these people. In the ninth suggested clause, it is suggested that the schedules of rates of wages paid, and the hours of labour observed, shall be posted in the shops and at all works where Government contracts are being carried out, and that pay-sheets and wages books shall be open to official inspection. We certainly should agree with that, too.

4952. That you do not object to?—No. One of the difficulties of tailoring is the want of organisation. I may tell you that the Amalgamated Society of Tailors, who claim so frequently to speak for the whole body of the workers in the tailoring, only represent a comparatively small number. I have not had the figures for a few years, but I should say that 17,000 members is about what they have. Your Blue-books would show you at once. The highest number, I suppose, would be about 22,000, and they have been down as low as 16,000. If you were to take 17,000 to 18,000, it will be quite obvious that these people do not represent what is going on in the operative part of the tailoring world; and yet they claim to do that. What is wanted is organisation—more and better organisation to unite those who are doing an inferior class of work. Many years ago, I asked the Amalgamated Society's official, "Why do you not co-operate with us employers to improve the lower grades of tailoring"? The answer to me was, "We have found officials, and we have paid them wages to look after the interests of our own members and not to look after these people." "But," I said, "surely you can see that it would be to your best interests to try and elevate those at the very bottom, because they are always competing with you, and you will never do any good until you make that bottom class right; you must get your substratum right before you can build a decent social fabric for yourselves." But they never quite saw that, I think, until very lately, when I think it is dawning on them.

4953. How do you account for the want of organisation among workers in your business?—Simply because of the ease with which any ordinary person, say a poor woman who has not got means, can soon pick up a little tailoring. I had a case that I knew of in good-class tailoring, which was the sort of business I carried on when I succeeded to my father in Liverpool. We used to make singlets and drawers for customers—a thing that has quite gone out from tailoring. Naturally, we had to have a few women to make those sort of things. I may say that a few conservative customers get their singlets and drawers made still by a tailor instead of going to a hosier. We had one woman who was very badly employed by us, that is, we could not give her much work to do. I said to her, "I am very sorry for you, Mrs. A. B., you ought to try and get into the waistcoat making." Well, she began, but although I gave her that advice, I was not free to employ her myself, as she cou'd not work quite to our standard. She went to work for—I had better not mention names, as it is a disgraceful thing I am going to tell you, but I am afraid there is too much of it. She went to work at a very large cheap firm in Liverpool. She came to me one Saturday—as a matter of fact she had been doing something for myself, as I cut my own singlets and drawers—anything I wear now I cut myself; she had come in with something like that. I said, "How are you getting on in the waistcoat making?" She said, "I have made two waistcoats this week," for this firm I do not care to mention. I said, "What did you get paid for them?" She said, "I had better not tell you; you would not understand it." I said, "No, I would like you to tell me." "To begin with they were serge waistcoats with four pockets; I had to find all the sewing material myself, and I was paid 10d. for making the two"—it was the time the South African War was on—"I had 3d. taken off for the Boer War Fund and 1d. for Hospital Saturday." She got 6d. for making the two waistcoats! I sent the full particulars up to Labouchere, and said, "You are very fond of going for something, and here is something you can go for. The man is quite big enough, and if you ask any woollen merchants in London, they will tell you anything I say is reliable, so you need not be afraid to go for him." That is the answer to your question, How is it? It is because it is so easy to get into the lower ranks of tailoring; that is the trouble.

4954. Do the Government contracts, do you think, go very largely to the worst class of houses in your trade?—I am quite satisfied that in the case of many of the Government contracts that are given out, although the people who take them have got factories, yet there is a good deal of subletting going on. There was a libel case between the Amalgamated Society of Tailors and a firm, and I have followed the evidence in that case carefully. I am not a pro-workman, I may say. I largely assisted to organise the Master Tailors of this country to fight the workmen, because we were not getting fair-play from them; so we organised the whole of this country, through this Association. I am not speaking as a friend to the workmen, but I do not think they got justice on that occasion. I do not think that the practice which was adopted by the firm that got the factory was fair trading. I ventured to say in the few remarks that I sent up that I think there ought to be more efficient inspection. I am an examiner of clothing now for the Corporation of Liverpool. I have retired from really active business, but I retain my association with the trade. I edited a trade paper for thirteen years, and this January number is the first that did not come out under my editorship. I am interested in a business in London, but I am simply chairman of it; it is a private limited company. We put in the Fair Wages Clause in the Liverpool contracts.

4955. What is your clause in Liverpool; is it like the Government Clause?—It is very much the same; but I think I am right in saying that we do little to see that it is enforced. I think it is always a pity to put clauses in a contract where there is not what I call a reasonable attempt to follow it up and see that there is something done.

4956. I suppose you would get a complaint if it was not being carried out?—We do get complaints, and there are many questions in the Council Chamber and a certain amount of answering and all that sort of thing. I will tell you the way it operates—it operates against the fair employer, the man who would be a contractor and who really would be anxious to keep to fair conditions. I do not think he is getting a fair chance unless the authorities do something to try and see that the thing is carried out in practice. That is my view of it.

4957. How do you think the Government should proceed in order to exclude houses that are guilty of the practices that you are speaking of?—I think it would be a very simple matter. There are not a great many of them. They sign the contract when they are going to do this, and an inspector is sent to find out whether they have a proper factory in which the work is to be done. I am not against home-work altogether. There is a great deal of most honest home-work, but I am against giving work out by the bushel to anybody you do not know—who it is, or where it is, or what is paid for it. I am against that sort of thing. I think it would be a very simple matter to have such inspection as would be absolutely efficient on this point.

4958. How would the inspector arrive at the current rate?—There is a reasonable rate of wages which is generally current in the factory, and they are going to work so many hours a day and under good healthy conditions. The factory inspectors see that they are working under good sanitary conditions. The Factory Act fixes the hours in which they are to work and sees after the young people and all that sort of thing. I think the Factory Act is a sufficient protection for most people.

4958*a*. How would it protect that woman who got 10d. for making two waistcoats?—I do not think it was insisted on in those days that you had to put down the name of your out-worker. That was done four or five years ago, during the Boer War; and now the local authority becomes the authority in all these matters, and we have to make a return.

4959. Yes; but even if the name of this unfortunate woman had been known it would not have prevented her getting only 10d. for the two waistcoats. How are you to bring pressure to bear on an employer of that kind, that is the point?—I have been reading a good deal about the way the law is operating in New Zealand and Australia. I think there is a good deal of abuse in the way those wages boards are acting, but at the same time one can hardly see what else can be done but something on that line. Certainly I believe an employer would be ashamed to put up such a price in his shop—any way, I think they ought to have at least that protection, that the prices to be paid for the garments should be put up where people can see and criticise them.

4960. How would it be if the contract contained a clause that no one was to be paid below a certain minimum rate?—I think it would operate in the end for the benefit of everybody. I think there is an amount of competition among the very poor which perhaps might be met in another way rather than having to try to run down everybody else's wages. It would shut out people who go in for working for a little pocket-money, and I think it would really tell for the honest worker who wants to work and who would work, and that it would give him a living or her a living.

4961. Would it interfere with any legitimate management of the business, do you think?—There is no doubt it would interfere with the man who we might say had ultra free trade ideas and wanted to get everything done in the very cheapest market. It would largely go against that man; but at the same time he would be fighting his competitors in a fair way, because they would be all under the same restrictions.

4962. Supposing you wanted to fix a minimum rate in a Liverpool factory, what would you put the minimum rate at for a woman on a time rate?—There you must take ages, and you must take their proficiency. An apprentice would not be paid so much, of course, but I do not think that any woman who has come to adult years, and who has really to maintain herself, should be expected to work at a rate of pay that would work out at less than about 16s. a week. That is my idea of it.

4963. For what number of hours?—The number of hours that are fixed at present by the Factory Acts. I think they are very fair hours.

4964. 54?—Yes, about 54 hours per week.

4965. That would be about 3½d. per hour?—Yes, it would; but it would not be very laborious work in tailoring, you know.

4966. Would 3½d. per hour be a fair minimum to fix in tailoring, do you think?—No, it would not.

4967. Would you say that no contractor shall pay any of his hands less than 3½d. per hour?—I am afraid that if you said 3½d. per hour that perhaps they would begin to divide the day up and say, "I can give you two hours," or "I can give you four hours," or something like that. I think they should either take them for a half-day, or for a whole day, or for a week, and if it works out that there are a good many slack times, times when perhaps they have not got work to give them, they should have to pay them on rather a better scale than that in order to equalise the thing. I do not think the poor person who is your work-person should have to stand all the racket of the slack times. I think the employer ought to regulate his profit and his charges in such a way that he should take a part of that responsibility. You have not a right to go to a man and say "You only worked one hour a day for me" when the man has been standing about waiting for you all the day. I think you ought to stand a little bit of that.

4968. I gather that you have not many complaints in Liverpool about the operation of the Clause?—No, we have not many complaints, but when I see the prices that people are willing to enter into contracts for, it can only lead me to one conclusion, namely, that there are not fair wages being paid somewhere.

4969. They are cut too low, you think?—Yes, they are cut too low.

4970. But you do not get any complaints from the workpeople?—We do hear complaints. As I said, we have a Labour member or two in the Council, and they will criticise certain prices. The Corporation of Liverpool adopt, I think, a little unusual way. For one large department buy their own cloth to begin with, and they simply get tenders for the cutting-out, the making, and the trimming of it. The prices that contractors are willing to enter into these contracts for are such that I often think there cannot be fair wages paid for them; but, of course, I have no right to assert that without following it up, and it is not my business, unfortunately, to follow it up.

4971. As you know, what we call the Fair Wages Clause is really a clause which enforces a current rate, and is not what some might call a fair rate?—I know it is the current rate.

4972. Would you have any difficulty in saying what the current rate for any particular article in Liverpool was?—You would have a very great difficulty.

4973. Because there is so much variation?—Yes.

4974. Do you see any way in which we could avoid this?—You could avoid it partly by the suggestions that come from the workmen's side; that would help it a little bit, if the prices for making garments have to be fixed and affixed to a workshop wall, or where the work is given out, and if those prices are put up in such a position that the persons taking out the work shall be informed of the price they are going to be paid.

4975. How are you to arrive at the prices?—That is where the want of organisation makes trouble. I ventured to say in the Memorandum that I sent up to your secretary that our association would welcome better combination.

4976. Of course, that is the difficulty where you are dealing with an unorganised trade, that there is no agreement as to rates?—That is so.

4977. How would you deal with that difficulty in Liverpool, if you had to face it?—We run this country a good deal by unpaid philanthropic efforts, and I think some good would be done if some ladies and gentlemen went into that work a little bit and tried to make it known that they are willing to assist these sort of people who are at work to form an organisation. There is a good deal of that going on, I may say, to help them to organise, and even the men's societies are doing a little bit now; they formerly absolutely neglected that department, but I think in that way something is being done.

4978. I was looking at it more from the point of view of the Liverpool Corporation and of you as their officer. Suppose that you felt that something or other had to be done to meet this grievance, in what direction would you do it?—Supposing, now, there was a little more elasticity—there is not a great deal, and I think, perhaps, wisely so—if you set out certain conditions, and you have practically got to accept the lowest tender that was sent in to you, you must assume that they are going to keep to those conditions. But supposing an estimate for making certain things comes in, and it is obviously low, I think some official—myself or someone else—should be appointed to try and track that out. It need only be done once or twice; that would be a lesson to the people, and it would not occur very often that they would try to get behind the conditions.

4979. Supposing that you were to find that a certain rate of wages was being paid, would you be in a position to say that that was not the current rate?—I dare say they would say to me, "We can get plenty of people to make trousers for sixpence a pair"; but still I would not like, on the mere fact that people will do a thing, to call it the current rate. I am afraid you have to come back to the idea of getting a wages board after all, in some way or other—getting these people together, and saying to them, the workpeople and the employers, that they must agree as to what is a sort of fair thing for them.

4980. There is this further difficulty which occurs to me. Supposing you have induced the employer to pay what you might call fair rates on Government work, how could you prevent his paying a lower rate to the rest of his people who were employed on other jobs?—I think they would look after him for that.

4981. But they might be content to take what they could get?—Yes, they might.

4982. That is an objection that occurs to me against fixing prices and rates at all?—It is a very difficult question that you have got to look into.

4983. Your experience at Liverpool does not suggest anything?—I have got experience all over the country. I have gone all over the country in regard to tailoring matters.

4984. If you had to draw up the contract yourself, would you make any alteration in the existing clause?—No. The only thing I would do is, I would follow up the inspection and I would have better inspection. I would give every facility to anybody who is at all interested in it, such as a Trade Union, or anyone else. As I say, I am no lover of the arbitrary methods of Trade Unions—far from it; but I would give anybody who would take the trouble the opportunity of going into these things and seeing that abuses did not happen. Let the light of day in on the thing anyway.

4985. The practical difficulty with which you would be confronted is that you would find that the contractor whom you are criticising would say, "I am paying the current rate"; very likely he might be, but you would find that it was a very low rate, perhaps less than you think ought to be paid. Could you do anything more than say that he is to pay the current rate?—If you find that he is paying the current rate, I think that should absolve him; I do not think you could do any more. I think you would probably find that he was not paying the current rate in some cases.

4986. With an unorganised trade it would be very difficult to ensure an adequate wage being paid, would it not?—It would be very difficult indeed.

4987. (Mr. De la Bère.) I gather that you have not much personal experience of Government work?—No.

4988. Your remark that the wages might be more closely followed up by inspection than they are now is based on your experience, let us say, of the Liverpool practice?—It is much the same all over the country. Our Masters' Association formed a moveable Board going all round the country; we used to meet in various towns and talk about the conditions of trade.

4989. I think the conditions are pretty much the same in all Government contracts. With regard to the War Office contracts, in which I am particularly interested, there are clauses by which, in the first instance, the contractor undertakes that all garments shall be made up and the material cut out in his own factory; there is also a clause that all wages earned by the workers engaged in making up the garments shall be paid direct to them, and, further, that the firms and workers' wages books, together with the details on which they are based, shall be open to the inspection of the Secretary of State. Those clauses are, as far as possible, closely followed up throughout the performance of the contract by an inspector who is constantly going round; and yet, in spite of all that, there is very great difficulty in ascertaining, in the first place, that a current rate is being paid, and very frequently in ascertaining what is the current rate. The difficulties as regards the current rate are very largely caused by the fact that processes of manufacture differ very much in London especially—whether intentionally or not I do not know—almost every firm has a different way of sectionising its work, so that it is extremely difficult to arrive at what is the proper rate for any given process of manufacture?—That is so.

4990. Can you make any suggestion for getting over that?—If you keep to tailoring, which is the only business I am interested in, I think that a man or a woman, whoever it is working, ought to work on a time log, that that log ought to be compiled upon the basis of the actual time taken to make the garment, and that supposing you are going to pay by the piece, you will pay by the piece on that time log, but if you depart from that, then you must pay by the day or week—so much an hour.

4991. As you pointed out just now, I think, under the factory system garments are not made throughout by the same individual?—That is so; but there is a suggestion, coming from the Trade Unions, that all these persons—the presser, the machiner, the baster, and all those people—are to be paid alike. That is nonsense. You would naturally pay the operative organiser of a shop, or a skilled man—a man that can put a collar all round, or a lappel—a better wage. If they fix the same rate of pay for the various grades of work, and see that they are paid it——

4992. Who must fix it?—The employers and the workpeople must fix it between themselves.

4993. Probably you would agree with me that in the bulk of the tailoring trade the employer, apart from any Government intervention, is practically able to impose upon the workpeople any terms that he likes?—If it is a large factory it is not so; but if it is a small factory (and a great deal of work is sent out to various Jewish places) there is a great difficulty then. More organisation is wanted with those sort of people—there is no doubt about it.

4994. That is the crucial difficulty?—Yes.

4995. Then with regard to the minimum rate of wage; of course, a worker is frequently not continuously employed—illness, perhaps, or slackness of work or something like that intervenes?—Yes.

4996. So the weekly earnings are less than the minimum rate; what are you going to do then?—That is a very great difficulty. You may say that illness is the Act of God, and people are supposed not to be responsible for it; but there, again, it is union and organisation that are wanted.

4997. Then, again, the worker is not always on Government work; she is on a Government order perhaps two days in the week, then for one day and a half she goes to some other order—an ordinary trade order—and she comes back again on Government work at the end of the week. How are you going to maintain a Government minimum rate under circumstances like that?—If you are paying workpeople either by the piece-work log, or by the hour, according to the time they actually work—if you have got a set of people on these terms—it appears to me that it does not matter what they are working on, they must be working at that rate. A man would not shift his pay about; if anything, it appears to me that he would try to get them to work a little cheaper on Government work than he would on ordinary work, because everybody knows Government work is cut fairly fine.

4998. But then on the other hand Government work is subject to much more rigid inspection than the ordinary work, and it is also subject to those very restrictions about wages from which ordinary work is entirely free. That probably results in many cases in Government work fetching with the workpeople a higher price than the ordinary trade work would?—Although, perhaps, there is a little more rigid inspection, I do not think it amounts to a very great deal in the way the work is made up. There is nothing very extra-superfine about Government tailoring.

4999. The rejections are very heavy sometimes, are they not?—Yes, they may be. They may put in inferior thread, for instance, and when you come to try it it breaks; or you put it under the magnifying glass and you find it is a very poor thread that is put in. Naturally, an inspector would reject that right away. Or perhaps the linen is not right. I fancy the rejections will more often occur through something not coming up to standard in the way of the material used rather than through the workmanship that is put in.

5000. The materials are generally supplied by the Government?—All the trimmings, do you mean?

5001. Not entirely, but very largely?—Do you mean the linen stayings?

5002. Very largely, but not altogether?—They may not have put the stayings in that have been provided. That is the sort of thing. It is nearly all machine work, and if it has only the proper thread in it and a decent machine behind it there cannot be much the matter.

5003. Still, our inspection does lead us to think that in some cases persons are deliberately turned from one class of Government work to other work with the express purpose of defeating any endeavour to arrive at a current rate; and if you can offer any suggestion which will overcome that difficulty it will be of great assistance?—I wish I could.

5004. It is only a shrewd suspicion, and we cannot find it out?—If there is a reasonable suspicion that that is done it would weigh with me, and I would lean at once to the side of those who ask that there should be a standard made for Government contractors which they must keep to all through.

5005. In other words, do you mean that the Government should actually fix the rates of wages?—No, I do not say that; but I mean that when the employers—the contractors—and the workpeople have fixed on a scale, and then they try to evade paying a decent wage by putting them on to other work and paying them less, and all that sort of thing; if I found there was this sort of gerrymandering going on, then I would incline to be severe.

5006. The difficulty is that in most cases there is no scale fixed?—That is the trouble.

5007. Where there is a scale fixed you can get along; with the cutters, for instance, it is all right, I think?—Yes.

5008. But with the lower branches of the trade there is no organisation, and there is no fixed scale?—That is so.

5009. I do not see how we are going to get over the difficulty?—The Amalgamated Society of Tailors want us to have their time log. I meant to bring one with me, but I forgot that. However, you can easily get a time log anywhere. They bring their time log and they say "We want that log paid to." That is absurd. I know that in Blackburn the labour element are rather in the ascendency in the Council there, and they have succeeded in getting the Police clothing of that town under a time log in which a man makes a garment and gets paid so many hours for it. The tailors are fair to this extent, that they make a reduction for contract work, and they do not expect the same as for private work; but that is not the way to make work of a contract nature. In Belfast they do the same; the Amalgamated Society's men work upon it. In some towns in Scotland they do the same. But, of course, you gentlemen are looking after the public interest as well as everything else, and I do not think it is in the public interest that work should be made in that style. It is an out-of-date style of making up contract work.

5010. The difficulty really is, I am afraid, in regard to tailoring, that many of the workers will under-bid each other if they possibly can; they are not only not organised, but they will under-bid each other; I think probably you will agree with that?—Yes, there is no doubt about it that they will. There is nothing like good Unions amongst the workers after all, and then when they are united they should use their strength reasonably.

5011. (Mr. Black.) You think if firms had to post up their wages they would be ashamed to put up very low wages?—I think they would.

5012. Supposing the Departments invited them to send in with their tender the schedule of wages that they would pay, would that have any effect?—Yes, it would; there is no doubt about that. I have never thought of that. I think it is a very admirable suggestion.

5013. You think if they had to do that they would have some scruple and feel ashamed of cutting prices? I think they would. That is the best thing I have heard to-day, I think. The rate of wages which they are going to pay should be sent in.

5014. The trouble of the Government in allocating the contract then would end?—Yes.

5015. If anything of that kind were done, supposing then the Inspector went down, would he not find that the little group on the Government work, getting rather a special rate of wages, was having an influence on the private work of the firm?—I should think so.

5016. You do not think for the sake of getting the Government contract he would pay a higher rate, and at the same time pay a lower rate for the rest?—I do not think so.

5017. Would it have any levelling-up effect?—I think it would have a levelling-up effect; in fact the workers would be getting that Government pay, if it were a good, fair pay. It would put so much backbone into them to fight for a fair remuneration on the other work.

5018. Would you have those rates posted up as well?—I would.

5019. You would do the two things—get them to send the rates in to the Department, and then post the rates up?—Yes, I would. I think that would have a very beneficial effect.

5020. (Mr. De la Bère.) In regard to that, would not the practical result be that the Government would fix the rates of wages?—No, I do not think so.

5021. Not if the schedule of wages were sent in with the tender?—No.

5022. In the first place, the Government has to satisfy itself somehow that the schedule is correct, and that it fairly represents the current rate, if there is a current rate, or if their is not a current rate, that it represents what the current rate ought to be?—Exactly.

5023. Both those are matters of extreme difficulty?—Yes.

5024. But the Government would have to do it presumably if the schedule was sent in?—I am afraid what would happen would be this—if the Government insisted on that—these people would be compelled to call their workpeople together at once and they would have a little wages board of their own.

5025. A united wages board, or one for each factory?—It would be one for each factory to begin with. But that sort of thing would only be a beginning, and there would be an evolution from there, which would, I think, become general in the trade.

5026. The schedules come in from half-a-dozen different contractors, situated in half-a-dozen different parts of the country, carrying out their works on half-a-dozen different methods, perhaps some by time, some by piece, some sub-dividing their processes in one way, and some in another. How is the Government to compare those rates and to ascertain which really is a fair rate to pay?—There again, people can live cheaper in some parts of the country as you have mentioned than they can in others. In a country place they can live cheaper. There would be that difficulty, but I think reasonable people who would be looking over these tenders that would be sent in would say: "This has come from some rural district where living is cheap." I do not think because the rate was, say, 1d. an hour lower than one that came from London, where the rents are high for workpeople, that they ought to condemn it as being wrong. Do you not think it would have something of this effect—that it would do a little bit towards sending the population out into cheap places, where they could live a little better.

5027. Assuming you could get over, we will say, the difference of districts, how would you compare or standardise in any way the different processes of manufacture?—You must do that by a standard sample.

5028. The same terms do not represent the same thing in every house?—Suppose you fix a standard sample, there you have it made up, the sewing is in, the tacking is in, the buttons are put on in such a way, the buttonholes are either hand-made or machine-made, and all that sort of thing. It is all made up of these little items; and if you have a careful examiner afterwards, they would see that the things must be made to that standard. That is the way you will get at keeping the work the same.

5029. It is not keeping the work the same; it is arriving at the comparative merits of the wages?—Exactly; but the work must be the same as a basis. A pair of trousers might be made that might be worth, we will say, 5s. for the workmanship only; or it might be made in such a way that it would be worth 10s.; but if you have a reasonable standard, and see that everybody works to that standard, they will not give it to you better—you may rely on that to begin with—and what you have got to see is that you do not get it worse than that.

5030. Let us suppose that we have approved of the contract and the schedule of wages sent in with it, and afterwards there is a complaint about some of those wages; what would happen then?—If they have worked to what has been ascertained to be the approved rate, and the complaint is made afterwards, I do not see that the Government has anything to do with that. I think all the Government could say is that "these people were willing to work; it was the rate that was prevailing in this district; they agreed to do it as a fair wage—and that sort of thing; you had better go and talk to them, and get them to insist on having something better."

5031. Then your schedule is conditional on agreement between the masters and the workpeople, in the first instance?—Yes.

5032. You know that in the present disorganised state of the trade, that agreement is worth very little, for the reason that the workers will always underbid each other?—There is a good deal of under bidding, but they will not carry it quite so far as that. I think the man who underbids, as a rule, is a man who gives his work out afterwards. He gets a lot of poor victims, perhaps, to make it for him.

5033. With the large amount of, let us say, alien labour which there is in London at present, there is no difficulty in any manufacturer getting any number of hands into his factory?—I am afraid there is very little difficulty.

5034. They would agree to any rates practically?—They will, for the sake of learning the language and getting their foot in. You ought to stop these aliens, to a certain extent, perhaps, from coming in.

5035. At any rate, you would not regard it that the Government, having assented to the schedule of rates, were responsible for the correctness of them, and you do not think that any complaint against the rates would really lie at the door of the Government?—No.

5036. In fact, would you be able to say, "You approved of them; I have nothing more to say"?—Yes. My only point is that when the Government does get the rate, they ought to see that it is made to that rate and made under reasonable sanitary conditions, and all that sort of thing. That is the only thing I think the Government could do when the rate was once made.

5037. I am afraid you would find that the Government would be blamed for having adopted an unfair rate in a case like that?—The Government will get blamed in any way.

5038. (Mr. King.) If wages went up while this contract was running, and after the terms had been agreed to, would you expect the Government to pay a higher rate?—No. I think a contract would run on the wages as entered into.

5039. For three years or five years?—That is a long time.

5040. Contracts are for three years, are they not?—You do take a contract for three years, but sometimes you do not.

5041. (Mr. De la Bère.) Sometimes we do?—Two years is about the longest that I know of in municipal work.

5042. (Mr. King.) Do you think there should be no change, once the prices have been settled?—I do not say that. If the price went up I do not say they should not be charged.

5043. If the price went down, would you alter then?—That is a point, and it is a point that I have not considered. I am afraid that if a contractor went into a contract to do a thing at a certain price, he would have to take the risk of its going down, or going up, and making one fit against the other. I am afraid he would have to do it.

5044. You recommend the adoption of a national time log, I see from your proof?—Yes.

5045. Does that mean that the London time log should be extended to the whole country?—When you talk about the London time log you are talking about a log which is only worked to by perhaps 70 or 80 of the first-class firms in London—perhaps half a dozen in the City and the rest in the West End. As a matter of fact, that time log is excessive to the extent of one-third.

5046. What I really want to find out is, do you mean that there should be a uniform price all over the country?—No. When we urge the adoption of a national time log, we mean that it takes so many hours to make a coat or a pair of trousers in any part of the country—we do not care where it is—but the rate of pay ought to vary. We say that there should be a standard of time only for all over the country, and that the rate of pay should be according to the locality in which the work is done and the quality of the work.

5047. If a minimum rate were fixed, would you have the same minimum for men as for women?—No, certainly not, because the same thing is not expected of women as of men.

5048. If a woman can do a certain part of this work in the same time, and as quickly as a man, would you say it was right to pay the woman less than the man?—Yes, I would, if you found that you could get the women to work generally at a cheaper rate than the men, I think you are right to take advantage of that to a certain extent. There are some branches of tailoring in which women get paid better than men; for instance, speaking generally, a man cannot make a white waistcoat.

5049. If the work is such that men and women can do it equally well, as a matter of fact, would you still pay the women less?—I would pay the woman less, because less is expected of her.

The witness withdrew.

SEVENTEENTH DAY.

Thursday, March 26th, 1908.

At 32, Great George Street, Westminster, S.W.

PRESENT:

Sir GEORGE H. MURRAY, K.C.B. (Chairman).

Mr. F. W. Black.
Mr. A. Wilson Fox, C.B.
Mr. J. H. Hillier.
Mr. A. F. King.
Mr. J. J. Wills (Secretary).

Mr. Ernest N. Kent, called and examined.

5050. (Chairman.) You are a director of G. B. Kent & Sons, Limited, of London, are you not?—Yes.

5051. Do you represent any association of employers in the brush trade?—Yes, I represent the British Brush Manufacturers' Association.

5052. Are you chairman of it?—Yes.

5053. I think you have seen the letter that we addressed to the Employers' Parliamentary Council which contains suggestions that have been put before us by various persons representing the workmen?—Yes, the Trade Union evidence.

5054. I suppose we can take it that you approve of the Fair Wages Clause in Government contracts as a matter of principle?—As it is now inserted in the contracts.

5055. I am referring to the requirement that the current rate should be paid?—I agree with the Clause as it is now in the Government contracts.

5056. You agree with the principle of it?—Yes.

5057. Do you think it is desirable that you should have some basis of wages made compulsory in the contract?—The notes that I have put in front of you are rather to the contrary in some parts of our trade.

5058. I gather that you are objecting there to what is called the Trade Union rate; but you would not object, would you, to a clause making it compulsory to pay the rate that was paid by the average employer?—Personally, I am rather against that, because a great deal of machinery is being introduced and different methods have been put forward which are a great advantage to the employer and have reduced the cost, which, of course, is to the advantage of the Government also and all other people buying from us.

5059. How does the introduction of machinery affect the question of the current rate of wages? Do you mean that the current rate is so constantly altering owing to the introduction of new processes?—No. The Trade Union rate does not alter. What I have chiefly in my mind is the alteration of a method of manufacture principally of tooth-brushes which we have adopted by the introduction of machinery. There is, I know, one other manufacturer in the country who makes them in that way, but the majority of employers do not use that method—they make them by the old-fashioned hand method. My contention is that if a manufacturer employs new methods of making goods by machinery at a much cheaper rate, and does, in fact, pay his workpeople well and make his goods well, then that is one step ahead.

5060. Are the wages in your business at piece-work rates mostly?—Yes, they are mostly piece-work rates.

5061. Then is it only to piece-work rates that your argument would apply?—We employ a good many at day-work rates.

5062. The improvement in the processes would not make much difference in that direction, would it?—There are certain kinds of little processes that you cannot well put a fixed price on, and it is necessary that the people should take plenty of time to do them and not rush through them, so as to do them accurately and properly.

5063. If you did pay a time-rate the improvement in the processes would not affect the question at all, would it? You would be paying the current time-rate, only you would be getting more work out of your people by the aid of machinery?—Yes, we should be paying the current time-rate of the district.

5064. Then your objection would not apply in that case, and it would only apply to the piece-work rate?—I do not quite follow that, I am afraid.

5065. Your objection, as I understand, to a requirement to pay the current rate is that the current rate may represent two different amounts of work, that by the help of machinery you are able to turn out a much larger quantity with the same amount of labour, and that, therefore, the piece-work rate would not apply?—If I may show you some samples, I think I can explain it to you; I have had them got up on purpose. (Producing samples.) These illustrate the old-fashioned method of making the handles. A man is given that piece of bone and he has to crop it to that length; and there is a price for that cropping. Then it is given to another man to shape roughly like that. This (referring to other specimens) shows our present way of making the goods. This is the method employed by the largest makers on the Continent and in Japan. That is a piece of bone already cropped; we trim that by machine—one special man trims it. It is profiled like that, then these processes are put in by machinery. Then the piece of bone is handed to a workman or workwoman to put into the finished state, from that to that. But, as I have said, by the old-fashioned method one man does it all by hand.

5066. If you paid them by the piece in each case, of course the men would earn quite a different amount?—There is a Trade Union rate for making them in that way.

5067. Have you come to an agreement with them about what the price for the machine work should be?—No, we have not. We have come to an agreement for the processes between that and that.

5068. But not for the rest of it?—No.

5069. Then you would be in a position of some difficulty now if anybody asked you what the current rate for turning out that finished article was?—Yes, we should.

5070. To go back to what we began with, you do not object to the principle of your being compelled to pay whatever other people are paying, do you?—It would upset my business in this particular instance.

5071. I should say what other people are paying for the same thing done in the same way?—No, I should not object to that.

5072. You see the object is to prevent an employer, who wishes to pay what would be called an unfair rate of wages, from competing with employers who are ready to pay what is considered a proper rate. That is an object that you would approve of, I suppose, as a contractor?—Yes. The Trade Union for making the stocks from that to that was formed in 1892 or 1890, and there was a strike which happened in 1898. They struck then for more wages, but none of the employers thought it right that the men should be paid more wages. The strike lasted six months. In the meantime, our firm put down a lot of machinery and adopted these Continental methods of manufacture, which were a great deal cheaper. When the strike ended, we had still two or three men who did not belong to the Union any more, and we are now paying them the same rates as we were paying before the strike. So in the case of about three men—I think it is either two or three men now—we are paying them less than the Trade Union rate, because they do not belong to the Union, and they do not have to put by their subscription each week towards the raising of funds for the Union. They are paid the same rate as they were before the strike.

5073. You have not been able to get an agreed rate for these machine processes, have you?—No. We are always altering them or trying new devices and arrangements.

5074. Does it amount to this, that in your trade there practically is no current rate?—In my particular business I might say there is not.

5075. Would you object to the phrase "Trade Union rate as agreed on by the employers and employed"?—I think I should.

5076. Why?—Because all people do not pay the same rate. Some employers pay more than others.

5077. Then is there no possibility of an agreement? The Government work itself perhaps might be paid for at Trade Union rates, but that would absolutely preclude my shop from making these tooth-brushes. This is the future way of making tooth-brushes—there is no doubt about that. We have been using it for about eight years now; that is the method employed in other parts of the world, and in very much larger quantities than it has ever been applied to in England.

5078. Do the men earn more or less in the day by the new process than they did by the old one?—They are not skilled men.

5079. Not the men who look after the machines?—They become partly skilled; it is skilled labour to an extent, after they have been at it for two or three years.

5080. What have you to say with reference to the difficulty which has been raised about fixing what the current rate should be where a manufacturer is the sole manufacturer in his own district? Do you see any solution for that?—I should suggest that there are probably other factories in the same district though in other trades, and that the men employed in the brush factories might be paid about the same rates as they are paid. For instance, there is a very much larger concern next door to us which employs about 2,000 hands, and we are obliged to pay our people about the same rates as they pay theirs.

5081. What is their business?—They are paper manufacturers. If we do not pay as big a wage as they do, the workpeople go off to them.

5082. Could they easily turn from making tooth-brushes to making paper?—Yes, and they do every week or fortnight.

5083. Then you would go by the analogy of the other trades in the district?—Yes. That can only refer to day-work, of course.

5084. Is your work done mostly in factories or at home?—There is only one process practically that is done at home, and that is putting the bristles in the brushes.

5085. Is that always done at home?—No, not in all cases; but I should say three-fourths and four-fifths of it is, and always has been. Of late years there have been several automatic machines introduced for putting bristles into the brushes without touching them by hand.

5086. Are the people who work at home in your direct employment, or do you sub-contract for that?—They are in our direct employment.

5087. And you pay them all?—Yes.

5088. Not only the head of the family, for instance?—That we cannot exactly tell to a nicety. The woman may be working for us for a few years and she will still go on taking work home. In the meantime, unknown to us, she might have taught her daughter, and her daughter will come in for work and say she can draw. We cannot tell that the daughter does not practice on some of the goods that the mother has out, for instance.

5089. Probably she does?—Yes, I think so.

5090. But you pay the mother and not the daughter?—Yes; she is the only one we recognise.

5091. One of the points that has been raised—I forget whether in connection with your trade or not—is that there is a good deal of what practically amounts to sub-contracting in that way, namely, that the head of the family or some member of the family takes work from a firm and places it out among his family or his friends?—I do not think that occurs in our trade, at least, it does not in my business, because we should be able to notice that that person was taking out a great deal more work than she could possibly do—and we do not notice that.

5092. Would you object to that?—Yes, we should.

5093. Should you object to a clause in the contract to the effect that all the work was to be done on your own premises?—Yes. That would be impossible, I think, throughout the brush trade, at least throughout the drawn brush trade.

5094. What is your objection to it?—We should have to acquire very much larger premises to seat these people. Then there would be great difficulty in teaching them. Putting bristles into brushes is very easy and light work, and it is done at home by the people.

5095. You do not think you would find any compensating advantages in the factory system?—No. We encourage some of them who work in our factories to do it, so that we can get through orders in a hurry; we teach them that kind of thing so that we can supervise them.

5096. Does that system of taking the work home tend to depress the wages paid?—I do not think so—at any rate, it does not in our case.

5097. It enables them to bring in the help of children and people like that, who might not otherwise be able to do it?—It does enable a woman to do that.

5098. Would that not have a tendency to depress the rate of wages in the business?—In my experience it has not done so.

5099. What do they get for that work of filling the brushes?—They get from 4s. up to 5s. a gross.

5100. What does that come to for a week or a day?—A drawing hand in the factory could earn about 12s. a week and more. We have some drawing in the factory by the aid of a machine which enables them to do it twice as quickly, and some of the women earn 14s. to 15s. a week.

5101. Are they girls or adult women?—As a rule they start in the factory as girls, and they stop with us for a number of years.

5102. It is work that a girl can do?—Yes, it is very light work which she can take up when she leaves school.

5103. And would she get from 12s. to 15s. a week?—A good hard-working woman would.

5104. How many hours would it take her to earn that?—We work 9½ hours a day except Saturdays.

5105. Do you have a half-day on Saturday?—Yes, we work then up to one o'clock.

5106. You would never think of paying women at the same rate as men, I suppose, for the same kind of work?—No.

5107. Any condition of that kind would end in the women not being employed at all, I suppose?—Yes, it would tend to that, I think; but then it would be impossible to teach men to put the bristles into little brushes like this.

5108. That is not work that a man can do, do you say?—No; it is too small.

5109. I gather that you would have an objection to the names of the contractors being published?—I put it in my proof that I did not think that was necessary.

5110. The necessity only arises in this way: The workmen say that they want to know whether the Fair Wages Clause in the Government contracts is being complied with, but they cannot tell that unless they know who has got a Government contract. Would you object to an announcement in the public Press, say once a month, of the names of the people who have got contracts from Government Departments?—No. I do not think that would make any difference really; but I should certainly think that it would not be to the advantage of the employers to publish the rates at which the contracts were given.

5111. There is no question of publishing any more than the name of the firm and the nature of the goods which are the subject of the contract?—If it did not go any further than that, I should not think there would be any disadvantage.

5112. (Mr. Wilson Fox.) Have you got an Employers' Association in your trade?—Yes, the British Brush Manufacturers' Association. We represent it.

5113. I am afraid I came in late, but I heard you say that you paid on different rates, and I was wondering if you have got an Employers' Association how it is you have not got more uniformity of payment for the same class of work?—Our Association was only formed in January last, and we have not got as far as that.

5114. Does not the fact of the existence of an Employers' Association in London tend to more uniformity in the prices paid to the workpeople?—That is one subject we are going to consider—whether it is practicable.

5115. You said there was not uniformity, and therefore it was difficult to state either what was the current rate of wage or how far you could agree with the men about a Trade Union rate of wage. I see according to your rules that one of your objects is to make and define rules and regulations for obtaining uniformity of wages and customs in the British brush trade; if that is attempted by your newly-formed association, are you not likely to have less difficulty in future in London in ascertaining what the current rate is?—The point we have to consider is the price to be paid for work done in the same way by different employers.

5116. Of course I am referring to the same class of work. I have just read out one of the objects that you had in forming your association; and I should think that you are likely under that to get more uniformity in the future?—Yes.

5117. That would be an advantage, would it not, to the individual manufacturers? In tendering for a contract it is much better for you all to know that you are not cutting into each other, and that as far as labour is concerned you are all approaching the Government on the same basis of wages; is it not?—It would not be to the advantage of a firm that has adopted improved methods and is able to produce the same result at a cheaper rate.

5118. You mean if they had to pay more; but it is to the advantage of the better firms, is it not, to get an agreement, because it is the smaller firms perhaps that might be doing inferior work who are competing against the better firms for contracts?—I think in our trade it is only the larger firms who pay good wages who tender for Government contracts.

5119. That is so, is it, as a fact?—I believe so. The different Departments make inquiries about them.

5120. As a general proposition it is all the better, is it not, for the best firms if you can get all the employers in a district into line paying the same rate for the same class of work—I mean levelling up to you?—Levelling up as regards wages? Are you supposing we are paying the highest wages?

5121. It is all the better for the best firms to have the smaller firms levelling up their wages to the standard of the good firms?—Yes, that is so. But if I may class myself among the good firms I should say that in some instances, as I have just described, we pay considerably less wages per gross of work turned out than other firms who work on the old-fashioned methods.

5122. That I can quite understand, per gross of work turned out; that is taking the results, no doubt, of men and machinery together?—Yes.

5123. But in regard to the actual day rates you would probably pay more than some of the smaller people?—Yes; I think in day rates we pay very fair full wages.

5124. Generally speaking, if there is an Employers' Association, you are much more likely to be able to deal with a Trade Union than you are without an Employers' Association?—Yes.

5125. Have you yourself had many complaints made against you by the men with regard to the Fair Wages Clause?—It has come to my notice recently, since this Committee has been sitting, that in one particular trade we were supposed not to pay good wages—that is the one I have been referring to; but in the wood brush trade I am told that we have got a good name.

5126. And you have not had complaints in that?—No; but we have had a complaint from one Government Department on that question.

5127. Have the men put forward any other demands in connection with Government work apart from wages?—No, I think not—at any rate not that I have heard of.

5128. I mean that you should adopt any other conditions?—No. There is one point I was coming to with regard to the wages for Government work. There is a very curious thing in connection with one particular brush that is made for a Government Department—the Navy. There is a brush called the sweep's brush; if it is made for an employer's own stock and for his regular trade, the men will do the work at a cheaper rate than they will if they know it is Navy work. The one rate is 20 knots a penny and the other is 18.

5129. Have you got a regular arrangement about that with them? If they know it is Government work do you pay them as a matter of course the higher rate?—We do.

5130. Do they ask for it when they know it is Government work, or do you say: "This is Government work, and we are going to pay you the higher rate"?—It has been going on now for some years, and I really do not think I was present when the rate was fixed. It is not only in our shop, but in other shops, too, that all these Navy sweep's brushes are made at the higher rate of wages.

5131. Is that now an established system in your establishment?—Yes, and in other firms, too. It is rather a curious thing that if they make the same brush for the general trade they will make it at a cheaper rate. That does not seem to me like fair wages.

5132. Was that a demand originally by the Union?—Not recently.

5133. Did the Union suggest that?—I do not think the employers would have suggested it.

5134. Did the Union suggest it?—Yes, the Union suggested it.

5135. Did you contest it at all?—I do not know whether our firm did. I was not present when the arrangement was made. It has been going on for some years now.

5136. What sort of proportion of Union and non-Union men do you employ?—We employ all Union men in two branches, out of, you may say, four and a half. There is one little branch, I believe, that is still extant in some parts of the country for finishing brushes, but I do not think it has counted in London for some years. I believe in some parts there is a Trade Union rate for finishing brushes. The other branches are painting brushes, bristle dressing, which is called hair sorting, and the pan trade, that is the setting of brooms. We pay, on all those, Trade Union rates to Trade Union people.

5137. Practically all the men you employ, I understand, are Trade Union people?—No, we have a good many other men.

5138. What sort of proportion—can you tell me? Are two-thirds of your men Union men, or what?—I should think it is about one-fifth, that is, counting all our men all over the place.

5139. One-fifth are not Union men, do you mean?—One-fifth are Union men.

5140. And only one-fifth?—Yes.

5141. Then you have not had to come to an agreement about Trade Union rates of wages?—There is only one branch in which there is a Trade Union in which we do not pay Trade Union rates in our place. That is the making of tooth-brush handles.

5142. Is there any class of work which women do in your establishment that the men have objected to their doing?—No. There are classes of work that women now do that men used to do some years ago; but they have not raised any objection to it being taken away from them.

5143. So there has never been any trouble on that score?—Not in the last 30 years—not since I have been in it.

5144. (Mr. Black.) Do you think there is any defence at all for paying the higher rate upon Government work? Is it suggested, for example, that there is more rigid inspection?—No, I think not. It is the only instance I know of a higher rate being paid for Government work, and I think the inspection is just as rigid on all other articles as on that particular brush.

5145. What happens to the workers when the Government rejects the work, for example; have they got to make it all over again?—That depends on the employer. It may be partly the result of inferior material; but if it is inferior work I should say that the man has to make it again without being paid.

5146. You do not think there is a greater percentage of rejection by the Government for inferior workmanship than there might be in private trade?—Not for ordinary work.

5147. You have never heard it suggested that that is a reason for that difference of two knots a penny, have you?—No; and I do not know the reason of it at all. I should have thought considering it is very nice easy work, and that there is a good steady flow of it, in very large quantities, that the men would at least have taken the same rate as there is in the general trade.

5148. They would not complain that they were sweated at the lower rate in the private trade, would they?—No; they never do. I have here the list of prices that they drew up themselves. It is a little antiquated.

5149. That is for all work, not Government work in particular, is it?—This is for all work. This particular instance does not appear in this book.

5150. That is something they have got outside that then?—Yes. They have not drawn up their prices since 1872. There is one list of prices in this book for drawn work, and I think there are only about two small firms in the country who would be paying it now. All that work used to be done by men, and it is all done by women; it is drawing the bristles or material into household brushes.

5151. I suppose the Unions do not show much disposition to come to you and try to arrange a rate according to your change of processes? Does it come to this, that you put on unskilled workers who are outside the Union?—Yes.

5152. That is in this tooth-brush manufacture?—Yes.

5153. They complain that it takes it away from the skilled workers, I suppose?—That is so.

5154. They do not attempt to come to you and say, "Machines are coming in, therefore let us fix a new rate, taking that into account"?—No.

5155. That is not the attitude of the Union?—No. It is more boys and girls now that we employ on these machines.

5156. Have they not made that a subject of complaint with you?—Not directly, but indirectly I have heard it. I have heard it through the War Office within the last fortnight.

5157. In regard to the piece-rate for brushes, do the rates vary according to whether the brush is an easy one to make or not?—Yes.

5158. Take the tooth-brushes for example; some of these square-headed brushes are easier to make, are they not?—Yes.

5159. But the men rather claim that there ought to be an average rate, do they not? I think that was rather suggested to us. Supposing you had a very large order for the straight-headed brushes and you had oval-headed and more difficult brushes to make; would you give those out indiscriminately and pay an average rate, or would you give out a big quantity of the easier ones and say, "We have had to quote a lower rate per gross for them"?—In that particular case there is not any difference in the making of the handles whether square-headed or oval-headed. But when you come to large pieces of bone—round handles—they are more money. For instance, the regular patterns are 6s. 6d. a gross, and the round-handled ones, the same quality, are 8s. That is the difference in what we pay now.

5160. On the question of the publication of names, I suppose that would not hinder you in any way in arranging for your raw material, would it?—No, not at all.

5161. You would not say, "Well, if the Government decide to publish names they should hold back the publication for a fortnight till we have settled up for our raw material", or anything of that kind?—That had not struck me, but it might make a difference if the merchants of the raw material knew one had to procure the goods.

5162. That raw material is bought abroad, I believe, is it not?—Yes, but the wood-work, for instance, and the wire, and that sort of thing, are bought in the country.

5163. It might be a point worth considering?—Yes, but it has not struck me. Why I mention this subject in my proof was on account of the municipal boroughs nowadays publishing in the papers the actual prices.

5164. The Chairman has explained that is not in question, and that the point is merely publishing the names; but would you like a fortnight's interval, say, to enable you to settle up for the raw material?—I think that would obviate any difficulty at all.

5165. You think it would?—Yes.

5166. Do you think that would be worth doing?—I think so.

5167. I suppose it would be some help to you?—I do not think it would be any advantage to the employers to publish the names, but it would be an advantage to the men.

5168. You would not see any serious objection to the publication, would you?—No.

5169. You would rather like to know, sometimes, would you not, which of your competitors has got a certain order?—We have our means of finding that out.

5170. (Mr. Hillier.) Harking back, what would be the objection to a clause in the contract requiring all the work to be done in the factory? Why should not all the Government work be done in the factory?—To manage it inside the factory it would make it necessary to seat a great many more girls, which would certainly increase the expenses of the business. The difficulty in employing female labour at all is that you take on a girl at about 14 or 15, and when she gets to about 19 or 20 she leaves you to get married. If she does get married she can still do the work at home. It is a very great expense to us to teach these girls, and a very great bother, really; we are some months teaching them and they are constantly leaving.

5171. But you do find it necessary to employ them?—You are speaking of one particular branch, that is the drawing of the brushes.

5172. That is the branch in which most of the home-work is done, is it not?—Yes, that is where the home-work is done. If home-work were abolished, in my case you would have to build a factory to provide room for another 200 girls, which would make a very great addition to one's expenses at the end of the year and would put up the cost of the article.

5173. Now with regard to the pan-work, is any of that home-work?—No.

5174. That is all done in the factory?—Yes, all.

5175. About the effect of home-work giving at any rate a suspicion of sweating or sub-letting, you said that if a woman took more than her share of home-work attention would be drawn to it. What interest would it be to you whether the woman took more than a fair share of the work if she is paid a certain rate?—It is rather against our principles to sub-let. We always like to have the control of the work we give out, and we do not like the principle of sub-letting because it verges on what might be called sweating.

5176. But you have no control now, have you? Directly the work is taken home you do not know whether it is sweated or not, do you?—No, I do not think we do; at least, we could not make sure except by visiting the homes. We supply the Government with a list of all out-workers and their addresses.

5177. That could not prevent the sweating?—We have not any notion that we have any sweating in connection with our business.

5178. In regard to the proportion that you state of Trade Union men working as compared with the others, I take it that you pay Trade Union rates to the men who have a Trade Union for that particular class of work?—Yes, to all except one branch.

5179. To all except the tooth-brush branch?—Yes.

5180. Are there many parts of a brush bought from abroad in a partly-manufactured state?—Some kinds of handles are, and some kind of bristle which you can buy and put into the brush is dressed abroad.

5181. Do you buy parts with the holes drilled?—Yes, one can buy stocks with the holes drilled.

5182. Is that general among the good firms?—I have not much experience of that. I know one firm which, I believe, sells a good many of them; but we do not employ them.

5183. (Mr. King.) Do you supply all the material for these home-workers?—Yes.

5184. They do not find any material?—No, except there is one man polishing out of doors, and it is the custom in the trade, I believe, for all polishers to find their own polish. That is the only thing.

5185. Do you think the home-workers would object if home-work was stopped?—I think it would be very bad for them indeed, as they rely on it for their existence chiefly. There is nothing unhealthy about it, and it is very nice, light work and clean work.

5186. You said something about the women marrying and leaving you; have you any regulation not to employ married women?—No; we employ some of them in the factory.

5187. They prefer to work at home, you find?—Yes, I think so. They have home-work to do when they cannot get to their factory at the proper hours.

5188. Is there any class of work in your trade on which both men and women are employed?—Yes, there is the tooth-brush making.

5189. On exactly the same class of work?—Yes; the women do certain parts that a man would do in the making of a whole brush.

5190. What I want to find out is whether if you had such work and they were both on piece-rates you would give the same piece-rate to the man and to the woman doing the same work?—I am against paying women the same rate as men for the same kind of work.

5191. (Chairman.) There is one point I want to clear up. You have mentioned that in some branches of your business you pay what is called the Trade Union rate, but in the bone-work I gathered that you did not. Was that due to these improved processes and machinery being introduced? Was that the reason why you did not pay their rate?—No; that is due to the strike which happened in 1898. We pay the same rate as we did before.

The witness withdrew.

Mr. Charles Hamilton Watkins, called and examined.

5192. (Chairman.) You are a director of Hamilton & Co., Limited, London, are you not?—Yes.

5193. Are you representing the British Brushmakers' Association in any capacity?—I am a member of the Association.

5194. You have heard Mr. Kent's evidence, so I need not take you over the whole ground again. I gather that you are quite satisfied with the existing form of the Fair Wages Clause in which it speaks of the "current rate"?—Personally, I think that the current rate of wage is a very good thing to try and work up to, but in our business—the brush trade—it is very difficult to find what is a current rate. I can give an example of one branch of the trade, which personally I am not interested in, where there is a great difference between what the Trade Union would consider is the current rate, and the rate that is being paid by 95 per cent. of the manufacturers; that is, in the drawing of all sorts of brushes. There is really no current rate in the trade except for a few specified classes of brush work. You can take exactly the same class of work, and the Trade Union rate as it exists in their price list will be a certain figure for doing the whole thing by hand, and yet that same thing can be done exactly by the processes of machinery. Take, for instance, the boring of holes. At the present day there are automatic boring machines which will bore a whole lot of holes while one man will be looking at it. I take it that if a current rate is instituted, everybody would have to pay the same rate for boring 40 holes as is now being paid by some for boring 400. That will be a difficulty in the trade. There are plenty of little brushmakers, and I believe there are some contractors who do all their work by hand in the old-fashioned method; but most of the larger firms have broken away from all restrictions, and are making their own rates of wages. The point that strikes me in fixing this rate of wage—it has been discussed very much this afternoon—is, on what basis is it to be fixed?—There is a difficulty about fixing a rate. If you take Mr. Kent's rate for making tooth-brushes by machinery, for instance, and fix that as the rate, it would come very hard on the man who is doing all the work by hand.

5195. The methods of the different firms in the trade are so various that it would be almost impossible to fix a rate which would cover them all?—That is the trouble. For instance, some people do all their drawn work by machinery; some people use machinery in parts of it; some people use hand work generally. It would be a very difficult matter to find a rate of wage which would cover all those people satisfactorily. If a rate of wage were fixed, some would be paying too high a rate of wage even if you start with the Trade Union rate as being correct.

5196. Do you know, as a matter of fact, whether Government contract work goes rather to the more progressive firms or to others?—I should say that in the household trade it does.

5197. The most go-ahead firms get the business?—The big firms who employ machinery largely are the people as far as I know who are getting most of the Government contracts.

5198. Are their workmen, as far as you know, fairly contented with what they are getting?—I must not really speak on a matter of that sort, as I do not know for certain; but I should say that in the brush trade the wages paid are fairly satisfactory to the workers.

5199. You have no disputes in your own case, at any rate?—No. We are adopting the use of female labour in our own particular branch—paint-brush making; and we have no difficulty in getting plenty of girls satisfied with the rate of pay.

5200. Is much of your work done at home?—None of it in the paint-brush trade is done at home. I do not think it is general anywhere to do it.

5201. Is it all factory work?—All factory work.

5202. I gather that the Trade Union is rather weak in your trade?—It is a small Trade Union. The Trade Union in the paint-brush trade numbers not more than 150 to 160 members. I know two or three shops where they are employing amongst them perhaps 50 or 60 non-Union paint-brush makers. As I have mentioned in my notes, the rates of pay in the painting-brush trade generally are based on Trade Union rates, for the simple reason that the wages form a very small proportion of the cost of most of the painting-brushes. It is just as convenient to take a Trade Union rate as the basis for wages in our trade as to take any other basis. When we broke away from the Union some five to six years ago on the question of the subdivision of the work—of getting more work done by the same number of hands and getting it quicker done or better done—we came across that trouble of not knowing what rate we were to start with. When we altered the rates of wages, we based our calculations on the average earnings of the Trade Unionists, and when we took away a process which was substituted by machinery, we made a sort of balance between what the worker was going to lose and what we were going to gain. I will give you an instance connected with the making of certain brushes. There is a large amount of pure manual hard labour connected with the skilled work of making the brushes called sash tools. There, the workman takes out the bristles and the handles, and he has to saw out a sort of mortise in each of these round handles. He does about half-a-dozen or so at a time, and it is laborious work and not skilled work. Another process that they have to do when the brushes are made is washing the dirty bristles and getting them clean. Those were two processes that we saw years ago were unskilled portions of the work, and we were very anxious to relieve the paint-brush makers of that work. Of course, we knew there would be a question of what we were to deduct for doing it—that is, how much we were to take off the Trade Union rate of wages for the work. We offered, in our dispute with the Union, to pay for what was left at a higher rate of wages than they were getting. We could get this saw-cutting done at about 3d. a gross, and it would cost us by employing a man about 3s. I do not mean to say we were going to take all that 3s.: that was not our proposal. We said: We will give you half the difference, that is to say, we will add to your wages 1s. 6d. a gross. It leaves the rest of the work very much easier to do. We took away the two most laborious processes and paid a good rate of wages for what is left. That is, I take it, one of the things that is hit at in one of the clauses of the summary of the workmen's evidence where they speak of paying the unskilled part of a job at a higher rate than the skilled. That is a thing, I think, which most manufacturers have a great objection to do. We could not see, when we could get the work done by a machine at 3d. a gross, why we should keep a man working three hours doing work which is very hard work and pay him 3s. The result now is that we have got wages fixed for doing the work which are really Trade Union rates, less the part of the cost of the preparation of those handles.

5202*a*. You are talking mainly of the question of subdividing?—Yes, entirely; it was owing to the fact that there were so few men in the trade, and that the Union were not able to supply the requirements of the shops that employed their members that we adopted sub-division. We could not go on having our business regulated and limited entirely according to the number of men that the Trade Union liked to supply us with. At the time of the Government contracts, everybody wants Trade Union men, and if we did not happen to have a contract, the men would leave us and go to work elsewhere on Government contracts, probably just at the time when we are wanting them as badly as any other people. Our business had to wait while these men were away for three or four months; and when they came back, we had to go on again, but we lost our trade in the meantime. Then they would not allow us to employ non-Union labour alongside of them. A point that we tried to impress upon them was that if we paid Union rates to non-Union workers, there could be no objection to bringing more people into the shops; but they would not assent to that; in fact, they took a very arbitrary view; and we just had to take up a similar obstinate position and turn them out.

5203. Why do you say they left you to go and do Government work?—That was a periodical thing, and every year we were bound to have that. We might have 30 or 33 men at work, and we might have had a very great difficulty in getting 33 during the busy season. When Government contracts would be about, for large quantities of a few patterns, perhaps half-a-dozen of our men would leave and be distributed among the contractors. We had no hold on our men, and we could not say they were not to go. They just came and went as they liked.

5204. A Government contract would not be more attractive to them than any other, would it?—Yes, it would, because a Government contract in painting-brush work would run on one or two patterns only, and a man would get into a workshop where he would have nothing but one pattern to make—and a jolly good one, too. When you have a contract for 30,000 or 40,000 of large-size brushes such as 10 oz. distemper or 4s. paint brushes, for which the Union wages are 38s. and 24s. per gross respectively, and which are considered the pick of the work, a man would, of course, prefer to go to a shop like that where he can go on working for a long time on those patterns.

5205. (Mr. Wilson Fox.) And it is less trouble, too, I suppose, to keep on working at the same pattern?—It is also less trouble. Really, if a man works hard he might earn £3 or £4 a week easily on that class of work. We have men now in our employ who, without laborious work, are able to earn larger wages than they were earning before, and we are getting more work done, which is the thing we want. But supposing you take our present rate, the men in the Trade Union would not be satisfied with it for these 10 oz. distemper brushes. They would say, "Yes, but we have got to prepare the handles." We are deducting 10d. for that done by machinery, but they would probably want 3s. or 4s. added to the rate for it, and so make the rate higher than it would be in a Union shop. We have found that the Trade Union, when they have anything to do with fixing wages, always take the highest rate ever paid by anybody, irrespective of the work that has to be done. That was our trouble with regard to the subdivision of labour. They said, "We are perfectly agreed that the subdivision of labour is a good thing; we can quite see that we will do more work, and that we shall have an easier time; but we cannot accept it unless you are prepared to pay us the same rate that you are paying now." That seemed to us a very unsatisfactory proposition, and we could not agree to it. The reason I am going into these personal details is to show the difficulty of fixing a rate even in the painting-brush trade. If you fix a rate according to Trade Union practice, we should not be able to tender for any Government work at all, because we should not care to introduce a system of paying higher rates than we have fixed, which rates we consider are higher than the present Trade Union rates. It would merely re-act again on the Unionist employers, who would then have to fix their rates as compared with ours, and pay more for the extra work which the men had to do over what we were paying them for. We are paying a higher rate than the Trade Union rate appears to be, even taking some of the work away. There was one case of a brush, which is a very simple brush to make—it is almost mechanical work—where the men fixed the price when it was introduced, at a most prohibitive rate; we are now getting those brushes made by female labour, without any particular tuition, at just half the rate.

5206. (Chairman.) Half the piece-work rate, do you mean?—It is all piece-work.

5207. The effect of sub-division should be to increase the wages paid to the more skilled men, I suppose?—Exactly.

5208. Do they recognise that?—They recognised that, but at the same time they did not like the alteration of their own published prices. They said: "We have got a price for making sash tools and we are not going to alter it even if you take half the work away." That seems to be the trouble with regard to the fixing of a rate. As I say, certain firms have broken away, and now it will be very difficult to fix a general rate. We consider our rates are quite fair, and that anybody could take them as a basis for fixing wages. In one case we are paying 36s. 6d. where the Trade Union are getting 38s., and, therefore, we should not be considered to be paying what is called the current rate, but we know that, as a matter of fact, we are really paying higher than the current rate.

5209. Practically, you have no agreed rates at all, at present, as I gather?—In our firm we have, but then we have only made arrangements with our own men; we have agreed with them about the wages and made an arrangement with them. Then there is the published Trade Union rate.

5210. But that is not a rate which is generally accepted by the employers?—Any employer who saw his opportunity would undoubtedly follow our example and make his own rate for the work and subdivide it.

5211. You yourselves, for instance, do not accept the Trade Union rate as a whole?—No; but, as I told you in the first instance, we base all our wages on Trade Union rates, except where it is a new pattern and made by a totally different process, and there we base our wages on the work that is done.

5212. I see that you have got a note in your proof on the question whether the contractor should be compelled to pay on all the work that he does, the same rates that he pays on Government work; you object to any proposal of that kind?—I object to it on principle, because, in our own instance, supposing the Fair Wages Clause were adopted and we were compelled to pay Trade Union rates for any Government work we happened to get, that would mean that we should practically have to pay that rate for the whole of our work at that time, because, of course, the men would not accept one rate of pay for one part of the work and a lower rate when they went back to the ordinary work. There is no difference in the work. If we have to pay 40s. for making a Government distemper brush while we are paying 36s., we will say, on distemper brushes for other people, we should be forced to raise our rate all round to 40s. against our own knowledge of what is proper and right, and of what is considered right by the Trade Union. That is the difficulty there.

5213. Have you any objection to the publication of the contractors' names?—Personally, I do not think it makes much difference whether the names are published or not. I think most people know in a very short time who has got the contract. But I think that if Mr. Black's proposition of holding back the names for a fortnight were adopted that would get over any difficulty that any manufacturer might have.

5214. (Mr. King.) Are you not mixing up the question of the fixed rate with the current rate? It is not a proposal that we should fix the rate?—I know; but what I say in regard to fixing the current rate is that there is no current rate in the brush trade. Take, for instance, the rate that we are paying at our works at Harrow; there are no other brush works at Harrow; we pay the rates which I have mentioned on certain articles, and those are the current rates for making those goods there.

5215. Are there not a considerable number of employers that do pay very nearly the same rates as yourselves?—The difference is not very great in the painting brush industry; but the bulk of employers do not pay the rates we pay.

5216. Do they pay more?—Yes, from one point of view; but taking it the way I put it they pay less, because their men have to do so much more work for very little more pay.

5217. How many employers do you think there are paying the Union rate?—All the principal painting-brush makers in the country pay the Trade Union rate with the exception of about three or four. It is rather difficult to say off-hand, because painting-brushes are made pretty universally, and there are lots of small shops where they have one or two men who cannot be Union men.

5218. If all the firms but two or three pay the Union rate, is not the Union rate the current rate?—It might be considered to be the current rate; and then the point is, will you enforce that rate against our rate.

5219. We do not want to force it on anyone; we simply try to find out what is the current rate?—If it is stated in a contract that the current rate will have to be paid by contractors——

5220. That is stated at present?—Then the difficulty is to know what is the basis of the current rate. We have had a small amount of Government work: are we to take as the current rate the rate that we have been paying, or are we to be considered as violating the rule by paying our rate as against the rate that other people pay?

5221. If your rate is less than the rate generally paid——?—It is less in figures, but we consider it is more in fact as we give the man less work to do for a very small reduction in his wages.

5222. Does he earn as much money in the day?—He earns more money.

5223. Then I think you would be paying more than the current rate?—But the Trade Union would not consider that.

5224. I think you told us that the work of the Government contracts was easier than the ordinary work of the factory?—It is not easier individually.

5225. But the men could earn more at it?—It is easier from the fact that the number of patterns made is so few.

5226. And the men could earn more?—Where a man gets a large quantity of the best patterns of brushes to make that he can go on with for months, he knows very well that he has only got to do that work; whereas in the ordinary trade he has to take what work there is in the shop; he has to take the good work with the work that is not quite so well paid.

5227. Would that not be a reason for getting Government work done cheaper at a lower rate?—It ought to be if there is a larger quantity.

5228. You have not that practice in your trade, have you, of paying higher prices for Government work?—No, I do not think so. I believe there is an old list with special Government prices, but I do not know whether they are higher or lower; we have not had much to do with the Trade Union prices lately.

5229. On Clause 4 you say that: "The proposal that women should be paid the same rate of wages as men could not be entertained"; you would not accept that as covering piece-rates if they were doing the same sort of work, would you?—No; but in the painting brush trade I think there are many branches of piece-work that the women could not undertake—they could do a portion of it, but not the whole.

5230. If there is work that men and women can do equally well on piece-work rates, what then?—I would not agree to the principle there of paying a woman the same as a man, for the simple reason that you have to take the trouble of teaching the woman, and after you have taught her there is the possibility of very shortly losing her. You are constantly having to get fresh hands among the women workers, whereas with the men the bulk of them stay with you for years.

5231. (Mr. Hillier.) The average weekly earnings would be some indication of the fair rate of wages, would it not?—I do not think that you could even take that as a fair average, because there is such a very considerable difference in the work of the men. Some men may earn £2 a week, and on the same class of work and at the same rate of wages, others will not earn 30s.

5232. But you can average that, can you not?—Yes, I could average it by the time, but I say it would be difficult to get a proper piece-work rate which would be fair to everybody from that average.

5233. The difficulty, I understand, in fixing a rate is the difficulty of apportioning what I may call the value of the labour-saving appliances?—Yes.

5234. Because very few firms have exactly the same kind of labour-saving appliances, and, therefore, each firm has to average one with the other?—Yes, that is the difficulty.

5235. As far as your branch is concerned, there would be no objection, I take it, for a clause stipulating that all your work should be done in the factory?—Not at all.

5236. (Mr. Black.) I rather gather that you contend that you are paying fair wages?—Yes, quite so.

5237. Supposing a complaint were lodged against you, what is really your defence? I thought you would argue the average, but according to what you have just said to Mr. Hillier, apparently you would not?—Supposing, for instance, the complaint was made as to our wages, the only way I could prove we were paying proper wages would be to show you a dissection of the wages; in other words, to show you how we apportion payment for that part of the labour that was taken away from the man who is now left to do the skilled portion.

5238. That would bring us down to the average weekly earnings, would it not?—It would bring you to the fact that we are paying a higher rate for skilled work than the Trade Unionist gets.

5239. We should get down to the weekly earnings roughly, should we not?—I do not quite see that you would. We have no weekly rates at all in our business.

5240. So you would still be making a comparison with the piece-work rates?—Yes.

5241. You could make a comparison, could you not, by allowing so much for the facilities?—There is one way in which you might average it. We might take a certain portion of the work and say that that could be done at so much; then we should have to decide what of that we would give to the skilled man and what of it we would give to the machine hands. That is a sort of averaging up, and I suppose in that way it would be, as you might say, averaging it.

5242. But, at any rate, it would not come to a weekly rate?—No. We usually assume when we are roughly calculating the wages that a skilled worker will earn from 1s. to 1s. 2d. per hour, and if we find that a job is going to take one or two hours, or three hours, or whatever it may be, we make a rough calculation on that basis.

5243. So it would really come to a weekly rate?—You would come to that in fixing the rate. Since we have been at our works at Harrow and have broken away from the Union, we have altered our wages two or three times; where we have found that the wages have not been quite correct or that we have been treading on somebody's toes, we have revised them. Most of the revisions have been increases, and I do not think we have reduced the wages on any article except by the introduction of female labour.

5244. I suppose that when you move out into the country, you do not get a free hand altogether to fix what wages you like?—We could have done so if we had liked, but I do not think people use that privilege always. Take the painting-brush trade; there is no doubt that the whole of the work can be done by women, but I do not think any manufacturer would care to do that. The materials are so costly in our business, and there are such large quantities of them used in a comparatively small quantity of brushes, that you do not want to run the risk of losing the material in order to save a very small proportion of your cost of production. I have some figures which will give you an idea of the very small proportion that the wages are in some of these brushes—in fact the wages do not count at all. On a 10 oz. distemper brush of the best quality—that is, the highest price—the entire wages on the cost of the whole of the materials is only $5\frac{1}{4}$ per cent.; that is, on the making of the brush $3\frac{1}{4}$ per cent., and the dressing of the bristles is 2 per cent. on the cost of the bristles; so that the whole lot of wages paid for making those brushes, including the dressing of the bristles is $5\frac{1}{4}$ per cent. The 10 oz. distemper-brush is a very big brush and a valuable brush. Then you may go down and take the No. 8 sash-tool, which is a small brush made in very large quantities. There you come down to a different figure altogether; there you get 19 per cent. —7 per cent. for dressing the bristles and 12 per cent. for the making. So you see it is not worth while even on that sort of brush to save a little in the wages, because it would not show any real effect on the price. Therefore, I do not think manufacturers in the painting-brush trade would care to lower their wages just for the sake of lowering the wages.

5245. That is, of course, quite apart from any attempt of the Trade Union to follow you up in the country, and so on?—Yes, quite so.

5246. (Mr. Wilson Fox.) You are rather short of labour in your trade, I understand?—In the painting-brush trade I think it is rather short, although I think it is not quite so short now as it was, for the simple reason that two or three manufacturers have found their own labour, or created it as it were.

5247. In busy times you appear not to have quite enough labour to suit you?—That is not so much the case now. When I was referring to that, I was talking of five or six years ago.

5248. Do the men go off the general work in order to get on to the Government contracts?—When we were a Trade Union shop that used to happen, but now that would not happen, because there are so few non-Union shops for them to go to. We keep our men now, for the simple reason that there is no other place for them to go to, except they go to Scotland or some considerable distance. There are not very many non-Union shops of any size in the paint brush trade.

5249. Do many apprentices come into your trade?—Speaking personally of my own business, about five or six years ago we had to start with practically nothing but apprentices.

5250. What proportion of apprentices did you have?—Then we were obliged to have about 75 per cent.

of apprentices in order to start at all; having lost our men, we had to start teaching people. We thus brought into the trade a large number of skilled hands independently of the Union, and we are now personally independent on the question of labour. As to the paint brush trade as a whole, I should think it is probably short of labour.

5251. The tendency, therefore, is for a fair rate of wages to be paid?—That would be the tendency.

5252. If there is a rush of work and a lot of Government orders, as the trade is at present constituted the wages would rather tend to rise, would they not?—I do not think it would really have that effect.

5253. Supposing there was a rush of work and you were rather short of labour?—You see you cannot produce extra labour quickly; you cannot bring people in.

5254. But would it not make the rates of wages rise if you were all wanting labour and there was a shortage of that commodity? Would you not have to pay for it; in other words, would not the shortness of labour tend to a rise in its price?—I do not think it has had that effect on wages. The effect of it is that we have to lose business; that is the trouble, and that is what the real effect has been. There has been no question of people coming on at a higher rate of wage; and the Trade Union have never attempted to get a higher rate of wage, in consequence of any increase in the demand for labour.

5255. As regards the Trade Union rates, you say there is some little difficulty about paying the same rate, and I gather from what you have said that you take the Trade Union rates as the basis and adopt them as far as possible according to circumstances?—Quite so.

5256. So practically the Trade Union rate is taken with such necessary modifications as circumstances demand?—Quite so, but it is on those modifications that you eventually convert a Trade Union rate into a thing that is no longer like it. In the painting-brush trade we are at the present time making certain brushes very largely by machinery, and we have adopted a rate of wage for women's work; there would be no comparison between that and the rate we should have to pay if those brushes were made right through by hand.

5257. If you take the Trade Union rates as a basis, and you have got a different set of circumstances in your shop to those obtaining in other shops, if you point those circumstances out to the Trade Union, there is no reason, is there, why they should not agree with you upon your particular rate, although that particular rate may be rather different to the rate paid in a neighbouring shop?—I am afraid we should not agree.

5258. You do not think you would?—I am perfectly certain we should not agree with the Painting-Brush Union, because we disagreed upon a point that was certainly less difficult than that. It is the fact that the thing which influences my own firm and others in the same branch of trade is that with the Trade Union it is not so much a question of wages as a question of their methods and restrictions which prevent people going ahead. If we had had to employ Trade Union workmen we should never have been able to introduce the machinery that we have introduced into the manufacture of a certain class of paint brushes, and the brushes themselves would never have been introduced.

5259. Was not that feeling more in existence a few years ago than it is now? Is it not easier to introduce machinery now than it was 20 years ago?—Not in the painting-brush trade—I am perfectly certain of that.

5260. You do not think it is?—I do not, unfortunately. The Painting-Brush Trade Union is one of the most old-fashioned of the whole lot of Trade Unions in the country. We employ members of a Trade Union for dressing the bristles, and we do not find them so difficult to deal with. They are a very much larger Union, and we have employed their members all the time. The fact of our employing non-Union labour in one branch has not prevented them working alongside of non-Unionists; but in the Painting-Brush Union they will not allow a man to work in our shop. The fact that you employ Trade Union men in the painting-brush trade practically precludes you from adopting any methods whatever in regard to the production of those brushes which do not conform to the exact rules and regulations of the Trade Union.

5261. They regard themselves as an old handicraft, I suppose?—They may do so.

5262. I suppose it is like the hand-sewn boot people?—Yes, I suppose it is.

The witness withdrew.

Mr. Arthur Mason called, and examined.

5263. (Chairman.) You are a member of the firm of J. Mason & Sons, Marylebone?—Yes.

5264. Are you, like Mr. Watkins and Mr. Kent, a representative of the British Brush Manufacturers' Association?—I am a member of the Association.

5265. You have heard their evidence; do you agree generally with what Mr. Watkins and Mr. Kent have said?—Yes, I do.

5266. Especially as to the difficulty of defining anything like a current rate in your trade?—Yes. I do think that would be practically an impossibility, excepting in regard to pan work, and the dressing of hairs.

5267. For the reason that Mr. Watkins pointed out, that the methods of procedure vary so much in the different businesses?—Yes, and the fact that the Trade Unions have never shown any disposition to take their part in any improvement of methods. They have always held aloof from that, so that one has had to go outside the Unions in order to run machinery.

5268. Do you agree that the Union is not very strong?—Yes.

5269. And that there is a very large proportion of non-Union labour employed in the trade?—Yes, there is a very large proportion.

5270. Supposing you had to define the current rate, how would you set about it?—I could only define the current rate in regard to the dressing of bristles and pan work, and possibly in regard to paint-brush making, only I have not had much experience in that. I could give a current rate for most things. I suppose it would be about the average of what is paid; but the figure varies very much in some parts of the country. Take, for instance, the drawing hands. I suppose down at places like Berkhampstead and Chesham, and other places in the country, the wage is considerably lower than it is in London; indeed, I know they ask 40 to 50 per cent. lower than in some cases; but then they do a different class of work, and I really cannot say what they earn down in those places because I do not exactly know.

5271. Would those workers come within the Union, such as it is?—No, there are no drawing hands at all in the Union.

5272. Then the drawing hands are entirely unorganised?—Yes, entirely, as far as my knowledge goes. There is an old Trade Union rate for drawing, but I never heard of it being enforced within the last 30 years or so. Machinery does part of it; the boring is done by machinery, and the filling of the holes is done by women instead of men, who used to do the whole lot—boring, filling and cutting off.

5273. All the prices laid down by the Unions in this trade are rather antiquated, are they not?—Yes. I do not think they have been altered, as far as I know, for about 30 years, or nearly 40 years, I think.

5274. What is the date of the list you have got in your hand?—1872.

5275. Do they claim that that is still in force?—I do not think they lay any real claim to the drawing at all now; I think they have practically given it up.

5276. At any rate, I suppose no employers have agreed to work at those rates?—I would not like to say that, as there may be one or two isolated cases, but I personally have never heard of any, and I do not know of any. There may be some who employ drawing hands at the old rates, but I should think they are very few.

5277. Do the employers act together much in your trade with regard to the fixing of wages?—I do not think they have done so very much in the past. They generally pay what they consider fair in the particular district. Of course, that rate depends on outside trades, and on the amount of the demand that there is for labour in the particular district where they are situated. If there is a great demand for female labour, it is more difficult to get people to do brush drawing; but if there is nothing else in the district it is comparatively easy, and the prices, I suppose, are lower.

5278. Have you found the same difficulty as regards the question of subdividing labour that the previous witnesses have spoken to, namely, that the Trade Union is disposed to resist it?—The Trade Union absolutely decline to take any part in it at all, and they have never done so. They have never signalised their wish to have any share in it at all; they simply stand on one side.

5279. And they have not altered their prices in any way to meet it?—No. They keep their prices on the list the same. Things may be done by totally different methods now, but they would say: "This is the Trade Union price." There are many items here that I do not suppose are ever made under Trade Union conditions or paid for at Trade Union rates of wages now.

5280. Do they still claim to make the article all through instead of dividing it up?—Yes.

5281. Then they have not departed from their original claim?—I do not know of any cases at all where they have departed from it either in the painting-brush making or in household work.

5282. Do they refuse to work under any system of sub-division?—The Trade Union would not allow individual men to do so, except that in certain parts of the country they will go and work in a non-Union shop at the prices prevailing there; but in those shops which are considered Union shops they will not allow non-Unionists to come or to work at all even at the Union rates.

5283. Do they insist on going on in the old way?—Yes. For instance, in our factory we are a Union shop as regards pan work, and they would not allow a non-Union man in there, although I know some of our men have been down into the country in slack times and got a job at places like Norwich, or down west, where I believe prices are lower, and I have heard that they will work at the current rates prevailing there.

5284. Supposing you started a new process in this pan work which would involve sub-dividing the work and giving part of it to a highly skilled man and other parts of it to less skilled people, how would they meet that?—Several times they have refused to have any part in it. The only reduction they do make is in regard to the power supplied for turning the lathe in boring. In the old days it used to be done with a foot lathe, and they make an allowance now, if you have steam power, but it is a very small allowance. We get 2½ per cent., and I believe some people get more; in fact, I have heard of one firm which gets 4 per cent. off; however, we have only come to an arrangement for 2½ per cent.

5285. Would they not allow anything for the fact that you had so divided the work and distributed it that a great deal of it fell to a much less highly skilled man than the man who was able to do the whole?—No; they would not tolerate that at all. If you were to give them a stock in which the holes were bored and ask them to set knots in it, they would charge the same price as if they had bored it themselves.

5286. That, I suppose, would obstruct the employer very much in any attempt to introduce improved processes?—It does not obstruct the employer, I think. It simply means that he cannot make any arrangements with the Union and that he has to go outside it.

5287. That is what is going on in your trade very largely, I gather?—That is so, I think, to a great extent. We, ourselves, make pan work by other methods, but that is done in another factory.

5288. Where you do not employ Union men, do you mean?—We do not employ Union men there. We bore the stocks by machinery, more or less automatic, and we have women to set them—in some cases men, but they are non-Union men.

5289. Is that a tendency which is on the increase?—I think so. I think it is inevitable that it should come all round in time. Such a lot of brush work—indeed, all except the heaviest class of work—is quite capable of being made by women, and it is as suitable as anything for them, although I am personally not much in favour of women being employed as a principle, but of course I cannot help it.

5290. Why do you object to it?—I object to it on principle, because I think women ought to be kept out of factories as much as possible, except it is work which is absolutely suited to them. This is entirely apart from this inquiry, really, but I think that where you put a woman in employment you put a man out of employment possibly, and the result is that he has got to be kept. Still, that is only my own personal feeling in the matter. Of course, I plead guilty to having done it, although I really have a technical objection to it.

5291. (Mr. Wilson Fox.) If an allegation was made against you, if you had a Government contract, that you were paying an unfair rate, I suppose you would be able to examine into the matter and see how far the rate you paid compared with the rate which other employers were paying?—I should always be prepared to meet any allegation of this kind, and to justify my contention that my firm always pays fair and reasonable wages. In all these cases I should take the Union rate, and I should make a certain deduction for the various processes which were taken away.

5292. I am putting this rather as a test. Assuming that a charge is made against you of paying an unfair rate, you would be able to go through some process to satisfy yourself, having regard to what other people were paying, that you were paying a fair rate?—Yes, I think I should, at any rate where men were employed. Of course, if you take women's labour you get on to an entirely different basis, and then it is hardly arguable.

5293. I am speaking as regards the men?—As regards the men, yes, I should.

5294. Therefore, by some process or other you would be able in practice to ascertain what the current rate is, that is, what other people are paying?—I think it would be very difficult to arrive at the current rate of wages in regard to many branches of the brush trade. Take finishing, for instance, or boring, the old price for boring is 4d., 5d., or 6d. a thousand, and we can get it down to somewhere about a farthing or half a farthing per thousand by machinery. So there is no current rate there; you simply put a girl on and she works an automatic machine at so much a week.

5295. What do the other employers do? What are they paying the girl who works the automatic machine?—It would not much matter whether they paid the girl 10s. or 12s. or 14s. a week; it would not make a great deal of difference, because she turns out a tremendous quantity.

5296. But it makes a great deal of difference, if the Trade Union makes an allegation against you under the Fair Wages Clause, whether you are paying a fair rate or not; and I want to know whether, if such an allegation is made against you, you could satisfy the Government Department by examining what the other employers were paying on that particular class of goods, and could show that you were paying somewhere about the same rate?—If they made an allegation with regard to our boring by machinery, I should simply be able to give the wages that the girl receives on this job.

5297. Would you be able to ascertain the wages the girl would receive on other jobs of a similar class from what were acknowledged to be fair manufacturers?—Possibly.

5298. Would you be able to satisfy the Government Department—that is all I want to know?—I think, perhaps, I should find it rather a difficult job to satisfy a Government Department. I should simply be able to tell them what wages this girl was receiving, and they would have to form their own opinion as to whether I was sweating the girl or not.

5299. Could you get a sufficient number of facts in justification of your own position to show them affirmatively that you were paying as fair a rate as other people were for the same class of work?—And to the same class of girl?

5300. To the same class of girl?—I should think I could. I should probably be able to get the average wages which other firms paid the girls for the same work. I should think that in the country they would probably be paying less—I know as a matter of fact they are. But if you were to go into a Lancashire town they might be paying the girls more, because, of course, there women's labour is much more in demand.

5301. That is, practically you would be able to prove that you were paying the current rate?—Yes, I suppose so.

5302. Supposing that a firm employs nothing but Trade Union men, and that the Trade Union would not let them sub-divide the work, it would be very difficult for them to compete against a firm that was employing non-Union people among whom the work was sub-divided, would it not?—Yes, I should think it would be; it would seem so.

5303. Has that been your experience at all?—Certainly, I should not like to revert to the old methods, personally, because we should lose a considerable item of profit.

5304. It would make a good deal of difference to the cost of the article, I suppose, if one firm employed Trade Union people and they paid a skilled rate for all processes in the making of a particular article, and another firm was sub-dividing the work and paying unskilled rates for certain portions of the work?—Yes.

5305. That would make it very difficult to compete, would it not?—Yes, I should imagine so. Of course, the tendency is for the brush trade to settle down in certain localities. Take the drawn work, for instance; a lot of it, as I said before, has settled down in Chesham and Berkhampstead and round about there, presumably, I suppose, because labour is cheaper. All the cheap fibre work is made down there. At St. Albans, too, there is a lot.

5306. Is it also because there is no Trade Union there?—The Trade Union have not touched the drawn trade for years; the Trade Union is absolutely dead as regards drawn work.

5307. (Mr. Black.) Except on the question of the employment of women, it seems to me that there is a good deal of unanimity of opinion between Mr. Kent, Mr. Watkins and yourself; might we take it that that unanimity of opinion on wages questions prevails right through your association?—I think so. In the association we have all sorts of employers who use different methods in the manufacture of their work. Of course, it is our endeavour to include all manufacturers.

5308. Do you think that what we have heard this afternoon is fairly representative of the opinions of the employers in your Association?—Yes, I should say so.

5309. You do not think there are any out-and-out Union employers who would hold different views, perhaps?—No, I do not think there are.

5310. (Mr. Hillier.) About women labour, it has been alleged that women labour has been devoted partly to the filling-in of bass-brooms, and it has also been alleged that that is not fit work for women?—It is done by them, I believe, to some great extent.

5311. Do you think that the employment of women upon that work is justifiable?—I think they are capable of doing the smaller kinds, but I think that the heavier work is not exactly suitable for them.

5312. Do you know the proportion of Union to non-Union men in the brush trade?—In regard to the pan-work?

5313. Yes, take the pan-work?—I do not know the exact number of Union and non-Union men in that branch of the trade, but I think that probably less than half, taken throughout the country, are Union in pan-work. It is a very strange thing that the women's first incursion into pan-work was in regard to the bass-broom trade—the heavier work. That was the first work they undertook. There are many shops now where Trade Unionists do not care about bass-brooms; that is an absolute fact. They have been used to other classes of work—the hair and whisk work. On the whisk work they get a higher rate of wages and on the hair work they get nominally a lower rate of wages than on the bass-brooms; but at the same time it is easier work, and they are more used to it. They cling to the lighter work, and they do not really care for the bass trade. The Union Committee would probably say differently, but individual men do not care for the bass trade and they are quite content to let women or anybody else make it. That has been my experience; of course, it may be an isolated experience.

5314. I take it that it would only be in what I might term the old-fashioned firms, or in small firms, where the old process of manufacturing the brush right through would not obtain now?—I really do not know where these old-fashioned methods do obtain in regard to manufacturing them right through. I believe there are some people who bore by hand with a foot-lathe in the same old manner, and I presume they pay somewhere about the old nominal Trade Union rates of payment.

5315. But who employs the Trade Union men on their work? You say the Trade Union men will not work where there is subdivision of labour?—That is so.

5316. As there is a large number of Trade Union men, there must be, therefore, a large number of Trade Union firms who employ them?—We employ Trade Unionists on pan-work. We have at the present time about 48 pan hands.

5317. How do you get over the difficulty of boring the holes which is done by machinery?—We leave certain branches to them, and anything else we wish to bring under the new scheme we have to do elsewhere in another building.

The witness withdrew.

Mr. William Bagley, called and examined.

5318. (Chairman.) You represent the Yorkshire Glass Bottle Manufacturers' Association, I think?—Yes.

5319. Are you the Chairman of it?—I am not the Chairman, but I was the originator of that association. In 1876 I brought it into existence, under a nom de plume, being a young man at that time, and it has been in existence ever since.

5320. Does it cover the whole trade?—It covers Yorkshire only, but it influences the whole trade.

5321. There is not much glass bottle manufacture outside Yorkshire, is there?—Yes; you have it in Lancashire, on the East Coast of England, and in Scotland.

5322. Is it the practice in your trade to agree on rates of wages?—Every year we agree a rate of wages for skilled hands.

5323. But not for all hands?—We have a considerable number of hands who are not employed in actual bottle-making, such as men who prepare the glass for the skilled hands to work, others who sort and examine the bottles when made, and others who pack and despatch them.

5324. Have you agreed rates only for some of those?—For each twelve months. Since the year 1876, when this Association formulated its ideas, it meets once a year or more until a settlement is arrived at.

5325. And agrees rates with the men?—Yes, with the workmen.

5326. But you do not cover the whole of the workmen in your trade, do you?—We cover what is known as the glass bottle industry, that is, the men who are practical glass bottle makers.

5327. Not the packers?—No, not the packers. They have a wage which is determined by the district; some are paid by piece and others are paid day wages.

5328. Does the rate agreed upon cover the whole district?—It covers the whole district of Yorkshire, Wales and London.

5329. Do you pay the same rate at all those places?—Yes.

5330. That is difficult to understand?—Yes, it is rather difficult.

5331. Is the man in London getting the same rate as the man in Yorkshire?—The man in London is getting the same rate as the man in Yorkshire. The rate is determined partially by piece-work and partially by day-work. In our trade they work in sets, and in each set there are three men and two boys. There is the bottle-finisher, who has charge of the five; there is the bottle-blower; there is the man who brings the metal to the blower—the bottle-gatherer; and there are the two boys. They form a set, and they are paid for a certain number of dozens per day according to the size or shape of the bottle; and that determines their wage for the week. Their money can be earned, taking the average, in about six hours per day; or if it is a good job, say five hours. Over and above that they are paid what is known as over-plus, which is a certain amount of money per gross over and above the stipulated number for a week's work. Then, what they call over-work is determined afterwards. The agreement which we came to binds Yorkshire, Wales, London and the North of England.

5332. Does it work out frequently that the individual gets about the same in those districts?—Yes, according to his skill.

5333. Assuming the same skill and the same work?—With the same skill he would get the same conditions.

5334. He must be much less well-off in London than elsewhere, surely?—We know the London conditions. The factories are in the East End of London, and I suppose the conditions there would be something similar to what they are in the large towns of England.

5335. Do you find that all your employers adhere to this rate?—Yes.

5336. And that there is practically no dispute as to whether it is being paid or not?—Since 1876, I think, we have only had one dispute, I mean a dispute wherein we have come to a strike.

5337. Have you much Government contract work yourself?—No, we have not much Government contract work. There cannot be any sweating in our trade, except from the heat of the furnaces, of which we have plenty.

5338. And the men are fairly contented, are they?—They are quite contented. I can say this—and one can speak more definitely about one's own firm—we employ about 700 hands, and I have the greatest respect for them, and I believe they have the greatest respect for me.

5339. I suppose if you do not do Government contract work, you do not know anything about the conditions under which it is done?—We have done a little, but it is very little. The Government do not use many bottles.

5340. Are you bound under the contract to manufacture in your own works?—No.

5341. Could you import from abroad, for instance?—Yes.

5342. And you consider that would not infringe the terms of the contract?—That is so. We have perfect liberty, in fact. I am afraid a revolution is coming in our trade. A bottle machine has been invented in America, and has been demonstrated in Manchester at the Trafford Works, and each machine will displace about sixty men and boys. It becomes so grave in its nature that an arrangement has been come to by the British, the Germans, the Austrians, the Swedes, and, I believe, the Dutch—in fact, I believe all Europe except Russia, France, and Belgium—by which they have agreed, under certain conditions, to form themselves into companies and buy the patent rights of this very machine for Europe; 83½ per cent. of the glass-bottle manufacturers are in the association to-day, and the patent rights are being bought for £600,000. It is of such a serious nature that every Trade Union official and our own workmen—we have paid our own workmen's expenses—have been to witness it in operation. So I think there is quite a revolution coming to pass in our trade. I do not know what will happen in the future. It simply produces the article entirely without the hands, and what is going to be the outcome of it I do not know.

5343. Under the present circumstances, you do not see any necessity for altering the terms of the Contract Clause, I think?—Not so far as our trade is concerned.

5344. You are always in a position to say what the current rate is?—Yes.

5345. Do you never find any employer undercutting you or breaking away?—Yes, there is plenty of that. We are only bound together, so far as the Yorkshire Association is concerned, for the purpose of arranging with the workmen, but we are free so far as selling is concerned.

5346. I meant under-cutting the rate of wages?—No, we cannot do that.

5347. You all do pay the same rates?—Yes; in fact, it is an utter impossibility to do anything else. Ever since I have known the trade—and I have known it now since 1854—there has always been a uniform rate of wages paid and agreed to.

5348. Is that paid to Unionists and non-Unionists alike?—There are no non-Unionists in what is known as the glass bottle trade. What is known as the flint trade, which differs somewhat in its manipulation, is under another Trade Union, and there are non-Unionists in that trade. The only difference between the flint bottle trade and the ordinary bottle trade is this—that they add in the manipulation of the mouth of the bottle a little more metal to the neck, and form the neck from the additional metal rather than from the neck of the bottle which was originally made. That is the mode of flint making. They have a different way, and there are considerable variations in the case of small manufacturers. When I speak of the bottle trade, I mean what is known in the trade as the ordinary bottle trade.

5349. Are not the employers in the other business associated together?—No, not to any extent; I think they are a little, and I think they are coming more together now.

5350. That is a less organised branch of the trade than your own?—Yes.

5351. Both on the part of the employers and on the part of the men?—Yes. There are many manufacturers in London of that class. You have put me in mind there that I think they work on Sundays in London in some of these trades; but it is only in a small way. They are not large manufacturers as we are. They may get a back premises, and they may commence a factory, and their capital may be confined say to £500 or £1,000—that may be their capital, but not further than that; and they may do not only the heat sweating, but sweating the other way as well.

5352. Are there any general observations that occur to you on this question of the Fair Wages Clause?—You must excuse me, but I have got an experience of Trade Unions. Prior to my commencing as manufacturer in 1871, I was the secretary of our own Trade Union, and it was the knowledge which I had of Trade Unions which actuated me in bringing about the Masters' Association, which should meet the men and discuss the whole question and come to a settlement. In my opinion, not only as a man with a knowledge of the Trade Unions but as a manufacturer, I do think that a regulation to the effect that all work should be carried out by a contractor in his factory and should be paid for at Union rates is simply an impossibility. Then I think also with regard to female labour that it is simply sheer nonsense to say that women should be paid the same wages as men.

5353. As regards your first point, I did not quite follow why it is impossible?—Take ourselves. We employ fitters and turners, and we also employ bricklayers, joiners and tinsmiths in connection with our own business. I do not think myself that the rates of wages that we pay those men are rates of wages which would be Trade Union rates. We have never asked the question, mark you, nor have we had any strike on the matter; but ours is regular work, which is a consideration.

5353*a* As regards the men who make the bottles, it is practically a Trade Union rate?—It is a Trade Union rate; but I am speaking about these subsidiary men. The memorandum says, if you notice, that "firms which do not recognise in all their work the rates of wages, hours of labour, and conditions agreed upon by the Trade Unions and the employers, should not be eligible to contract for Government work." That would mean that if we were not paying the Trade Union rate of wages for our fitters and for our bricklayers, we should not be eligible.

5354. I suppose those men have their own Unions in the neighbourhood?—I do not think the bricklayers have.

5355. At any rate, you are paying your bricklayers the same as other people in your neighbourhood, I suppose?—Decidedly. But you see there is a difference betwixt our man and a bricklayer who is belonging to a Trade Union being employed on what we would call catch jobs, that is to say, he goes to one contractor and as soon as that contractor has done his job he pays him off and the man goes to another—instead of that our man is employed all the year round, and he is under cover, or if we cannot find him a position inside we find him one outside. We employ these men in furnace building.

5356. And you practically give them continuous work?—Yes.

5357. (Mr. King.) From what you say, I gather you would not object to the expression "agreed rate" instead of "current rate." The rate of wages that you pay is the agreed rate, is it not?—Yes, it is the agreed rate; but I think you ought to have the same freedom of going into the market that I have.

5358. Without any conditions?—Without any conditions. Why should you, the Government, be handicapped with me as a buyer? I go to the man who sells me the article I want, and I say, "What will you sell me that for?" I do not put him under any conditions, but I say, "Give me your lowest bedrock price," and I buy my article free. I contend that the Government especially, who have the spending of public money, ought to be as free as I am.

5359. Would you suggest that the Government should always buy in the cheapest market?—Practically so, if the article be the same value.

5360. Irrespective of how it was produced, and under what conditions?—No, I will not go so far as that. If I was offered an article which is produced abroad partially, or which is produced by sweated labour, as we understand sweated labour, I should most certainly consider that the man was not doing fair, and I should not buy of that man.

5361. That is the object of the present clause?—Granted, but why should it be binding on every one, and why should it be put into your contract? There are plenty of ways of getting to know whether a man is sweating, as you call it, without putting it into your contract.

5362. The Trade Unions contend that even our present clause does not prevent sweating?—The Trade Union goes further than I am going.

5363. In your trade there is no complaint of that I gather?—No, not the slightest.

5364. But they do grumble, I think, at the purchase of bottles from abroad?—Yes.

5365. You do not see any objection to that?—I do not know any objections to it, providing you put on the bottle the mark of origin.

5366. But they ought not to be passed off as made in some English factory?—Yes. If you let buyers know that they are foreign bottles, it would be all right; but then you know we are stopping all that by this combination for working Owen's machines, which I have mentioned to you. We have an agreed price now even from abroad. We are taking tariff reform by the ears.

5367. (Mr. Hillier.) It is difficult to distinguish, is it not, foreign manufactured bottles from English manufactured bottles?—Yes, it is difficult to detect.

5368. But if there was a clause in the contract that the glass had to be made at the contractor's own works, then it would be a fraud to supply foreign bottles, would it not?—It would in that case.

5369. If in the Government contract there was a clause stipulating for that, then the substitution of foreign glass would render the contractor liable to pains and penalties?—Yes, but it would be difficult to detect whether it was foreign glass or not, unless you put on the article a mark showing the place of origin. You cannot detect it in many instances. They are making bottles now which we never thought they could make abroad, and they are sending them into this country.

5370. I thought that foreign glass, as a rule, had not quite the same metal as the English glass?—That wants qualifying. If you are speaking of table glass, I would agree with you that the foreigners have not yet beaten us in what I would call good table glass; but if you are speaking of ordinary white glass, they can beat us hollow, and they do beat us hollow, for this reason—I know, because I have been over there, and I have studied their processes—they use a lot of female labour in the manufacture of the article—not in the packing or the sorting of it, but in the manufacture of the article—and they work nearly all the hours that God has made.

5371. It has been alleged by some of the labour representatives that the employment of these subsidiary men, bricklayers, carpenters, etc., is an infringement of the Fair Wages condition, because those men are employed at a less wage than that fixed by the Trade Unions for their particular industries?—Again, there are conditions which would, in my opinion, alter the circumstances. There are joiners to-day, in rural districts in Yorkshire, who are only receiving 23s., 24s. or 25s. per week, and that does not work out to more than 6d. an hour, whereas in the towns they may be getting 8d. an hour. What is a fair wage in a town is not a fair wage in a rural district.

5372. If your glass works, for instance, were situated in a rural district, the rates of wages would be governed by the wages in that district, I take it?—We should ask the man what he wanted, and we should come to some agreement with him as to his wages.

5373. But if the wage was less than was current for this particular trade, it is alleged that that would be an infringement of the Fair Wages Clause?—Not at all: I should not consider it an infringement of the Fair Wages Clause at all. It is a question of supply and demand. There is a man, a joiner or a bricklayer, who does this subsidiary work, and he comes to us and he wants work. We simply say to him, "Now, what do you want?" "What is your price?" "So and so." "That is our wage at the present time, and if it is not your wage you are at liberty to refuse it." That is the position. Then you must consider that we employ these men continuously, and that is very different to what we call catchwork.

5374. But the Trade Union do not recognise that?—I know they do not; I quite agree with you there.

5375. Do you have the carpenters for making the packing cases?—We use carpenters for making packing cases; we have only about three or four.

5376. What do you pay them?—We pay them the current rate in the district. Generally speaking, may I say that if the wages of the bottle hands go up or down, the wages of the other men proportionately rise or fall. As the rate goes up or goes down, these men's wages rise or fall according to the current rate in the district.

5377. (Mr. Black.) Do you see any objection to the publication of the names of Government contractors—not of the prices, but of the names?—I do see a great objection to it. They would be victimised by Trade Unions at the present time if the names were published.

5378. The employers would, do you mean?—Yes; they would undoubtedly come under the influence of the Trade Unions if such information were given. I cannot see why it is necessary. Again, I would come back to my original statement, that I think you ought to have the same freedom that I have. If you sit down under all these conditions and restrictions, the result will be that you cannot buy like an ordinary individual. That is the state of things really, and you cannot look at it from any other point of view.

5379. I suppose it gets known now, does it not, to the Trade Union generally when a Government contract is held by a firm?—It gets out soon. I was informed only yesterday by a person who I believe does most of the Government contracts for bottles that the red-tapeism—I do not know whether I am speaking to gentlemen who are in charge of departments—that the red-tapeism which is going on in these purchases in this country is of such a nature that you have got to pay ten per cent. or twenty per cent. more for your goods than an ordinary individual has.

5380. In what direction?—I am speaking of bottles.

5381. What were you aiming at in your reference to red-tapeism?—In the examination and in the unnecessary refusal of articles which would suit an ordinary purchaser. Of course, I am speaking generally.

5382. Do you mean in regard to special patterns?—Yes. It must be in accord with certain samples, and if it varies a little, you reject it. In an ordinary business we could not refuse an article if it was not up to every little possible mark.

5383. You are speaking of fair manufacturers?—I am speaking of a fair manufactured article.

5384. Is that not generally recognised? Most Government Departments, I think, understand that; at any rate, we talk about fair manufacturing methods?—I will not say any more. I am afraid I am treading on corns.

5385. Supposing a Government Department puts a certain firm of bottle makers on its list, after sending down an inspector to see its actual capacity for manufacture, and then it makes a contract with that firm; do you not think that it is expecting to get bottles made by that firm, and not bottles supplied from abroad?—Why send an inspector down in the first place? Excuse me, I am not here to cross-question you, I know.

5386. We prefer to deal with the manufacturer, rather than with the middle-man, as you know?—Certainly; but cannot you do that without sending an inspector down?

5387. I think we want to know also whether he can make a certain output. We ought to know whether he can give us so many hundreds or so many thousands perhaps per annum?—That is easily obtainable.

5388. Surely that is a good and direct method of ascertaining, is it not?—I should never send an inspector down if I was a buyer. I should find out without sending a man down, because that would be increasing the cost. I know of a case where an inspector was sent down to a firm some time ago, and that inspector was there for weeks ascertaining certain things which were absolutely unnecessary.

5389. Of course, it might be overdone, but surely it is a good method of finding out the reliability of a firm?—Yes, it is; still I think there are other means which can be adopted, and which would bring you within the scope of buying your articles on the same level as an ordinary individual.

5390. Supposing we have done this, and we have made a contract with the firm, because they are manufacturers with a certain output, do you think that firm are entitled to act as merchants and supply foreign bottles—I am assuming that there is no direct stipulation in the contract other than the sub-letting clause?—Will you repeat that, please?

5391. Assuming we have inspected the firm and find out what their output is, and that they are actually manufacturers, we then make a contract with them believing they can make and give us a certain quantity and deliver within a certain time; assuming, too, that we put the ordinary clause in the contract with reference to sub-letting, but that we have not specified directly that the bottles were to be made by that particular firm; do you think under those circumstances that the manufacturer is justified in simply acting as a merchant and supplying foreign-made bottles?—Or English-made bottles?

5392. Either?—I say he would be justified in buying of other manufacturers, because you cannot alter the quality of a bottle to such an extent that it could be an article which would be made by sweated labour. As far as the foreign manufacturer is concerned, I object, from a patriotic point of view, to a man going abroad for his article; but so far as getting it from another British manufacturer, that other British manufacturer would have to pay the same rate of wages.

5393. That is where the sub-letting clause comes in, is it not?—Yes. If he had to sub-let it, or if he had to merchant it, he would still get the same class of article.

5394. Would he take any steps to see that the other manufacturer did make them under equally fair conditions of wages?—The other manufacturer would be bound to make them so.

5395. That is one of the objects of the Fair Wages Clause?—He would be bound, because his trade would be under the conditions of the Trade Union, and the manufacturer can only pay the rate of wages that exists.

5396. Do you not think he would be obliged to bring it to the notice of the Department and ask their permission?—There would be no necessity for that, because you would get an article equal to what he made at his own place.

5397. We should get the same quality, you think?—Yes, for his own credit's sake.

5398. But should we have the same guarantee that the Fair Wages Clause was being observed?—Yes. You would have this guarantee, that he would be getting them off a brother-manufacturer, and perhaps he would be buying them at, say, an agent's commission; but they would be made under similar conditions as he would make them himself.

5399. You would draw the line at the foreign bottle?—Yes, and I draw it from the patriotic point of view. I want to see all the goods made in this country that can be made, and so to employ home labour.

5400. Do you not think that would be getting round the sub-letting clause? It is a kind of thing the Government Departments have always held was forbidden by that sub-letting clause?—I know that.

5401. Do you mean that a manufacturer would not think there was anything irregular in his doing that? I should not think there was. Supposing your order came to us in spring. Now springtime is our time of pressure—for the mineral water trade, and all that sort of thing. I want to keep faith with you, and I want to keep faith with our other customers, so I go to a brother manufacturer and I say, "Make me so-and-so," and he would make me those. He would make them, perhaps, for 5 per cent., or 7½ per cent.,

or 10 per cent. commission, but I should get the same article, and the same rate of wages would be paid for producing that article.

5402. Would that commission come out of your profits?—That would come out of my profits.

5403. Supposing the other maker were on the Government list, would he not give better terms in that case to the Government Department?—No, because we have an understanding that there should be a certain current rate of prices, and that we can help one another by paying 7½ per cent. commission.

The witness withdrew.

EIGHTEENTH DAY,

Thursday, 2nd April, 1908.

At 32, Great George Street, Westminster, S.W.

PRESENT:

SIR GEORGE H. MURRAY, K.C.B. (Chairman).

Mr. R. BAILEY, M.V.O.
Mr. F. W. BLACK.
Mr. H. DE LA BÈRE, C.B.
Mr. A. WILSON FOX, C.B.
Mr. J. H. HILLIER.
Mr. A. F. KING.
Mr. J. J. WILLS (Secretary).

Sir ANDREW NOBLE, Bart., K.C.B.; Mr. ARTHUR GREENWOOD; and Mr. ALEXANDER SIEMENS; called and examined.

5404. (Chairman.) You and your colleagues, Sir Andrew, represent the Engineering Employers' Federation and the Shipbuilding Employers' Federation?—(Sir Andrew Noble.) Yes.

5405. First of all, I suppose we may take it that you all agree that the principle embodied in what is called the Fair Wages Clause in Government contracts is a just one?—We have no objection to that, provided a proper construction is put upon "fair wages." For example, no one can have a stronger opinion than I have that the difference between men is far greater than is generally considered. In our particular business we have plenty of employment for men who may well be rated very high, say, somewhere between 40s. and 42s. per week; on the other hand, we have a great number of men who have nothing like the same skill. I take as an instance the work of the Admiralty now regarding sights; that work may fairly be put as being nearly on a par, if not altogether on a par, with astronomical instrument making. The Admiralty, when they send their specification to us, frequently say that a great part of the work is to have no error at all. Of course, to put it in that way is wrong, because no work can be made with no error; but what it is taken to mean is that there is not to be an error of a thousandth of an inch; and it practically is so. The men who do that class of work are very much superior in skill to the men who do the more common work, which you can get done at a lower rate of wage. What I want to put most strongly is that nearly all progress will be ruined if it is to be assumed that all men are to have the same wages. I agree most strongly with the contention of the Admiralty and the War Office that you should pay the current wages of the district; but that is not to mean that all men are to be paid the same wage. Attempts have been made at that, but it would be ruinous both to the men themselves and to the country. Every man has a right to have the advantage of his ability—at least, that is the way I put it.

5406. The Trade Union demand does not go beyond a minimum wage, does it?—My friends may speak upon that point, too. Trade Unions have a perfect right, which I do not dispute, to order their members that they shall not accept less than a certain wage. On the other hand, the principle that I have adopted ever since I have been at Elswick, and that now is only one year short of 50 years, is that no man when he is taken on has his wage fixed; the foreman sees him for ten days, and then says the man is worth so much, and that wage we give.

5407. Without reference at all to what may be called the Trade Union rate?—Absolutely without reference to the Trade Union rate. I need not say that a very large number of our men have the Trade Union rate of wage, because they are worth it. The wage is, so far as it goes, based upon the skill of the men, according to the best judgment we can form. If you put men upon any special work, you find that certain men can do 25 per cent. or 30 per cent. more than other men can do; it depends upon their skill.

5408. Do you imagine that you are paying any men below what their Unions would call the minimum rate?—Yes, a great many. At this moment I hardly know what to call the Trade Union rate, whether 36s. or 35s., because we have made a reduction from 36s. to 35s.; but I should say myself that we have about 20 per cent. under that rate—they are either apprentices who have not quite come up to the skill of the rest, or men who from other causes are not quite able to earn the Trade Union rate.

5409. Does that principle run through your Federation? Are you all carrying out that practice?—Generally, and in fact I do not remember at this instant any material case of the wage we fix not being accepted. Of course, there may be cases where a man thinks he may do better elsewhere, and he leaves us, but as a rule the wages that are fixed by the foreman are accepted. I may say, in passing, that I happen to be Chairman of the Engineering Employers of the United Kingdom, and we have had very long conferences between the Engineering Employers Federation and the Amalgamated Society of Engineers, the Steam-engine Makers Society, and the United Machine-workers Association, and, if you will permit me, I will read what these societies have agreed with us was fair and right. It is this: "Employers have the right to employ workmen at rates of wages mutually satisfactory to the employer and the workman or workmen concerned. In fixing the rates of skilled workmen the employer shall have regard to the rates prevailing in the district for fully-trained and skilled men. Unions, while disclaiming any right to interfere with the wages of workmen other than their own members, have the right in their collective capacity to arrange the rate of wages at which their members may accept work. General alterations in the rate of wages in any district shall be negotiated between the employers' local association and the local representative of the Trade Union or Unions concerned." This little book from which I am reading was the result of very long conferences, and we adhere to it; it has the approval of the societies I have named.

5410. That is the way in which your rates are fixed?—Yes.

5411. Then you would never have any hesitation in saying what the current rate for any class of workman in any of your trades was?—If you ask me, I should say the current rate of every skilled engineering workman would range from 43s. or 44s. down to 32s. or 33s. As long as England is to maintain her position you must have ability recognised and paid for. Just to show the difference, I suppose I may take the average rate of workmen at somewhere like 36s. or 37s. a week; when I joined Elswick—that is 49 years ago, I am sorry to say—the average wage of a fitter was 23s. (Mr. Siemens.) The current rate depends on the class of work and the quality of the work. (Sir Andrew Noble.) That is the distinction that I am endeavouring to draw, that the current rate embraces a large scale of differences dependent upon the particular skill. (Mr. Siemens.) It is quite easily ascertained for the same class of work. As Sir Andrew Noble points out, you cannot say that a new man who is taken on shall be paid like those men who are making sights for guns if he does not do the same work in the same way. The rate of his wages is compared with the rate of wages which other workmen earn who do the same class of work in the same style. In that way there is never any difficulty whatever in arriving at the current wages of a district For a certain class of work the wages are fixed by mutual agreement between the men and the employers.

5412. One of the complaints that we have heard is that the Fair Wages Clause is practically evaded owing to these modifications of the wages, and to the fact that they are not all uniform and that there is no minimum. The Trade Unions complain that employers pay what may be called the current rate for the best of their workmen and the best skill that they get, and then that they employ a large number of others at rates lower than the minimum which has been fixed?—(Sir Andrew Noble.) That is perfectly true; but then, on the other hand, there is a very large number—quite as large a number—who are paid above the fixed rate, as you call it, of 36s. or 35s., as there is below it. I need not tell you that the lower class includes men who are just out of their apprenticeship and who are not quite equal to the men who have more experience.

5413. At any rate, in your case these various rates of wages for highly skilled men or less skilled men are all agreed upon with the men's societies?—Yes. I have just read to you from the agreement finally settled only on the 1st October of last year. I think we were three or four years discussing it altogether, were we not? (Mr. Greenwood.) Practically these terms were originally settled after the great strike 10 years ago.

5414. In 1897?—Yes. Then they were modified five years ago. We had a long conference which lasted for something like 8 or 10 working days between the executive of the employers' federations and the executive of these three trade societies, and we agreed upon an amended form of the rules removing a few of the difficulties. The men were rather restive under the original ones, because the first rules were made after a tremendous fight, and they were made rather at the point of the bayonet. In five years' time the men said they had worked fairly well in the meantime, but they thought there were some clauses that were rather objectionable, and they asked if we would have a conference to try and modify them. We had that conference five years ago, and we spent eight to ten days in discussing the subject, and we arrived at a conclusion which was signed by the representatives on both sides. It had to go to a plebiscite of the whole of the members of these societies, and when it was voted on by the men the men refused to ratify it. Both the men's officials and ourselves were very much disappointed at all our labour being thrown away. The matter went on, and we still worked under the original agreement. Then five years afterwards, that is, last year, they again renewed the proposal to have the rules revised. We had a conference of the same kind as on the previous occasion, and we sat for another eight or ten days, and we arrived at this agreement that you see here. That was submitted to the men and the men accepted it. Practically there is very little difference between this and the one that was made ten years ago. That points to the fact that the agreement that was come to after the big strike was a very reasonable one, because the men worked on it and expressed their satisfaction with it; they merely pointed out a few hardships which they thought existed, and those have been remedied. The main point that was made at the last conference was this—"We do not want to make an agreement which is to be constantly changing from time to time; we want to arrive at an agreement that will practically last for all time." The result was that every possible point was discussed, and every objection was raised that could be raised to our proposals. I happen to know pretty well about it, because I was the chairman of that conference, which lasted ten days, I believe, altogether. The result was pronounced to be absolutely satisfactory to all parties concerned. That was voted upon by the men and confirmed. That is merely an explanation as to the time this thing was under discussion, as you asked about the discussion, I think. So it really was spread over ten years. These are the present conditions, and the agreement is so satisfactory that we have been approached by many societies who are not parties to the agreement to know if they might come in under the same terms. We have admitted already two societies in addition to the original ones; that makes five of them who have adopted the whole; and several others have adopted the provisions for avoiding disputes. We think it is only a question of time before the whole of our various trades fall in practically under this agreement; at least, that is our desire.

5415. With an organisation such as yours on both sides, employers and men, of course, there are many fewer questions arising; but you can easily see that with the less highly organised trades there may be endless disputes as to what the current rate is, arising in the way I have mentioned, for instance?—(Sir Andrew Noble.) I have had, as I have said, a very considerable experience in the matter, and I have never known any real dispute upon the subject. As I have said, the difference between men as engineers is, as in many other walks in life, very marked indeed; the difference in skill is extraordinary.

5416. What would you say on the question of unskilled labour? Is it as easy to say what the current rate for unskilled labour is?—Yes, I think it is; but even there there is a certain amount of skill connected with labourers. When I had a department in the Royal Arsenal—that is also very many years ago—, at that time the labourers were paid 15s. a week; I do not know what it is now in the Royal Arsenal.

5417. It is about 23s., I think?—Thank you. The lowest rate in our works that a man is taken on at is 19s., and I think the average is somewhere between 21s. and 22s. Some labourers get as much as 27s., but that is generally when they are in charge of cranes and special work involving a certain amount of skill.

5418. Have you much experience on that point, Mr. Siemens, of the current rate for unskilled labour?—(Mr. Siemens.) That is settled by demand and supply. There is a sort of understood rate, as at Woolwich, 23s.; and we make it also a point, like Sir Andrew Noble, to reward merit. We promote the labourers as soon as possible, but we generally take them on at what they will come for. I have young men even at 18s.

5419. What do you regard as the current rate for unskilled labour in your neighbourhood at this moment?—I am not absolutely certain, but I think it is at least 5½d. to 6d. per hour, so that would be up to 27s. We pay the highest wages here around London. The young men get 4d. an hour, that is 18s. per week.

5420. Those are not adults?—No. (Sir Andrew Noble.) How many hours do you work? Do you work a shorter week than most of us? (Mr. Siemens.) We work 54 hours. For the skilled labour the current rate is perfectly simple, because the Trade Unions say to their members in the London district, "You must not take work under 40s." When we take on men, of course, we do not ask; but if a man comes and says, "I belong to the Trade Union and I cannot come under 40s." we know we must pay the 40s. or we cannot get the man. There is no question and no difficulty whatever in regard to the skilled men. I do not know whether you ever contemplated the fundamental objection to these "current" conditions, namely, that the whole Resolution does not apply to skilled labour at all?

5421. It applies rather to a minimum wage, I should think?—The House of Commons Resolution of 1891 says, "That in the opinion of this House it is the duty of the Government in all Government contracts to make provision against the evils recently disclosed before the Sweating Committee"—so the Resolution distinctly limits itself to the evils recently disclosed before the Sweating Committee—"to insert such conditions as may prevent the abuse arising from subletting, and to make every effort to secure the payment of such wages as are generally accepted as current in each trade for competent workmen."

5422. That last part is the point that we are on?—I have got here the Report of the Sweating Committee. They say on page 43, paragraph 180, in their Conclusions and Recommendations: "As a rule, however, it must be remembered that the observations made with respect to sweating apply in the main to unskilled or only partially skilled workers, as the thoroughly skilled workers can always obtain adequate wages." I could not get a copy of the Evidence, but as far as I know there was not a single case of sweating alleged against the engineering trades during the whole of the Inquiry. Of course, we are perfectly willing to accept the Clause, and we are working under it; but by rights it does not apply to skilled labour at all.

5423. I think the Clause is meant to go rather further than you suggest. I think the main object of the Clause has been to provide that the rate of wages shall be almost eliminated from the elements of competition between different tenderers, and that they should all know that they are tendering on the same basis as far as wages are concerned?—(Sir Andrew Noble.) You cannot do that, if I may venture to say so; for example, take the difference in the rates between the Clyde and the North-East Coast.

5424. "In the same district," I should have said?—(Mr. Siemens.) None of our competitors can get labour cheaper than we can. It is not possible for them to do so, because the Trade Unions simply forbid their men to take work at less than their rates.

5425. That would not apply to unskilled or unorganised labour, would it?—(Sir Andrew Noble.) May I give an illustration of the difference between the rates of the North-West Coast, which is the Clyde chiefly, and the North-East Coast? The employers on the North-West Coast—I am talking of shipbuilding—pay 10 per cent. less for their labour than the employers on the North-East Coast do, to begin with. The peculiar thing is that taking the average the men on the North-East Coast—and you will understand fully that I am speaking of the average—are less skilful than the men on the North-West Coast. The reason of that is that although battleships are built both on the North-East Coast and on the North-West Coast, the other trade in the Clyde is chiefly passenger ships, and on the North-East Coast chiefly ocean tramps. The difference between the class of men employed in building battleships and the class of men employed in building ocean tramps is so great that in my own firm we cannot work them in the same yard. Battleships are built entirely in one yard and with one class of labour; and the ocean tramps in another, where the same skill and the same finish and so on are not required. Battleships require the very highest class, whereas ocean tramps do not. You have got to take that into consideration, and so where you are building ocean tramps the current rate of wages will not be as high as the current rate of wages where you are building battleships.

5426. All that the Clause requires is that the contractor should pay the rate current in his own district; it has no reference, of course, to any general rate of wages?—That is so. My experience is that I have never heard it charged against the Association to which I belong that any but the current rates were paid, dependent, of course, upon a point which I look upon as of the highest importance—that superior skill is recognised in wages. (Mr. Siemens.) May I just put it in a slightly different way? Employers who understand their business are only too anxious to pay high wages if they are earned, and if the quality of the workmen justifies their giving high wages. We have our telegraph instruments made by mechanics who get about £3 a week, but they are so skilled that they have constructed special tools for the purpose, and they can therefore make the instruments quicker and better than a man could who came in from the street; although he may be a very skilled man, he cannot make them as well as they can. So that the instruments cost us less than they would cost if we took an ordinary mechanic, although we pay the man who actually makes them nearly 50 per cent. more (in piece-work, of course) than the regular wages are. That is a thing which the Trade Unions always overlook, that it is to the interest of the employer to pay high wages if they are earned, because high wages in that sense means great skill, and great skill means great turn-out, and that means cheap work per apparatus. That is what the workmen can never understand, or, at least, they find it very difficult to understand that cheap labour per apparatus does not mean low wages, but does mean that the workman really exerts himself and does his best and then he can produce the apparatus in the shortest time, which means cheap cost, although he himself gets a lot of money.

5427. Does that apply equally, do you think, to the less skilled and unskilled forms of labour?—Certainly. We give piece-work to everybody we can, so that the industrious man gets really more, and we do not mind how much money he takes away.

5428. But when you come down to the really unskilled man there is not much difference between one man and another, is there?—Yes, there is always a difference—whether a man is punctual and whether he really attends to his business; if it is only sweeping a yard, whether he really sweeps it or whether he stands and talks. There is a difference in every class of labour. It is to the interest of the employer to pay high wages. (Sir Andrew Noble.) The enormous number with us, especially of what we may call semi-skilled men, men, for example, who are in charge of automatic machines where the sole work they have to do is to see that the machine is doing its work—it does it for itself when it is once started, and they only have to attend to the machine, and in that lies their skill. Then there is a great deal of repetition work. I rather understood you to suggest that the point would be met by having a minimum wage. That would be almost impossible to manage, and what we understand by current wages is that the various rates paid are the current wage for similar work.

5429. Several questions have been raised as to the difficulty of defining a district; have you anything to say on that?—Yes. I have just mentioned to you that in the shipbuilding at this moment on the Clyde, the wages are 10 per cent. less than the wages paid on the North-East Coast, although, if anything, the average of skill—I want to say particularly it is the average, not the individual—is higher on the Clyde than on the North-East Coast; and for the reason I have named.

5430. The difficulty I was referring to was rather the difficulty of defining what the North-East Coast or the Clyde, for instance, would include?—The North-East Coast includes the three rivers, the Tyne, the Wear and the Tees. (Mr. Siemens.) We have our Federation in districts, and the Trade Unions have got their branches in districts; and I think all those districts are perfectly well understood.

5431. Where you have a highly organised trade, no doubt that is so. One of the questions is: How far would the London district extend?—(Sir Andrew Noble.) Down to Woolwich, I suppose. (Mr. Siemens.) It would include Woolwich, but it would not include Erith. That is the Trade Union district.

5432. You mean the district that would be recognised by the Trade Union?—Yes. The Amalgamated Society of Engineers is really the most important Trade Union, and I think their districts could be taken for all trades without any difficulty.

5433. Then we come to another difficulty, which is the case of what one may call the isolated industry, which goes into a new district or sets up in a district where there is no other industry of the same kind. That is really one of the most difficult problems we have come across in this inquiry. How do you think the current rate ought to be defined when you have only got one employer in the district?—(Sir Andrew Noble.) There is an instance of that at Barrow. (Mr. Siemens.) Does that not solve itself by supply and demand? If they do not offer enough money, the people will not go there. You see the modern facilities of travelling are so good, that if a workman does not care to work at a particular place, it is not difficult for him to go away to another. Therefore, that settles itself, so to speak.

5435. It does settle itself in a way, but the workmen complain that it settles itself by depressing the rate of wages in that place, because the employer has the men, so to speak, at his mercy, and he fixes a current rate for himself, without reference to any competitor or any other employer?—It is impossible for him to do that. Sir Andrew has mentioned Barrow; that is a case in point where there are the big works of Messrs. Vickers, Maxim & Co. and there is no other employer as far as I know. If Vickers, Maxim & Co. did not offer enough money, their people would simply go away. Under the provisions in this agreement for avoiding disputes, we have had cases brought before the Central Conference where the men made demands for an increase in wages, and, as far as I remember, got it. So, under this particular system of the Engineering Employers' Federation, the men have a possibility of appealing to a central body which is perfectly impartial and disinterested.

5436. Is the firm at Barrow in the Federation?—Yes.

5437. That makes the position different. Supposing that they were outside it, and supposing that they were trying to fix a rate of their own in the Barrow district?—They could not get the men. I know the theoretical difficulty is there—I quite acknowledge that; but practically there is no difficulty whatever, because if they do not offer enough money, the people will not go there. Why should they?

5438. Would not the effect of the employers being isolated be rather to depress the rate of wages?—No. He must pay enough for the men to live in the same comfort as they would live in a district where there is great competition between firms for men, because otherwise the men would simply go to the other district and take work there. So he cannot put the money down at his own sweet will. That is an absolute fiction on the part of the Trade Unions; it is one of their rooted beliefs which is absolutely wrong. The employer cannot fix the wages; it is the higgling of the market that does it.

5439. Does it not cease to be a current rate in the ordinary sense of the word when it has been fixed in that way? The current rate implies that it is a rate which has been paid by several other people, or at least, by one other person?—You say that it is a rate paid by another person, but is it not also a rate paid to another person? The employer has got several workmen, and, as we said before, workmen doing the same class of work in the same way—I mean with the same skill—will always get the same rate of wages. Siemens Brothers have had an experience of that kind. When we opened our works at Stafford we were quite alone, at least there were some very small works only. That you would have thought, was an opportunity for depressing wages and so forth. But we could not get the men there, and now we are paying higher wages than anybody else, because we cannot get the men to come to us otherwise. In practice, the isolated employer is rather compelled to pay more money than less, and the workmen are not rooted to the ground, but can go away if they do not like it.

5440. (Mr. Wilson Fox.) That is only in the case of a highly skilled trade surely?—With labourers it is just the same.

5441. (Mr. De la Bère.) Labour is not quite so fluid as all that, is it?—Yes. (Sir Andrew Noble.) If you attempt to establish a large works in an unknown district, the natural result would be that the skilled labour would be paid higher, and probably the unskilled labour less.

5442. (Chairman.) I think most of these complaints have been based rather on a reduction in the rate paid for unskilled labour than in the other branches. It has been alleged that employers do move their works away from a district where the rate is high, and set up their works in an isolated place where there is no other employment of the same kind to guide them and where it is said they are able to make their own rate?—I do not think he could do it in the present state of affairs. The result, I think, would be, as I have just said, that he would have to pay somewhat higher for skilled labour in order to attract it there; but labour that you could get from the fields, or anywhere else, would be lower. (Mr. Siemens.) Only, as a matter of fact, coming back to our Stafford business, we could not get the labour from the fields because there was very little on the fields. (Sir Andrew Noble.) That is the misfortune of the country. (Mr. Siemens.) We pay almost as much for unskilled labour—not quite as much of course—as here in London. Our reasons for moving were, because we could not make our shops big enough here in London, the London Building Acts being against us; then we could not get a railway siding into our works at Woolwich; and further we wanted to be near coal and iron and so forth. Those were our reasons for moving. We knew beforehand that the wages of skilled men would probably be higher, and the wages of the unskilled men were found a little lower, but not very much. In addition, we have had to lay out over £40,000 in houses for the workmen because there was not accommodation enough. (Mr. Greenwood.) What I want to point out is that the statement that one removes one's works into the country for the sake of the lower wages is not at all consistent with the facts. Mr. Siemens has partially anticipated what I was going to say. If you start works in the country, it is to avoid, not rates of wages, but rates of taxation, and to get better accommodation in that way. I am quite certain from my own experience and from the experience of many firms that have moved, that we always find the same thing—that we have got to pay more for skilled labour if we go into the country. We may get unskilled labour slightly cheaper in one place than it can be got in, say, London or Leeds or Manchester or any city of that kind, but even then it would be a higher rate than what the agricultural labourer was getting, that is, it would be an improvement in wages for the labourer of the district—it would certainly bring the rate for the district up.

5443. The question came up in another form in connection, I think, with anvils. The anvil-making trade appears to be mainly concentrated in Staffordshire, and a certain firm moved its works from Staffordshire to Sheffield, whereupon the workmen claimed that they ought to be paid the same rate in Sheffield as they used to be paid in Staffordshire, alleging that that was the current rate because all the other anvil-makers were paying the same. The answer of the firm was that they were paying the current rate in Sheffield; but it was a rate fixed by themselves, and it was lower than the rate paid in Staffordshire. How would you treat such a case as that?—The rate under the new circumstances must be agreed for the district. It is a matter of arrangement between the employers and the men.

5444. I suppose this was a case where the Union was not very strong?—Very probably that was the case. There are so many circumstances that bear upon the case, and you cannot import a rate from another district where the same circumstances are not in force. You have considerations of rent and expenses of living, and the employment that there is for the other members of the family, to bear in mind.

5445. You are clear that it would not do to insist upon the rate of the nearest place where the industry was being carried on?—Distinctly not. That system would be quite impracticable; it is quite unsound.

5446. You agree to that, I think, Sir Andrew, that it would not do to fix the rate by the nearest place where the industry was being carried on?—(Sir Andrew Noble.) Yes, I agree.

5447. Another demand has been made, that besides paying the current rate of wages, the contractor should undertake to observe all the Trade Union customs and conditions in carrying out his contract. How does that strike you?—I think that is impossible. The Trade Unions, of course, can make such regulations as they please, and can instruct their members to adhere to them; but I cannot see that they have any right to introduce them into any works; I think I may say that we have ourselves agreed with the Trade Union, and this little book is the embodiment of our agreement.

5448. Then you would not object to such an extension of the Clause?—(Mr. Siemens.) If you put our agreement in, certainly not.

5449. "As agreed"?—(Sir Andrew Noble.) I would not object to an extension of the Clause as long as it is based upon our agreement. (Mr. Greenwood.) We should be quite ready to have the agreement inserted if that is really what it means. We have agreed upon this, and we are quite willing to work upon those terms.

5450. In fact, you would not object to any conditions being inserted in the contract which had been agreed upon between the employers and the workmen?—(Sir Andrew Noble.) No. (Mr. Siemens.) We should not object to these particular ones. (Sir Andrew Noble.) We are working on those now. (Mr. Siemens.) This agreement refers to rating and to the selection and training of apprentices, and it also contains provisions for avoiding disputes, for overtime, piece-work, and, generally, all the conditions of employment. Of course, any of these conditions we would be perfectly willing to accept.

5451. And, indeed, any others which had been agreed upon by both parties?—(Sir Andrew Noble.) By both sides. (Mr. Siemens.) Yes. (Sir Andrew Noble.) But we should object most strongly to its being put into any Government contract that we were to pay a minimum rate fixed by any Trade Union. That is all carefully provided for in this agreement.

5452. Why should you object to a minimum rate, if it had been agreed upon?—It is not agreed upon with us. We have specially guarded against a minimum rate in our agreement with the Societies I have named, for the reason, as I say, that there are very different degrees of skill. What we say is: We will pay you according to your skill. There is another point that I will merely touch upon. We have had men in our employment for very many years, and we generally make an arrangement with them when they get old. If they can do work, we do not like to turn them off, so we pay them for what they can do. I know many men that have been with us for 40 or 50 years, and it would be very hard upon them if we turned them out when they are capable of doing a certain amount of work.

5453. Do the Unions object to that?—No. We have never had any interference with us in that respect, I am bound to say.

5454. They do not object to your paying the old men rather less?—No. (Mr. Greenwood.) You see, if they did not agree to that, those men would come on to the Trade Union superannuation fund. They are very glad for the older members to retain employment, even at lower rates of wages, because it saves their pension fund.

5455. I thought that as a general rule the Unions did object to it?—(Sir Andrew Noble.) They have never objected to it with us. (Mr. Greenwood.) In the district where my own works are situated, we have quite a number of old men working at a lower rate, and they are still members of their Trade Union. I do not know that there is any rule to that effect, but in practice it is admitted; and it is only common-sense that it should be so.

5456. (Mr. De la Bère.) I think it has been objected to by some of the smaller Unions?—That may be. You see, if these men were not employed they would come on the Trade Union funds for a pension of perhaps 10s. or 12s. a week. So it is very much better for them to allow the men to work at 1s. or 2s. under the rate; they look upon it as a great saving to themselves.

5457. (Chairman.) Female labour, I suppose, does not concern you much; but have you ever thought of whether the men have good ground for contending that if women are to be employed they must be employed at the same rates as men?—(Sir Andrew Noble.) That would never do. But you are wrong, for we have a very considerable number of women. I think in our drawing offices alone we have over 100. You should fully understand, please, that they are not employed in designing. All they do is to copy tracings and other things for the shops and for various other purposes. They do it beautifully and neatly, and it is very satisfactory to see the work they do. If you ever happen to be in the place, you shall see their drawings. Then we have an immense number working typewriting machines, copying letters and so on; and they are exceedingly satisfactory.

5458. But I presume you do not think the demand for equal wages for women and men could be maintained?—It is out of the question that you should give that, because whenever it comes to anything at all severe, we find the women are physically hardly capable. Then they have shorter hours than the men, and there are several other points.

5459. What would you say about the piece-work rates for women?—I do not think we have any women on piece-work, but I will inquire into it and let you know. We have an immense number in the drawing offices and in the account branches, doing for the shops all their work and doing all the account work; and they do it uncommonly well. Of course, we have to be very careful that they do not go out at the same time or come in at the same time as the men, and all those sort of things have to be looked after. I think altogether we have as many as 400 or 500 women.

5460. (Mr. De la Bère.) They are mostly in the offices, I suppose, and not in the shops?—There are some in the shops in a separate place upon such work as winding and other light work.

5461. (Chairman.) What do you say on that point, Mr. Siemens?—(Mr. Siemens.) We have also a number of women and girls employed, and we pay them according to the work they do. I think some of them earn almost as much as the men, but then in the nature of things they cannot work at the same rate, if it is work which requires physical exertion—they cannot do it. As far as piece-work is concerned, they work at the same rates as the men.

5462. Is that common, do you think?—I could not speak about other shops. I think Mr. Greenwood also employs women. (Mr. Greenwood.) We employ a large number of girls in the shops on work that they can do very much quicker and very much better than men or boys can—it is picking up and putting down small things and handling them. (Sir Andrew Noble.) They are much neater fingered. (Mr. Greenwood.) They do a great deal of work at cartridge-making. It is a universal practice amongst the cartridge-makers of this country to employ girls; but you could not employ them at the same rate as men—that would be simply absurd.

5463. Not even on piece-work?—No; but they make very large wages on piece-work, and they are rated above the rate that women get in the various mills. For instance, in my own town of Leeds, there are a very large number of the women employed in the various mills and clothing factories and places of that sort, and the current rate of wages for them, you may say, is 10s. or 12s. a week; whereas many of my girls in the cartridge factories will take up to £1 a week away with them, which, of course, is a great advantage.

5464. Is that mostly piece-work?—Yes, it is all piece-work.

5465. And is it work where they do not compete with the men at all?—That is so; the men could not do the work. It is not man's work. A man could not feed a cartridge-machine; his fingers are too clumsy and heavy. (Mr. Siemens.) And probably he could not earn the same money. (Mr. Greenwood.) He could not. We have experience of that, because on the few occasions when it has been necessary to work night shifts, when we cannot get the girls, we have to put men on, and they cannot get the work out—they do not get half the work out the girls do.

5466. The argument on the Trade Union side is that the increased employment of women is excluding men very often from work which they have hitherto done and which is now being done by women at a lower rate of wages?—That is an argument that we hear very often, but I utterly disagree with it, because the mere fact of doing more work makes more work for the men themselves. If we employ our women in the cartridge works or in any other work of that kind, it means that we employ so many more men in making the tools for them and doing the other parts of the work. That argument is an utter fallacy.

5467. But I daresay there are many cases where men are being excluded from work which they formerly did?—I do not know of any. That is not the way I look upon the business at all. We employ women for work that women are much better adapted for than men are. That is the line that I should take.

5468. The employment of women is increasing in many branches of trade, is it not?—I do not think so, and I am not aware that it is—certainly not in the way of displacing skilled men's labour.

5469. Take bookbinding and printing?—They are, unfortunately, trades that I do not know much about; but I do not think it is done there. I think men are employed principally for that work.

5470. There is one other point I should like to put to you, Sir Andrew. It has been suggested that the workmen would be very glad to have the names of the contractors who have obtained Government contracts, so that they could satisfy themselves that the work was being done under proper conditions; do you see any objection to the publication of the names?—(Sir Andrew Noble.) That is for the War Office and the Admiralty to say. I should think myself from the special instructions that are given to us to keep everything secret that they are the people to say.

5471. There would be no objection on your side?—No; I do not know that I care. I have never thought on the subject, but it occurs to me on the moment that merely publishing the names does not matter to us. But of what use is it? Because, if I may venture to say so, it is common knowledge as to who gets these Government contracts.

5472. It is in your business, no doubt, but there are a great many industries in which they find it very difficult to trace where a given contract has been placed?—Mr. Greenwood or Mr. Siemens may have other opinions about it, but for myself, I think the objection would chiefly come from the Crown, and that they would object to its being published. I do not see any harm in its being known that we have contracts with the Government. (Mr. Greenwood.) It is absolutely immaterial to us. It is a question for the Government to consider. Some years ago we were asked, I remember, by the Contracts Department—it was some 20 years ago, I think—if we saw any objection to the results of successful tenders being advertised. A poll was taken, I believe, amongst the Government contractors, and the result was that the names were not published; I suppose there was found to be a general feeling that it was not advisable to do so. As a matter of fact it is absolutely immaterial to us whether the names are published or not.

5473. (Mr. Black.) That poll had reference principally to the publishing of the prices?—(Mr. Siemens.) That is another matter. (Sir Andrew Noble.) That is quite another matter.

5474. (Chairman.) This suggestion is confined to the names of the contractors and to the subjects of the contracts?—(Mr. Greenwood.) That is absolutely immaterial to us.

5475. It was suggested that the middleman might object, but I should have thought he would have recognised by this time that the Government must necessarily very often deal with the manufacturer direct?—Certainly.

5476. (Mr. De la Bère.) I think that case of the middleman was a very special case?—I think it must have been a special case.

5477. (Chairman.) Have you anything more, Mr. Greenwood, that you would like to add to what Sir Andrew has said?—No.

5478. Mr. Siemens, have you?—(Mr. Siemens.) Only that I should like to say generally that Trade Unions cannot understand that the interests of the men and of the masters are absolutely identical. If I may take an example of what I mean, what is the most important thing to make a cup of tea?—the tea leaves, the water, or the person who puts them together? It is idle to talk about it. It is just the same with industry. You want the materials supplied by capital; you want the men to work the materials into the finished article; and you want the management to direct the men and see that the thing is done in proper order; and to dispute who is the most important or which is the essential portion of the industry is absolutely idle. All three are necessary, just as the water and the tea and the man are necessary to a cup of tea. If the industry is flourishing all three will be flourishing, and if the industry is going down all three will be going down; but you cannot in the nature of things damage one without damaging the lot. All sensible masters see that, and try to do the best they can for their workmen, because they know that satisfied workmen work best and therefore cheapest—I mean by cheapest that they produce the better article, not cheapest by way of low wages.

5479. The difficulty is that all employers are not sensible, I am afraid?—All the federated employers are. (Mr. Greenwood.) I should like to add a word or two on one point that you raised—namely, that the Trade Union rates should prevail. That is a thing that we must modify; it must be the Trade Union rates as agreed between the masters and the men. I will just give you a case in point. We employ, amongst other classes of men, joiners, plumbers, builders, painters, and men of that kind; they are employed to some small extent by us in our business as engineers. We give these men constant employment—that is to say, when they are once engaged they have regular employment. They have tried to make us pay the standard Trade Union rate of wages, which is quite another matter, because the Trade Union rate of wages is fixed for men who are working outside on buildings and contractors' work, for which, naturally, a higher rate of wages is paid because they have to put up with bad weather, bad employment, and so on. But it is quite an understood thing that men in these various trades should agree to a lower rate of wage because they have constant employment. That is one reason why we cannot accept "the Trade Union rate of wages"; we must stipulate for "as agreed."

5480. Would the Trade Union recognise these rates?—As a matter of fact they do, but from time to time, every now and again, when a new local district secretary comes in, a forward man, he tries it on. He says, "You employ so many joiners, and so on, and instead of paying them 7s. a day"—or whatever the rate is—"you only pay them 6s." It is an agreed thing that they shall work for us at 6s., because we we give them constant employment, and they make full time, whereas if they are working outside on a building they have to give it up whenever it rains, and so on. Therefore, the higher rate demanded by the Trade Unions under those conditions, of course, does not apply with us. That is one of our objections, and I wanted to make it perfectly clear why we object to the statement that we must always pay the Trade Union standard rate of wages.

5481. That rather applies to your subsidiary trades?—Yes. We employ a good many of these subsidiary trades and shipbuilders employ an enormous quantity of this subsidiary work. All engineers employ them to a certain extent. (Sir Andrew Noble.) I should like to mention one other point. I do not know that it amounts to much, but it shows you that the men do have a certain amount of money to spare. About eight or ten years ago we announced to our employees that we would accept any deposit from them under certain limits of depositing, and that we would give them in addition to 4 per cent. as a minimum rate of interest a proportion dependent upon the year's dividend, which ran their interest sometimes as high as 8 or 10 per cent. We have got deposited with us now no less a sum than £225,000 belonging to our men. I merely mention that to show that they can deposit.

5482. (Mr. Wilson Fox.) In your industry, the engineering industry, the Unions are so well organised that as a rule you do pay agreed rates, and you have agreed conditions with the men?—Exactly.

5483. Consequently the Fair Wages Clause does not affect your particular industry very much?—I say not at all.

5484. As regards a firm setting up in a country district—a point to which Mr. Siemens alluded—in your industry the Unions are so strong, that even if a firm wanted to pay low wages the Unions could frequently stop men going to them, I suppose?—Yes, they would. I met that, when Sir George spoke to me about it, by saying that any shop which set up in a district where there were no available men would have to pay considerably higher to skilled men, although it might possibly get unskilled men at a cheaper rate. (Mr. Siemens.) And that would apply whether they were Union or non-Union men. (Sir Andrew Noble.) Yes.

5485. In your particular industry the Unions are so strong that they could look after these men in the outside districts?—Yes, and they would. (Mr. Siemens.) It applies to non-Union men just as much even although they are absolutely without organisation. They do not come to Stafford, and they will not come unless we offer them more wages. It is quite a wrong impression if you think that this is only done through the Unions.

5486. You may have gone to Stafford at a busy time; supposing it had been a slack time do you not think the non-Union men would have come to you if they could not have got work elsewhere?—No.

5487. At any rate, that is what the Trade Unions want to stop?—The non-Union men would not have come.

5488. Are you sure of that? Do you not think if there had been an over-supply of men in the market the non-Union men would, in those circumstances, have come to you at a lower rate than they would have come to you in a large town?—No.

5489. How is that?—We have tried very hard and we have not been able to get as many men there as we want. We have applied to the Trade Unions to send us men, and we have applied to several non-Union agencies to send us non-Union men. There has always been the same answer: "We do not care very much about Stafford."

5490. Do you think if the trade had been slack, and there had been non-Union men out of work elsewhere, they would not have accepted work at Stafford at a lower rate—assuming the premises I am suggesting?—Good gracious, no!

5491. Stafford must be a very unattractive place?—No, it is not. It is a place where a firm is quite by itself, and all this has happened in slack times and in good times. We are not yet up to our full strength; we have not yet the full number of workmen that we want. It is entirely a mistake to think that employers in a place by themselves can make it warm for the workmen. (Mr. Greenwood.) The non-Union men are just as keen in keeping up wages as Union men.

5492. But they have not the same organisation?—But they work under it. All our non-Union men have the advantage of this agreement.

5493. But then you are dealing with very special and skilled workmen?—We are dealing with the engineering trade.

5494. (Mr. Black.) Supposing you put Stafford on one side, Mr. Siemens, might there not be a difficulty of that sort, say at Charlton or Woolwich, in slack times? Might not a number of non-Union men come to you for work, and might that not force the wages down? You are dealing with a very special case when you are dealing with your rather isolated works at Stafford, are you not?—(Mr. Siemens.) I mentioned that to meet the statement of the Unions that employers in isolated places were able to put the wages down. I say that is not the case; it goes by demand and supply. Even now, when the Arsenal has dismissed 14,000 men or so, our wages have not gone down, although there are plenty of people ready to work. We are unfortunately not doing quite as much as we might, and we can get as many men as we like at the gates, but they will not come at a lower rate of wages. I am referring now to unskilled men and non-Unionist men.

5495. At your Woolwich works?—At Woolwich.

5496. On the question of publishing the names of contractors, do you think it would injure you in any way in getting your raw material if it were known at once when the contract was placed by the Government Department? Would you be in any difficulty with your suppliers of material?—The only possible thing that I could think of in which there might be a difficulty would be a sub-marine cable. The market might be raised against you in that particular line. But then there would be negotiations; it would not be a matter of simply accepting a tender straight away; there would be most probably some pourparlers, and we would know in good time whether we should get the contract or not, so that we could secure ourselves. I do not think the publication of the names could possibly have any influence on that.

5497. There is no very special kind of material you think that might be in the hands of one firm perhaps?—Barring gutta percha, I do not know of anything. Copper, jute and indiarubber even you can get all over the market.

5498. Do you think it would be a good thing if we delayed the publication of the names?—I do not think that we are interested either one way or the other. (Mr. Greenwood.) It would give you an opportunity of placing your sub-contracts for material. (Mr. Siemens.) Yes, it would.

5499. (Mr. De la Bère.) It would do that if it were delayed for two or three weeks?—(Mr. Greenwood.) I think it would be better in that respect, but it is really of very little importance.

5500. (Mr. Black.) Not in your business, that is?—No. (Mr. Siemens.) For the usual telegraph cables we buy all the materials in the market, and whether we get an order or not will not affect the market at all—the quantity is too small even for very large contracts. As I have said, it is only where we get very large submarine cables that the market could possibly be raised against us.

5501. (Chairman.) You suggested just now that wages might be left to the operation of the law of supply and demand; of course if we could rely on that law there would be no necessity for the Fair Wages Clause that we are talking of, nor, indeed, would there be a necessity for any trade organisation?—Of course, as far as a Trade Union organisation goes I do not see the necessity of it at all. I think the evils which were disclosed before the Sweating Committee were especially connected with sub-letting. In open works, so to speak, like our works, where everything is above board, and where everybody can easily find out how everybody, including himself, is treated, it is impossible to do anything very wrong without its being at once noticed and brought forward and discussed. Then there is our agreement giving the opportunity to the individual workman to bring forward his grievances if he really wishes to.

5502. (Mr. Hillier.) With regard to skilled labour in the engineering trade, engineers work under the Trade Union, of course, but then some firms of engineers do something more than engineering work; they do cabinet-making, do they not, Mr. Siemens?—Yes.

5503. Although they do cabinet-making work they, coming under the engineers' federated rules, do things which would be opposed to the particular industry that they are dealing with, say, cabinet-making; is that not so?—I do not know anything about that. I know that we are cabinet-making and that the cabinet-makers' and joiners' Unions have raised all sorts of awful questions against us, and they have been investigated by two or three Government Departments and by the London County Council, and have been found to be groundless. The only question was perhaps the same that Mr. Greenwood has already pointed out—namely, that some of these Trade Unions have got higher rates for joiners and cabinet-makers who are working in the building trade where the work may be interrupted by weather or by the season, and where the employment is uncertain as compared with the regular work which we give the men in our factories.

5504. But cabinet-making would be on somewhat the same lines as factory work, would it not? It is not subject to these out-door considerations, is it?—There are current rates in cabinet-making of course.

5505. You do not work under the Trade Union rules with regard either to joiners' work or to cabinet work, do you?—I do not know the Trade Union rules, and so I do not know whether we are working under them or not. That is, of course, a principle which all our federated firms have, that we will not allow any Union to interfere with the management.

5506. Therefore, you have no Trade Union men working for you in your cabinet-making or joiner work?—They are working for us, as far as I know. We do not ask them.

5507. Under the joiners' Trade Union there is no piece work allowed at all, is there?—I am not aware of that. Our men work piece work quite peacefully.

5508. Then they are not working under Trade Union conditions as far as joiners are concerned?—In so far, that is quite true.

5509. Again, your hours of labour are different, are they not?—We cannot have two different sets of hours in our works. We have got the 54 hours' week, which was agreed upon at the end of the strike in 1898. There were eight or nine Unions at that time in it, and I am not certain that the carpenters and joiners were not also in it at the time—I forget which Unions were. But, as I say, we cannot have two sets of hours in our works. Then the 48 hours which they work is, again, the time in the building trade, because they count the hour they have to walk to the work and the hour which they have to walk back from the work into the working hours.

5510. No; they are paid from the time of commencing until the time they leave off work. If they were sent out to do work during the day, yes, that would count, but they are not paid for getting to their work unless they are sent away from home. Harking back, there have been complaints made by Societies by reason of your working under the engineers' rules but doing work which is claimed to come under the cabinet-makers' or the joiners?—I should first protest. We are not working under Trade Union rules at all. We are working under our own rules of management. The beginning of the engineering rules is this, that the federated employers shall not interefere with the proper functions of the Trade Unions, and the Trade Unions shall not interfere with the employers in the management of their business.

5511. That is in the case of the engineers, but we are now speaking of a branch of industry which comes under another Trade Union?—What I want to say is that our business is conducted vis-à-vis all the Trade Unions on these lines, that we do not allow any Trade Union to interfere with our management. It would be absolutely impossible for us to admit the principle that a Trade Union can make rules either about hours or about any other thing which is purely a question of the management of the works. The idea of each Trade Union being allowed to put their own hours of work and their own conditions of management! Where you have six or seven Unions in your works you would not know where you were. How can you work your works unless you have got one uniform rule of management? That is the thing which we settle, and if they do not like it they must go away.

5512. (Mr. King.) These other Unions have come to an agreement with their employers, have they not? Take the joiners. Is there a joiners' Union?—Yes.

5513. Have the workmen and the employers there agreed on rates and on conditions?—Yes, for the building trade.

5514. And that is the case with joiners or capenters, or any trade you like, is it not?—Yes; but then I think there is a very great difference between the building trade and factories.

5515. The contention of the Unions is that if you employ a joiner, and there are agreed rates, you must pay the agreed rates as well as any other employer?—As far as I know we are paying more. That was one of the things which came out in this frightful disturbance when they attacked us, I think, five or six times. Their proper rate is 10d., and we pay 10½d. to the lowest man, and, besides that, we let them work piecework, by which they earn ever so much more.

5516. We had a case quoted to us of an employer at Charlton—I think they meant Woolwich—paying 4½d.?—To a joiner?

5517. To one of these subsidiary workers—not one of the engineers, but one of the handy men?—I do not know anything about that.

5518. (Chairman.) It was unskilled labour?—That would be 20s. 6d. I do not know anything about it.

5519. (Mr. King.) They called it unskilled labour, but they would be referring to these handy men that you might employ to knock up a case which would not take any great amount of skill, would it?—No. It might be a youth. I think our starting rate is 4d., or something like that.

5520. For boys?—Yes, for boys it is that, as a rule. That is 18s. a week.

5521. But if a man is simply employed to do a little carpentering to knock up a rough case, say, what would you pay him?—I could not say off-hand.

5522. I take it that this 4½d. man was one of that sort? (Sir Andrew Noble.) It may have been an apprentice.

5523. No, he was not an apprentice; he was a full-time man?—I never heard of anything like that.

5524. We had a similar complaint made to us about a firm on the other side of the river—they were employing a handy man as carpenter and paying him under the London rates for labourers?—(Mr. Siemens.) It comes back again to the principle which Sir Andrew stated at the beginning, that we pay the man for what he is worth to us.

5525. I do not say you are wrong; I only say the Union make this point?—If there is any man, which I do not know, who is paid so little there would be some reason for it. (Sir Andrew Noble.) He must be a joiner's labourer, I should think, if he got anything like that. (Mr. Siemens.) Or it might be, for instance, a man who is just rising, who has been doing labouring work pure and simple, sweeping, or something of that sort, and now is put to a little more skilled work. If he shows that he is good at it, he will get increased. But you cannot take a labourer from the floor and put him to some skilled work, and then pay him as a fully-skilled man at once.

5526. No, but the Union's contention is that if you put a man to carpentering you must pay him as a carpenter?—That does not follow. (Mr. Greenwood.) That is what we cannot admit at all.

5527. (Mr. De la Bère.) A further point arises on that. Is that class of man a competent man to be employed on Government work? If he is employed on it, ought he not to be paid under the Fair Wages Clause the rate for a competent man? The Fair Wages Clause pre-supposes, I think, that the people employed on a Government contract shall be competent?—(Mr. Siemens.) Yes, of course; but then, if we employ a competent man we pay him a competent man's wages, naturally. To take this 4½d. man again; he would not, most probably, have the skill to be employed as a competent man.

5528. But then, should he be employed on a Government contract?—He gets the current wages for the work he is competent to do. That is the meaning of the clause—that every man shall be paid the wages he is competent to earn.

5529. That he shall be paid the wages current in the district for a competent man?—Yes, if he is competent himself, and for what he is competent.

5530. But if he is not competent himself, then I think it rather follows from the wording of the Clause that he should not be employed upon a Government contract?—No. What the Unions are driving at is that everybody is to be paid the same wages.

5531. I am not looking at it from the Trade Union point of view, but from the point of view of a Government Department and qua the Fair Wages Clause?—Quite so. The Government Clause says that the man is to be paid the current wages which are paid in the district to competent men, that means to say, to men who do the same work as he does. As Sir Andrew pointed out, a man who makes sights for guns requires a good deal more skill than a man who simply has to hit a nail on the head. The two cannot be paid the same wages. You must make a difference. The proper rule as to wages is that all the men who are doing the same class of work are paid the same rate.

5532. I know nothing of the case which has given rise to this, but, provided the rate paid is that accepted in the district for a competent man at the particular work at which they are engaged, I do not think there is much more to be said; but if it is not the accepted current rate for that work, then I think there is distinct cause for complaint?—I quite admit that.

5533. (Chairman.) Can 4½d. per hour be a rate for any kind of adult labour in the neighbourhood of London, do you think?—I do not think so. I made some inquiry—not with a view of to-day's examination—a little time ago, and I was told that practically you could not get a labourer under 6d. (Sir Andrew Noble.) I know of no skilled man at all that ever receives so little as 4½d. an hour. It is quite unheard of by myself.

The witnesses withdrew.

NINETEENTH DAY,

Thursday, 9th April, 1908.

At 32, Great George Street, Westminster, S.W.

PRESENT:

Sir GEORGE H. MURRAY, K.C.B. (Chairman)

Mr. R. Bailey, M.V.O.
Mr. F. W. Black.
Mr. H. De la Bère, C.B.
Mr. A. Wilson Fox, C.B.
Mr. J. H. Hillier.
Mr. J. J. Wills (Secretary).

Mr. Henry Hall Bedford and Mr. Albert John Hobson, called and examined.

5534. (Chairman.) You, Mr. Bedford, are the Master Cutler of Sheffield, I think?—(Mr. Bedford.) Yes.

5535. And you, Mr. Hobson, are the President of the Sheffield Chamber of Commerce?—(Mr. Hobson.) Yes.

5536. I think you have seen the suggestions that we have circulated summarising the evidence we have taken from the Trade Union representatives?—(Mr. Bedford.) If you mean the Treasury Minute, dated August 14th, yes, I have got that.

5537. The first difficulty that we have come across is the difficulty of defining what is called in the Fair Wages Clause the "current rate." I understand that in most of the Sheffield trades there are standard prices which have been agreed upon between the employers and the workmen, but that there is a great deal of variation always being introduced into these rates, especially with regard to Government contracts, and the result is that the standard rates are being broken down. Have you any experience of that?—As far as I know in my own trades, the steel trade, the file trade, and the edge-tool trade, there is a standard rate of wages for hand-work—in the file trade, we will say, all the way through, for hand file cutting, forging, grinding, and everything; and when the work is done by hand, that scale of wages is adhered to, I believe, by all respectable firms. But in some trades, of course, of late years machinery has been introduced to a considerable extent, and the old list for hand-work has been modified and a list for machinery has been adopted, but that is also recognised by the Trade Unions as being a fair list.

5538. I was coming to that point presently. The point I was on at the moment was this—the employers and the workmen are in the habit of making special prices, particularly for Government work, which do not coincide with the standard lists; and that in that way the list prices are getting reduced. I dare say Government orders are rather large?—Yes, they are.

5539. And that might be a reason for making a special price?—Yes, that might be so.

5540. Have you anything to say upon that, Mr. Hobson?—(Mr. Hobson.) Yes, I may say a little upon that. For specially large quantities the workmen are able to quote a lower price with perfect fairness to themselves.

5541. Then the question arises whether that price can in any sense be described as a current rate?—Exactly; the question does so arise. I could give, perhaps, an instance which has been investigated by the Admiralty. That would be a case of the current rate as against Trade Union prices. (Mr.

Bedford.) Perhaps you might point out that probably a man is able to earn more wages at the reduced rate on the large quantities than he is on the smaller quantities at the higher rate. (Mr. Hobson.) He earns a very good wage, and he would not be satisfied if he did not. The point is that, instead of these things being given out in small quantities, he is kept entirely on steady quantities doing one kind of work for weeks, and consequently he is really earning a very good wage that satisfies him.

5542. I want to bring you back to my point, which is whether that can be described as a current rate?—Now I come to that point, because I had a case with the Director of Navy Contracts at the end of 1906, which is a concrete case. The Admiralty then investigated the question of what was a current rate in my factory. I do not know how far Mr. Black is acquainted with this correspondence, as I forget whether it came before him, but it seems to me to set forth very clearly what would be the effect of accepting the recommendations of the men. The case was with reference to hafting seamen's knives, and the Union made a complaint to the Admiralty that we were not paying the Trade Union price. A circular was sent to us on January 31st, 1907, which I produce, setting forth the claim of the Trade Union. (Handing in same.) The question had arisen between the Admiralty and ourselves somewhat earlier, because in fact we wrote to them on December 27th, 1906, in reply to a letter from the Admiralty:—"Dear Sir,—We are duly in receipt of yours C.P. 15812 of the 21st, received by us on the 24th inst."

5543. Is that the correspondence you have there?—Yes; and this letter from ourselves to the Admiralty, which I propose to read, sets forth the facts of the case as briefly as I could do it if I were to put it into words myself. "In the first place we beg to say as to this pattern, that it was specially brought out by us for you in 1903. It is not made commercially for anyone"—that is a point I want you to realise with regard to Government patterns, because it often happens that they are not made commercially for anyone—"the price for making it does not appear upon any recognised Trades Union schedule of prices, and no price has ever been agreed between the masters as a whole, and the men's Union had no official price for making this article. The price you mention of 2s. 8d. for a set of one dozen knives and one dozen forks"—that was for hafting the handles—"is entirely new to us. We have never been asked by our men to pay this price, and it is considerably in excess of the price agreed with our men before the knife was submitted to you on April 30th, 1903, when we first brought out this sample, and in excess of the price at which more than half of your first order for these knives were made by our men. On this first order, we paid our men the price at which they had voluntarily agreed to make the knife. As your first large order in July, 1903, was required quickly, we think it possible that some other contractor may have paid this price either then, or subsequently, but the contention put forward on behalf of the Union appears to be that the highest price ever paid is the current price, whatever may be the state of trade. We should like very much better evidence than is at present before us, before we are prepared to accept that the price of 2s. 8d. has any weight of authority, or of general acceptance behind it. When we first received tender forms of our present contract of 25th July, C.P. 12611, we asked our men what their price would be for making these knives. They were given an opportunity of consulting together about it, and if they so desired of consulting their Trades Union. We may say, that ours is an open factory in which both Unionists and non-Unionists are employed, and that it is not our custom to ask a man whether he belongs to the Union or not. Having been given this opportunity for consultation, our men returned to us the next day, and stated that their price for hafting the knives and forks would be"—the price I now hand in to the Chairman. "You will please note that this was not a figure suggested by us to the men, but one suggested by them to us, and as there was no similar work in the market at that time, we are prepared to contend that this price became the current rate for this year. At the time this price was made the cutlery trade was not particularly good, and we do not think that a price paid in the previous year, or years, by any other contractor can be alleged to be the current price, as the circumstances of previous years' trade would not be identical with this year's. You will also please note that there has been no attempt on our part, when we received the order, to beat our men to any lower price than was agreed with them at the time the tender went in. Every knife and fork for this contract has been paid for at the agreed rate. With reference to the point of what other firms have estimated for hafting"—that was in the Admiralty letter—"we have not as yet approached them to ascertain the facts, we will do if so desired, and we are quite certain that we can procure you evidence that other firms have estimated for a lower price than 2s. 8d. for hafting. We trust that the above explanation will be satisfactory to you, but if there is any further point on which you desire to be informed, we shall have pleasure in answering any inquiry you may make." I may say that on those facts the Admiralty began an inquiry and an inspector was sent down. We threw our books open, as is proposed in some of the suggestions here, and he verified the fact that these men, owing to the quantities, were much better off in making this knife at that price than they were on the ordinary commercial work which they were doing immediately before that work was given out to them. He also verified the fact that they were earning good and satisfactory wages. The result was that the Admiralty wrote to us at the end of the whole investigation, and said: "I am commanded by my Lords the Commissioners of the Admiralty to inform you that the matter has been investigated and your explanation is accepted." Therefore, that is an examined case. If the 2s. 8d., the contention of the Trade Union, had been paid there, we should have been compelled to pay a substantial advance for the hafting of the twelve knives and forks, and you would have paid that advance as a Government Department—that is to say, on the wages which were good and satisfactory in amount and which were better than the men were earning before that work was given out to them, you would have paid a considerably higher price quite unnecessarily on that basis.

5544. (Mr. Black.) I think there was another point was there not, that you offered special facilities to your men?—That is so.

5545. So that they were really somewhat better off than the difference of price showed—at least, that is my recollection of what I think I heard?—They had special facilities in this respect. You are probably thinking of the special facilities we provided in the machinery for the clasp knife we make for you. They have this facility as compared with what they would get at many other makers, that our men always are given out an adequate supply of handles and blades with the order at the blade room and the handle room of our warehouse, so that they can commence work straight away; whereas it is the very frequent custom in the smaller houses in Sheffield to give a man an order to go and fetch himself a gross of handles from the horn cutter or merchant, and to be told that he is to wait until some workman on the premises has finished forging the steel blades; and therefore a good deal of time elapses before he can settle down to his work. Owing to the fact that we have always so organised our place, the men have every possible chance where we get straightforward work of getting at it straight away, and so they can take better wages at the week end. No doubt they take that a little into consideration in fixing the price. I may further say that having lost for two intervening years any share of this order, the men were quite as anxious as we were to get the order back, and I told them that if they chose to make any concession, I would abate my price the full amount of any concession they gave me. Therefore, it was a bid on the part of my men, and a voluntary bid on the part of my men, to get this work for their own benefit.

5546. (Chairman.) And you think they succeeded in making more money out of it than they could on another job?—Yes. I should draw attention also to the fact that the price we originally paid for that knife was 2s. 5d. and not 2s. 8d., and that there is no authority that I am aware of for the 2s. 8d., beyond the claim of the Union.

5547. It was never a current rate, in fact?—No, it never was a current rate; it would be a Trade Union price. But that statement should be guarded by the fact that I think we were able to prove to the satisfaction of the Admiralty that what we were paying was the current rate, and it is only a Trade Union price which is set forth in the Trade Union circular, which is quite a different matter. It also came out in the inquiry that proably not more than one in twelve of the men in the trade were in the Union. Therefore in that case where the Union approached the Admiralty and put on pressure in Parliament by questions in Parliament, and raised the whole issue of whether we were paying the current rate or not, the men that were raising that question were a small minority of the workmen in the trade. The question is, do you propose as a Committee so to legislate that where only a small minortiy of the workmen are in the Trade Union, you are going to neglect or ignore the wishes of the majority, or the prices paid to the majority?

5548. It seems that there must necessarily be a considerable difficulty in deciding what the current rate is in a trade of that kind, owing to the extreme variations in price and the special prices that are made for special jobs?—Special prices are made for quantities. There will always be a difficulty in deciding what is the price where the Trade Unions are in a minority, and therefore have not been able to force on the trade as a whole one fixed price. But whilst there is difficulty, I would suggest that the proper measure as to whether the price paid is a fair one or not is the question whether the men are drawing a larger amount of wages at the end of the week than they drew before they were put on Government work and were on commercial work in the same employment and the same firm. If they are benefited by the receipt of the Government order to the extent that the amount of their wages—I carefully say amount, not rate—is increased, it does not seem to me that there is any hardship to the men in the amount that is being paid.

5549. That may be so, but of course you are converting the "current rate" there into a "fair rate," which is another thing altogether?—Yes; but I think that whilst there should be some obligation on the contractor, as at present, to show that he is paying the current rate, where the Union is, as I say, but a minority, if it should be established that the rate paid is a fair rate, that ought to go a long way to justify it being considered as a current rate also.

5550. From your point of view I should have thought you would have been as anxious to insist upon the current rate being paid as upon a fair rate, because otherwise it is always open to an employer to make arrangements with his workmen under-cutting what might otherwise be held to be the current rate. These special bargains seem to me to bring a peculiar difficulty into the question in your trade; is that not so?—That is so; but it must be recollected that if a man is not able to make special bargains based on special facilities, either of machinery or in the organisation of his work, the tendency will be to send that work on the whole to inferior contractors, because any inducement to make better conditions for the men is taken away if you have to pay the same price even after making those better conditions.

5551. Do you think, as a matter of fact, that the Government work does go to an inferior class of the houses in the Sheffield trade?—That is a difficult question to answer. Some parts of the Government work do. For instance, I should draw a strong distinction between the Admiralty work and the War Office work. The Admiralty work is still in the hands largely of the better-class manufacturers, but the War Office work, at any rate in cutlery, has largely gone to a very much poorer class of manufacturers.

5552. Have you any idea of the reason of that?—It is, I think, because the Admiralty take a keener interest in quality than the War Office do, and as they intend to get a better quality, they have usually to go to a better-class firm.

5553. It has nothing to do with the under-cutting of rates then?—The under-cutting of rates is always a tendency to take the work to the poorer firms, but of course the keener the interest in the quality on the part of the Department in question, the greater the check that is put upon that tendency to get it down to the most shoddy manufacturer. Quality is the only thing that keeps it in the hands of a good firm.

5554. (Mr. Black.) And you think we get the benefit of that?—Yes, I am quite sure you do.

5555. (Chairman.) Do you, Mr. Bedford, agree generally with that?—(Mr. Bedford.) I am not in the cutlery trade myself, but from my knowledge of it, I think that is perfectly true. I quite agree with what Mr. Hobson has said.

5556. Then you agree that there is a slight tendency for the Government work to go to rather inferior houses now?—What part of the Government work are you referring to?

5557. I was only asking you generally; I had not got anything particular in my mind. Mr. Hobson gave us an illustration of the War Office cutlery?—Of course I do not know who gets the War Office cutlery, but as far as the edge tool and the file trade and steel trades are concerned, I should not like to say that the contracts are given to inferior houses, because I think they are not. They are certainly sold at cheaper rates than are current for ordinary orders, but the large quantities no doubt influence the price. In the file trade there is a very large quantity of large files made under Government contracts which are forged and made by machinery; they are more remunerative to the manufacturers than the small files which are made in a great measure by hand, and that accounts for the Government work being done at cheaper rates sometimes. (Mr. Hobson.) I should acount for it a little also by the fact, if I may say so, that Government work never does in my experience pay a profit to any manufacturer who undertakes it, if by a profit you mean something beyond its share of the standing expenses of the firm. My experience is that the utmost you can ever expect to get out of a Government contract is some contribution towards the expenses of the firm, so as to spread those expenses. The reason for that is that taking Government work does not cut down the price that you can get from the rest of your customers, whereas if you begin to cut down the work for your ordinary customers, it runs freely through the trade and cuts you down everywhere. Nearly all the firms are ready to take some additional Government work in hand at a very low range of profit in order to lessen their standing charges, because for the Government work which they undertake the money is certain. That is the attitude we take with regard to this work.

5558. (Mr. Black.) Do you really mean to say there is no profit on it?—There is no net profit at all, if you apportion to the Government contract its fair share of the expenses. I have never seen a shilling profit out of a Government contract, and I have done many thousand pounds' worth altogether, except it has been practically a contribution towards the standing expenses of the firm. So low is the profit on these knives that if I had conceded the Trade Union demand, I should have been in the position that the total cost of those knives would have been more than I received for them. That shows the impossible nature of the advance. (Mr. Bedford.) My objection to this Clause is that if you insist that the standard rate of wages should always be paid on Government work, there will be no inducement to the manufacturer to get any improved machinery or improved methods in order to bring down the cost of production, so that really it would mean standing still in the way of manufacturing instead of progressing. (Mr. Hobson.) Exactly. Government work, you see, would be regarded by a Trade Union if you were to fix the price, as something in which every facility was to be appropriated by the men when any facilities were provided, and as something that was to be a little plum which they as a Union had secured for the men, and therefore as a reason for getting the men into the Union and supporting the Union.

5559. (Chairman.) Do you think, apart from the special prices connected with these large orders, that the rates paid on Government work are less than those on other people's work?—(Mr. Bedford.) Not in the file trade, I think; at least, I have never heard they were. (Mr. Hobson.) They are and they are not, as far as my experience goes. In some trades where the Union has been strong and the masters have come by degrees to recognise a price for Government work, that price is quite as good as the price for commercial patterns. In other cases I have known of instances in which what has appeared to me an inadequate price has been given by the masters for Government work—a price at which you could not expect the work to be properly done. The consequence is that when you put that point forward, the answer entirely depends on the branch of the trade.

5560. I daresay you have noticed that one of the suggestions put forward by the Trade Union representatives was that a contractor should be compelled to pay the same rates for all his work as he pays on the Government work. I gather from what you say that this would not be practicable in a trade such as most of the Sheffield trades, and that you could not insist that the contractor should pay the same rates for all the work that he has got in his business as he does on the particular work he has got from the Government?—(Mr. Bedford.) I do not think that would be practicable. I think it ought to be sufficient to satisfy the Trade Unions if the workman has got as much wage at the end of the week, or more, on Government work as he would on ordinary commercial work

5561. And vice versâ?—And vice versâ.

5562. It is nearly all piece work, I suppose, in your trades?—Yes. (Mr. Hobson.) I would say that in my trade it is almost entirely so; and my trade ranges over saw and file-making, and through every department of cutlery up to the manufacture of electro-plated goods at my own works. I should also mention that I have experience at Messrs. Jessop's works (of which I am chairman) of the engineering and steel trades, and at Messrs. Hornsby's works (of which I am a director) of the heavy engineering trade; so I have a fairly wide experience in Trade Union practice. (Mr. Bedford.) Practically the whole of the heavy trade and the steel trade in Sheffield, in regard to manufactured articles, is piece work. The old rates of wages have in many instances been modified by the introduction of machinery; for instance, steel which used to be forged square, we will say, for the making of files, and then had to be forged into a round or into a half-round, is now rolled to the sizes required, so that the man has less to do on it. Naturally, he is not paid the old rate when he is working by machinery on steel which is rolled nearly to the size required; but he is paid a rate which has been agreed upon by the men's Unions and the masters together, and which is perfectly satisfactory.

5563. It could hardly be expected that a list of prices which was fixed in 1844 could be of very much practical use at the present day?—That is so. (Mr. Hobson.) But that is the only list which exists in the trade. I was just going to point out to you that one great facility for table-knife cutlers is the provision of emery wheels, which were not known of at the time that list was made; but that has greatly reduced the work of the men in preparing the bolster, which is the shoulder or point of junction between the handle and the blade; and consequently some modification of that list, due to that extra facility, is reasonable. As a matter of fact, where the work covered by that list is done with modern facilities, it is really paid at a very much higher rate than was fixed. I do not dispute that in the interval it is only reasonable that the rate of wages should have advanced; but I say that they have advanced more by the provision of facilities than by raising the price—that is what it comes to.

5564. Have you anything to say on the suggestion that wages have been depressed by the increased employment of boys, women, and apprentices?—(Mr. Bedford.) I do not think so; at any rate, it is not so at Sheffield. The trades there are mostly skilled trades, which require years of training to do them satisfactorily, and I do not think that there is any depression of wages through the employment of boys or women in the Sheffield trades. I have put down a note in regard to the suggestion that Trade Unions should regulate the hours of labour, the number of apprentices, and the employment of boys and women, that it would not be fair that Trade Unions should be allowed to regulate the conditions of employment, especially as to the number of apprentices, because it was their short-sighted policy in doing it in the past which led to very serious results in the limitation of production in the light edge-tool trade. I remember the time when the restriction of the number of apprentices caused such a dearth of forgers in the light edge-tool trade, that the services of these men could only be procured by the offers of loans of money, in order to get them to go from one firm to another. The men themselves said, "I will come, if you will lend me £5 or £10." When the man had spent that money and he wanted some more, he might go to another firm, who might say, "I will give you £12 if you will leave Messrs. Bedfords and come to me." That was caused by the restriction in the number of apprentices, and it was a very bad thing both for the masters and for the men, really, and also for the trade of the town. Therefore, I do not think it should be the Trade Unions who should say how many apprentices should be employed.

5565. (To Mr. Hobson.) Have you anything to say on that point?—(Mr. Hobson.) I should like to say two things. In the lighter Sheffield industries, there are certain branches where the employment of women has gone on as far as my memory goes back; and I should very much doubt whether the workmen in the district wish in any way to interfere with the employment of women, or to restrict it. As an instance, I would give you the burnishing and finishing of silver-plated goods, including spoons and forks, which is usually women's work. In that branch it is not a case of an attempt on the part of the masters to substitute a woman for a man, because it is something which has been done for, say, half-a-century by women—how much further back it goes, I cannot say without looking into the records; but it is my business recollection that it has always been done by women.

5566. And it is not growing—that is the point?—No, it is not growing. I do not know any instance in Sheffield where women are being substituted for men to do the same work. There are certain branches where the employment of women is traditional, and to say that no woman shall be employed on Government contracts except at the wages of a man, when you have those traditional instances where women have always done the work, would be to inflict a very grave hardship on the women and to be very unfair to them. (Mr. Bedford.) That is my point, also.

5567. Do you mean they would not be employed at all if that rate of wages was insisted on?—(Mr. Hobson.) There would be a difficulty in getting men to do the work, because it is woman's work. One difficulty would be that in many of these cases there is no price for men doing the work—I mean to say, there is no known or acknowledged price at which you could get men to do it.

5568. What the Trade Union representatives were thinking of was the invasion of men's provinces by women?—That may apply to, say, the clothing trade, though I do not know that it does; it may apply to some trades with which I am not familiar, but it does not apply to any Sheffield trade. There are branches of Sheffield trade where the employment of women is traditional and should be continued. As for youths and apprentices, as a matter of fact, there is a very great difficulty in getting a sufficient number of boys to be apprenticed to any handicraft or any skilled trade that I know of, to keep up the number of men who are at present in it. The consequence is that I do not think, in the Sheffield trades at any rate, that any grievance can arise out of the possibility of a superfluous number of apprentices being employed.

5569. Going to another branch of that same subject, there is a practice which may be described as "sectionising" the work. Have you anything to say on that?—(Mr. Bedford.) Do you mean as to the employment of unskilled labour on parts of a job, and skilled labour on the other parts?

5570. Yes?—My reply to that would be that the Trade Union suggestion would act as a great bar to the employment of unskilled labour, and you would give the unemployed no chance at all if you do not admit them to do unskilled work. Why should you employ a skilled man who is earning from £2 to 50s. a week on work that an ordinary labourer would be very satisfied to do at 25s. a week? You are not giving your unemployed a chance if you do not put them on your unskilled work. The Trade Union suggestion would prevent the employment of any form of improved machinery, or cheaper methods, if you always insisted on skilled hand labour. (Mr. Hobson.) Exactly.

(Mr. Bedford.) The whole tendency of the trade is to try to secure improved machinery in order to cheapen production, and so long as you pay your skilled men their full standard wages, they ought not to object to that. That is a point I wish to make.

5571. I think the suggestion put to us was rather that these processes resulted in a deterioration of quality, owing to the employment of semi-skilled men?—Of course, it is a sine quâ non that you do not deteriorate the quality. (Mr. Hobson.) If you uphold the quality in Government work, you are bound to get the best labour to do it, because you cannot get the best quality in any other way. The question of what sort of labour you employ upon your work is rather a question of what quality you ask for. Take as an illustration automatic lathes, in the engineering trade. We have an automatic machine for making studs and bolts; that automatic machine has a steel bar fed into it, one tool advances and turns the shank of the stud, that tool drops out of the way, and another automatically comes forward and turns the thread of the screw on it, another tool cuts it off, up-ends it and cuts the nick in for the screw; and then that stud with all these operations done to it, drops into a bucket at the end of the machine, and the machine automatically draws forward another length of the bar and begins to repeat these five operations and makes another stud. When that bar of steel reaches a certain point, the machine rings a bell to ask for another bar. If a mechanic at 38s. a week is to stand by and watch that machine, instead of a boy just beginning to work, the cost will greatly increase the cost of the studs, and it can hardly be contended that the man would be other than deteriorating under such enforced idleness. I do not know where you are going to draw the line; but the constant tendency in the engineering trade is to try to put brains into the machine, so as to save the necessity for skilled handicraft work. Any attempt to say that any job that is being done by a skilled mechanic now at a certain price shall always be kept to him, would be, as the Master Cutler says, to absolutely stop all progress in improved methods or machinery on Government work—it must be so.

5572. I think you have something to say about piece work earnings?—(Mr. Bedford.) Yes; our next point is with reference to piece work earnings. A great proportion of the work in the Sheffield district is piece work, and must be so. A price is paid per dozen for certain work. Those prices have been agreed upon and are recognised by the men and the masters, and where it is hand work are always paid. I think it should only be necessary for the Government in regard to their work to know that the firms who are contracting are paying the current recognised local prices for piece work.

5573. You would not hold that the requirement was satisfied by paying a rate which allowed the man to earn no more than the standard time rate when he was working on piece work?—In point of fact, when he is working piece work he always goes faster, and he earns more, as a rule, than he would on day work. (Mr. Hobson.) The Trade Union suggestion here appears to me to apply only where piece work is being introduced into what has previously been a time work trade. There is no time work standard throughout the Sheffield cutlery trade or in most provinces of the Sheffield trade generally, and, consequently, there would be no possibility of comparison such as is expected here between the two. The work is almost always done at piece-work prices, and on the question of piece work prices there is always the difficulty which we mentioned earlier, that the Government work being in larger quantities, it may be fair to quote a special piece work price rather than the one that would be given for lesser quantities.

5574. I gather that this is a question which does not affect your Sheffield trades very much?—No; except, of course, that it affects such Sheffield engineering trades as where men are tending machines which are making propeller shafting or big work of that kind. Further, all the big East End firms, such as Vicker's, Brown's and Jessop's, would be affected by this, because they are in effect engineering firms working under engineering conditions. But, as the Master Cutler says, as a rule the fixing of a piece work price is regarded in those trades generously by the masters, for the very excellent reason that the cost of any piece of work to them is as much the cost of the machine in depreciation and interest and in driving as the cost of the labour; and consequently the extra stimulus, by getting the work of the machine done rapidly, affords a sufficient profit to the master, so that he does not beat down or desire to beat down the piece work price below what will be remunerative. He looks for his profit in the extra energy of the men setting the machine at liberty to make a greater output. I might mention that after the engineering strike of 1897, in one of the works with which I am connected, the substitution of piece work prices for time work prices enabled the same men on the same machines, making the same article, to earn 25 per cent. more wages in the year following that engineering strike, and the firm to produce the goods 15 per cent. cheaper; that is to say, the stimulus to more energy on the part of the men produced 40 per cent. more output from the same machines, of which the men got 25 per cent. and of which the masters got 15 per cent.

5575. If a less skilled form of labour is substituted for a higher skilled form in parts of the work, how is the skilled man to ensure that no more is deducted from his share of the total proportion than is right? One of the things which was suggested to us—I forget whether it was in connection with your trade or not—was that when you are substituting one form of labour for another, the skilled man suffers more than the unskilled man?—(Mr. Bedford.) I do not think that is the case. When there is any substitution, it is generally because of the improved methods, and I think improved methods scarcely ever bring down the rate of wages per week to the man who is working. The division between the skilled men and the unskilled men is a matter of arrangement between the skilled men, the unskilled men, and the masters.

5576. The allegation that we heard was that the skilled man always suffers in the process?—I do not think he ever has done in the lighter Sheffield trades; at any rate, I have never heard of it. (Mr. Hobson.) The only way I can see in which the skilled man would suffer, is where the skilled man and the unskilled man being partners in doing work, they have themselves to adjust the division of the wages; but I never heard of that. (Mr. Bedford.) That does obtain sometimes. (Mr. Hobson.) Not within my experience. It may be that I have forgotten an instance that I ought to remember, but I do not remember one at the moment. At any rate, what would occur to me is that the skilled man may suffer to the extent of saying: "I used to earn a good wage at this particular job, but owing to an improved method it has now been taken away and given to less skilled labour." Therefore, I should suggest that his grievance is more one of the transfer of work and of lessened demand for his skill than one of asking him to do that work for a lessened remuneration. I agree with the Master Cutler that if there is an improvement, and he still goes on doing the work, he always gets a share of that improvement. (Mr. Bedford.) Yes, he always does. (Mr. Hobson.) But if the work becomes something that you cannot give him a share of that improvement in it, because then it requires so much less skill, then it is a question of the transfer of work to another individual, and it is not a question of the skilled workman taking less to do it. Is that not so, Mr. Bedford? (Mr. Bedford.) Yes, I quite agree with you there. Improvements in machinery nearly always mean improvements in wages to the men. The manufacturer never is able to make such an arrangement with his men as to get the full benefit of improvements. To encourage the men to work any new methods, manufacturers must see that the men are going to get some little advantage, either less hard work or more money—or else the men would not do it. (Mr. Hobson.) There would be no inducement for them to take up the new methods but for that. (Mr. Bedford.) There would be no inducement for them to do it at all. (Mr Hobson.) No manufacturer I have come across has been unwilling to give some share of the improvement to the men. (Mr. Bedford.) They give it because they get more work done. (Mr. Hobson.) You must not push it to the point that the men are to have it all, or else you bring it to the point that there is no inducement for the manufacturer to improve.

5577. The allegation is that the employer takes all the advantage?—(Mr. Bedford.) That is not my experience. (Mr. Hobson.) We have never come across any employer we know of who is able to do that.

5578. I imagine the truth is about half-way between those two statements?—But we make no statement that the men take it all. We make the statement simply that if you were to stereotype the Union rate they might be able to take it all. We make no statement that they have done so in the past. (Mr. Bedford.) That is so. My contention is that in order to induce the men to work by the new methods, the masters must see that they are going to get some benefit from it, and that the fair wages rules such as have been current up to now, have been sufficient to ensure that being done, and no more stringent rules are necessary. That is my point.

5579. My last question is on a different subject. The workmen have complained that they cannot trace where Government contracts are placed, so that they cannot make sure that the men employed on them are getting the current rate of wages for doing the work. They suggest that the names of the successful contractors should be published in some publication that is open to all the world. What do you say to that?—I do not agree that the names of the successful firms who tender for Government work should be published. That would be giving very valuable information to competing firms, and it might work very much to the detriment of the Government in reference to their orders in the future; because if you find that there are only three or four firms contracting for any class of work, then giving the successful name would make the others perhaps approach that firm to see if they could not make some form of combine or trust of it so as to get a better price from the Government next time.

5580. The next time?—Yes, in the next contract. (Mr. Hobson.) You are giving to the manufacturers information that may be used against you, which could not otherwise be used if you did not publish it. I am merely making clear what I think is Mr. Bedford's meaning. (Mr. Bedford.) Yes. (Mr. Hobson.) I am not wishing to put that in as a statement from myself.

5581. Would it meet your objection if this announcement was delayed for, say, a fortnight or a month after the contract was placed?—There is a more serious objection in my opinion than that. (Mr. Bedford.) I do not see what the outside public have to do with it at all. I do not see why that information should be given.

5582. It is not the outside public who are to have it, it is the workmen?—You mean that the Trade Union should be informed?

5583. Or the workmen who are engaged on the job; that is the point?—(Mr. Hobson.) Then the object is to let them know when they are on Government work instead of commercial work, in order that they may put the screw on to us, and get something that they could not get on commercial work, in consequence of this agreement with you?

5584. All they want to be sure of is that the current rate is being paid by the contractor for Government work, in fact that he is carrying out the clause of his contract which binds him to pay that rate; and they say there is no means of testing that, unless they know who has got the Government contract?—(Mr. Bedford.) Do you mean that the unsuccessful firms should have the right to go and see what the successful firm is paying?

5585. No——that the workman who is being employed by the successful firm should be able to satisfy himself that that firm is complying with the clause in the contract?—The workmen working at a firm who have obtained a Government contract always know when they are working on Government work. (Mr. Hobson.) Yes, they do.

5586. They say not?—(Mr. Bedford.) They do in any trade that I have been connected with, because as a rule there is an arrow, or some other indication, put on, showing that it is Government work. They will always insist on the standard rate of wages.

5587. If they know that it is Government work?—Whether they know it, or whether they do not, they will be getting the same rate, whether it is Government work or ordinary work. I am referring now particularly to the file trade and the edge-tool trade.

5588. (To Mr. Hobson.) Take those knives that you were talking of; they would not know what they were for, I suppose?—(Mr. Hobson.) It was perfectly well known that they were Government work, but I do not think those particular knives had the broad arrow; I have no recollection of that.

5589. (Mr. Black.) They were of a special type?—They were of a special type which is not made in ordinary commercial work at all, and it was perfectly well known to my workmen that it was for Government work they were quoting. In fact we make no secret of it in going to our men and fixing the price; we always say to our men, in effect, "It is as much in your interest as ours to be reasonable; because if you fix any price that is not reasonable, we shall not be able to secure the order next time, and you will go without." The consequence is we have always found our men quite open to reason on the subject of Government work, on account of that very forcible argument which they know to be true. One thing that I would mention with regard to this publication is this: The workmen take no account of the difficulties that the manufacturers have as to supplies, and I will just give you an instance in relation to something that happened when I quoted to Mr. Black at the Admiralty for an order for ivory table knives. The ivory market showed signs of falling, and I anticipated that fall to the extent of what was practically no profit at the moment on that order, in the hope that I would buy my ivory at a sufficient advantage to carve the profit out of the variation in the state of the market for the materials. If it had been published to all the ivory-cutters in Sheffield that I had obtained the order—as a matter of fact, I did not obtain it, for it went to someone who was a little more sanguine, I think, about the state of the ivory market than perhaps myself—but if it had been published to the ivory-cutters, and it came to be known that I was in the market for so many thousand dozens of handles, I should not have been able to buy those handles to as great an advantage if the sellers had known that I must have them as if that information had merely rested with myself. Consequently, you are going to put up against yourself the market for materials, by permitting this information to be published.

5590. (Chairman.) It has not been proposed to give any information about the quantities?—You are bound to give the information, because you distribute your tender forms so widely that manufacturers who are not particularly interested are constantly giving information to the local Press. It is usual with regard to every Admiralty contract form that comes out in Sheffield, for the local paper within a day or two of its being distributed to say that the Admiralty is in the market, or the War Office, or the India Office, is in the market, for so many thousand dozens of this, that, and the other; and so the fact that the order is in the market would get talked of and be matter of common knowledge. The question as to where that order is placed, is not by any means always a matter of common knowledge, because most contractors who wish to conduct their business on prudent lines keep that information to themselves, at any rate up to the point at which they have bought the materials necessary for the execution of the order. Of course the question of purchasing the materials is nothing to the men, but it is something of importance to the masters, and it is something of importance to you.

5591. However, you are clear that it would not be a popular measure with the contractors?—(Mr. Bedford.) I do not think so. I think it might be open to very grave objections.

5592. And even my modification, providing for a delay of, say, a fortnight or a month, would not meet the case?—(Mr. Hobson.) No, I do not think it would. (Mr. Bedford.) I think perhaps if there was any complaint that a manufacturer was not paying the scheduled rate of wages on any Government work, then it would be time enough to inquire into it and to see whether that was so or not.

5593. Their statement is that they have no opportunity for making a complaint, because they do not know whether it is Government work that they are on?—That cannot apply in the Sheffield trade. (Mr.

Hobson.) If they do not know it, that is perfectly plain evidence on the surface that that work is not being worse paid than the average work the men are working on. If it goes through unobserved, it must be paid for at the current rate of wage or it would soon be observed. So the question answers itself from that point of view, that where there is nothing known it must be because there is no grievance, for if there was a grievance it would soon become known. (Mr. Bedford.) Certainly. (Mr. Hobson.) I cannot see the hardship myself. I can see the point of the advantage to the Trade Union of having that information if you were to embody all these clauses in the Government contract, because these clauses would form a most powerful lever to put pressure on a firm. I would particularly draw your attention to the suggestion of the Union that no work should be given to any firm that was not in every department paying the Trade Union rate of wages. Immediately that any Union who had a quarrel with a firm knew that that firm had got a Government contract in any other department, they would go to them and say, "We will point out to the Government Department concerned that you are disqualified to have this contract because you have a quarrel on with us and you are not paying our terms in this other Department, and thereby we will prevent you taking this Government order in that Department." Therefore, if you put these clauses in as an entirety, evidently that information would be most valuable to the Trade Union to enable them to use any Government order with any firm as a lever to settle in the way they wish any dispute in any part of that firm's business. (Mr. Bedford.) Certainly. (Mr. Hobson.) And, as I say, if the work as it is going through calls forth no comment, that in itself shows it must be going through at the current rate of wages.

5594. (Mr. De la Bère.) On that question of the publication of the names of the successful competitors, is it not already pretty common knowledge in the trade very shortly after the orders are placed?—(Mr. Bedford.) Yes, it is.

5595. In point of fact, it is known?—(Mr. Bedford.) In point of fact, it is fairly well known in our district.

5596. Then as regards your chief objection to it, that, I understand, is that the market might be raised against you?—That is one reason.

5597. Would not delaying the publication for a fortnight or three weeks get over that?—It would be better to delay it than for it to be done straight away. But I do not see that it is necessary. If the men are asked to take a lower rate they know at once, and if they are not asked to take a lower rate than the usual rate, it does not matter to them whether it is a Government order or not.

5598. I am not looking at it merely from the point of view of the men; I am looking at it from a more general point of view. Many of the employers who have been here have been rather in favour of it, and at any rate I thought that your point as to the raising of the market against you would be very largely met if the publication were not immediate, and if it were delayed for a fortnight or three weeks?—I think it would.

5599. What do you think, Mr. Hobson?—(Mr. Hobson.) I think it would be very difficult to lay down a general rule; there are so many different forms of work for the Government, and in some cases they extend over a long period. For instance, it is not unknown for people to get a three years' contract, and what would be a reasonable delay in some cases might not be a reasonable delay in others. I think it would be very difficult to lay down a rule. (Mr. Bedford.) It could not hurt a firm that had got a three years' contract. (Mr. Hobson.) Because it would be known that they had got it, do you mean? (Mr. Bedford.) It would be fairly well known. (Mr. Hobson.) I am a little disinclined to assent to that.

5600. It is very largely known already, is it not?—It does not always follow that a firm has to put it in hand immediately; for instance, I have known us to be given an order in February of which we were not to commence delivery till April, and in some cases it is three months after we have received a contract before we begin to make any delivery. In such a case a fortnight's delay would be of no use to us at all, because if we are not going to make deliveries for three months, it may be that in some of those cases we should be quietly making our purchases with a view to putting that work in hand, and to publish the name at the end of a fortnight would be just as bad as if you published it immediately. So I do not think you can lay down any general rule.

5601. In your notes you say that workmen do not work with the same diligence and application if they know that there is a large order in the hands of the firm employing them. And you go on to say that the publication of this information would therefore be detrimental to the interests of the contractor; that is, of course, as regards purchasing the materials, but as employers of labour do you say that, in point of fact, the workmen do know when they are on Government work?—(Mr. Bedford.) Yes. (Mr. Hobson.) In most cases they do. But that is a very serious question, as the workmen do not work as steadily at piece-work prices if they know there is always a bulk of work to come back to.

5602. Then I suppose that in point of fact they do know already that it is Government work?—Yes, in many cases they do; they get to know it by degrees.

5603. In many of the War Office contracts there is a clause requiring direct payment to the worker by the firm; that does not at present obtain in the class of contracts we have been discussing this afternoon, but do you think it would have any prejudicial effect if it were introduced? It gets over the middleman or the little master; and I do not know how far that system still obtains in the Sheffield trades of one man taking a job and paying the other workmen employed on it?—(Mr. Bedford.) Do you mean that a man should not be able to take a Government contract and sub-let it.

5604. Yes?—I think to make a rule that he should not do that, might be rather awkward sometimes. Take some of your long lists of tools; you do not want yourselves to sub-divide that contract, but there may be three or four lines which are special lines not made by any firm which is competing, and if you were to prevent a firm from quoting for those, that would be quite an upset to the Government. It would not matter to the manufacturer if you took that part out of the contract, but I do not think it would be to the advantage of the Government to put a clause of that sort in.

5605. The practice as to the clause at present seems to vary in the case of different departments. The War Office clause is to the effect that sub-letting other than that which is customary in the trade is prohibited; that leaves a great deal of latitude, because in many trades a great deal of sub-letting is recognised. Other Departments have a clause prohibiting any sub-letting at all without the written permission of the Department. I am rather anxious to know how far sub-letting in the Sheffield small trades, which we have been discussing, still exists?—It does exist in miscellaneous stores, but I do not think it exists in large contracts. (Mr. Hobson.) I am not quite in agreement with you there as regards the cutlery trade. (Mr. Bedford.) I am only speaking of my own knowledge. (Mr. Hobson.) You are speaking for your trade, but I have something different to say for my trade. (Mr. Bedford.) I am not speaking for the cutlery trade at all. (Mr. Hobson.) I know. I will say a word about that shortly. (Mr. Bedford.) In my own trade a firm that takes a Government contract, if it is files, makes them themselves; if they were not to do so, I should say that that firm would not be acting quite fairly to the Government.

5606. (Mr. De la Bère.) Are the workpeople in the direct employment of that firm, or are they employed by a series of little masters who take parts of the job?—As a rule they are paid direct by the firm, but, for instance, in a file-cutting shop containing 30 or 40 machines, there may be one man who is a sort of overseer of that shop, and who makes out a sheet of the wages and pays those men.

5607. Would you regard that as a necessary incident of the trade?—Yes. (Mr. Hobson.) But he is the contractor for that shop, in effect. (Mr. Bedford.) It simplifies the wage-paying for the manufacturer, that is all, and I do not see that it is any injustice to anyone.

5608. I do not say that it applies in your trade, but in many trades it results in its being extremely difficult for a Government Department to find out what the workpeople actually are receiving in wages?—Certainly it would be, but I do not see how you can stop it. In the very heavy trades, if a man is forging a shaft, the head man has three or four men under him whom he pays.

5609. That is the group piece-work system, which is a recognised thing?—(Mr. Hobson.) Yes. (Mr. Bedford.) In the trades I am representing it is only as a matter of facility that the head man pays 10 or 20 men who are working at this particular shop; but they are all paid on a recognised scale of wages.

5610. There is just one small point I wanted to ask you: In the file trade is the expression "cast steel" necessarily taken to mean "crucible cast steel"? Is that recognised in the trade?—It ought to be, but it is not. "Cast steel" really means "crucible cast steel," but we know that very often Siemens-Martin steel, which is also cast, is used instead. (Mr. Hobson.) There is a very simple answer to that. "Cast steel" means nothing, and "crucible cast steel" should definitely mean steel made in a small crucible. That is what is the original meaning of the words "cast steel"; but by the pressure of deterioration, "cast steel" is now worthless as a definition. (Mr. Bedford.) If you want to get crucible cast steel you must use the word "crucible" really; that is what it comes to. (Mr. Hobson.) And you may not get it then.

5611. Some of the witnesses here have asked for a more widely spread exhibition of the patterns, War Office patterns especially. Are the employers at Sheffield generally satisfied with the facilities given at present?—(Mr. Bedford.) Yes, I think so. They can see them either here, or they are generally sent down to the Cutler's Hall in Sheffield for inspection. (Mr. Hobson.) Not War Office patterns. The Admiralty patterns are always sent to the Cutler's Hall, but the War Office patterns are only inspectable at Woolwich.

5612. Do you not get War Office patterns at Sheffield?—No. (Mr. Bedford.) It would be a distinct advantage if we did. (Mr. Hobson.) It would be an advantage to the War Office, I am prepared to say, but not exactly an advantage to the individual contractor. Those of us who take the trouble to go to Woolwich, and know all about them, would have a little more competition to face; that is what it comes to. (Mr. Bedford.) Yes, that is so. (Mr. Hobson.) If you ask me my opinion as a contractor, I should say, do not show them any further, because I find out all about them; but if you ask me my opinion as a friend of the department, I should say, by all means send them down and get the utmost competition you can.

5613. Then, Mr. Hobson, on that point of the middleman or the little master, I think you did not quite agree with Mr. Bedford?—I do not quite agree. Of course, there are several cases in the cutlery trade in which a man is not paid direct. That is customary. For instance, when we forge a hand-forged table-knife for Mr. Black for his ivory work, that is done by a forger and a striker. It is universal in Sheffield that the forger's name only should be on the wage-book, and he and his striker divide the wage in proportions agreed between themselves. The forger must have a striker to suit himself; he works so intimately with him that you cannot force any man on him; he therefore selects his own striker. Now you could not arrange to pay that striker direct from the firm; it would be contrary to the custom of the trade. The same thing applies to apprentices. An apprentice working with his master is paid through the master, that is, the master pays the apprentice, and consequently, to say that all the wages must be paid direct is absurd, if I may venture to say so—even where put in, it is probably not done. We understand sub-letting to mean that a man must not be a mere merchant or middleman who takes a contract from you and then lets out the making of those things again. So far as that clause goes, I have no objection to it on the broad principle, but I agree with Mr. Bedford that there is in every contract, or nearly every contract, some one thing or other which the man who is making the great bulk himself must procure elsewhere. I will give you an instance again in the cutlery trade. I never make carving forks, and no cutlery manufacturer in Sheffield makes his own carving forks; if we want a carving fork we go to the fork-maker and buy a fork blade, and we put that into the handle. We make the carving knife blade and put that into the handle, and we send them in as a pair of carvers; but I do not control or pay the man who actually makes that fork blade.

5614. (Chairman.) You buy it ready-made, in fact?—I buy that fork blade ready-made.

5615. (Mr. De la Bère.) Really, I think you are both in agreement that so far as the Sheffield trade is concerned, the trade is not ripe for the introduction of such a clause?—(Mr. Bedford.) That is so; it would be inconvenient to both the Government and the manufacturer. (Mr. Hobson.) That is so. The sub-letting clause at present existing which you mentioned, to the effect that there should be no sub-letting other than what is customary in the trade, fits the Sheffield trade, and goes as far as we can go in our case. I do not quite see how you can possibly do anything else.

5616. (Mr. Black.) And it is not a grievance with the worker at Sheffield?—I do not think so; I never heard of any workman making any grievance of it, and there is not, as a rule, any sufficient margin of profit on Government work that I have ever come across to enable two people to share it.

5617. (Mr. De la Bère.) Are the Sheffield trades gradually becoming factory trades, that is, passing from homes and small workshops into factories?—(Mr. Bedford.) The smaller manufacturers are gradually dying out, or being merged into larger ones.

5618. And the larger ones carry out the work in their factories?—Yes.

5619. It is gradually passing over into the factories?—I think so. (Mr. Hobson.) But there is a possibility of retrogression in that respect. There is a possibility of such severe requirements on the part of the Home Office in cutlery factories at the present moment, that if those requirements are put forward as the Home Office is inclined to put them forward, the tendency will be to arrest that development and to take the work from the large factories back into garret workshops again.

5620. (Mr. Black.) I do not want to go back into the details of that Admiralty case that you mentioned, but can you suggest any simpler method of settling disputes of that kind than the amount of trouble we took in that case to send an inspector down? Is that a satisfactory method from your point of view?—It depends entirely on the inspector—if he is quite satisfactory. You sent a very able, fair-minded man down, whom we were glad to see; and if all disputes were looked into by a man of the type you sent then, we should be very well satisfied with that method.

5621. He decided in your favour?—I do not think that biassed my opinion. What he did was, he looked into the facts: he got them methodically; he went very carefully to work; he interviewed the workmen and everyone else. I have not had much experience of such inquiries, and I can only say that was a very favourable experience.

5622. If they become frequent, might there be any simpler method, do you think, than each Department sending its inspector, because with different inspectors you might have different methods?—I am afraid I cannot suggest any simpler method. I think you might possibly form—what shall I say?—an agreed staff for several Departments that might take that work. I do not see why each Department should be in a watertight compartment and have its own staff. I think if you would interchange services you might make economies and get useful results. I do not know that I have any right to make a suggestion, but for my own part I think that in this matter I might possibly suggest that if you would hold such inquiries to see that on Government work no one was under any worse conditions than he would have been without that Government work, that ought to go some way towards satisfying labour. I would suggest that you put into the clauses of your contract an obligation on the part of the masters to contribute a sum, which you would fix, towards the cost of such an inquiry, and that a like sum should be contributed by the men's Union, and that in case either party fails to prove its case some portion, if not the whole, of the cost of such inquiry should be borne by the one in fault. I think you will have endless inquiries if you are going to take up every question to see whether the conditions are not those of sweated labour. You may have speculative inquiries put forward without sufficient warranty, on the off-chance that something may be got. But if you put some caution money up, so that if the allegations are not proved the Unions shall pay —which they are well able to do—and if they are proved, the masters shall pay—which is an obligation I am perfectly prepared to recommend the masters to undertake—then I think that those inquiries would be kept down, and the result would be that you would be able to assure labour that there was being no sweated labour. For my own part I should welcome that, because the high-class firms do not want to be put in competition with sweated and badly paid labour; it is not in our interest. (Mr. Bedford.) Would you not agree in any such inquiry that it should be some one disconnected with either the masters, the men, or the Trade Unions, who should be required to arbitrate? (Mr. Hobson.) It is not a question of arbitration that I suggest; it is a question of an inquiry into the facts by a Government Department. I suggest that the Government shall simply inquire into one fact: are the men working on this contract earning an amount of wages at least equal to what they were earning before they were put upon this Government work, or at least equal to what they would be earning in the same firm on non-Government work? Knowing that the Government would accept the principle that they have no desire to profit by sweated labour, and no desire for men employed on their work to be paid a less amount of wages than on commercial work, and that they expect that these clauses shall be carried out; therefore, if you express willingness to look into that fact, I think that there ought to be some clause by which the masters undertake when they take this contract that, if they are alleged not to be carrying out the Fair Wages Clause, they will put up such amount as the Director of Contracts or the Secretary of State—I care not whom you place the obligation upon—shall fix as reasonable for an inquiry into that trade. It is evident, according to the size of the contract and the nature of the trade, that the inquiry may be large or small, expensive or cheap, and therefore I do not wish to tie you to a sum; but the contractor shall put up a sum, I suggest, and a like sum shall be put up by the Union who make a complaint. Then you will go down and investigate into the facts with a view to proving that one point: are the men being paid an amount of wages equal to what they were earning before put upon this Government work, or would be earning at the ordinary commercial work in that firm? It seems to me that you will then have cut away from the labour people any ground for saying that Government work is sweated, and that you will have given an assistance and not a drawback to all contractors who are desirous, as Mr. Bedford and myself are, of paying a fair rate of wages.

5623. You do not favour the idea, then, of anything like a local tribunal composed, say, of one master, one Trade Union man, and one independent gentleman?—No, I do not.

5624. That is not an idea of mine; it has been suggested to this Committee?—I will tell you one objection to that. Once that local tribunal has fixed a rate of wages which must be paid in any case, the tendency of that fixed rate of wages will be to make the better-class firms who can provide better facilities indifferent to taking that Government contract and it will be taken by the small people, for two reasons—one is, that they will use that presumably well-paid Government work as a possible bribe to their men by saying, "We will give you some share of the Government work if you will do something else on the cheap"; and another is, that they will do it practically without profit, but for prestige, or to employ their men when they are short of other employment. I believe that such an absolutely strictly fixed wage will tend to stop facilities. That is really the point. I do not think there should be a fixed wage for Government work; I see no reason at all why the Government work should not fluctuate with the market, as all commercial work does; you ought to fluctuate with the market, and when wages are cheap why should not you have your price lowered as well as have it raised when wages are dear?

5625. Would you not agree to the idea of a minimum of any kind below which wages should not fluctuate? In very slack times you might get down to almost a sweated wage, might you not?—That is a very difficult question to answer, because I have not in my purview all your trades. As far as Sheffield trades go, I can only say that I do not think so. (Mr. Bedford.) They do not go down in slack times. (Mr. Hobson.) They do not go below a certain level, and consequently I do not think there is any serious fear of what you suggest happening in those trades I have any knowledge of. There may be in other trades, such perhaps as the clothing trades, for example; but in the Sheffield trades I do not think there is any fear of it, and we can only speak of what we have knowledge. (Mr. Bedford.) The only way in which they suffer in bad times in Sheffield is not in the rate which they are paid, but in the quantity of the work which they get. (Mr. Hobson.) Exactly; that is so.

5626. (Mr. Hillier.) It has been suggested that schedules should be sent to a responsible representative of the men, at the same time as tenders are being sent to the contractors?—Schedules of what?

5627. Schedules of the items that were included in the tender—the goods for which the tenders are being called for?—As I say, in Sheffield that is frequently in the newspapers in any case. (Mr. Bedford.) I did not quite catch the question. (Mr. Hobson.) It has been suggested that a schedule of the articles required should be sent to the men, and so practically informing the Union that the Government are in the market for certain articles. At present, as I say, it often leaks out into the newspapers as it is.

5628. (Mr. Hillier.) It is practically sending a tender form to the men as well as to the masters.

5629. (Mr. De la Bère.) That is virtually done.

5630. (Mr. Black.) Yes, it is very largely done by the Admiralty and the War Office.

5631. (Mr. Hobson.) I do not think we are prepared to say very much on that; and if you do it, you know the effects of what you do.

5632. (Mr. De la Bère.) We do it?—Then, as I say, I do not think there is very much to be said on the subject.

5633. (Mr. Black.) It is not sent to individual men, but it is sent to the Union as a confidential document?—(Mr. Bedford.) If it is sent to the Trade Union, I do not think there is very much to be said about it. My own opinion about these new clauses is that the Fair Wages Clauses, as they stand, are quite sufficient for both masters and men. If there is any dispute, and if the firm is not paying the full rate of wages, the Fair Wages Clause exists, and I do not think you will need anything more. If you introduce more stringent rules, that will have a tendency to create friction between masters and men which does not exist to-day; therefore I deprecate any stringent rules being made.

5634. (Mr. Wilson Fox.) On a point the Chairman has already asked you about, is there much difficulty in your trades in Sheffield, as a whole, arising from skilled men claiming to do unskilled men's work?—Do you not mean the reverse—from unskilled men claiming to do skilled men's work?

5635. No, I mean from skilled men claiming to do unskilled men's work?—I never heard of such a case.

5636. There are certain trades where unskilled men are carrying out certain operations; in making a certain article, part of the work can be done by unskilled workmen, but the skilled man who has the doing of the skilled part of the work claims to make the whole of the article—unskilled work as well as skilled work. Have you never heard of that in Sheffield?—No, I never heard of it in Sheffield.

5637. (Mr. Hillier.) Take the making of files as a concrete case, and put it that 1s. a dozen is paid for the files; then you introduce unskilled men to feed the machines, and the masters deduct, as it were, from the agreed price of one-third for the introduction of this unskilled labour, although it is claimed that they should only deduct a sixth, or 2d.?—(Mr. Hobson.) I think that refers to this: I do know that in the price paid for file-cutting in some cases the men are accustomed to fetch and carry that work. It is not so much to put the files into the machines, as merely to bring them as labourers from the store where the blanks are kept, and then to take them away again and deliver them. Of course, it is quite possible that a firm may be reducing their price, and cutting their price by overcharging for that labour where they supply it; and so far as they are doing so, they are not paying the wages current in the district. If the practice of that firm was more extreme than that of other manufacturers doing Government work, you could, on an inquiry such as I suggest, bring the firm that were overcharging their men to the proper level, under your present Clause. It really means, not that your present Clause is not good enough, but that your present Clause is not put in force, surely? I can quite see that there would be a possibility of cutting the men down, and I may say, with reference to the file trade, that I am not in agreement with the Master Cutler on the question of there being such absolute unanimity as to the prices in machine-cut files. There are very considerable diversities in the prices paid for the machine-cut files throughout the town; as, for instance, there is this question whether the files are brought to them and also taken away, and there are some other points in the trade. Consequently I do not know of that unanimity for cutting files that the Master Cutler seems to think exists. (Mr. Bedford.) I have never heard of any complaints. (Mr. Hobson.) Nor have I, but I think that various forms of bargain may be equally equitable in their way, and that broad justice is being done—I do not doubt that; but I think you will find there has been very considerable diversity in the forms of the bargain on minor points, such as the practice of bringing the work to and from the machines.

5638. (Mr. Wilson Fox.) Do I understand that the Master Cutler takes the same view that in Sheffield the skilled men do not claim to do the unskilled work in any operation?—(Mr. Bedford.) I cannot say whether they do or do not. If they do claim to do the unskilled work, I think it is very foolish of them.

5639. I only want to know the fact. It has been alleged, not necessarily in Sheffield, but in connection with certain trades, that the Trade Unions by their action are ousting unskilled men, and therefore adding to the difficulties of the employment of unskilled men, and aggravating to some extent the unemployed question. I only want to know whether you have anything to say on that?—No, I think not, except this: if a skilled man were to insist on doing unskilled labour, I think he would be badly employing his time in preventing the manufacturer using unskilled labour to advantage.

5640. It is not a policy carried out in Sheffield by Trade Unionists as far as you know?—I do not think so. (Mr. Hobson.) I may say, as far as I know, there is a difficulty of that kind more in the shipbuilding trade than in any other trade. I have heard that the difficulty of dividing the skilled and unskilled labour does exist considerably in the shipbuilding trade. (Mr. Bedford.) On the tramway lines, and so on, there are certain unskilled men employed, and we had disputes a short time ago with one firm in Sheffield. Certain skilled men were employed on one part of the work, and unskilled men were employed on the other, and there were questions asked in the Town Council about it. But that dispute has been settled. That is the only instance of which I have heard of skilled labour claiming to do unskilled labour at the skilled price. (Mr. Hobson.) I think it was in that case the Engineer Fitters' Union which intervened. They were claiming that they as engineer fitters ought to be employed on laying tramway rails and junctions, and not what are known as engineers' labourers. That was not, of course, Government work; that was Corporation work. That is the only instance I know of in Sheffield, and I have never heard of such a question arising with regard to Sheffield work for the Admiralty or for the other Government Departments.

The witnesses withdrew.

Mr. Herbert Henry Bartlett, called and examined.

5641. (Chairman.) You represent the London Master Builders' Association, I understand?—Yes.

5642. Do you find any difficulty in your trade in defining and enforcing what is called the current rate? I believe there is an agreement over the whole London district between the masters and the men which covers almost every kind of operation, does it not?—Yes, it does; not only in London, but generally throughout the country now.

5643. One difficulty that we have heard of in connection with that matter is that we have heard of cases on the verge of the district where there seems to be a local modification of the rate generally agreed upon; have you any experience of that?—No. There cannot be such cases, I think, because our district extends to 12 miles all round from Charing Cross, and the rules are binding upon the masters and the men.

5644. You do not know of any case of a master on the outskirts of that district who tried to set up rates of his own?—They might try it, but they would never succeed, because the Trade Union men take care of that. They produce their rules, and they say, "Here are the wages you have got to pay," and if they do not pay them, the men leave the employment. There may be isolated cases where a small builder or a speculative builder would try and get a lower rate of wages, but he cannot succeed in it.

5645. Allegations have been made that builders with Government contracts on the outskirts of the district have refused to pay the rate settled for the London district as a whole?—I have heard of one or two cases only, and I have been connected with the London Master Builders' Association for a good many years. All the cases come before us. In our set of rules which we have agreed with the Trade Union, we have conciliation rules, so if any difficulty arises or any question, it is to be referred to the conciliation board before any strike can be declared, or any lock-out. During the course of my connection with the Association I have heard of, I think, two cases that might perhaps bear upon the point you mention, that is, on the limit of the 12-mile radius. Sometimes the line cuts halfway through some Government premises, and the buildings outside of that line would be subject to one rate of wages, and the buildings inside would be subject to another. That is a difficulty which you cannot get over, because you must have a boundary somewhere, and if you put it at 20 miles or 30 miles, the same thing would happen. There was a little difficulty about three years ago with a Government contract at Enfield, I think. There the border line just cut through the Government premises. The matter was very easily settled; when the contractor's attention was called to it, he paid one rate of wages for all the men, although they were outside the actual line, that were engaged upon that particular contract; he paid the London wages, although he was not really bound to do so.

5646. Have you got all the masters in the London district in your Association?—No, not all, but we have all the principal employers. Of course, there are always new firms springing up, and so on, and the speculating builders we do not seek to have in much, of course.

5647. The London Master Builders' Association would not admit any contention of a master, say, on the verge of the London district, that there could be any other rate than that which had been agreed upon with the men, would it?—No.

5648. Do you agree that the customs of the Trade Union in other matters than wages should be enforced on a contractor?—In all the cases where we have made rules and agreements with the Trade Union, they have referred not only to the rate of wages, but to working hours, to the rates for overtime, to holidays, and all that sort of thing.

5649. Those are all included?—Those are all laid down, just the same as the wages themselves, in fact.

5650. Do your agreements cover all sections of the building trade?—All the trades, except at present that I think we have no rule with the labourers. Some three or four or five years ago, I suppose it was, we met the delegates of the labourers on several occasions, but we could not agree terms, and so it was considered on both sides better to leave it open and not to have any rules at all. We have found that work very well; there is a recognised rate for unskilled labour.

5651. (Mr. Bailey.) What is that rate, do you know?—Sevenpence an hour. That is what everybody pays, except that in some cases, where it is trench work, and so on, they pay more. Sevenpence is the basis rate.

5652. (Chairman.) Do you think it is possible that any masters, while they comply with the Fair Wages Clause as regards the bulk of the work, are paying below the proper rate for other parts of it?—I do not see very well how it can be, because the men cannot possibly be separated from one particular kind of work and another.

5653. I was thinking rather of joinery work and that kind of thing, which is done in the shops and not on the building itself?—In the shops there are the same rules precisely as on the building.

5654. And they are generally accepted and enforced, are they?—Yes. We are bound by those rules. The only difference is that on the jobs or contracts outside there are certain rules which apply to those, such as having to provide messrooms for the men and a man to cook for them, and that sort of thing, which you do not do in the shops.

5655. To go to another point, you have no objection to the publication of the contractors' names, I think? That is so.

5656. I believe it is always done in your case?—Yes. I see no objection to that.

5657. (Mr. Bailey.) Even the amount of the contract, I think, is published?—Yes, it is. I think, in fact, that it would be rather an advantage to see the list of tenders published.

5658. (Chairman.) Generally, you think the present form of this Clause is satisfactory, and could not be improved upon?—I really do not see any necessity for altering it as regards our trade. We find no difficulty with it. You are, of course, entitled, as you do, to attach that particular slip to all Government contracts, calling attention to the Resolution. We have no difficulty in applying our rules between us and the workmen when any question arises.

5659. Very few cases are brought before the Association of infringements of the rules, I understand?—They very rarely arise. Amongst all the thousands of men who are working under these rules, I do not suppose we get two representations a year, and then it is upon some little question or other which there might be a difference of opinion upon—not really upon the basis of wages, but as to whether a man may be allowed to start a quarter of an hour earlier of a morning to suit trains and that sort of thing, without being paid overtime. We have fixed the hours of work at the regular wages, and beyond those hours it is overtime. But sometimes it may suit a contractor, where trains run badly, and so on, for the men to come a little earlier, and then the question has arisen whether they are to be paid overtime for coming that half an hour earlier. We have little things like that, but nothing affecting the broad principle. There is a point raised in the suggestions you have sent to us that I should like to speak to. I am referring to the question of a contract at a distance away from a town, and the question if there should not be wages fixed in the district, whether you should not pay the same rate as that of the town. I think that would be very unfair. For instance, you may go outside of London and of our radius. It is only the thin end of the wedge that the Trade Unions are trying to get in there, with the view in my opinion—and that is supported by a great many others—of trying to get London wages paid everywhere. We have had cases brought before the Association where serious difficulties have arisen with regard to that. A man has had a contract a considerable distance away in the country, and he has employed the men in that district to carry out the work, paying them at the rate of wages recognised there. Then the Trade Union have tried to stir up strife, and have succeeded in two or three cases of rather important and large contracts, on this ground, that the contractor's works being in the town, he should pay the town rate of wages to the men employed at this distant place. There may be a very much lower rate of wages there for very good reasons—the rates and taxes are not the same, living is different, and the whole thing is different. There is no reason at all why they should be paid the same rate of wages as the men in the town. I can see that this is the thin end of the wedge of trying to get these London wages paid everywhere.

5660. I do not think it came up in connection with your trade at all; and, of course, the Clause in the contract only requires you to pay the current rate in the district where the work is performed?—I quite understand that; and that we are all willing to do, of course.

5661. (Mr. Bailey.) It has been alleged in regard to places on what I might call the fringe of the London district—take, for instance, Croydon and Kingston—that there exists in those places a sort of understanding amongst the masters in regard to the wages, according to which they pay rates lower than the London rates; are you aware of any such understandings?—I have not personally known of them; perhaps I should say I do not know of any understanding, but that I have heard, as I said just now, that there have been attempts to do it.

5662. So far as you know, there is no definite understanding?—I have never heard of one.

5663. (Mr. Hillier.) With regard to that question of Mr. Bailey's, is there not an Association of Builders at Kingston which is independent of your Association, the London Master Builders' Association?—There may be, but I have not heard of it.

5664. Is there not another one at Croydon?—I do not know of it, but there may be.

5665. Do you know of any builder at Kingston or of any builder at Croydon paying the London rate of wages?—No. I do not know that any special case has come before me at all, and therefore whether they are paying the London rate or not, I could not say.

5666. These rates that you refer to are the rates that were agreed upon between the London masters, the big masters; and they said that those rates should apply to 12 miles round?—Yes.

5667. If those builders that are on the fringe of the 12-mile radius were not called into your conferences, would those rates prevail against them?—Do you mean if they are builders outside or within the radius?

5668. We will say just within; take Kingston, which is within?—As long as you are within the radius you are bound to those rates, and the Trade Union take very good care that those rates are paid; they call attention to it at once if they are not.

5669. Then it resolves itself into this: that there are a large number of men who are not Trade Union men?—Yes, of course, there are.

5670. And, therefore, these rates are agreed between the builders on the fringe and the men who are not in the Trade Unions?—That we cannot control, of course. Bargains made between men separately you cannot control at all.

5671. There is no limitation on the number of apprentices in the building trade, is there, with the exception of the plasterers?—Yes; that also applies to the masons and the joiners.

5672. But it is not in your rules?—No, but it is an understood thing.

5673. (Mr. Wilson Fox.) Taking the London district, the rates are agreed upon between you and the Trade Union?—Yes.

5674. Therefore, whether you call it a current rate or whether you call it a Trade Union rate, it comes to the same thing?—In London it does, but it is not so in the country.

5675. I am talking about London. You have nothing to do with the country, have you?—Yes, very often.

5676. I mean to say, as regards your organisation, the London Master Builders' Association deals with rates in the London area only?—Quite so.

5677. Therefore, when you go out into the country, you are as much in difficulty to know what to do as the Government Departments are when they have to consider questions arising out of the Fair Wages Clause?—Generally speaking, there are working rules made between the National Federation of Employers (which is the organisation outside London) and the workmen.

5678. But you sometimes get into a district where there are no rules, I suppose?—Very rarely.

5679. I know there are some instances of that?—There might be such cases, but they are very rare.

5680. When a London man takes a job in the country, say in Essex, and he takes some of his London men out with him, and has to find them lodgings, they will not accept the Essex rates, will they?—No. He has to pay those the London rate, and he has to pay for their lodgings as well.

5681. That is what I wanted to clear up. It is only when he employs local men, say in the country districts of Essex, who are getting lower rates of wages than the London rates, that he would expect to pay his men the current rate; that is your point, I assume?—Yes.

5682. But if you were to take the London man out, he would never think of accepting a lower rate than he gets in London, would he?—We are bound by rules to pay them the London rate.

5683. Plus lodging money?—Yes; and allow them time for travelling as well.

5684. Then it is conceivable when you take some London men out and you employ some local men, that you have got different rates for the same work on the same building?—Yes, that is so.

5685. Is that not rather conducive to trouble?—We have found it work pretty well. There is not much trouble about it, because it is thoroughly understood. Generally, I might say that the local man locally employed gets a little better really than the local wages; he gets an improvement upon them. But then he is expected to do more work; he has to work up to a London man's idea of what can be done instead of a countryman's idea.

5686. (Mr. Hillier.) In fact, I suppose the country workman at his low rate of wages really does not give such good results as the London man with his higher rate of wages?—He gives no better results certainly.

The witness withdrew.

Mr. Frank Moore, called and examined.

5687. (Chairman.) You represent the Midland Counties Hosiery Manufacturers' Association, do you not?—Yes.

5688. Do you see any difficulty in interpreting the expression "current rate" as applied to wages in your trade?—We have never found any difficulty in arriving at what is the current rate. You might say there is always a current rate for making certain articles in the district where those goods are made.

5689. Is that a piece-work rate?—Yes; practically you may say that the hosiery trade is all done at piece-work rates.

5690. We have heard of a case in which, instead of their being paid at a piece-work rate, the men or women—I forget which it was—have been paid on time-work rate, which did not work out nearly as high as the piece-work rate?—Speaking personally as a manufacturer, I should say that any manufacturer who paid a woman on time-rate would act very much to his own disadvantage, because we find that people do not work in the same manner when on time. For instance, if you are paying a woman 15s. a week, she would expect to get £1 at the piece-work rates, and she would earn it. Machinery is so expensive in our trade that we could not afford to have a woman only earning a limited amount on a machine—nor a man either, for the matter of that. You must have a good rate of production, and the more your people earn the better you are pleased.

5691. The case we heard of was a case of making jackets, of which the price was 11s. per dozen; then the firm converted that into a time-work rate of 30s. per week, and it was found that the men could make four dozens of these jackets for the 30s. which compared with the piece-work rate of 11s. per dozen?—My experience of the men is that any man who is put on time will take very good care that he does not do more on time than he would get the value for. I suppose it is a very wrong thing to say, and that we ought to assume that every man would do as well on time as he does at piece-work; but they do not. I think we are about the largest hosiery manufacturers; we have got factories all over the county of Leicester and in Derbyshire. The only occasions on which we ever put any one on time are when we get a new machine and we do not know what it will produce, nor what the hands can or should earn; then we put them on time till we get an idea.

5692. In order to test them?—Yes; and then it is a matter of arrangement with the workpeople as to what they consider is a fair rate. Suppose we have got a man that we are paying 30s. per week to, if we attempted to fix the piece-work rate so that he would only earn 30s. he would not agree to that—"No," he would say, "I shall earn more than that." So probably we should come to an arrangement by which he could earn perhaps 34s. or 35s., and then we should find in a month's time he would be earning 45s. I remember when I was quite a young man, as a manufacturer, we had in one room nearly 60 girls employed on what we call mending, that is to say, making up any imperfections. We put them all on piece-work and fixed a rate with them, and in about six weeks I think we had got the number down to about 20, and that 20 were doing all the work that there was to be done. I do not grumble against it; it is human nature; but I mean to say that it shows that piece-work is absolutely necessary.

5693. Are your rates generally agreed upon by all the employers?—By all the employers in a certain district.

5694. What district do you cover?—We have a factory at Leicester, we have one at Hinckley, we have two at Burbage, which is near Hinckley, and we have a large factory at Derby.

5695. Have you different rates at all those places?—Yes, we have different rates according to the rate of the district.

5696. How do you define the district?—In Leicester you pay the prices that are current in Leicester, in Hinckley you pay the prices that are current in Hinckley, and in Burbage you pay the prices that are current in Burbage. There is a tremendous amount of local jealousy in the way. For instance, our factories at Burbage are 2½ miles from Hinckley, and the people there are intensely jealous of Hinckley, and will have nothing to do with Hinckley. At Hinckley there is a Trade Union, but the people at Burbage are not in a Trade Union. On a good many things we pay at Burbage considerably more than we do at Hinckley, but on other things we pay less. The Burbage men, however, prefer to have their own price current.

5697. (Mr. Wilson Fox.) But are the rates agreed rates?—They are agreed rates as between the workpeople and ourselves.

5697*a*. (Chairman.) Now take the case of Derby; I think you said you have a factory at Derby?—Yes.

5698. Has that been recently established?—It was established about eight or nine years ago.

5699. Do you pay less there than you do at Leicester?—We pay less than we did at Leicester. We do not manufacture now at Leicester any of that class of work that we manufacture at Derby. That class of work used to be made entirely at Leicester. It is nearly all underwear—the sort of goods that we make for our Army contracts—a sort of coarse stuff. The bulk of the factories moved out of Leicester some years ago, and their rates were quite 35 to 40 per cent. less than we were paying in Leicester; that went on until we were practically the only firm left in Leicester doing that class of work. We went in for doing a lot of the extra processes ourselves; for instance, we went in for all the finishing that is generally done by other businesses, in order to try and meet the costs; but we found we could not do it, and so we had to move out the same as the other people had done. We moved to Derby. There were already two other good factories at Derby, so it was not quite a new field for our manufacture. But this is the stupid part of the business, looking at it from our point of view as against the Trade Union. The men's leaders asked the workers whether they could not meet the masters and go into the matter. Mr. Holmes, who is the leading Trade Union man in the hosiery trade, came to me and said, "Could not we arrange it?" I said, "I should be very glad to arrange it; if we move this factory to Derby it will probably cost us £10,000 to teach the fresh workers and establish the factory there"—and I think it has cost us that amount—"let us look into it and let us try to come to a fair basis." A great part of this business had gone out in the country to a village called Fleckney, about nine or ten miles from Leicester. I said to him, "You know nearly all this work is there." He said, "Yes." I said, "Suppose you take the Leicester prices and the Fleckney prices and split the difference; then I will undertake that we will not go to Derby; we have moved a few machines, but I will undertake, for five years at least, anyway, that we will not move any more machines." He thanked me, and he was delighted; he said, "That will settle the question; it will keep a lot of these fellows at work who otherwise would be thrown out of work." They had a Trade Union meeting in the town, and the arrangement was rejected, right against the advice of their leaders.

5700. That was in Leicester?—Yes. They decided right against the arrangement he had made with us.

5701. But the general effect of this migration which has taken place from Leicester is to reduce the wages by 35 to 40 per cent.?—On what the list was in Leicester.

5702. Have the manufacturers all gone in different directions?—Yes; they have gone into the villages all over the county. I do not think there is 20 per cent. of the manufacture now done in Leicester; and exactly the same applies to Nottingham.

5703. When they set themselves up in these different villages, how did they proceed to establish a rate; was that agreed upon in all cases?—The rates were all current in the county; they were country rates. For instance, when we started at Burbage the rates there were practically the rates that were current at Hinckley, which is a small town about two miles off. The absurdity of the Trade Union system as far as we were concerned was that they persuaded the Hinckley workmen to join the Hosiery Union for the county, and let them get their own prices, which were 35 to 40 per cent. less than the Leicester rate; and yet, to make the same stuff, they had insisted upon a manufacturer in Leicester paying the 35 to 40 per cent. more, so that a man had absolutely to move out of Leicester or to be ruined.

5704. How do you account for there being so much difference between Leicester and Hinckley?—I do not know that there is much difference now, because the trade has practically left Leicester, and the men in Leicester may either be Trade Union members or not; they may please themselves, because the Union now practically has no power there. Why there was so much difference is due to the fact that the men in Leicester did not work. It used to be quite a stock saying with over-lookers that all the good men in Leicester had finished their week's work by Wednesday. In regard to this identical factory at Burbage, when we went there I remember saying to one of our over-lookers, "We shall never get the same amount of work done in the country"; but in less than 12 months both the men and the women, who were paid at rates less than the Leicester rates, were earning more money than the same operatives had earned in Leicester at the higher rates. The country people work, and the town people, when they really get Trade Union ridden, do not work. The main thing against letting the Trade Unions get control is the fact that they try too much to restrict production. For instance, with a great many machines, Cotton's patent for example, it is the custom for a man and a boy to manage two, and a man and a boy can do that quite easily; in fact, in some places women manage these Cotton's patent machines. But the Trade Unions lay down hard-and-fast rules that in Leicester we are only to have one man working one machine—that is to say, two men are to do a job which everywhere else in the country and in all non-Union places a man and a boy can do. It is this undue restriction of output that kills the manufacturer.

5705. Is the rate of payment to labour in Derby generally lower than it is in Leicester?—I really could not tell you anything about that. The only thing we could do when we went to Derby was to get a rate as nearly as we could to the prices that our competitors paid in the same trade at Fleckney, which is on the other side of the county. What people were paying at Derby was absolutely immaterial to us. We went there to be able to compete; at Leicester we were practically losing the trade, as from three-fourths to four-fifths of it had gone to the other side of the county. Therefore we went to Derby and taught the people there, offering to pay them the same rate as our competitors were paying; in fact, we were paying them a little bit more, because a good many hands came from Fleckney to us at Derby.

5706. But practically you are paying the Fleckney rate at Derby?—That is so.

5707. What made you think when you went to Derby that you would be able to do that; because, naturally, one would suppose that Derby and Leicester being very much the same class of town, there would have been no great advantage as far as wages went?—The reason why we went to Derby was that there is a good amount of women labour there as well as men labour, and women labour is not Union labour; even in Leicester it is not Union labour. But in Leicester there is a great scarcity of it, because the boot trade mops it up and takes so many of them. The idea amongst ourselves—for two or three others went there besides ourselves—was that there were a lot of men employed by the Midland Railway Company, and as, of course, even the clerks there get comparatively small pay, we thought there would be a good many girls and women who would be glad to get work.

5708. Have you now an agreed rate at Derby with the other manufacturers there?—Yes. We all pay the same; in fact, you would be surprised if you are a bit under or over your neighbours, how soon you get to know. When there are only three or four large places the workpeople go from one place to another for work, and you know at once what your competitors are paying; and if you try to pay less than they pay, your hands will soon let you know.

5709. The effect of this move from Leicester seems to have been to reduce the wages and the cost of production considerably?—For the manufacturers who moved out—decidedly. It was a question with the manufacturers absolutely of either moving or of being ruined, because it was not only the competition of the manufacturers outside the town that we had to face, but also we had to meet the foreign competition, which is most acute. We were open to the foreign competition, which is very heavy; and then, again, even if we could meet the foreign competition, we were knocked out by the manufacturers a few miles from our own door. We have a large factory in Hinckley now that is working under the Trade Union.

5710. How do your piece-work rates at Hinckley compare with the Derby rates?—In some things we are higher. There was certain machinery there that was not being employed, and so I took it to Derby, and I said we would make the work for them and employ it on the Leicester work also—we call the coarser work the Leicester work. When we came to do it, we found we paid considerably more on that work than at Hinckley, but still that was as it happened to turn out. You get a price as near as you can, and if it is higher we cannot help it.

5711. As matters now stand, these rates are agreed over the whole district, both in the rural places and in the urban places, I take it?—How do you mean?

5712. You have a general agreement between the employers and the workpeople which covers the whole of this area?—The Derby area, do you mean?

5713. The area to which all these manufacturers are migrating?—I should think so. We had no concern at Derby nor anywhere else, except at Hinckley and Burbage, but we knew the other manufacturers were taking away our trade, and so when we moved we got to know the price as well as we could. There is not a Trade Union there, and we could not get to know exactly, but we started at those prices, and the men earn very fair wages. We had a Government inquiry last year from the War Office, and I think the experts satisfied themselves of it.

5714. The allegation on the other side, of course, is that by this method of migration manufacturers have been able, each of them, to set up what he calls a current rate for himself, which is very much lower than the old rate, and very much lower probably than the rates now paid in urban districts where there is much competition; do you think there is anything in that?—I do not think there is anything in that whatever. You would be surprised, you really would, if you noticed how the workpeople migrate from one place to another. We have quite a quantity in our Derby place of people who come from Fleckney to work; and Fleckney is 40 miles off! No doubt they come because there is some advantage in coming—they would not come without it. In the same way we have people in our Burbage place who come from Leicester; they come on Monday morning, and stay there the week, and then go back on Saturday night. Workpeople would not go to any factory where the wages were much lower, unless you got to a village that was absolutely away, where there was not much communication, and where they could not get to and fro very comfortably. When you get to places anywhere near great centres like Leicester, or Derby, or Hinckley, the workpeople move about just as there is work.

5715. But a good many of these moves have been made to quite isolated places, have they not?—I do not know. As far as we are concerned, I can say, no. I should think it is almost a matter of common sense from a manufacturer's point of view not to go to isolated places, because if you go to a place where there is no labour, you are soon at a standstill. You must have plenty of labour to draw upon. You cannot have a considerable hosiery factory, I should think, without employing 300 to 400, or up to double that quantity, of workpeople; and you cannot get them out of a small place.

5716. And they would not be attracted there?—No. You might say that primarily when people move out of Leicester, they move, not so as to get away from the Trade Union or to avoid paying the wages that they have paid, but to meet any competition from their rival manufacturers.

5717. And the wages at the places they have settled at are agreed between the employers and the employed there?—Absolutely. I say the fact proves it, because even at Derby you get them coming to us to work from all over Leicestershire. We get them from A's place, where they make the best class of underwear in the country; then again we get them from Fleckney, we get them from Leicester, and in fact we get them from all over.

5718. (Mr. De la Bère.) And each place has its own rate, do you say?—Where they come from?

5719. No, where the works are?—You might say it has its own rate, but then you would find that they are substantially the same.

5720. Throughout?—Throughout; there might be small odd differences, but they are substantially the same.

5721. And they are all very much lower than the Leicester rates?—Than Leicester used to be, because you may say Leicester, for out trade, is practically non-existent, and there is no manufacture there, because there is not 10 per cent. there of what there was years ago. There are just warehouses and so on.

5722. (Chairman.) Would you be prepared to include in the requirement to pay the current rate a requirement to conform to the other customs of the Trade Unions?—I should want to know what the customs were.

5723. Any customs that you had agreed upon, I suppose you would not object to being inserted in the contract?—It would all depend. I should want to agree with them first. Trade Unions are very good things, if you can only depend on the men, when they have got hold of a good man, following him. They have got a very good man now at Leicester, a man named Holmes. He is always fair and always reasonable; he has always fought for the interests of his clients, but he has always been reasonable, and he did not want to imperil the trade.

5724. I suppose you would agree that from a manufacturer's point of view it is very desirable that all tenderers should tender on the same basis as regards wages?—If you can get all tenderers to do so; but while you will perhaps get one man to tender on the Leicester rate, another will tender on the Hinckley rate, another on the Fleckney rate, and another on the Hawick rate—and Hawick is a much lower rate than the Leicester rate—and again you might have another tendering on the rates paid in the North of Ireland. It simply means that the man who was in the highest Trade Union district would not get any share of the trade, and could not. If the Government are prepared to say a certain price shall be paid for the article, then it can be put on one footing. There would be no harm in that.

5725. Except that you would not wish to compete with firms who were undercutting wages below what they should do?—I say they would not undercut the wages on Government work if the Government said that a certain amount is to be paid for the knitting.

5726. That is, if the Government fix the wages?—If the Government fix the wages, that would be another thing.

5727. But that would not be possible, would it?—I do not think it would. According to the Trade Unionists, they say the Trade Union rate of the town nearest where they are working; but that Trade Union rate might be 20 per cent. higher than it is in another district, and I should think very probably it might be 50 per cent. higher than it is in a place like Newtownards.

5728. Is there very much variation between all those districts that you have mentioned?—There is a great variation in places.

5729. Is Hawick the cheapest of all?—Hawick used to be very low, but I do not quite know what it is now. It used to be a great deal less than Leicester.

5730. Would Newtownards be below Hawick?—Newtownards would be lower again—considerably lower. Of course, the wages there are very good for those Irish girls, compared with what they had been earning. Mr. B—— told me once when I was over there—we used to supply him with a lot of goods—what his wages were at the time. They were very low, but they were very fine wages compared with what these poor creatures were able to get at their outdoor knitting, and that sort of thing. The wages question is a very difficult question.

5731. You do not object to the contractors' names being published, I think?—Not a bit. We can always get to know, when we do not get a contract, who has got it. The yarn-spinners always tell us whom they have got the order for the yarn from.

5732. It would not put you into the hands of the yarn-spinners, would it?—No, I do not think so. I cannot see very much in that point.

5733. Suppose a spinner knew that you had got a large order, would you be as free to make a bargain with him as you would if he did not know it?—The bargain always has to be made before you tender. We have to get a price before we tender, and we could not tender without. When you get articles that weigh 12 lbs. or 13 lbs. per dozen, a penny per lb. would make an appreciable difference. Therefore, before we tender we send round to the men who spin the Government yarn and get their prices.

5734. (Mr. Black.) Will they quote an open price?—Yes.

5735. Supposing there is any delay in issuing the Government contract?—They keep it open for the usual time.

5736. (Mr. Wilson Fox.) I see you take a strong line about Clause 5, and that you say in your proof, "In every business skilled men are paid at higher rates for those portions which involve greater skill, and the portions of the article requiring less skill are handled either by less skilled male labour or by women." Is there any question in your trade at all as to the skilled man claiming to do work which could be done by the unskilled man?—That struck me, but I did not quite know how it could apply.

5737. I only want to know whether it applies or not. If it does not apply, I will not press the point?—It might apply in the Army pants. We make the legs on Cotton's patent machine, and the clause reads as though the most skilled man who works on that machine has got to follow it through all the other processes.

5738. In certain trades parts of the articles are done by skilled men and parts are done by unskilled men?—That must be so in clothing.

5739. Exactly; it is so in clothing. Are there any cases where the skilled man thinks that he ought to do some of the work, or all of the work, that the unskilled man is now doing?—I never heard it said. There is a point about the employment of women which the Trade Unionists make. I do not know whether that is intended to apply to the hosiery trade.

5740. (Chairman.) No. The suggestion there is that women are being used more and more to displace men, that is, that they are invading the men's province; but I suppose you would have very little of that?—I do not know quite. They undoubtedly have invaded what we used to consider was men's province; but as far as we are concerned personally, we have a great prejudice in favour of men's labour when we can get it. As I say, our machinery in the hosiery trade is so expensive that it is very much a matter of getting the most production you possibly can get off it. We have tried—and we are doing it more and more—paying rather more to the men for the same work, so as to get more production out of them. Even if we pay so much per dozen more, if we get so much more off the machine, we think it pays us in the long run.

5741. Do you think that for machine-minding, and that kind of thing, male labour is much better?—It is better than female labour at any time. You see the men can stand more continuous strain than the women can.

5742. And so you get more out of your machine in that way?—Yes. In our trade that is the great aim of the manufacturer, to get all he possibly can off his machines. They are so expensive, and they are so continually being changed, that if he does not do that, he finds his machine is out of date before it is paid for.

5743. (Mr. De la Bère.) I suppose in the lighter machinery a woman is as good as a man?—With the lighter machinery, of course, a woman is better, because she can handle it better with her fingers. But even with a good many knitting machines which have been worked by women, we are trying to get men in, because they get more out of the machines. We pay a copper or two more to the men, but it pays us by reducing what we call the common charges.

5744. I suppose one result of this transfer of work from Leicester to other neighbourhoods is that the Unionists do not come into the works now; is that so? In your works, for instance, have you Trade Union men as well as others?—As far as we are concerned, say, for instance, in Derby, we know there are a certain number of Unionists in the place, but it does not matter twopence to us as long as they do the work, and do not try to make a disturbance. If we got Unionists in the place and they were aggressive, and they were trying to make the people turn against the work, they would have to go. So long as they do not shove their Trade Unionism at us, it does not matter to us twopence.

5745. You do not discriminate between them merely as Unionists and non-Unionists?—Not at all; as long as they do the work satisfactorily, it does not matter to us.

5746. (Mr. Black.) If the nearest town rate were adopted, would it be always Leicester that would set the rate, or would some of those places that would be nearer to Derby be considered as setting the rate?—I do not know quite, because there is no labour of the kind outside Derby, or near Derby. I think the nearest point to Derby is Ilkeston.

5747. Are there not two or three factories of the same kind in Derby now?—Yes, that is so.

5748. So that would make the Derby rate a town rate?—Yes.

5749. Might there not be some of these outlying districts nearer to Derby than they would be to Leicester, or do you think they would all fall nearer to Leicester?—They would all be nearer to Leicester. When we moved to Derby, we went there because we should be far enough away to get more female labour, as it had not been drawn upon.

5750. Take Fleckney; that is nearer to Leicester than to Derby, is it not?—Yes. It is 10 miles the other side of Leicester, and Leicester is 30 miles from Derby, so that is 40 miles away.

5751. Some witnesses have contended that if a firm has its office in Leicester or Nottingham, and its warehouse is there, it is a Leicester or Nottingham firm, and therefore it ought to pay Leicester or Nottingham rates; is there any understanding of that kind among your Trade Unions?—Not the slightest. You have to pay the rates of wages of the town or village where your works are situated. Of course in that way if our centre were Leicester we should have to pay the Leicester price, and in the same way we have to pay the Hinckley price, or the Burbage price, wherever we have a factory.

5752. I only wanted to gather whether there was an understanding on that point?—Not at all. Your factory rate is the rate of the district where your factory is.

5753. (Mr. Hillier.) I suppose there would be some difficulty in fixing a current rate or a price for particular articles in the different districts, because I presume that the different kinds of machinery would enter very largely into the price?—I hardly grasp the question. Would you mind repeating that?

5754. The improved machinery, or the different kinds of machinery, would have an influence upon the price paid to the workers who were producing the articles which are made by machine?—That is so. In one district you might produce the thing on a rotary, and in another district you might produce it on a Cotton's patent, and on the Cotton's patent you might have agreed upon a lower price. It would depend upon whether your machine was a six-at-once machine or a five-at-once machine; and then also it would depend upon whether you have got any improved finishing machinery coming out. If it is conspicuously improved, you take the operator and see what he does, and then you have to fix a fair price for the improved machinery.

5755. So there can be no standard price for any length of time for any of these things?—Absolutely not for anything.

5756. I take it also that there are other conditions in these different districts which will enter into the price; for instance, coal may be dearer or cheaper in one district than in another?—Getting nearer to his coal might assist the manufacturer, but it has nothing to do with the wages; it does not concern the work-people you employ.

5757. But where coal is plentiful and you can use machinery, there would probably be more machinery used in that district than in another district where the manufacturer would be a long way off the coal, and therefore he might use more hand labour?—I do not think that would affect it. The cost of the coal makes a very small difference in the hosiery trade, because our machines are very light driving. The hosiery trade is not like the cotton trade. There is such a very light drive.

5758. (Mr. De la Bère.) Are the other firms at Derby small firms?—No. C—— is a very large firm. He has a centre at Leicester and he has a large factory at Derby, and I believe he employs 400 or 500 at Derby. Besides his warehouse at Leicester, he has a large factory at Fleckney. Then Messrs. D—— have a large factory at Hinckley.

5759. And are they a firm at Derby too?—Yes.

5760. (Chairman.) When you went to Derby did they claim that you should pay the Leicester rates, or did they not?—They never made any claim, and we never supposed that it was at all within the realms of probability. It was simply a matter, not of not recognising the Trade Union, but because we aimed at competing with Fleckney. As I say, Holmes absolutely arranged with me that we should stay in Leicester if the Trade Unions would agree to halve the difference between the Leicester rates and the Fleckney rates.

The witness withdrew.

TWENTIETH DAY.

Thursday, April 30th, 1908.

At 32, Great George Street, Westminster, S.W.

PRESENT:

Sir GEORGE H. MURRAY, K.C.B. (Chairman).

Mr. F. W. Black.
Mr. H. De la Bère, C.B.
Mr. J. H. Hillier.
Mr. A. F. King.
Mr. J. J. Wills, Secretary.

Mr. James Scott. called and examined.

5761. (Chairman.) You represent the Master Saddlers' Federation of the United Kingdom, I believe?—I am the President of the Saddlers and Harness Makers' Employers' Association, which is mostly an association of retail saddlers. It is affiliated to the Master Saddlers' Federation of the United Kingdom, of which I am a member of the executive.

5762. Are you in the business yourself?—Yes.

5763. In London?—Yes.

5764. Is it mostly a London Association?—Yes, it is, but it does include a fair number of men in the provinces.

5765. About how many members have you got?—In our London Association there are about 150, and in the Federation there are about 500 members.

5766. Does the Federation cover the whole trade of the country pretty well?—The Saddlers' Federation does cover the whole trade of the country pretty well, but it does not cover that part which deals largely with Government contracts.

5767. Have you personally much experience of Government contracts?—Not much experience of Imperial Government contracts, but a great deal of Indian and Colonial contracting, as that has been the bulk of my firm's business for half a century.

5768. On the workmen's side is it a well-organised trade?—It is getting better, but it is not strongly organised, and is not at all to be compared with the Engineers', for example.

5769. Have you any agreement with the men as to prices and wages?—Yes. With respect to the saddle which I have brought with me, which is made according to the Government sealed sample, the price which the workmen get for making it is £1 17s. 10d.

5770. Is that agreed to by all the masters?—That I do not know.

5771. That is the point I am really putting to you—whether you have got rates of wages or piece-work prices which have been agreed between the masters and the men?—I do not think the rate has been arrived at by mutual arrangement; I think the rate has been fixed by the workmen.

5772. And accepted by the employers?—Yes, tacitly.*

5773. But no more than tacitly?—I do not know whether or not any employer objects to paying the men's rate; my firm does not.

5774. As a body, does your Federation concern itself with rates of wages?—Yes. The workmen have a scale of wages for various parts of the work, which the employers accept.

5775. There is a general agreement then?—Yes.

5776. Is it of a formal kind, or informal?—It is printed in a little booklet, and I believe there have been occasions when an employer has paid less than the men's rate, which has led to a species of strike.

5777. Do you, as a body, enforce these rates on your colleagues?—No.

5778. You do not bind yourselves to pay the agreed rates then?—No.

5779. That is not a condition of membership of the Federation?—No.

5780. As a matter of fact, is there tolerable uniformity in the rates paid by the different masters?—

* Note by Witness on Revise.—I had forgotten for the moment that in common with other employers I had signed a document agreeing to pay the rates fixed by the Workmen's Unions as laid down in their book of prices for Government work.

Yes; I think they are pretty uniform, but I do not think they are absolutely uniform; they are very similar. The greater prices prevail in the West End establishments, where they usually pay more than they pay in the City establishments.

5781. Is London higher than the provinces?—Yes.

5782. Do the provincial rates vary very much?—They are very well organised down there, I think, as far as prices go; indeed, I think they are better organised as far as prices go than they are in London. But the rates are less.

5783. Your own business is in London, I think you said?—Yes.

5784. If you have not had very much experience of Government contracts, I suppose you are hardly able to say whether the Fair Wages Clause has worked well for you or not?—No; I cannot say how it works in practice.

5785. Does it strike you as good in principle?—Yes, it is good.

5786. The object, of course, being to ensure that, so far as rates of wages are concerned, all the tenderers are on the same level?—Yes; if they all construe the conditions similarly, that would be so.

5787. One of the conditions being that the rate paid should be the rate current in the district?—Yes.

5788. Do you see any difficulty in saying what the rate current in any district is?—I see a difficulty in the case of this saddle here, for example. There are certain portions of the work in that saddle which the workmen's Union have fixed at 9s. 6d., but it has been the practice in some workshops in London for such work to be done by women—it is sub-let, in fact. It is easy work, and quite suitable for women's work, and the women earn, as women's wages go, a very fair wage at that work. Their work is necessarily cheaper than men's work, and therefore with two firms tendering, one on the basis of men's work entirely, and the other on the basis of women's work partly the latter will be less than the former by that difference, at all events.

5789. Could you say, for instance, that the women's rate was current in any particular district? Suppose you were challenged, as a contractor, to show that you had paid the current rate, and you were employing women, who, as you say, are paid less than men for the same work, would you be in a position to show that the women's rate was current in the district—that is, was generally paid?—Had you asked me that question about a year ago I should have said Yes; but since then the various workmen's associations have combined, and have produced this book, in which the price is fixed for that work at 9s. 6d. I do not quite know what the Government expects—whether they expect to get men's work entirely at the higher rate, or whether they expect to get some of this work, which has hitherto been done by women, at a slightly lower price.

5790. I do not know what view might be taken of that question, but I think that all that the Government would require is that you should show that whatever you were paying was a rate generally paid, whether to a man or to a woman?—As an employer, I have been under the impression that this rate paid to the women, which is 5½d. per hour, is a fair rate, but the workmen's Union take a different view, and they say we ought to pay the 9½d. per hour rate.

5791. In fact, they do not recognise the women's rate at all, I suppose?—That is so.

5792. Then the question would arise whether the employment of women was so general in your trade as to justify a contractor in using women and paying them the ordinary rate that women get?—In my particular firm, we have employed them for 30 years to my knowledge.

5793. And you have not extended the operations which they do?—No; they are limited to that certain portion of the work, and they cannot very well do any more.

5794. As far as you are concerned, you have not extended the employment of women at all then?—No.

5795. I see you have a practice in London of sub-letting to the women, or what practically amounts to that, does it not?—Yes. That practice has existed.

5796. Is that a recognised practice in the trade?—It has been so till now.

5797. The man, in fact, farms out the work to the women?—Yes. It is only a small portion of it.

5798. You see no reason, as a contractor, to object to the condition with regard to the payment of the current rates?—No.

5799. Can you suggest any better formula than the "current rate" to express what we want to express?—I should think, probably, the "Trade Union rate" would express it more definitely; I mean to say the "current rate" might mean that in one district of London a certain price is paid, whereas in another district in London another price is paid; but the "Trade Union rate" would fix it for both places.

5800. But would that be fair? Would you not be enforcing on a contractor there a rate which neither he nor other employers in his district had ever agreed to pay to their men?—That might be so.

5801. Would a provision of that kind be well received in the trade, do you think?—I think the members of my Association would like to see a fixed rate applying generally.

5802. Would they all be content to pay it?—Yes.

5803. Not only on Government contract work, but on all the business they did?—Yes, I believe they would accept that.

5804. But they have not done it up till now, have they?—Some have done it. Some have not done it.

5805. Still, you think they would if it was made a condition in a Government contract?—Yes, I think they would.

5806. By the Trade Union rate you do not mean the rate demanded by the Trade Union, but the rate actually paid in practice, I suppose?—That usually is the rate demanded, I think.

5807. Do you always pay what the workmen demand?—If their Union has a fixed rate. For example, the minimum rate for certain classes of work done in London by the harness makers is something equivalent to 7½d. or 8d. per hour; 33s. per week is the minimum, and I think most employers recognise that that is the minimum, and do not pay less.

5808. Do you mean they never would earn less than that?—There are men earning less certainly, but I think most employers recognise that 33s. is the minimum. Union men are not allowed to take less when employed by the week. If employed on piece work on Government work the prices are fixed by the book.

5809. Would you see no objection to a clause in the contract which compelled you to pay the rate demanded by the Trade Union of the trade, whatever it was?—If it were a fair rate, and if it affected us all equally, we should pay it. We wish to see the condition of the workers better, if possible. In some branches of our trade the condition at present is very good; in some branches it is not so, and we should like to see an improvement in those lesser-paid branches.

5810. The minimum, as I understand you, is somewhere in the neighbourhood of 33s.?—Yes.

5811. Would you call that bad pay?—It is not bad pay, but it cannot be called good pay for a skilled mechanic in London.

5812. You look at it as rather an underpaid trade then on the whole?—In the harness and accoutrement branch, yes. The brown saddlery trade—that part which makes riding saddles like this—we reckon is rather well paid.

5813. The accoutrement people are less well organised than the saddlers, are they not?—They have been, but I think they are fairly well organised now.

5814. Do you do both classes of business yourself?—No; the bulk of our business is riding saddles like this.

5815. Are the accoutrement makers included in your Federation?—They are not in the Employers' Federation, but they are in the Workmen's Federation—the workmen combine.

5816. Both the saddlers and the accoutrement makers?—Yes.

5817. But they have separate Unions, have they not?—They have separate Unions, but the four Unions mentioned in that booklet have combined in one federation.

5818. Turning to another question, have you any experience of what is called "sectionising" in the trade, that is, subdividing labour more largely than has been done hitherto, so as to give each man a much more specialised job?—The tendency in the trade of late years has been rather the other way. When I entered the trade as a boy, it was quite a common thing to find a number of men doing parts and one man putting the whole together; whereas now the tendency largely is for one man to make the complete article.

5819. Could any one man make the whole of that saddle?—Yes, every stitch.

5820. What part of that saddle is done by women?—Some of the lighter stitching, such as the stitching round the edge.

5821. (Mr. De la Bère.) Do they do the quilting?—No.

5822. (Chairman.) Is that too heavy work for a woman, or too difficult?—No, it is not difficult at all, but it is simply a sort of trade custom that women have not been asked to do it.

5823. The tendency now is, you think, for men to generalise more, rather than to specialise?—That is the tendency in that particular branch of the trade.

5824. Is that a good thing, do you think?—Yes. A man takes more pride in his work, and he feels more interested in it if he is making the whole rather than a part. It tends also to produce a better type of mechanic.

5825. Looking at it from the point of view of the economy of labour, what do you say?—If one were making huge quantities, I think subdivision would be more economical; but the saddlery trade is a very small trade at the best.

5826. And there is no scope for producing parts in large quantities and then putting them together?—No; it is a very limited trade indeed.

5827. Do you think the employment of women is extending in the trade?—No, I do not think it is extending, because they are limited to such a small part of it.

5828. But limited more by practice than by necessity, I gather?—Yes, that is so.

5829. Have you any idea why they do not take to it more?—I suppose one difficulty is the size of the workshops—they would have to be enlarged. An employer would have to run a double establishment practically if he engaged a female staff as well as a male staff.

5830. But you all have some female staff now, have you not?—Not all. The large contractors do have a double staff.

5831. Do you think the men are exercising their influence to keep the women out of it?—There seems to be a feeling amongst the men's Associations that it is not a woman's trade, as it were, and if more women are introduced into it, they will displace a similar proportion of men. At the present time there are many men idle, and they feel rather strongly on the subject.

5832. And the employers have no desire to press the employment of women?—They have no desire to press it, but I do not think they would like to see it wiped out; I mean to say, it would be a species of injustice to the women who are already in it.

5833. (Mr. De la Bère.) I suppose the employment of women is increasing rather in the harness and accoutrement trade than in the saddlery trade, is it not?—I think it has increased largely in the accoutrement trade, as far as I can gather. It has led to rather serious trouble in that trade.

5834. You told us, I was going to say, that the saddlery trade is a happy family compared with the harness and accoutrement trade just at present?—Yes; I think we are well off as compared with them.

5835. Would you say that the employment of women in the saddlery trade has increased in regard to Army work more than other work, or is there no difference?—I do not think there has been any difference for 20 or 30 years.

5836. I suppose the work is mostly done in a factory, or is there much home work?—Government work is mostly done in the factories.

5837. Government work would be, because the contract requires it to be done there; but, generally speaking, is the saddlery trade a home industry?—That portion of it which I may call the women's work is often done at the women's home; for example, the work on that saddle, which was done by a woman—I brought it down for that reason in order to show you the work—was done by the woman in her own home.

5838. You mentioned that the practice in London is practically to sub-let certain work to the women?—That is, where the practice exists; in the West End establishments it does not exist.

5839. Your firm, I think, do not touch the Army work much?—Not much for the British Army, but I do not know of any firm doing more for Colonial troops.

5840. I daresay you know that the Army saddlery contracts contain a clause requiring direct payment to the workpeople?—Yes.

5841. That, of course, runs counter to this practice in London?—Where officers' saddles have been made privately for officers in West End establishments, each saddle is made entirely by one man right through, and they do not bring in women's work.

5842. (Mr. Black.) I think some witnesses have suggested to us that the women are not strong enough to draw the threads right home in some of the saddlery that they have to do; do you agree with that in the saddlery trade?—That might be so in very heavy work.

5843. Take that saddle; would you call that particularly heavy work?—No. There is no work in the sewing which is heavier than any seamstress could do; no strength is required for it.

5844. The stitches are well drawn home, are they?—Yes.

5845. I think it was suggested to us that sometimes a mechanical device was used to assist in pressing the stitches in when it was done by women, as compared with the stronger pull that a man gave to it?—That may be so in heavy work, but it is not so in the saddlery trade.

5846. I take it you think the right thing would be then not to employ the women in the really heavy work if they could not pull the stitches home properly?—In very heavy work I do not think it is right to employ women.

5847. But you think, perhaps, it may be the case in the trade, to some extent, that the women are employed stitching heavy work where they ought not to be employed?—Yes, that is so.

5848. To that extent you would sympathise with the men?—With the women, and with the men, too.

5849. But rather with the men?—Well, yes.

5850. I gather from your proof, as far as the publication of the name of a successful Government contractor is concerned, you see no objection to that?—No objection whatever.

5851. Do you think that it would hamper you in any way in getting your material? Supposing it happened, for instance, you had a large order from the War Office for saddles; if it were known at once in the trade that you had got that order, would you be in any difficulty, through your name being published, in making your bargain for the leather and other materials?—If the business were generally very prosperous, it might have that effect, but in normal times it would not have that effect. Most firms obtain estimates for supply of material before tendering to the War Office, and in the event of getting an order the estimated price would be expected to prevail, so that as far as I can see publication of contractors' names ought not, in ordinary cases, to increase cost or cause any difficulty.

5852. If the publication were held back for a week or a fortnight, what then?—It would be better, perhaps, to do that.

5853. Would it hamper you in dealing with your Trade Union, or with your labour generally, if the name were published?—I do not think so.

5854. Do you think it now gets pretty well known?—The men very soon know when an order is placed.

5855. I suppose there is hardly a firm in the trade in which there are not some Union men employed? Are there any houses, do you think, that are absolutely non-Union?—I should think so.

5856. You think there might be?—Yes.

5857. You do not know what view they might take of it?—I do not.

5858. You are speaking rather as a Union house, I suppose?—Yes.

5859. Do you think it possible there might be a difference of view?—There might be a difference of view, certainly.

5860. (Mr. Hillier.) What is the proportion, do you think, of Union and non-Union houses in London?—It is difficult to answer that question, because you find in the same establishment Union men and non-Union men working together. The men are not at all vindictive in a matter like that. If any of their fellow workmen do not care to join the Union, the Union men do not at all go out of their way to insist upon it that they should.

5861. Have you any idea of the number of non-Union men?—No, I have not.

5862. And you cannot hazard an opinion?—No, I cannot guess.

5863. You told the Chairman that you thought it would be acceptable to the masters if a Trade Union rate was made uniform throughout London?—Yes, I think it would.

5864. But at the same time you said that the West End prices were higher than the City prices?—Yes.

5865. If you made a uniform rate right over London the City people would be paying for Government work, would they not, a higher rate of wage than they would for any other work?—It is assumed that a different article is turned out in the West End to what is turned out in the City. There is a sort of feeling among the workmen that the article is different.

5866. If a master in the City had been paying his men at a rate of wage less than the West End, and he got a Government contract, do you think he should pay his men higher because they were working for the Government than he would when they were on private work?—If a Union rate were fixed, probably he would have to do so. I do not know whether it would be possible to fix a Union rate for the West End and for the City; I should not think it would be possible to form a rate that would vary, that is, one amount for the City and one for the West End.

5867. (Mr. Hillier.) Take the prices at Walsall; if a Trade Union rate was fixed how would it affect the woman labour at Walsall in the case of a Government contract? The operation is rather different there, is it not?—At present there is a Union rate fixed for London and a Union rate fixed for Walsall; for instance, this saddle, which costs in London £1 17s. 10d., costs about 10s. less in Walsall. That rate is accepted by the men's Unions; they have arranged that among themselves. I think that the women's work is regarded as essential in Walsall. The men are not in the habit of doing it, and could not do it without practice. So far as I can gather they have not the slightest wish to do it, and differ in that respect from the London men.

5868. I notice that in your proof of evidence you say you do not see any objection, where there is no Trade Union, to taking the rate of the nearest town as the rate which should be paid?—That is so. I do not think there would be any objection to that.

5869. How would you fix it?—I take it the workmen's Union would have already fixed that in the nearest town—would they not?

5870. Your London rate extends for a radius of 20 miles, does it not?—Yes, I think so.

5871. Would you have another rate at Guildford?—If they had a local association strong enough, they might have a local rate there.

5872. Supposing there was not an association strong enough, but that there were harness makers there, would not the rate that was agreed upon between the masters and the men, say at Guildford, be the current rate?—Yes, I should say so.

5873. (Mr. King.) In the Comparative Statement which you have sent us you refer to the prices for stitching by men and for stitching by women; is that exactly the same stitching?—Yes, quite the same.

5874. I thought from what you told the Chairman it was a different class of stitching?—No. When it is done you cannot tell whether it has been done by a man or a woman.

5875. In this Statement you reckon that what a woman can do in four hours is worth only half what a man can do in four-and-a-quarter hours; is that not what it comes to?—I rather tried to indicate there what is the present position.

5876. The position means that, does it not?—Yes.

5877. A woman's work in four hours is worth only half what a man does in four-and-a-quarter hours?—That is about it.

5878. Does that mean that a man in four-and-a-quarter hours does about twice as much as a woman?—No. The man is slower than the woman at needlework.

5879. And therefore he is paid higher?—The man is paid at a much higher rate than the woman.

5880. But that is not because he does more—it is simply because he is a man?—He does less.

5881. Then if the men and the women were on the same piece-work rates, the women would earn more than the men?—Yes; they are naturally more nimble. The work seems to be more suitable for women than for men, I think.

5882. Do you think that both men and women do the work equally well, in spite of the fact that women get only half the rate that the men get?—Yes.

The witness withdrew.

Mr. Ernest Wakely, called and examined.

5883. (Chairman.) You are the hon. secretary of the Master Bone Brush Manufacturers' Association?—Yes.

5884. Are you in the trade yourself?—Yes.

5885. Are there a large number of employers in the Association?—No; the bone-brush making is a very small trade. I should think there were as near as possible about nine members of the Association only.

5886. Have you an agreement with the workmen?—Yes. We recognise their Union to a great extent. About nine years ago they had a strike, and they wanted more money; we gave them half what they wanted, after six months' strike. Many masters then said that they would not acknowledge the Union, but still we do to a great extent, and for fear of upsetting the men we generally see that he is a Union man that we take on.

5887. As a matter of fact, do all the masters pay about the same rates?—Yes, for fashioning, that is, for preparing the handles. That is the only thing really that is done by men in our trade.

5888. How is the rest done—by machinery?—Machinery, boys, girls, and women.

5889. Of course, the boys and the women are entirely unorganised?—Quite so.

5890. Do you all pay the same rate to them, do you think?—There is no recognised rate, except for the out-door hands. Are you speaking of the out-door hands now?

5891. I was speaking of the boys and the women, generally?—For the out-door workers there is a general trade price which is paid round the trade.

5982. A piece-work price?—That is the piece-work price. Inside it is time-work for women, girls and boys.

5893. What I wanted to get at was whether, on the whole, the masters in your trade may be assumed to be all paying about the same rates of wages to the different classes of their employees?—Yes; I think I may say that it is pretty general throughout the trade.

5894. And that if one of you takes a contract you may be pretty sure that he is paying the same rate as the others would be paying?—As far as contracts are concerned, there are one or two firms who have introduced machinery to do away with the labour of men. Of course, in their case, they are not paying the same to those who operate the machines as they would to the men who make the articles by hand.

5895. Subject to that, do all the firms employing machinery pay the same rate for the machine part of the work?—To the machine-minders, to those who work the machines?

5896. Yes?—They would. That is what the men are complaining so very greatly about—they are putting the boys and girls on to men's labour. That is being done by one or two firms who have contracted for Government work. They have taught boys and girls to do the thing in sections, and they have become pretty proficient and able to do it well; but the consequence is that they do not get near the wages that the men had.

5897. The effect of that, of course, is to exclude the men by degrees?—Yes; I suppose it would exclude one man for every two boys or two girls.

5898. Do you see any objection to that process which is going on?—Not as regards the ordinary business; but I think on Government contracts there should be a uniform rate of wages paid, so as to put everybody on a fair footing.

5899. But why on Government contracts more than on anything else?—I take it that the Government work cannot be bought out of the country. What I mean to say is this—When a man has foreign competition to contend with, as we have very largely—and it is not only French competition, but Japanese competition, and the Japanese are running us very closely—a man should be allowed to do his work in any way he thinks fit, and to get it out as cheaply as he can, provided he does not infringe the Factory Acts or work people unduly; but as far as Government work is concerned, I think that one master should be on the same footing as another one.

5900. What I was trying to get at was, why you thought that that rule or practice should be applied to Government contracts, and not to the rest of the business that you do?—I took it that these things must be bought in England.

5901. But you have the same foreign competition to meet as in the ordinary trade of the country?—Yes.

5902. Then why do you make the distinction?—I took it that we had no foreign competition to face in Government work—only the competition among ourselves.

5903. Do you think that that principle ought to be carried as far as to exclude boys and women from this work?—From the Government work, yes.

5904. Why?—Because, you see, the contracts get into the hands of one or two; they are not given to the trade generally.

5905. But if they get into the hands of one or two, I suppose it is because those one or two can quote a lower price than the others?—Quite so; but how do they do it? They do it by excluding workmen who have in some cases paid to learn their trade—that is, paid through small wages—and then, when they have got to be men and want to work at the trade, they are excluded from that trade which they have learnt.

5906. By the employment of boys and women?—By giving work to boys and girls. This fashioning is not work that ought to be done by boys and girls. It is very hard work indeed, and it is very heavy work too. It is not right for boys and girls to do it, in my opinion. I would never myself put a boy or a girl on that part of my work. I am talking now about what we call the fashioning, which is the only thing that is paid a Trade Union rate of wage for. That is all done by men.

5907. Do you look on the work as too hard or too heavy for boys or women?—Yes; fashioning is.

5908. What kind of work is it?—It is filing the handles up in a vice with a file about 15 inches long; it is filing them round.

5909. Does that require great strength?—It is very hard work; it is very bad for the muscles of the arm.

5910. And you think it is quite unsuitable for boys or women?—I consider that what we call fashioning is quite unsuitable for them.

5911. You say that is the only part of the work that there is an agreed price for, I understand?—Yes, that is the only part.

5912. What happens to the rest?—There is the drilling, for instance, and that is done by girls. In many cases it is done piece-work, and in others time-work. It used to be done by hand, but it is nearly all done by machinery now, except a few special patterns, which cannot be done on machines.

5913. I suppose there is a fixed rate for the people who work the machines, is there not?—No, there is no fixed rate.

5914. In practice do you all pay about the same?—Yes, about the same. It is done by boys and girls.

5915. Is it all done by boys and girls?—The fashioning is the only part that is now done by men. The drillers have lost their occupation by machinery being introduced, and now we find that a girl can do that work, which is very light work, on the machine quite as well as a man, and, in fact, can do it rather better.

5916. You cannot suggest any improvement in the formula as regards the current rate which is embodied in the Fair Wages Clause, can you?—I do not think so. Do you mean in the contracts?

5917. Yes. Suppose it was suggested to substitute "the Trade Union rate" for "the current rate," what would be the effect of that?—The Trade Unionists might fix a very high price indeed; they might meet together and fix a 50 per cent. higher price, and we should not be able to pay it.

5918. Would you see the same objection to the expression if it was "the Trade Union rate, as accepted by the employers"?—I think that would be better. I see the Trade Union evidence suggests "the Trade Union rate as agreed upon by the employers and workmen in the district." "In the district" would not concern us; but there are country firms, of course. Then I see there is something suggested where there is only one firm in a country place; that is the case in our trade especially; one or two firms have done that.

5919. Who were isolated?—Yes, because they have gone down to one or two country places, and of course they employ nearly all the people in the place.

5920. Supposing you put in some clause of that kind, prescribing the Trade Union rate, what would happen where there were parts of your business for which there is no Trade Union rate? In point of fact, I suppose, it would only apply to the fashioning?—Yes, that is the only thing to which it would apply. Fashioners have a Union, and that is all.

5921. In order to secure one of the objects that you have in view, which is that all the contractors should be paying the same rate, what do you propose to do as regards that portion of the work which is not done under Trade Union prices?—I do not see that it could dominate that at all.

5922. The present formula of "the current rate" is probably the best for that?—Yes, I should think so. As there is no Union among the women and the girls, of course "Trade Union" rate would not apply there.

5923. Does that not strike you as an objection to saying anything in the contract about the Trade Union rate?—Do you mean to say that it should not be mentioned at all?

5924. Yes; is not "the current rate," in fact, a better expression?—Yes. When you say "Trade Union rate" that is playing into the hands of the Trade Union entirely; they can play fast and loose with you, and they can say, "We want another 50 per cent.," whereas "the current rate" would be the rate agreed upon by the employers and the men as a body.

5925. Whether agreed upon or not, it would be the rate that was actually being paid?—Yes, it would.

5926. If you could secure that you were all on the same footing in that respect you would be satisfied, would you not?—Yes. I think that would meet the case entirely.

5927. You yourself are rather opposed to the extension of the employment of women in the fashioning part of this business?—Yes; I do not think it is a proper thing for women to do at all.

5928. But all the other branches are suitable to them?—Yes.

5929. Are they being more largely employed than before?—Yes; there are many more women.

5930. They have practically got possession of the whole trade now except the fashioning, have they not?—Yes.

5931. And in some firms that has gone to them, too?—Yes, that has gone too. I do not know how they manage it in Paris, but I think in Paris they use machinery very largely and make them almost entirely by machinery, so that there is no need for boy labour in fashioning.

5932. I suppose they use boys to mind the machines?—Yes. I believe it is done very largely by machinery there.

5933. Are you feeling this foreign competition very much?—Very much indeed, especially the Japanese competition. The Japanese are swamping the country; they are dumping their stuff here by the shipload, and it has got to be sold at some price or another.

5934. Therefore these Government contracts are rather important in your trade?—Yes, they are, when we can get hold of them. In fact, my firm was the very first who ever made tooth brushes for the Army, and we had only one small consignment, I think, returned. Since then we have never had a look in; never mind what price we put down, we never get a look in. I must say the Government pay a very miserable price for these articles, and it does not give the employer very much margin to pay his workpeople well.

5935. The Government pay whatever you ask, I suppose?—Quite so. Of course, the remedy is in the hands of the contractors; but to a great extent they seem so anxious to get these orders, that they put them in almost at cost price. I cannot see where the advantage comes in.

5936. Do you know what firms are getting the contracts now?—Yes.

5937. Do you look upon them as paying very low wages?—One of the firms that have got the contract are employing boys and girls. One of the firms who have lost it this time are also employing boys and girls. The firm who has got the greater part of it now, I believe, is a firm that has just started, and they are doing their fashioning by these boys or girls.

5938. You have probably lost the business owing to your objection to the employment of boys and women?—No, I do not say that. I suppose that our price must have been a little bit too high, although it was a price that was, from our point of view, very low indeed. If they have gone lower than we went, there cannot have been a profit on it at all that I can see, unless they get it out of the men, that is, by not employing the men.

5939. That is what I was coming to. Have they been able to secure this business owing to the class of labour that they employ?—I take it they have, because they have been able to tender lower.

5940. They are practically under-cutting you in the matter of the wages?—Yes. We have always paid the Trade Union rate of wages.

5941. You have no objection, as a manufacturer, to the names of the successful tenderers being made known?—No objection at all, but I cannot see that it would serve any useful purpose.

5942. The purpose it would serve is this, that the workmen would then know whether they were getting paid the rate you had contracted to pay, namely, the current rate?—It is such a small trade that they generally know who has got the contract; it gets round in no time.

5943. (Mr. De la Bère.) Might I just say on that point that about two months ago we had at the War Office a deputation of brushmakers—I do not think the bone brushmakers were specially represented then—and one of their requests was that the names of the successful tenderers should be published. I think that request was put forward with the object of ascertaining what orders, if any, were placed abroad, but at any rate they did ask that the names of the tenderers should be published. I mention that, as you apparently are rather averse to it yourself?—I am not averse to it; but I do not see that any good purpose would be served by it.

5944. In the first paragraph of your proof you suggest "that the contracts should be more equally divided instead of given to one or two firms only"; of course, price is not the only consideration in the placing of contracts?—So I understand.

5945. But it is an important one. If your suggestion is adopted, what is going to happen, and how are you going to distribute the contracts—regardless of price?—Of course, you could not pay one firm more than another.

5946. You must accept each man at his own quotation, I take it?—Yes; unless there could be a standard price fixed, a fair price fixed, for these articles, and that that is to be the price, and if a firm do not like to make them at that, they can leave it.

5947. Do you mean that you would dispense with competition altogether?—Yes. I would fix a fair price for those articles, and then give each master a share of them.

5948. You probably know as well as I do what really happens. In practice latterly I have noticed that we get a few firms tendering at a group of prices very much the same, and then there is a big rise and the bulk of the firms come on at a very much higher figure?—Quite so.

5949. Is that not mostly attributable, not so much to the employment of boys and girls, as to the fact that those firms which are able to quote at a lower price are employing machinery much more largely?—They may be employing machinery, but then, you see, they are shutting out the workmen.

5950. Would not your proposal to exclude boys and women from the fashioning practically result in debarring Government Departments from any advantages which might be derived from the introduction of machinery?—The Government, you mean to say, would get it cheaper if they gave it to those firms who employ machinery?

5951. Yes?—They would.

5952. Are you not really taking up a position antagonistic, not so much to the employment of boys and girls, as to the introduction of machinery, or the development of machinery?—Yes; but I understand that the Trade Unionists are very averse to machinery of any kind—I know they are in fact—and do not care about it.

5953. Apparently you are with them on that point?—I am with them as far as it concerns Government contracts only. I do not think they should interfere with a man on his other work; he should be allowed to make that as he likes.

5954. In proposing to fix a uniform rate of wages for Government work on the fashioning, you realise, I take it, that that excludes the introduction or improvement of machinery?—Yes, it does. There is no dearth of men, and they have had to serve, each one of them, a seven years' apprenticeship to their trade, or they are not allowed to work in a factory.

5955. Do you not think it is rather an unreasonable restriction upon the trade to prevent an enterprising firm—I am not alluding now to any particular firm, but merely speaking in general terms—from laying down the most modern and improved machinery?—Of course, if you come to that, then they would be able to do without the men entirely.

5956. After all, the whole industrial history of the past century is the progress and development of machinery in manufactures, is it not?—Quite so.

5957. Do you not think, therefore, that would be rather a retrograde step?—It would, but I understood that this inquiry was formed in support of Trade Union principles.

5958. (Chairman.) It is not quite correct to say that. The object of this inquiry is to ascertain whether, either by an alteration of the machinery or the phraseology of the Fair Wages Clause, or otherwise, we can carry out its intention more accurately and more effectually?—Of course, as Mr. De la Bère says, if you debar firms from laying down machinery they must employ the men; on the other hand, if the men are not employed, and if they are allowed to pay any rate they like on Government contracts, they will put down machinery; but they would not put it down at all if it was not allowed, I mean to say, if they had to pay their men a proper price.

5959. (Mr. De la Bère.) Does the putting down of machinery inevitably result in the displacement of men?—Yes, entirely.

5960. In many trades it is found, I believe, that a man looks after a machine better than a woman does?—Yes.

5961. And gets more out of it?—As far as making these articles by machine is concerned, I cannot see myself that they save very much, though they profess to do so. They profess to save a great deal, but I do not think they do, because they get such a lot of work spoilt.

5962. Is it the machine which spoils it, or the boys or girls who spoil it? Is it the inefficient minding of the machine, or is it that the machinery is defective?—The machinery is not defective; it is the boys and girls who spoil the work on it.

5963. That, I imagine, will work its own remedy in the direction you want; for I should think the result of that would be that men would be employed on the machines. If the employment of boys and girls to look after the machines results in turning out defective work, surely the firms in time will fall back upon men again?—Yes, they would have to, and then, perhaps, they would find there were no men to be had. It is no good going on apprenticing boys to this trade, and letting them waste seven years of their time learning a trade for which there will be no demand by-and-by when they get out of their apprenticeship.

5964. Obviously a firm will not invest in expensive machinery unless some advantage is to be got out of it, and if they find, owing to the system they adopt of machine-minding, defective work is turned out, they will very quickly turn to some other form of machine-minding; is that not so?—Yes, I believe that.

5965. Where machinery is not used, is fashioning a home industry largely, or is it at all, done in the factory?—That is all done in the factory.

5966. But the drawing is done at home?—Yes.

5967. I suppose it is a recognised trade custom that the drawing is done at home?—Yes; it has been so for many years.

5968. In some Army contracts we have a clause prohibiting home work and insisting on all the work being done in the factory, and also insisting on direct payment to the workers; I take it you would not consider that the brush trade is ripe for such a clause as that?—No. That might place a very great hardship on the women. It is mostly done by married women to add to their incomes, and, in fact, sometimes to keep their husbands who will not work. It would not be a case of coming into the factory with them, because they could not; they have got children to mind, and they could not come into the factory.

5969. Are they, as a rule, paid direct, or are they paid through a foreman?—They are paid direct. There has been rather a wordy battle in the "Daily Chronicle" between myself and the Sanitary Inspector of Bethnal Green. Have you seen it?

5970. No, I have not. Has that been lately?—Just lately. I sent my reply, which they published; Mr. Foote published a counter reply, and I sent another reply then which they would not publish, which was very unfair, in my idea. Would you like to read it?

5971. Yes, thank you, I should. These women would be paid direct in most firms, would they?—Yes.

5972. The outdoor workers are so paid?—Yes. That was the plea in this correspondence. He said it was done through a contractor or a middle-man. There cannot be much middleman or contractor over a gross of tooth-brushes. They never have more than a gross out at a time, and there could not be much of a middleman on them. They come and fetch the work themselves, they do it themselves, and they bring it back themselves, and they are paid direct.

5973. Is it booked up in their own names?—It is booked up in their own names and in their own books. It may be that a woman may have one or two children working with her.

5974. That is a different thing?—Yes, that is a different matter. It is not farmed out.

5975. (Mr. Black.) Supposing that all Government brushes were made in this country, and supposing you knew as a fact you had no foreign competition to face for the Government orders—do not assume that that is the case, but supposing it were—would your attitude towards the machinery question alter then?—No, it would not.

5976. I cannot quite see why you think it is fair that a manufacturer should be enterprising in the matter of machinery and moving out into the country in the case of private orders, simply because he has got competition to face, and not in the case of Government orders if he has not competition to face?—I take it that there is not the competition on Government orders that there is on his ordinary work.

5977. Why does that element of foreign competition, or the substitution of a machine for hand-labour, make the difference in the fair treatment of the workmen?—I consider that if a contractor, or, we will say, a firm, is getting a fair price for his work, he should employ fair means of getting it made.

5978. But making by a machine is not necessarily an unfair means, is it?—No, perhaps not. The whole question hinges on this, that if the machines are to be introduced then we shall not want the men, and if we keep the men we shall not want the machines.

5979. You gave us a very good instance yourself, I think. You said that the boring was formerly done by hand by men, and now you find that girls, with the aid of a machine, can do it, and do it very well?—Yes.

5980. Would you set back the hands of the clock there?—And go back to hand-boring?

5981. Yes?—No, because it was not effectual.

5982. If you try to stereotype the old methods in the case of Government contracts you would go back, and you would prevent all enterprise, would you not?—Yes, perhaps I should.

5983. Would you not also check the more or less healthy movement into the country. I do not say that is always what actuates a manufacturer in moving, but still, from a public point of view, this carrying the factory down into the country is a healthy movement, is it not?—Yes.

5984. Your system, I think, would rather operate against that, would it not, because probably that country manufacturer is in a position to quote lower prices than the man who retains his works in an expensive city?—A man who moves into the country generally gets his work done much cheaper than a London man does, simply because he is the only man in the place, and if the people there do not work for him they cannot work for anybody.

5985. But he does that simply because the conditions of living are cheaper sometimes?—Yes, I grant that.

5985*a*. On this question of the allocation of contracts, in fixing the price is not the taxpayer's point of view to be considered?—The taxpayer?

5986. Yes. Why should the taxpayer be deprived of the advantage of the introduction of machinery, or of the moving of the factory down into the country?—You must have a fair price.

5987. It seems to me that you want to keep up a sort of artificial price for Government orders?—No—a fair price on Government work.

5988. Why should not the taxpayer, so long, of course, as the labour is fairly paid, have the advantage of the enterprise of the manufacturer?—I take it that he does get that advantage.

5989. I rather think you would check it. You would have Government work done by hand at certain fixed rates?—Yes.

5990. Then I think that would deprive the taxpayer of the advantage of the enterprise of the manufacturer in moving into the country and in introducing machinery; would it not?—Yes, indirectly.

5991. I am looking at it as a taxpayer rather?—These men would be earning better wages.

5992. I suppose the workpeople in a country district might conceivably be as well off as those in London, taking the local conditions into consideration?—Yes, although they get lower wages.

5993. They might conceivably be as well off?—Yes; food is cheaper, and so on.

5994. I am only suggesting that there is that taxpayer's point of view?—Yes, there is the taxpayer's point of view; but still I think the thing rights itself. These men will be paying taxes, will they not, if they are earning money?

5995. That is only a fraction of it, is it not? You have to look at the interests of the bulk of the taxpayers, not of a particular fraction of them?—I do not think the Government ever pay too much for their articles, and I do not see why they should get them any cheaper than anyone else.

5996. You are saying that they should get them dearer than other people?—No, I am not saying that.

5997. It practically comes to that. If you admit free trade, and competition, and machinery, and so on, in the case of orders for the private consumer, and you do not admit all these things in the case of the Government consumer, surely you are artificially making the article dearer to the taxpayer?—Looking at it from that point of view, yes; but look at it from the other point of view!

5998. That is one of the points of view from which it must be looked at, is it not?—Certainly.

5999. It is a public servant's duty to consider the interests of the taxpayer, is it not?—Quite so.

6000. Consistent, of course, with fair wages to the workmen?—Supposing the Government gets their work cheaper by the introduction of boy and girl labour, which they would, then the men have got to starve.

6001. Then you might not bring so many men into the particular trade. I suppose they would find their way elsewhere; brushmaking is not the only trade in which machinery has come in?—That is so; but I mean to say that to put a boy to a trade for seven years and teach him that trade, and then to introduce machinery which cuts him out, is cruel.

6002. Has the employer no voice in the number of apprentices taken, supposing he has in view the possible introduction of machinery?—He need not take any at all, unless he likes. It is rather the other way—the men complain about too many apprentices being brought in.

6003. By the employers?—Yes, by the employers. In the summary of the Trade Union evidence I see they want to restrict them.

6004. Do not the employers rather set their faces against apprentices? If you see one employer introducing machinery, you know what the effect of that must be on the number of workpeople eventually, do you not?—Yes.

6005. So do you not rather set yourselves automatically against bringing them in?—No.

6006. You rather talk of the number of workpeople as of a thing that must automatically remain at a certain figure?—Personally, I do not think that the fashioning will ever be done effectually by machine.

6007. You get on now to one particular part of the making, do you not?—Yes.

6008. I suppose years ago you might have thought that the boring would never be done properly by machinery?—Quite so; and it may be that more machinery will be introduced which will take out the men altogether.

6009. (Mr. King.) Is it your view that the Government would be justified in using these contracts to prevent swelling the number of the unemployed, especially in your business?—I do not quite understand. I think you mean to say: Is it the duty of the Government to pay a high price for the stuff?

6010. To pay a higher than the market price in order to keep a larger number of men employed. Is that your contention?—Higher than the market price?

6011. Yes?—No, I never said that, and I never meant it.

6012. For the ordinary private trade you see no objection to the employment of boys and girls, nor to the employment of machinery, but for Government work you object to the employment of machinery and to the employment of boys and girls; that means that the price must be higher. Do you think that higher price would be justified, simply in order to keep the same number of men employed in your trade?—I think so. I think the Government have a right to help the men if they can; if they go into the workhouse they have got to be kept.

6013. You push that further—that the Government should almost pay as high a price as it possibly can?—No, a fair price, I say.

6014. The question is, what is fair—is it the usual trade price?—Certainly not the price that is being paid now. The price that is being paid now is ridiculous.

6015. I am not dealing with what is being paid now; I am dealing with what we should have to pay if we adopt your view that on Government contracts no boy or girl should be employed and no machinery either?—After all, the difference would be very little indeed.

6016. Then the difference in the number of men would be very little?—Quite so; I mean to say that the machines do not save much, because they spoil more than they make properly.

6017. In the last paragraph of your Proof you say that the wages books should be open to Government officials; do you mean all your wages books, or only those relating to Government contracts?—Only those items which are concerned with Government work.

6018. Not all the wages books?—No. When speaking of officials there, does that mean only Government officials, or Trade Union officials?

6019. It means Government officials unquestionably there?—Thank you.

6020. (Mr. De la Bère.) I want to be quite clear about the employment of boys and girls. You do not suggest that their employment has been extended in the hand-fashioning work, do you, but in the machining?—Yes, the boys and girls are being taught to do it exactly the same as the men are doing it with the file—the hand work.

6021. I understood that where they were being introduced was where machines were displacing the hand work?—No. One firm who have got the contract now, I believe, are employing girls to do the fashioning by hand; other firms have introduced machinery for making the handles.

6022. Then the displacement is really taking place in two ways—first, by the introduction of machinery, which is tended by boys and girls?—Yes.

6023. And, secondly, by the direct employment of boys and girls on hand work?—Yes.

6024. The employment of boys and girls on hand work is not being introduced to any extent, I take it?—No; but it is very funny that the firms who have got the work are those who are employing boys and hand work.

6025. And not those who have introduced machinery?—I think not. I do not think a single firm have got any part of it now who have got machines.

6026. You are confining yourself now to the bone brush trade?—Yes, to the tooth brushes.

The witness withdrew.

TWENTY-FIRST DAY,

Thursday, 14th May, 1908.

At 32, Great George Street, Westminster, S.W.

PRESENT:

Sir GEORGE H. MURRAY, K.C.B. (Chairman).

Mr. F. W. Black.
Mr. H. De la Bère, C.B.
Mr. A. Wilson Fox, C.B.
Mr. J. H. Hillier.
Mr. J. J. Wills (Secretary).

Miss Margaret H. Irwin, called and examined.

6027. (Chairman.) You are Secretary of the Scottish Council for Women's Trades?—Yes.

6028. You have had considerable experience in questions affecting women's labour, have you not?—We have been engaged for a number of years in investigating the condition of women's employment generally in Scotland. My experience does not extend beyond that in the meantime.

6029. Our interest in the question arises in this way: We are engaged in an inquiry into the working of what is called the Fair Wages Clause in Government contracts, under which, as I dare say you know, the contractor engages to pay to all the persons engaged on the contract the current rate of wages of the district?—Yes.

6030. It is complained on behalf of the men's unions that the employment of women on those contracts really makes that Clause nugatory, because it cannot be said, I believe, that there is any current rate of wages for women?—That is so.

6031. At any rate, their labour is not organised in the same way as the men's, and the result is that the men contend that the men's wages are undercut by women. I suppose we may take it as a fact that wherever women are employed on work which is common to men also, they would be paid at a lower rate?—Yes, I think you may take that as the general rule. My experience has been, however, that while the woman does the same kind of work up to a certain point, the man is usually, owing to his longer training, what I may term a more efficient all-round industrial instrument for the employer. He can be turned on to more departments of work than the woman can as a rule.

6032. That would not apply to all kinds of work, of course?—I am thinking particularly of the typographical and tailoring trades.

6033. No doubt it would apply there?—You certainly can make some comparison, and a fairly exact comparison, between men's work and women's work in those two trades.

6034. We come next to the causes or the justifications for the difference between men's wages and women's wages; have you anything to say on that point?—In the first place, there is the absence of trade organisation amongst women; that, I believe, is the main cause of their lower wage. Then there is the operation of tradition.

6035. Perhaps, before we pass from the first cause, you could tell us to what extent there is any organisation of women's labour?—In Scotland Trade Unionism is extremely limited amongst women. We have a few Trade Unions amongst the textile operatives in the North of Scotland. In Dundee and about Forfar and Brechin there are large textile Unions, but in the other trades organisation is practically non-existent. My Council have had an extremely disappointing experience in that way. We have organised, I should think, between 30 and 40 Unions. Sometimes under the most favourable circumstances, where the employer has been willing to recognise the Union, and where we have got help from the trade councils and the men's organisations; but they have fallen to pieces through the apathy of the women themselves. The great stumbling-block, I think, is that the woman does not take her industrial work as seriously as a man does his, and she does not regard it as the permanent occupation of her life to the same extent as he does. That, I think, is what comes in the way of Trade Unions mostly. Women have not been accustomed to take collective action to the same extent as men in affairs generally. We hope that this state of things is improving, but in the meantime the result in the way of combined effort is very limited.

6036. Do you think it is improving?—I think there is a general effort over all in many ways. Women are combining together for political and philanthropic work, for example, and that is having an educative effect upon them. Then we have these large co-operative guilds amongst women in connection with the co-operative movement, which, I think, are having a most valuable effect on the women in educating them in collective effort.

6037. Probably, as you say, the real cause why women do not take their work as seriously as men do is that it is only a mode of filling up their time, as a rule?—Yes, for the most part that is so.

6038. You were going on to say that the next reason you give for the difference in the wages was the operation of tradition?—Yes.

6039. Women's wages are traditionally lower than men's?—Yes. I have questioned employers frequently as to why they were paying women less for the work they do—so very much less—in cases where they have told me that the woman as a worker was "every bit as good as the man." The usual reply was that "a woman's wage always is less than a man's." In reply to further questioning the employer would explain that it takes less to keep a woman than to keep a man, which I think is a highly controversial point.

6040. But there is sound reason in that, is there not—a woman is not, as a rule at any rate, the bread-winner of the family?—Perhaps not quite to the same extent as a man is, but very often a woman has dependents—parents or other members of her family—and very often she is a widow and has children to support. In any case, one feels that our commercial system is based on the payment of a worker according to his production and not according to his needs.

6041. I think the needs must always weigh heavily among the elements which go to make up wages; don't you?—If you were to push that to its logical conclusion, I submit, with all respect, that you would pay the married man with a wife and a family to support a larger wage than you at present pay the unattached bachelor.

6042. No doubt that would be the logical conclusion?—But that is not done.

6043. Still, when all is said and done, it must be admitted, I should think, that the normal wage of a man is fixed largely by reference to the fact that he is the bread-winner of the family, and that he is not a bachelor?—I think that is a very important factor, but I think trade organisation has even more to do with it than that. Tradition certainly is a contributory cause, but not quite so much as the other one.

6044. Do you contend that this traditional depression in women's wages as compared with men's is wrong or unjustifiable?—One does not like to generalise on these big economic questions; but I certainly think, on the whole, that women are paid relatively too little. I do not think that in very many cases, if any, they do work worth an equal wage with the men's; but I think at present they are paid relatively considerably less than they ought to be.

6045. Having regard to the difference in their relative efficiencies?—Yes. I think that the difference in wages is out of proportion to the difference in the value of their work. I feel that very strongly.

6046. Would you contend, for example, that on pure piece-work the rates ought to be the same for the two sexes?—There is a little difficulty in answering that.

6047. Piece-work, you see, eliminates all the main differences between the efficiency of the two sexes, because you assume that all piece-work is done with equal efficiency?—To a certain extent; but if a worker produces less in quantity, that worker is not quite so valuable really to an employer, because his cost of upkeep is the same for the worker who produces much as for the worker who produces little.

6048. His standing expenses have to be met in either case?—Yes.

6049. Subject to that, would you maintain that on piece-work the two sexes ought to be paid the same rates?—I think they ought to approximate more closely than they do at present; I think there is too great a difference now.

6050. You do not go so far as to claim, for equal work done in the same time, that they should be paid at the same rates?—As a matter of simple right or wrong I should, but I do not know that I should as a matter of expediency, because I am afraid it would result in the women being dismissed from many trades.

6051. I think that is the conclusion which one cannot avoid—that if that demand is pressed and conceded, it would probably end in the disappearance of women from many of these trades altogether?—I am afraid it would. I have questioned employers very carefully on that point, and even humane, in fact, very benevolent employers have told me that they could not possibly keep on women in their trade if they had to pay them the same rate of wages as the men. Here I am thinking of the printing trade. But notwithstanding that, I should like to emphasise once more my feeling that the women are paid too little at present—considerably too little.

6052. Another point you were going to mention, I think, is that, owing to their inferior physical strength, women are more subject to absences for illness and to more interruptions of their work?—Yes.

6053. That is clearly a factor which must come into the account?—Yes, that is urged. Then on the other hand, employers say that women are more steady; as one employer put it, "They don't stay away on Monday morning; they turn up regularly."

6054. Is that the general experience, so far as you know, that they are more regular in attendance?—One has rather conflicting evidence on that point. One employer says one thing, and another another. As far as the habits of the women are concerned—and these are not affected by illness and domestic causes—I should think that the woman is the more regular worker.

6055. She does not take so many holidays?—Quite so.

6056. And you think that is recognised by the employers?—I think so. I find that opinion differs considerably in different towns; in one town I may be told one thing, and in another another.

6057. Would that apply to clerical labour as well as to other kinds of manual labour?—Not quite so much, perhaps—not among the higher grade workers.

6058. Then you are inclined to think, I understand, that the opposition of the men's unions has some effect upon the employment of women?—I think that in certain cases an artificial line of demarcation has been drawn. Women are prohibited from taking up work in certain trades which they are quite well fitted to do; they could do the work if they were allowed to do it.

6059. Do you see any trace of the extension of women's labour? Are they capturing more departments which were formerly monopolised by men, do you think?—I think there is a distinct tendency in that way. The extended use of machinery is bringing more women into trades; in fact, women and machines are to a large extent, in many cases, replacing the skilled hand-labour of men.

6060. Would you place any limits on the employment of women, supposing that the work is suitable? The men's complaint, of course, is that after having been trained for a particular kind of work, they find themselves displaced by that work being taken over by women at lower wages; do you think there is anything in that contention?—I think that is a fact we must accept. There is a very conspicuous example of that in the typographical trade in Edinburgh. Then again, I find in another town that the women have been taken on owing to the difficulty in getting apprentices. The long period of apprenticeship, which is made compulsory by the Unions, is preventing working-class parents from sending their boys into the trade, and the employers have taken on women instead.

6061. Who do not want so long an apprenticeship?—No. There is a sort of unwritten law that a woman shall serve about three years, but there is no law to enforce it, and it is merely customary. I think it takes a woman about three years to become efficient in the work that she is expected to do.

6062. Is that in the typographical trade?—Yes.

6063. She can learn all that she need know in about three years?—Yes; so I am informed.

6064. I suppose the men's period of apprenticeship would be five years or seven?—It is seven. I am told that is longer than is necessary, and I think many of the men themselves are of this opinion. The seven years' apprenticeship has been imposed by the Union.

6065. But as a general question of economics, do you think there is any substance in that contention that woman ought not to invade man's province?—I do not think so. I think a woman has quite as much right and as much need of work as a man; therefore, I say, most distinctly not.

6066. And that the men cannot claim to keep to themselves, owing to tradition, or for any other reason, particular branches of labour?—I do not think they should oppose the entrance of women if the women are paid a fair wage.

6067. The usual demand on the part of the men is this: They say, we have no objection to the employment of women, provided they are paid the same wage as we are; but that, I think you agree, it is practically impossible to maintain, because it would end in there being no women employed at all?—Yes, in many cases it probably would. Then, as a matter of fact, taking it all round, the women do not do the same work. They do the same work up to a certain point, but their output is rather less, and they are not so useful generally in the workroom.

6068. Because they cannot do everything?—They cannot do everything. I met, however, a very flagrant example of the discrepancy in the wages between men and women doing the same work which I may mention; it was not under a Government contract, but it brought out very clearly the tremendous difference that exists sometimes. I found men and women employed in setting up the columns of a newspaper; the work was exactly the same, and sometimes the woman, with her superior deftness and lightness of handling, could produce rather more than the man. The work was rated at, say, 1s. per column; the man would turn out perhaps 32 columns at the end of the week, and he would send in his bill to the cashier and be paid 32s.; but the woman might turn out also 32 columns, and when she sent in her bill the cashier executed a little sum in simple division, dividing it by 2, and giving the woman half. That was a very glaring instance. It, I think, was due to the fact that the women had no organisation to protect them—and entirely due to that.

6069. What would you suggest is the basis on which women's wages should be calculated? Suppose we assume, to go back to the subject we were on just now, that a man's wages were calculated on the basis of what it would require to keep the man and his family for a given period; how are you to compare a woman's wage with that? What should be the basis in fixing what you call a living wage for a woman, assuming that the living wage for a man is based on the necessity of keeping himself and his family?—I do not know, in the first place, that I am able to accept that assumption, because you find the standard varying so much in the different trades. I think it is pretty much a case of the relative strength of the Unions and the employers; the Unions try to get as much as they can for their members, and I am afraid the employers are trying, on the other hand, to keep wages down as much as possible.

6070. Of course, besides the element that I mention, you have to consider the relative skill required in the different trades?—Yes, certainly.

6071. I should thnk you might say the basis of all wages was what was necessary to keep the man and his family for a certain time in certain circumstances; then, of course, over and above that, you have variations due to the relative skill of the different workers and to the difficulty of getting them?—Yes.

6072. What I was trying to get at was, what your idea was as to how you would fix what a woman ought to get. If you do not adopt the male basis to start with, that is to say, that they are to be paid the same as the men, how much less ought they to be paid than the men?—Assuming that the man's basis is a fair and just thing, I have tried to ascertain, in the instances I have given you in my Proof of Evidence, what is the real difference between the value of a woman's work and of a man's work; and according to the statement of several employers, the difference amounts to about one-third; that is, the woman might be regarded as producing in value about two-thirds of the man's production.

6073. You are speaking there of trades where they work in common, and are practically doing the same work?—Yes.

6074. And there you would put the woman's output at about two-thirds of the man's?—That is the employers' estimate. It is very difficult to hit the exact difference between the work of the two sexes. The work varies in certain cases, and then, as you will see, there is absolutely no standard rate for paying women, and you find that every shop has its own individual rate of payment, which is a matter of arbitrary fixation on the part of the employers.

6075. That is what I am trying to get a suggestion from you about. What ought to be the basis on which the rates paid to women should be fixed?—If you take the men's standard as a fair and just one, and then discover what is the real difference between the men's work and the women's work, is not that the line which you should pursue?

6076. Then you would be paying her on exactly the same basis as the man?—Yes, you would.

6077. And on the same assumptions that I mentioned before with regard to his duties as the head of a family, if a man with these responsibilities on his shoulders gets £1 a week and turns out a certain amount of work, would you say that a woman who turned out two-thirds of that amount of work ought to get two-thirds of £1—Yes.

6078. That means that you do fix her wages on the same basis as the man's, and the only allowance you make is for the relatively less amount of work which she turns out, but for the same amount of work she would get the same wage as a man?—Yes, she would. You are thinking there, I suppose, of the employers' statement that the insistence on an equal pay would result in the women not being employed?

6079. Yes?—But that would not be exactly an equal pay; it would be a relatively equal pay, but it would not mean that the woman was paid the same amount as a man.

6080. No; but she would be, if you were to convert that into a piece-work rate; and one of the objections which you mentioned to us before was that all the standing expenses of the employer get increased by the relative inefficiency of the woman; that is to say, to turn out the same amount of work in the same time, he would require to keep fifty per cent. more women than men?—Yes.

6081. So I think, even if the woman did turn out two-thirds of the work that a man does, she ought not, on your assumption, to be paid two-thirds of his wages, because even so she imposes a larger charge on the employer than the man does, does she not?—Yes. It is rather difficult to answer a question like that put offhand, because you see it involves a very great many considerations. You require to make some estimate, I should think, of the general cost of production of every shop, and to distribute it very carefully, and also the cost of the supplementary labour for the women, which I tried very hard to get at and found that it varied in every shop.

6082. I was rather assuming that we made allowance for all that before we arrived at the two-thirds. But it does seem to me that you are claiming that a woman should be paid at the same rate as a man if you say that her wage ought to be fixed by measuring their relative output, and then giving the woman the proportionate part of a man's wages for her smaller output?—Perhaps one might make a slight deduction; but it would be a matter of proportion of course.

6083. Then you would pay her in the same proportion as the man, with a slight deduction on account of the extra charge which she imposes on the employer by her relative inefficiency?—Yes; but possibly over a large workshop that would not make any very great difference—in cases, for example, where there is no steam power.

6084. And where the standing expenses are not very large in proportion to the whole?—Yes.

6085. Then you mention as another reason for woman's lower wages, inferiority of skill in many trades. For our present purpose that need not enter into our consideration, because we are assuming that for equal skill they will get equal wages. The inferiority of her skill will show itself in the wage she gets, and for less skill she will get paid less wages. Your final conclusion is that the difference in pay is considerably out of proportion to the difference in work, and that at present women on the whole are not receiving a wage proportionate to the relative value of their labour?—That is my final conclusion.

6086. (Mr. Hillier.) In the textile trades, are the women paid the same rate as the men?—There are no men employed in the textile trades in Scotland. That is the great feature which differentiates the Scottish from the English textile trades. We have men employed in the preparing departments of the industry, but not in the actual spinning and weaving, with some unimportant exceptions, such as weaving carpets and curtains, and in the south to a slight extent in the weaving and spinning of wollen yarns.

6087. It is a uniform rate, is it not, generally throughout the textile trade, and the workers have a scale of wages upon which they are paid by results?—That is a point to which I should like specially to draw the attention of this Committee. There is no standard rate for women, even in the textile trades. I think that is the great stumbling block in the way of doing anything for women, and it has most disastrous results for them.

6088. (Chairman.) Do you mean that the organisation, where there is one, has not succeeded in establishing a standard rate?—That is so; it has not.

6089. What does it do then?—It tries to prevent reductions, and when any special firm wishes to cut down its workers' wages, the Union intervenes. It is a regrettable fact that it has not been possible to establish standard rates throughout women's trades in Scotland by means of Trade Unions.

6090. One would have thought that if they were organised at all, they would have succeeded in establishing a standard rate of some kind?—Yes, but the Unions have not been able to do this for the workers generally, I am afraid.

6091. In fact, the organisation, even where it exists, is very weak?—Yes, it is weak throughout the trades generally.

6092. (Mr. Hillier.) You cannot suggest a remedy, I suppose, for the low payment of wages to women?—What I should be glad to see is legislation doing for women what Trade Unions at present do for men. It is so very difficult to organise women to such an extent that their Trade Unions can be any real protection to them in their work. Therefore, personally, I should be very glad to see the State step in and do for them what the Trade Unions have done for men.

6093. If the State fixed a rate for women, would not the men have an equal claim that the State should fix the rate for men?—But the men have their Unions, which the women have not.

6094. I suppose in districts where there are manufactories which employ men and which women do not enter into, like engineers' works, if anyone started an industry there for the employment of women, he would get women very much cheaper than he would in districts where the work was more equally distributed between the sexes?—Yes, presumably.

6095. Therefore, if you fixed a uniform rate, it would make it difficult perhaps to establish an industry to give employment to women, and, therefore, the wives or the daughters of the men employed in these manufactories you would be doing an injustice to in that way?—I am afraid I do not quite follow the question.

6096. If a standard rate for women's wages were fixed, it would militate against starting industries that are starting now in districts where the work of the district is mainly composed of men's labour, like engineering work; and, therefore, the fixing of a rate would prevent those industries being open to women in those districts?—If the rate were fixed so high as to be prohibitive, I suppose it would, but if it were fixed with due consideration and discretion, I do not think it should have that effect.

6097. Then if you had a fixed rate, how would you differentiate between the good workers and the bad workers?—I suppose it would operate in this way, that those who fell below a certain level would probably not be able to get employment in that particular industry, and they would have to take to something else. The employer would not engage workers whose skill and power of production were not up to a certain standard.

6098. The difference between the average rates of men and women, where they are employed in the same labour, is that the women get about 60 per cent. of the men's wages, do they not?—It differs in various trades; I think you could scarcely generalise.

6099. As a rule, it works out to about 60 per cent., does it not?—Very frequently the difference amounts to that.

6100. (Mr. Black.) Do you think in the textile trades the women are badly paid?—Do they get what is sometimes called a living wage, do you think, in Dundee for example?—It varies very much in the different departments. You find women getting as low as 7s., 8s., or 9s., and then you find them getting in other departments 15s., 16s., and perhaps a little more.

6101. If you could persuade Parliament to do what you wish, would you set up a minimum wage higher than the present wage?—I think in some departments I certainly should.

6102. You think you would?—Yes, in certain departments.

6103. Would that not tend to stereotype something like unfair competition? You say the employers sometimes estimate the output of the women at something like two-thirds of the output of the men, and then by a stroke of the pen they pay them half a man's wages?—Yes.

6104. Does that not make the women's competition there rather unfair—I am looking at the interests of the working classes generally?—Do you think at present it is unfair?

6105. If an employer can get two-thirds of the work done at half wages, is that not an inducement to him to run down the wages generally?—Yes, and I think that is what we ought to guard against; I think that leads to most unfortunate economic results all round.

6106. But then if you guard against that by legislation, the only way to do it would be to make the wage absolutely equal, would it not, and in that case you would shut out the women?—I do not know that I would recommend that it should be made absolutely equal, but I would recommend that it should be made higher than it is at present. I think you might greatly improve the industrial position of the women, and still secure for them employment in certain trades, and also make it profitable and advantageous for the employer to engage them.

6107. And still leave a field for the man?—Yes.

6108. The man has to face now a double competition, has he not? He has got the machine displacing him on the one hand, and he has got the cheap labour of woman displacing him on the other?—Yes.

6109. At any rate, that competition exists so long as the employer has an inducement to employ women's labour in those trades?—Yes.

6110. The unfortunate man is hit rather hard with those two things facing him?—Yes. One has considerable sympathy with the men's Unions, I think, in holding strong opinions on this point. They are inclined to favour an agitation for getting up women's wages.

6111. We should get into rather a serious economic situation if we had all industry carried out by machines and women and boys. Of course, I do not mean that that could be done in heavy engineering and shipbuilding work?—That would be so; but I do not know that that is quite what is likely to happen.

6112. Some big adjustment would have to take place, would it not, in such a case?—Yes.

6113. May I now ask you a question in reference to Government contracts in particular? Do you know of any case in which women's wages have been taken up, on a point under a Government contract, with any Government Department? Do you know of any complaint being lodged under a Government contract on behalf of women workers?—Yes. I think a case occurred in Edinburgh in the printing trade some time ago. The men complained, and I believe the women were taken off that particular bit of work. I remember one of the women saying to me that when they had raised the wages to this extent they took the women off, because they would never allow the women to make so big a pay as that.

6114. (Chairman.) I think the question rather was, Do you know of any complaint by women to a Government Department?—I do not think the women are in the habit of complaining.

6115. (Mr. Black.) There is a great deal of work done, I take it, by women workers in the textile factories of Dundee and Aberdeen?—Yes.

6116. You do not know of any complaint on their part being lodged?—Not so far as I know.

6117. (Mr. Wilson Fox.) Is that not because they have got no Unions?—It is very largely, I think; but in Dundee they have a Union.

6118. (Chairman.) But it is not effective?—It is not so effective as it would be if a larger proportion of the workers were in regular membership, probably.

6119. (Mr. De la Bère.) Is the membership falling off?—I do not know what the actual figures are.

6120. (Chairman.) They would not be in a position to say that there was a current rate which was not being paid?—Possibly not; but I do not know. My opinion is that the Women's Textile Unions suffer in Scotland from the absence of men's labour in the departments of spinning and weaving. I know it is quite different in Lancashire and Yorkshire, where the Union fixes the rate, and that is adhered to, and has to be applied to the work of both sexes.

6121. (Mr. Black.) Have you any views as to whether women's wages on Government work should differ from the wages on similar work in private trade?—My feeling is that the Government ought certainly to be a model employer, because it has not the same difficulties to encounter as a private employer in the way of competition. If I may say so, I find there are general complaints regarding the Government not being a very lavish paymaster.

6122. To its contractors, do you mean?—To its contractors.

6123. Suppose the contractor were paying fairly good wages to women workers, we will say, on a Government contract, and then when that work was finished, there were rather slack times, and by agreement with his employees he offered them other work at lower rates—I have heard of a case of that kind occurring in Scotland——Merely to keep the place going?

6124. Yes?—Sometimes trouble arises through the workers not accepting the wages paid in these conditions.

6125. As a temporary measure?—Yes, merely as a temporary measure. I think raising and fixing the standard for Government work would have a good effect on every trade. It would tend to raise the women's wages throughout, possibly, and generally it would have a good moral, stimulating effect.

6126. (Mr. Wilson Fox.) You think that the women's wages generally are on the low side?—Yes.

6127. If you had legislation which set up wages boards, I understand you would be prepared to run the risk that the decisions of some of those wages boards might result in the women's wages being raised to such a high point that women might be squeezed out of a particular industry?—I should think that a properly constituted wages board would take all these points into consideration, and not raise the wage to such an extent that it would result in women being squeezed out.

6128. That would depend on the views of the people on the board. There are some people who do hold as we have heard—and they are not only workmen—that women and men should be paid the same amount for the same class of work?—Yes, I know.

6129. But you would be prepared to run the risk—whatever risk there might be—of such a decision by a wages board?—I think I have already said that I am not arguing for equal pay, because women do not really do equal work, as a rule.

6130. I know you are not?—I am arguing for something rather less than that.

6131. I only put it to you that, looking at it from the women's point of view, when they went before the wages board they would run some risk of their wages being fixed so high that it might become in some particular industry not worth the employers' while to employ women?—If that is found to be the result, I should think that some further adjustment could be made by the wages board.

6132. In order to keep the women there, do you mean?—Yes.

6133. As regards the point of machinery displacing men; in particular industries it might be that machinery would displace men?—Yes, and it is doing so to a certain extent.

6134. Taking the country as a whole, however, if there is a large amount of machinery introduced into factories, that means that there is a very large amount of extra machinery being made in the country?—Yes.

6135. Which, on the other hand, would give extra employment in other directions?—Yes.

6136. And so the introduction of machinery throughout, on the balance, would not necessarily mean a decreasing number of men employed in the country?—No, possibly not. That, of course, is a highly complicated economic question.

6137. Quite so, but we need not assume without strict proof that the introduction of machinery as a whole will decrease the number of men employed in the country?—No. My personal feeling is that it does not result in that on the whole, but that it results in larger production and cheaper production.

6138. It is a proposition which has still got to be absolutely proved, and it is still an open question?—Yes, quite so.

6139. Now take the tailoring trade; have you had many or any instances where men who were employed making a whole article themselves have raised objections against women coming in at a lower rate and doing a portion of that particular article?—The tailoring trade presents a very interesting example, I think, of that point which you raised just now. To begin with, the men objected very strongly to the introduction of women into the trade, and, in fact, their Union rules contained a clause which said that a man must not instruct a woman in the trade; the women had forced their way in, but they were regarded as a sort of pirate labour, and everything was done to make things uncomfortable for them. The men have now come to realise that the women are there, and have come to stay, and are considering a proposal of mine, made a good many years ago to the Tailors' Union, that, instead of fighting the women they should, by way of protecting themselves against this irregular competition on the part of the women, draft a tailoresses' log with slightly lower rates for the women. At the time—I think it is some eight or nine years ago now—the men refused to consider this suggestion; but I heard from the general secretary just a week or two ago that now they have come round to think that this would be the best thing to do. They realise that the women are there, and that they had better organise them and have a standard rate of pay for them.

6140. You see the man's point is that he is making a whole article, some of which is rather easier work than the other parts of it, and he does not see why he should do all the hard work in making that article and let in somebody else to do the rather easier work; he thinks he ought to take the smooth with the rough and be allowed to do it all at his own rate?—Yes, I understand.

6141. Have you had that point raised to any extent in any trade in Scotland?—You have it in both the tailoring and the typographical trades; the tailoring trade is coming round, but the typographical trade is still hostile.

6142. But there is some work in the typographical trade that is too heavy for women, is there not?—Yes; they cannot possibly undertake it.

6143. I was not thinking of that sort of work. Take tailoring again; there are some portions of tailoring which women can do perhaps as well, perhaps better, than men, but the man claims to do the whole, because, although there is this rather lighter work, he does not see why he should do all the hard work only?—I think that feeling has entirely disappeared in the tailoring trade in Scotland now.

6144. Is there any other trade in which you think that feeling among the men exists?—In the bookbinding trade you have a very clearly defined line laid down between the men's work and the women's work. The women certainly could do a great many more things if they were allowed to do them, but they are not; and the men are exceedingly jealous of any incursions of women across that boundary line. We have had strikes and trouble in Scotland several times over that.

6145. I take a man and a woman doing the same class of work; is there any reason why that man and woman should not be paid the same rates on piecework, because then they would be paid according to their output, and if a woman does less work she would be paid so much less at the piece-rates? Is there any reason why they should not be paid the same rate for piece-work when they are doing similar work?—If the woman produces exactly the same work, the same in amount and the same as regards skill and value, certainly not—morally.

6146. (Chairman.) And if she produces it in the same time?—Yes.

6147. (Mr. Wilson Fox.) Is it not rather difficult to compare men's and women's work? I can understand that you can compare it as regards pace; but take pottery work, where I will assume for one moment—it may not be true—that a woman might break more work than a man; it would be rather difficult, taking pace and breakages into consideration, to accurately determine what the precise value of the man's and woman's work was, would it not?—It is some years since I investigated the conditions of women's work in potteries; but I seem to remember that it is rather the other way about, and that the women are considered to be more careful than the men.

6148. Taking your previous answer, you think that the differences, whatever they may be, between the man's and the woman's work can be fairly and approximately accurately ascertained?—I think they can. I think it would work out in practical experience. Employers would very soon find out whether it was worth while engaging women at this rate.

6149. There are certain influences at work which tend to keep women's wages down; first of all, they have no Trade Unions?—That is so.

6150. Secondly, married women are working, and their earnings are not infrequently looked upon merely as supplementary to the husband's earnings?—Yes; that is a very important factor.

6151. Then the unmarried girls who are living at home and contribute a small portion of their earnings to the family housekeeping, but buy their own clothes, have got no other responsibilities, and therefore they in their turn can afford to take a lower rate?—Yes—a sort of pocket-money wages.

6152. In typewriting and that sort of work?—Yes; all these things come into it.

6153. So there are a good many influences which tend to keep pressure by the women away from the employers, which is not the case with the men, by whom pressure is exercised against the employers to make them keep up or raise the wages?—Yes.

6154. Therefore on those grounds you think that the women want more power at their elbow in the way of legislation, or something of that sort?—Yes. More particularly they want a standard rate. Really, I do not feel so keenly about the raising of the wages in the first place as about having a standard rate. I think the present chaotic state which prevails in regard to women's wages makes it impossible to do anything whatever.

6155. But where you have got these influences at work, when a number of women are prepared to take low wages, and do not press for a standard rate as long as they can earn something and make an addition to the family income, it is rather difficult to arrive at a standard rate, is it not? The men insist upon a standard rate, because they have got certain fixed expenses that they are bound to meet. It is very difficult for a married man, I should think, to live under 25s. a week, in a large town, and keep a family?—Yes.

6156. Dock labourers earning 25s. a week find that is about as little as they can live on, and pay rents, and so on?—Quite so.

6157. But there is no such element in the case of women which compels them to have a standard rate in their mind which they have got to ask for?—We ought to recognise that if the woman produces work of a certain value she should be paid according to that value.

6158. I can quite see that?—Of course, speaking generally, the pressure is not so great in the case of the women, and they have not been accustomed to demand these things; but it is morally right that they should get them.

6159. (Chairman.) I think your point is that your standard rate will always tend to be broken down by the operations of these casual or pocket-money ladies?—That is so. The competition of the partially-supported woman is a very serious thing. It comes out very particularly in the needlework trades.

6160. As long as that influence is at work, do you think you could maintain a standard rate?—I think that fixing a standard rate by law would be the best way of checking that.

6161. That, of course, would prevent the pocket-money ladies coming in at all?—Quite so. I do not object to anyone coming into the labour market, so long as they come in under fair conditions—conditions which do not impose hardship on their fellow workers.

6162. (Mr. Wilson Fox.) If a Government Department want to find out what is a fair rate of pay for women it is no use a Government Department inquiring, at any rate, in certain trades that you know of, what the current rate is. What you want to apply your mind to on behalf of women is, What the current rate should be, not what the current rate is?—Quite so; because in most trades there is no Union for the women; that is exactly what I wish to press.

6163. (Mr. De la Bère.) I suggest that, except with the more highly skilled, perhaps the most highly skilled, there is a current rate for women, and that it approximates to 10s. or 12s. a week; would you agree with that?—I think between 9s. and 10s. a week is regarded as about the average wage of women all through the United Kingdom.

6164. On the question of women's wages it appears, as far as I have been able to find out, that 10s. a week is about the rate that is paid to all but the most skilled?—I should think that is about the average.

6165. And that it does not depend very much on the degree of their skill or the class of work they are on?—No; it depends more on the custom of the district.

6166. Almost entirely?—Yes; and on tradition.

6167. How do you account for the fact that tradition should govern the rate for women and not for men? Is there any accounting for it, except that the men's organisation has enabled them gradually to push upwards?—I think that is it.

6168. That is the main reason?—That is the main determining factor.

6169. And it is the most obvious one?—I think so.

6170. Would you consider that women's wages have receded at all?—In certain classes of work they have. For example, in the needle-work trades, what are known as the sweated trades, I think they have fallen distinctly; and in certain branches of the textile trades too. In the West of Scotland the textile trades are suffering very severely from the competition of Lancashire, for example, and our main branches of cotton weaving, I think, may be regarded as decaying industries. Of course, you have falling wages there.

6171. With the exception of one or two industries perhaps, where there are obvious causes at work, you would not consider on the whole that women's wages have receded?—I do not think that is a point on which you could generalise. You must take each trade by itself.

6172. Do you think that the women stand now very much where the men stood before they were organised, that is to say, where the men did about 70 or 80 years ago?—I should think so.

6173. In the interval nobody has thought very much about women's wages—perhaps least of all the women themselves; and consequently the rate remains very much where it was?—Yes. I think the low wage is very largely due to the apathy of the women, because they will not organise.

6174. Have you any hope at all of the men's Unions in time admitting the women, as the Lancashire weavers have done?—We got the Scottish National Operatives Tailors' Union to throw open their doors to women workers, but the women will not come in.

6175. Won't they?—No.

6176. In Lancashire they have succeeded in practically obtaining the same piece-work rates for both men and women in the cotton weaving?—Yes. That is quite the most encouraging example of Trade Union effort that we have, I think.

6177. You do not see much chance of similar efforts elsewhere, apparently?—Not to the same extent in the textile trades in Scotland, I am afraid, because they are, as I pointed out, exclusively women's trades, and you do not have the men there to set the pace.

6178. Some of the witnesses from the Trade Unions have gone rather further than others, and have objected to the employment of women in factories altogether, quite irrespective of the wages paid?—Of course, that is a position with which I have no sympathy whatever.

6179. Then, with regard to home work, do you consider that that operates to bring down the rate of wages?—Yes. I am very glad that you have raised that point, because it has been urged on me again and again that, in Government contracts very conspicuously in fact, the rates are pulled down by the competition of out-workers.

6180. On the other hand, home work is a very difficult question, and I think it is obvious that if you were suddenly to restrict it, you would throw out of work a large number of deserving people?—Yes. We have made fairly exhaustive inquiries into home work, and we do not recommend its abolition; we recommend certain regulations of it in the way of licensing, fixing a minimum wage, and so forth.

6181. Quite irrespective of the displacement by women, do you think that the general result of raising women's wages would be to depress that of the men?—No. I should think it would have rather the opposite effect.

6182. I mean, assuming that the total production of the country yields a certain wage, do you think that if you give the women a larger share of that wage, it would result in the men getting a smaller share than they now have?—That is, assuming that there is a fixed wages fund.

6183. No, I will not go so far as that, and I did not mean to do so. Still, speaking generally, probably at any given time the trade of the country does not in point of fact—whatever it ought to do—bear more than a certain total amount of wage?—Then I am inclined to think—I may be wrong economically—that a general raising of the wages is good for trade all over; it increases the purchasing power of the worker and consequently of production.

6184. You do not think, for instance, to take a concrete case, that if a man is drawing 30s. and a woman 20s., and you set to work to raise her figure, that in the end they will both draw 25s.?—No, I do not see why it should work out so.

6185. There are just one or two questions I should like to ask you on that section in your proof of evidence which deals with the making of soldiers' uniforms. Are your remarks there limited to Scotland, or are you speaking from general knowledge of the trade?—They are limited to Scotland in these particular cases; in fact all my evidence here is so.

6186. You have gone into the clothing question, I suppose, pretty closely?—Yes, I have.

6187. Are you referring in this section actually to Government contracts or to volunteer contracts?—These are Government contracts.

6188. Because, in point of fact, there is only one firm in Scotland which does Army work?—Yes, I know.

6189. And I think within the last year or two they have not had any work to do practically?—One firm has given it up, but there is still one firm carrying it on to a large extent.

6190. I do not fancy they have had any orders recently—I mean they have not succeeded at the competitions, I think. I was wondering to what date, about, your evidence here related?—Last week; they were making Government work then.

6191. Is the table that you give the sort of wages that they pay?—That was supplied to me by the employer from his books.

6192. It seems to me to be rather a better scale than I should have anticipated from experience elsewhere?—I received the impression that this was a fair firm, and that they treated their workers very well.

6193. Looking at the general rate of wages which women obtain, I should have thought that there was not very much to complain of in that?—No; but you see they are very much lower than men's wages. The highest pay for the woman is 20s., and for the man 45s.

6194. But they are not doing quite the same work, are they?—It is not quite the same; but I do not think that the difference in the work justifies such a very great discrepancy in the wage as that.

6195. A little further on you suggest that orders should be placed for delivery from August to February. There are difficulties in that, but if orders are placed in March for delivery, let us say, up to December, I suppose that would largely meet your objection, would it not? Most of our orders are placed in March for delivery up to December?—Indeed? The great point is to have the Government contract work coinciding with the slack period in the tailoring trade.

6196. And the slack period, I gather, is actually in the winter?—Yes.

6197. I am afraid that is almost an impossibility. We try as far as possible to meet the wants of the trade, but I am afraid to put out the work in the winter would be a very difficult thing, for reasons which perhaps one need not go into here. I was wondering whether the usual practice of asking for delivery up to the end of December did not substantially meet your difficulty?—I really do not know. It was urged that the present arrangement is not satisfactory, as it coincides with their busy time.

6198. For instance, about a week or two ago we put out a very large order for delivery from April to December, 1908, both months inclusive; that, I should have thought, went a very long way to meet the point you raise there?—August to February is their suggestion.

6199. From Scotland?—Yes.

6200. Then you come to the "Universal jackets." Might I ask if that is a case that you have in view in Scotland, or is it the case which was raised by Mr. Ramsay Macdonald some six weeks ago?—It is a case which was quoted to me by an employer.

6201. Not as occurring in Scotland?—No, in London.

6202. That is why I asked. I should like to say on that that what was actually paid was a trifle more than the figure you give; the rates were, no doubt, low, but they were paid in the factory, and there was no question of out-work there?—Indeed? I think I should have put these paragraphs in quotation marks; they were really the statements of the employer.

6203. That is what I rather wanted to get at—they were not within your own experience?—No, I did not get them at first hand; they were merely repeated to me.

6204. Perhaps it is not in your experience, but I think in all Government clothing contracts, in the army clothing contracts certainly, home work is most rigidly forbidden, and the very greatest precautions are taken to see that it does not take place?—Indeed? I have heard from another quarter that that is very successfully evaded; but I do not know that at first-hand—that was merely stated to me by some one who has knowledge.

6205. If you can give me privately any case where it has been evaded, I shall be most happy to look into it; but you are aware that there is such a clause?—I know there is such a clause.

6206. It is one of the things which we endeavour to press; we pay more attention to that almost than to anything else. At any rate, these are cases not within your own experience?—No; they were merely reported to me, and as they related to points of importance I thought it well to repeat them.

6207. Then you suggest that the Government should fix the rate per garment?—That, again is a suggestion from the employer.

6208. And not from you?—No.

6209. Have you at all thought over that point yourself?—I can see that it would probably have some effect in equalising wages; it would make things more specific and detailed—more explicit.

6210. And you do not think it would result in stereotyping a low rate of wages?—Not if the rate is fixed at a proper figure. It depends on what figure is fixed, of course.

6211. I suppose the rate would differ according to the part of the country?—I suppose you must make a certain allowance for the cost of living. The cost of living would be higher in London, for example, than in a country district; but in big towns I think the cost of living tends to approximate pretty nearly—certainly in Scotland it does.

6212. I think it would have the effect that the Government would practically assume responsibility for the rate?—In the enforcing of it, do you mean?

6213. No, not so much that, but in fixing the rate. I think everybody would consider that the Government had made a declaration that that rate was the proper rate, we will say, and was a fair living wage?—I think our feeling is rather against the particular department which is giving out the work being authorised to fix their own rate, and in favour of its being fixed by some independent official.

6214. You say "We"; are you speaking of your council?—I am speaking of my council.

6215. The bulk of the clothing employers are very anxious indeed that the Government should fix the rate of wages; but your council would prefer legislation, I suspect, would it not?—Yes. I think there are obvious drawbacks to the department which is giving out the work fixing the rate. I, personally, would be strongly in favour of it being fixed by some independent official.

6216. But the department giving out the work has to pay for it?—Yes. Of course you are aware of the system in Canada under the Labour Department there?

6217. No, I do not know the Canadian system?—They have a special official for fixing wages rates, not only for Government contracts, but for all work that is paid for from the public funds.

6218-9. I take it that your suggestion applies not only to clothing?—No; I should like to see it applied all over.

6220. (Mr. Wilson Fox.) To follow up a question which has been asked of you, do you think that the higher men's wages become the tendency is on the part of the wives and daughters who are employed to care less what their wages are? If there is more money going into the home from the man's wages, do you think the tendency is for less pressure to be put upon the employer by the wives and daughters?—That is rather a speculative question, is it not?

6221. In recent years men's wages have increased considerably?—Yes.

6222. Your case is that women's wages have not increased to anything like the same extent; do you think that the fact that the men's wages have increased rather operates against any movement on the part of the women to make a fuss about theirs?—No; I think it operates in another way. It operates in the choice of employment. You can frequently trace the rise in the condition of a working-class family by the occupations followed by the daughters. I know cases where the eldest daughter has been sent to domestic service; the second daughter into a factory, and with increased prosperity—perhaps the father has got a foreman's job, or has accumulated a little money—the third daughter may go into a shop; and then finally, as the culminating point of the family prosperity, the youngest daughter becomes a typist—perhaps she is the lowest paid of all, which rather illustrates your point. The eldest represents the solid basis of the best-paid worker.

6223. (Mr. De la Bère.) That, I take it, is because there are attractions in the typewriter's profession which counter-weigh the lowness of the wages?—Yes. The typewriter is regarded as of a much higher social grade than the domestic servant.

6224. Of course, in most of the factories there is a very marked social distinction between the girls employed in the various operations?—Very marked indeed; it is rather difficult for an outsider to keep track of it sometimes.

The witness withdrew.

Mrs. Sarah Dickenson, called and examined.

6225. (Chairman.) You are one of the joint secretaries of the Manchester and Salford Women's Trades and Labour Council?—Yes.

6226. Have you thought at all about the operation of the Fair Wages Clause in Government contracts on women's labour?—As far as I know anything about it, women are not taken into consideration at all in the work. If the wages are all right for the men it does not seem to matter very much about the women. I think it is only when the women begin to do work which men have considered theirs that the men begin to worry about it.

6227. One of the points on which they have worried is that it is no use prescribing that they should be paid the current rate of wages if women are allowed to do work under the contract at a lower rate?—But then in the trades, women are doing one section of the work and men are doing another. Take tailoring or bookbinding; there is no woman who is a thorough book-binder, but she may be doing a little section of it—it is the same thing in tailoring—there is still some work that the men keep to themselves. As a rule, when we talk about men's work, it really means the best-paid portion of any trade.

6228. There are trades in which men and women are working practically side by side and doing the same work, are there not?—There is the Lancashire weaving; I think that is about the only trade where they are doing exactly the same thing. Of course, there is teaching, but that is a profession, is it not? According to my experience in the tailoring, for instance, the women do the machining in the better class work, and the men do the finishing; and in the factory work, which is much cheaper work, the women would do the machining and the finishing too, but there are still some processes which the men consider their own.

6229. Are you connected with many women's organisations?—We have nine or ten women's Trade Unions connected with our Council, representing between 3,000 or 4,000 women. Some are in the textile trades; then there is the Society of Tailoresses, the Society of Shirtmakers, the Society of Women in Printing and Bookbinding, the Society of Cigar

Makers, and the Society for Women in the Electrical Trades.

6230-1. Have they been able to do anything in the way of fixing a standard rate of wages?—The women in the bookbinding trade have just got an understanding with the employers about what apprentices shall receive, and what the women shall have when they come out of their time, and they have also got the minimum advanced 1s. The rate used to be 12s.; that was considered the rate for a journeywoman folder and sewer, but now it is 13s. I think there is one firm that does Government work, but I am not quite certain about it. Until the women were organised wages were very low indeed; the women would serve an apprenticeship for four years to a trade, and then they got 9s. a week and they were unable to get any more. They have certainly got the wages up in some of the trades through the Unions.

6232. And they are able to enforce those rates?—Yes. They are beginning to take more interest in the municipal contracts. The tailoresses are beginning to agitate now for a minimum wage for contract work.

6233. But you do notice a distinct improvement with the rates that they have been able to enforce?—Where women are organised, yes, certainly.

6234. I gather from you that the organisation is proceeding at a tolerably rapid rate?—Yes. We are getting members every week; women seem to begin to think more about Trade Unionism.

6235. Then you could say with confidence that in your district there was a current rate for women employed in, say, the tailoring trade?—Yes, rates are fixed, but the Union is not very strong. In fact, sometimes the men are really to blame for the women not being so well organised. That Union was started through a strike. It was the men who had the difficulty, and the women came out to support them; but in making arrangements with the employers they forgot all about the women although, of course, the women had some grievances, and the women seemed worse off when they went back than before. So they said "Unionism is no good," and we had to do the work all over again. We go in for organising the women separately from the men, and having their own committee and their own officials, and looking after their own business.

6236. You would rather not have a combined Union of the men and of the women?—No. In the cotton trade, for instance, where the majority of the workers are women, the officials and all the people who are at the top are men; they do not really like the women on committees at all.

6237. And do not allow them what you would consider a fair share in the management of the Society?—No. They would say that was not woman's work and that it is men's work.

6238. Take, for instance, the Union in the tailoring trade; do you find that they are able to enforce the rate of wages on which they have agreed?—Yes. In some of the shops that have municipal contract work they have been able to get rates agreed for the women.

6239. They are practically enforced?—Yes.

6240. And the employers do not take any women from outside the Union who undercut the rates?—I could not say. The rates are supposed to be paid to any woman who is working, and some women are getting the rate who are not in the Union. It has only happened with one firm.

6241. You do not find that there are women outside the Union who come in and work for less?—That would not be allowed in these particular shops, because there is an arrangement with the employer that if he does municipal work he must give the tailoresses so much; there is a certain rate below which he must not go.

6242. And that is practically enforced?—Yes, but only in one shop.

6243. Do you mean that all the employers have not agreed to that?—They are not all doing municipal work. I think there is only another firm in the town that is doing it, and I am afraid their women are sweated very badly, but we cannot get them to join the Union.

6244. Does the municipality refuse to give its contracts to anybody but this firm; is that the position?—No, they do not bother. They have a Fair Contracts Committee in connection with the Men's Trades and Labour Council, and they discuss all about the conditions, but they do not bother about the women at all—it is the men they are looking after.

6245. What is the obligation which this particular firm that you mention has come under?—A joint committee in the clothing trade pointed out to somebody on the Council—to some Labour Councillor—that this gentleman was getting the work and that he was paying such low wages. It was arranged that he should pay so much per week to his tailoresses, or else he would not get it. That is the only firm they have been able to enforce it upon. I do not say it has not been enforced upon other people, but you see you cannot speak for people if they are not in the Union.

6246. Who enforced it—the Manchester Corporation?—No; the Joint Clothiers' Committee took it up, as the tailoresses were represented on the Joint Clothiers' Committee.

6247. The Joint Clothiers' Committee was not an association of the employers then?—No, but of the workers—tailors, clothiers, and tailoresses.

6248. It is a Union in fact?—It consists of representatives from those three Unions.

6249. And what they have succeeded in doing is to get this one employer to pay a standard rate?—Yes.

6250. But they have not succeeded in getting any of the others to do so?—No.

6251. Why did he agree to it?—I suppose he thought he would lose the contract if he did not.

6252. As I understand it, this arrangement was not enforced by the Corporation, but by the women's Union?—Yes. I suppose pressure was brought to bear on him to raise the rates.

6253. By the women?—Yes, and that was why the contract was allowed to go through. The Corporation themselves did not take the matter up.

6254. They did not?—No.

6255. I do not quite see what pressure was brought to bear on him to separate himself from all the rest of the employers, and to pay a higher rate than they pay?—He was the only one in the district that was getting a contract. I think the work goes out of the town a good deal.

6256. Have you any practical suggestions to make for carrying out more effectually the object of this Fair Wages Clause?—I think if the Government as an employer were to pay a living wage to its tailoresses, if we take tailoresses as an instance, that would affect the wages in other parts of the country.

6257. How would you fix the living wage?—I would say that a skilled tailoress should not have less than £1 a week. I think at Pimlico the average is spoken of as 15s.

6258. Would you fix £1 a week as the minimum wage that anybody could earn under a Government contract?—Under the Government; and I think it would have an effect, because in going round and making inquiries amongst skilled tailoresses, I find that 15s. is about the average.

6259. If skilled tailoresses can only earn 15s., why should the Government fix the minimum rate at £1?—They are all underpaid. I do not think 15s. is enough.

6260. What is the standard by which you fix £1 rather than 15s.?—Because it would take £1, I should think, to live decently.

6261. (Mr. Wilson Fox.) Do you mean for a single woman?—For any woman. I do not see that there should be any difference between a single woman and a married woman.

6262. (Chairman.) A great many of them manage to live on less?—No difference is made between married men and single men. You would not give a single man a less wage because he was single; and women have responsibilities just the same as men.

There are thousands of women that have people dependent on them.

6263. Your suggestion would be, I suppose, that the Government in all its contract work should fix a minimum wage to be paid to anybody employed on the contract?—I think where the Government employ women directly, if they gave £1 a week, it would have its effect on the contracts. If it was put in the contracts that the women should be paid the rate of the district—it only says "men" now, and it does not say anything about women—I think wages would be bound to go up, because women are more and more beginning to organise, and where there are Trade Unions in a town, if they knew that was in force, they would look into it.

6264. Would it meet your view if the clause provided that the current rate should be paid for competent men and women workers?—Yes—"competent working men and working women."

6265. It would be rather difficult in most districts to arrive at the current rate for women, would it not?—I daresay it would in places such as Crewe, where there might only be one workshop; but, still, in a town like Manchester, they could look after those things themselves.

6266. To go back to your minimum wage for a moment; would you have the same minimum wage all over the country?—I do not say that you could enforce that now, but I think if the Government set an example it would have its effect. Personally, I think £1 little enough for a woman to earn that has got any skill at her trade.

6267. Anywhere?—Yes.

6268. Would you fix the same rate in a rural district that you would in a large town?—In a rural district you would very rarely have much factory work, would you?

6269. Don't you?—In the South of England probably you may; but in the North they are mostly in the towns, and Crewe is a town.

6270. Still, you must assume the possibility of a factory being set up in a district outside a large town, must you not?—£1 a week would not do anybody any harm.

6271. (Mr. Black.) Do you mean that the £1 a week should be specified in the contract, or that it should be paid to the workers in the Government factory as an example to contractors?—That it should be paid as an example, for a start.

6272. Would you put it in the contract as well?—No; I should put it "the rate in the district." I think it would work up automatically. In connection with municipal work, people make inquiries what they are doing in other towns, and the thing works round. They tell you in Manchester, "Women do it for such a rate in London, and we cannot afford to pay them higher," and that sort of thing. I believe if the Government made a start the wages would go up.

6273. (Chairman.) The first thing you think would be to make the Fair Wages Clause cover women as well as men?—Yes.

6274. I should think it would probably be interpreted now as covering women as well as men?—I am afraid it is not.

6275. Do you know any case in which it has not been?—I have never heard of any case where there has been any worry about women's wages.

6276. If there was a complaint on a particular contract that women were not being paid the market rate of the district, do you not think that it would probably be held that the Clause did hold the contractor to pay that rate?—I do not know. I do not think that there has been much trouble about the women; the women themselves do not seem to have bothered.

6277. Then as regards the relative rate of women's wages as compared with men's have you anything to say on that?—I think that women should be allowed to enter trades in a legitimate way; just now they are not. For instance, to go back to bookbinding, they would not take a woman as an apprentice to learn bookbinding. My experience in Manchester is that they did not even think years ago that it mattered about the women being organised. And they never bothered about women at all. It was only when the women began to encroach upon what the men consider their work that they thought, "Well, women should be organised, and there should be lines of demarcation." They held conferences about keeping women out, and talking about women's work and men's work; and it is the same in most trades.

6278. Is there any organisation as far as women are concerned in the bookbinding trade?—There is a society of women in the bookbinding and printing for folding and sewing. The Bookbinders' Union, where they are strong, allows them to do quarter-binding, but in a place like Crewe, where there is a branch of Messrs. A.'s, employing about 200 women, the women do all the branches of the work, the bookbinding, they set the type—but I am not sure that they are on printing machines. Certainly they do all the processes of the trade, because there is nobody there to stop them. The wages are a little higher than in Manchester; but at the same time they are not getting the same wages that a bookbinder would be getting. I do not know whether they are doing all the work that a bookbinder would do throughout; they may be only doing part of the bookbinding, and there may be some work which they do not do.

6279. Where is this bookbinding union?—In Manchester.

6280. Does it include Crewe?—No. We are just organised locally.

6281. Is any large number of women in it?—Nearly 500, and there are not more than 800 of them in the trade.

6282. How many employers have accepted their rates?—The employers have an association, and there are very few outside, but those who are outside we have written to, and have got them to fall into line.

6283. Are all the employers agreed with this Union?—Yes; and they recognise the Union as being the only society to speak on behalf of the women.

6284. And they pay the Union rate?—Yes. But this only came into force a month ago. We have been agitating for a long time, but we have only just got it settled.

6285. You have got all the employers into it, you say?—Those that are not in it have agreed to give the rate. Their objection to being in the Employers' Federation had nothing to do with giving the advance to the women.

6286. And they are all paid the same rate?—Yes; 13s. is now the minimum where 12s. used to be.

6287. Even if a woman is outside the union, they would not pay her less than that?—No. We spoke for all women; we did not want to differentiate between those who were members and those who were not. We thought of raising the wages in the trade.

6288. If a woman comes and asks for work and offers to do it at a lower rate, would they refuse?—There would be trouble in the shop, I should think; the women would agitate about it.

6289. Then you have got a very satisfactory condition of things as far as that trade is concerned?—Yes. It is a beginning.

6290. Do you think it is going to last?—Yes. We want to try to get wages up higher still, because for the work they do, 13s. is not enough.

6291. You have got a large margin to cover between that and your ideal £1, have you not?—Yes.

6292. What are their relations with the men's union?—There is a friendly relation with them, but they do not work with them in any way.

6293. Do not these shops employ both men and women?—Yes.

6294. Do the men complain that the women are invading their province?—There was some trouble at one place where they said the women were doing work that should be done by the men, but there was some arrangement come to. I think it was over this quarter-binding work; they would not allow the women to do that. But that was before the women approached the employers through the women's union.

6295. They do not object to the employment of women in that trade, do they?—No. They object to women doing what they consider their work, but they do not mind the women doing the folding and the sewing.

6296. If the women tried to capture any of the work that the men are doing, I suppose there would be trouble?—Yes; the men would be up in arms at once.

6297. Is it the policy of the women's union to extend their sphere of work?—No, they have not discussed that at all.

6298. And they are content with what they have got at present?—Yes, they are at present. But there is no doubt about it, women could be bookbinders if they were allowed; it is not a question of their not being able to do the work.

6299. Would you say there is hardly any branch of the trade that they could not do properly?—I am of that opinion. If they were allowed the women could be bookbinders.

6300. Do you think that any limitation ought to be put upon women's opportunities for work?—No; I think women ought to be allowed to go into all trades.

6301. And do anything that they can?—Yes.

6302. At a rate of wages below the men's?—No. I think the women should do the best they can for themselves. The men are to blame really, because they have held women lightly in the past. They have thought women were not capable and it did not matter. They have never tried to organise women, nor agitated to get women's wages up, and now when they see that women are beginning to look after themselves, of course, they are up in arms about it. Certainly, I want women to get good wages, and I think women are capable of going into trades which they are now restricted from going into.

6303. But you would not claim on their behalf that they should be paid the same as men, I suppose?—Where they are doing equal work I should. If a woman was doing bookbinding throughout, I should think that she ought to have the same wages as a man; and then if an employer preferred a man, well, it would be a fair field, and no favour, and she would go.

6304. Would not the result of that, if you were able to enforce it, be that the employer would almost always prefer a man?—I do not think so. In the weaving trade, there are less men now working than there used to be, although they work at a uniform rate. The men and women are paid piece-work rates, and they work to the same price list, yet the men have decreased and the women have increased. That is so through sheer ability.

6305. The piece-work rates there are exactly the same?—They are exactly the same; there is a uniform rate for Lancashire.

6306. And the result of that has been that the men are decreasing and the women increasing?—Yes; so that the women have not pulled wages down there.

6307. Where wages are on a time basis, I suppose you would say that the woman's rate would certainly be lower than a man's?—It is now, of course.

6308. And probobly always will be?—I hope not when we get more equality between the sexes.

6309. Will you ever get sufficient equality to enable a woman to command the same time rate as a man?—I do not see why she should not.

6310. Would she do as much work in the year as a man?—That I do not know, but I should think she might. There are strong women as well as strong men.

6311. Perhaps the strongest woman might, but the average woman probably would not?—The trouble in men's trades is that you have the employers grumbling that the weaker ones do not keep up to the stronger ones, and the weaker ones go.

6312. You think it quite a safe policy for the women to be urging that they should be paid at the same rate as the men for the same work?—Where they are doing the same work, yes, certainly.

6313. And you feel quite satisfied that that will not be to their disadvantage?—That is so. I think it might in some trades, but still they would have to take their chance. It would be a fair way of paying people for their work. Take, for instance, the teachers and the women in the Post-office; where they are doing equal work with the men they should get equal pay.

6314. They do not as a matter of fact, now, do they?—I suppose not.

6315. You are quite satisfied that it will not tend to discourage the employment of women?—It might do so in some trades, but it would not in others. Certainly, there are not enough trades for women now; there are so many women unemployed, and so many women fighting for one job, that that has brought wages down.

6316. Would that not be rather an argument for their not holding out for the man's rate of wages?—No, I should not think so.

6317. If there is much unemployment among women, would it not be their policy not to claim a higher rate of wages than they can now get?—If wages get very low, they would soon have to work for nothing. There is so much machinery nowadays, and there are so many unemployed, that there is overproduction; there seems to be very much more made than people can buy. We are feeling the effects of that in the cotton trade just now in Lancashire, which is very bad.

6318. Do you notice much jealousy of the employment of women amongst the men's Unions?—I think the men take up this position—"A woman can go into any trade but my trade." A man in the iron trade was talking about women working in the iron trade, and he said, "I do not think that is a fit occupation for women; I have made clerks of my daughters." If you go to the clerks, they are full of trouble about the women invading their work.

6319. Do you think that jealousy is increasing at all?—I think they are very bitter against the women on account of their taking men's work. They speak of them as if they did it out of pure cussedness, and that was why they want to take the men's work. They do not recognise that the women have got to live, and that they have got to work to live.

6320. So far as the Fair Wages Clause in Government contracts is concerned, your suggestion would be, I think, that the current rate applicable to men should be enforced for women?—No—that the current rate in the district for women should be enforced in Government contracts.

6321. But I thought you were urging at the same time that the women ought to be paid at the same rate as the men?—When they are doing equal work, but I do not know many trades where they are doing so now—they are only doing parts. For instance, in brush-making, the secretary will tell you that the woman is invading their work, but only sections of it; the woman is not doing everything in the brush-making trade that a man would do.

6322. How do you think the current rate for women can be ascertained where there is no Union such as you speak of in the bookbinding trade in Manchester?—I think you might find the rate out in the nearest place where there was a society.

6323. Are there a sufficient number of women's societies, do you think, for that?—People are agitating and trying to get them into Trade Unions up and down; for instance, there is a society in Manchester, and a society in Liverpool, and a society in London—there is one in all the large towns.

6324. You will be satisfied for the present if the women get the rate current in their district?—Yes

6325. Have you anything to say as to the wages paid to women who are doing work hitherto done by men in iron works, foundries, and so on?—Yes I have got some figures here. In iron works, the women are doing painting, japanning, chain-making, lacquering, tinning, and soldering. This work used to be done by men for 16s. to 21s. per week, but the women get 13s. for it. They would call the man who was doing it a sort of handyman—a man in the position of a labourer; he would not be in a Trade Union.

They seem to have introduced women into these iron works to do this work, and I am told that the women have only been doing it for about four or five years. They started at 8s. per week, and they have now got up to 13s., whether their wages will advance or not I do not know, and I could not say that they do the same amount of work as a man.

6326. How have they managed to advance their wages so far?—Through the Trade Union.

6327. Is that a Union of their own, or of the men's?—It is the Machine, Electric, and Other Women Workers' Union, and it takes in women in any trade where there is no special Union for them.

6328. Where is that Union situated?—It is in Manchester.

6329. Is that able to enforce its rules and rates?—No. There is no understanding, because there are not many iron works in Manchester where the women are working. This is rather a large one that I am speaking of, and when we wrote for an advance of wages when the women joined the Union, the manager wrote back and said that these women had been set on as a trial and had been very satisfactory, and they were very good at their work, and all that sort of thing.

6330. That Union covers iron-working?—It is a Union of Machine, Electric and Other Women Workers. In the Union there are women employed at the linotype works, at the Westinghouse works, and at Mather and Platt's iron works.

6331. That is rather a miscellaneous Union, is it not?—Yes, it is.

6332. Is it a strong one?—There are about 150 members in it.

6333. How many employers is it able to affect?—Just three. There are not many women at the Westinghouse, and I do not think we could do anything at the Westinghouse for the members in the way of wages. There is a sick and out-of-work benefit attached to it, and, of course, if there was any difficulty with a girl—such as trouble about wages or that—we would see the manager about it. The linotype works had a strike, and they organised, and as to the wages there the women get, some of them £1 as a standing wage, and some 18s. a week. The standing wages are a little higher at the linotype works than at most places.

6334. Do they all pay your standard rates of wages?—Some of them. Some women on certain processes are getting a fixed standard wage of £1 a week, and on other processes 18s. A young girl will get 8s. when she starts, and it is understood that she gradually advances as she gets proficient. There is no understanding with the employer about the rates; but if there was any reduction offered, of course, it is understood that the Union would interfere, and when there has been any difficulty about the girls, the manager would see a deputation from the Union and discuss it.

6335. But they are practically able to secure the rate that they have fixed upon for themselves?—Yes.

6336. Have you got particulars of any more Unions that you know of?—I have some figures as to the work they do at the electric works. These girls are in the same Union. For polishing, drilling, lacquering, and armature winding, the young girls are getting 6s., and the older ones are getting 16s., and they say the youths and the men used to get at this firm from 15s. to 24s. There again I do not know whether they turn out as much work as these youths and men did. In foundries, the women are doing core making. I have not been able to see the secretary of the Core-makers Union, but the core-makers do not appear to object to the women. They are only getting 10s. a week, and there again they are just doing a little bit of the core-makers' work.

6337. They have just got their foot in then?—Yes.

6338. Are they content with their 10s.?—They could not get any more anywhere else; if they went to brush-making or shirt-making or to something else, the wages would be very low.

6339. Are there are more Unions that you know of?—The shirt-makers have a Union, and I believe that one of the firms in Manchester sometimes do Government work. I saw some of the shirt-makers there. They are not in the Trade Union at Smethurst's; they have not joined the Union. They said some of the work paid rather better than their ordinary work, and some did not pay so well. There again, if they had Government work, the Shirt-makers' Union would know what was a fair rate of pay for the work they were doing.

6340. Have you any idea what they are paid on that work?—No. They said the prices varied so—that they went up to 3s. 5d., and went down to as low as 1s. 9d., which is pretty low.

6341. What would that give them in a week?—They said they could earn, when they were on full time, about 15s. or 16s. a week; but they perhaps would not be doing Government work all the time—they would perhaps have only a day or two of that, and then would get some other kind of work; it was only when they got very large orders that they were.

6342. The general effect of your evidence is that the women are able to protect themselves pretty well, I think?—Where there is a Trade Union, they can protect themselves fairly well; but, still, women's wages, the wages that have been considered good enough for women, have been so very low, and it is difficult to get them up. Women have the ability, but they are not getting paid for their ability. Then I do not think the men's Unions have done anything to help them. Take, for instance, the bookbinders; they got advances for themselves before the women ever had any Union, and they never thought of taking the women along with them and getting another shilling for them. In most of the trades—though they have been so badly paid, and even where they are not organised—the women's work is so important that the men can do nothing without the women, and if the men have any difficulty they could not come out on strike without the women came out with them.

6343. Are there any Unions for women in the French polishing trade?—There is a Trade Union, that is, the men have a Trade Union, but they have no women members. We have just been trying to organise the French polishers. We tried it at Messrs. B.'s place. The women there do beautiful work, and their wages are about 16s. The secretary of the French Polishers' Union said they should have about a sovereign for that work. A cabinet-maker will often have just a little house and be doing work in it, and employ women French polishing. The women are entering into that trade very much. The men's wages are, I suppose, about 30s. or 33s.

6344. It is regarded as a suitable trade for women, is it?—I do not know that that has been discussed. A man would say that his own trade was not suitable for them. I think if a trade is not suitable for a woman it is not suitable for a man; I think it would affect a man just as much as a woman.

6345. Have you anything to tell us about the brush-making trade?—I saw the secretary in the brush-making trade, it would be about six years ago, about some business, and I was asking him about the women, whether the women were doing much of the work which the men considered their own. He said, "Yes, they were." I said, "Why don't you organise the women, and get them to work side by side with you, and go in for equal pay where they are doing equal work?" He said, "We prefer to ignore them." He would rather prefer to see the trade crowded out with women than take them in the Union. I saw him this week, and now they are having conferences and wondering what they are to do with the women. There has been a great change since five or six years ago, and one-third of the work is now done by women, and their wages average about 15s. or 16s. a week.

6346. They are extending their operations, are they?—Yes, into the different branches. Of course, there are still men brush-makers, but the women are doing different branches of it now. There is no doubt about it that women are more and more getting into trades, and the pity of it is that they cannot get a better wage for their work.

6347. Generally, I take it that there will always be a difficulty in enforcing a standard rate, owing to the number of women who are prepared to take up casual employment at a lower rate?—I have not come across any of those women. I hear people talk about the "pocket-money" worker; the people I come across are really obliged to work.

6348. Do you see no "pocket-money" workers?—I only hear about them. There are a lot of people who want to impress you that they are well off, and they need not work unless they like, and all that sort of thing; but it is all nonsense.

6349. Are there not many of them who work for a few pence a day, but not for the whole day, or who work for two or three days a week?—The only women of that kind I know are married women whose husbands have not a high wage. They take casual work in the bookbinding department. They are the only women that I know.

6350. And you do not think there will be enough of them to affect standard rates?—No, I do not think they are the important people.

6351. (Mr. De la Bère.) In regard to that latter point, do you not think there are a large number of girls who live at home and to whom the wage is not of first-class importance? The greater portion of the factory hands of Birmingham, we will say, do live at home, and perhaps their father is engaged at some trade, and their sisters are probably engaged in a factory; as long as they have sufficient, I will not say of pocket-money, but to spend on the little pleasures of life, they are pretty contented, are they not?—I have not met those. The people that I know are really obliged to go out to work.

6352. I do not say they are not obliged to go out to work—I think they are—but I think they are willing to work for rather less than they would be if they had to support a family?—I do not know that a woman would go to a place and say, "I will take 5s." if she knew the rate was 7s. What happens really is that if there is a reduction offered, these people that have comfortable homes say, "Well, a shilling a week less does not matter."

6353. But they will go to a place worth 10s. a week when others could not afford to go unless they had 15s. or 16s.?—I have not met those kind of people myself.

6354. You have not met them?—No. The women I know, even where they are comfortably off, have a feeling that they want to earn their living, and if they are not bringing a decent wage home, they are sneered at—"They are going out to work, and it is a nice wage to bring home," and that kind of thing.

6355. I do not say it unkindly, but do you think the bulk of the women really trouble themselves very much about what they do earn, provided that it comes, we will say, to about 10s. a week?—I think that women do not think seriously about wages, and how wages are brought down, and all that sort of thing; but I do not altogether think women are to blame for that.

6356. No, and I do not mean that; but in point of fact, you do think they do not think about it quite so seriously as the men?—Some of them do not, certainly.

6357. Do you not think one of the reasons is that very few of them think of spending their lives at the particular work they have taken up?—That might have something to do with it. But I do not think that they think about that so much as they used to do. I do not think women think about marriage as they used to do.

6358. You think that an increasing number really think about the trade that they are going to take up, and they expect to have to make their living at it all their lives?—Yes. If they give any thought to it at all, they know that if they marry a working man he is apt to be out of work at any time, and they would be thrown on the industrial market again.

6359. Is it only recently that you have had difficulties with the men's unions? Formerly, with women there was, was there not, a strong line shutting off women's employment from men's employment; some things were always considered to be men's and others were always considered to be women's, so there was not much comparison of wages, and the two sides did not come much into conflict with one another; but recently, I take it, the women have been encroaching on the men's domain, and hence these differences of opinion that you refer to?—My own experience is this: Supposing you want to organise some women in a trade, and you go to the secretary of the men's Union, if you went about ten years ago and you asked him, would he help? he did not see that it mattered, and you could not get the men in that place to speak to the women about joining the Union. The men that are in the Trade Unions, although it is their own women that are working in these trades, do not talk to their women about Trade Unionism and about serious things, else the women would be better organised and have better wages.

6360. Is not the reason of that that now you have actually come into competition with the men, and the father, we will say, thinks that he is in danger of being displaced by his daughter, or the husband by his wife?—He may think that, but it would not often come so near him as that.

6361. You have not heard of cases, for instance, where firms have been discharging men and have been taking on women?—No. I think that the introduction of women into these different branches of trade has been so gradual that even the men have failed to notice it sometimes, because the Brushmakers' Secretary said they were aghast when they had a conference and began to count up the numbers of women that were working in his trade.

6362. You say equal pay for equal work; are you really not afraid if that were adopted that the inevitable result would be that women would lose the work—have you no fear of that?—I think it is a fair way of doing it, whether the women lose the work or not. I think if women are going to enter into these trades they should enter into them on an equal footing.

6363. Would you, for the principle of the thing, be prepared to sacrifice the work, because that is what it comes to if you drive it as far as that—it may mean that women would lose the work?—I should say that they would have to take their chance of that. There are always the weavers to point to. The readers have not lost their work.

6364. That is rather a special case, I think, is it not? It does seem to me that supposing both men and women in the factory were paid the same, the average employer would say, "Well, when I employ women I am subject to certain disabilities under the Factory Acts, I have to take certain precautions, I can only work certain hours, I cannot work overtime, and that sort of thing, it will pay me better to employ men." Do you not think that is a danger?—It might be; but still I stick to my point. I think where women are doing equal work they should have equal pay. Besides, women might get the Factory Acts altered if they had votes.

6365. You apparently have something to say about the rates of pay paid by certain contractors?—That refers to Messrs. C. I just took the prices down as they were given to me. They have a place in London, and they employ 500 women on Government and railway work. The Government work that they do is policemen's garments, three kinds, top coats, serge coats, and tunics. A woman, for machining the top coat gets 1s. 1d., and for finishing 1s. 3d. It goes through the basting process, which is paid 8½d. for, and pressing 1½d. For machining the tunics they get 11½d., for finishing 1s. 5d., for basting and pressing 10d., and for hooking 2d. Then machining serge coats 1s. 4d., finishing 8d., basting and pressing 10d. Then embroidering inspectors' tunics 5s. 6d., and embroidering inspectors' serge coats 4s. They have to find all their own sewings, which cost 1s. for every 17s. earned. The wages on full time, that is when they are in full work, average 15s. per week, and in busy times 22s. has been earned per week working from eight to eight. That is the information I got.

6366. That is as regards London, but would you say something about Crewe?—This is at Crewe.

6367. I thought you were speaking of a London house?—No. They are a London firm, I said.

6368. What have you to say on these rates?—I showed the Tailoresses' secretary those rates, and she said the rates looked very well, but the wages did not look so well.

6369. The total earnings, you mean?—Yes.

6370. Of course, we should all be delighted if people could earn more than they do, but do you consider, as things go, that 15s. to 22s. is a bad range of pay?—Not as women's wages go now—certainly not, because there are plenty of women working in trades for 5s. and 6s. a week.

6371. You only quote that as an illustration of what things are now as compared with what they might be?—Yes.

6372. And you have no complaint to make on it?—No. This works out very well compared with the others.

6373. (Mr. Wilson Fox.) As regards Government contracts, you are of opinion, I understand, that where women are doing the same class of work as men, the Government should pay the same rates of wages?—Where they are doing equal work, yes.

6374. I will deal with the word "equal" in a moment. Where women are working at work which men are not doing, how should the Government fix the rate? I understand you would suggest, at any rate, that it should not be lower than 20s. per week, and that that should be the minimum?—Where the Government employed women directly?

6375. No. Suppose that a contractor, working for the Government under the Fair Wages Clause, is employing some women in a factory, and the men are not doing the same class of work, how is the Government to set about, under present conditions, to find out what those women ought to be paid?—I have mentioned that I would put a clause in the contract to the effect that working women should be paid at the rate of the district.

6376. In the first place, you say they ought not to be paid less than 20s. a week, anyhow?—No. I said that the Government might set an example by employing women directly, and giving them £1 a week.

6377. I beg your pardon?—I did not say that they should state it in the contract.

6378. Supposing they did not employ them directly, but they are employed by a Government contractor, and are not doing the same class of work as the men, how is the Government to set about getting at what their rates of wages should be?—If they put a clause in the contracts I should think the local people might look it up and make inquiries. For instance, at our Council in Manchester we would look into things of that kind. There is no clause now about women's wages.

6379. You are in a very busy industrial centre in Lancashire, but in many districts that is not so, and the women are isolated and unrepresented. How is the Government to fix the rate of wages in those places where the women have got no Unions; how should we set about it?—We, in Manchester, would do all we could in our district, and we would try and communicate with other people to stir them up.

6380. Should we, as far as we can, find out what is paid for analogous work—it would not be the same work, but something the same sort of work that men are doing?—For instance, if a man was doing a process for which he was getting 30s. a week and a woman was doing something ——

6381. Rather lighter, is what I meant——?—You would have to get the wages fixed, and I should say the women should fix the wages for the women—not the men, but the women for the women.

6382. Therefore, you think there is a disadvantage really in men and women joining the same Union?—I think where the men and women join the same Union the men look after their own interests and the women get left.

6383. You think their interests are not sufficiently identical to make it desirable that they should join the same Union?—No, because the men are bitter against the women for taking their work. They think the women have no right in a lot of the trades.

6384. You say equal pay for equal work, but you mean equal output—where it is proved that the output is equal?—Yes.

6385. It would be not the same work, but the same class of work?—Yes.

6386. And their output, where they are doing that same class of work, would be the same?—Yes.

6387. If they were paid the same rate for piecework, they would be paid according to their output, would they not?—Yes.

6388. But if they were paid on timework, you would have to make inquiry first before you fixed those time rates as to what the relative output of the man and the woman was?—In most places they have time sheets, and even if you get 4d. an hour you must turn out so much work in that hour. They know how much work you can do.

6389. At any rate, I think you have got, as far as I can understand, a pretty good idea in your own mind that a woman can do as much as a man on the whole?—I think if women were given opportunities, yes, they can—in some trades, of course.

6390. Anyhow, however that may be, you are prepared to take the risk?—Yes.

6391. On the other hand, from your point of view you do not want to have women squeezed out of doing work?—No. I think if women have fair opportunities they could hold their own.

6392. What do you mean by "fair opportunities"?—There is no trade that is really open to women throughout; the women have always got to do the poorer-paid parts.

6393. And generally the lighter class of work, I suppose?—Not always; I should not say that.

6394. You do not think so?—No.

6395. But, of course, there is some heavy work—you will admit that, will you not—that a woman could not do as well as a man; I mean in foundries and at furnaces, and all that sort of work?—I believe in some parts of Scotland the women are working in foundries and working where there are furnaces.

6396. Do you really think that it is desirable that women should be shovelling coals in front of a furnace?—I say they can do it, if they develop their muscles and work hard.

6397. In front of furnaces?—I think it is very hard for the men.

6398. I daresay there are some men who would like to stop at home and let the women go and work in front of the furnace?—I think if a man had a few years at home it would do him good.

6399. And get grumbled at when the woman came home from work?—No. The woman has not such a happy time at home—the working woman, I mean.

6400. As regards the Lancashire weavers, which you take rather as a test that the woman can do as good work as the man, weaving is work which women are particularly skilled at, is it not?—Yes, but they are not allowed to be spinners.

6401. Take the man; is he as good an operative, do you think, as some of the men in other classes of work in Lancashire?—Do you mean other classes of work in the same trade?

6402. No—other classes outside. Is he as good as the Lancashire coal miner, for instance. Is he as strong and as good a man, and is he as good a worker?—I should say that the coal miner is developing his muscles; I should not say you are developing your muscles weaving.

6403. Is the male weaver a fair type of a good Lancashire worker, do you think? Are you comparing with the best class of man when you are comparing with the Lancashire weaver?—Perhaps not. There are not many men weaving at all now in Manchester, and my experience is that they are rather slow and heavy, while the women are pretty nimble.

6404. I would much rather you criticised the Lancashire weaver than I; I only want to ask you your opinion as to the relative capacity of men and women in that particular industry?—Machinery has been speeded up. At one time with the man-worker the loom went pretty slow, and he would get into a sort of easy way; and probably when the loom was speeded up he could not alter his speed to the loom's.

6405. Of course, during the last 10 or 15 years women have become more educated?—Yes.

6406. And that is tending to make them a better class of workers, I suppose?—Yes, I should say it was; but they cannot get much technical education.

6407. Still, the mere fact of their being better educated makes them use their heads more and put more brains into their work?—Yes.

6408. Therefore it is tending in the North to make them most useful workers than they were?—Yes.

6409. Do you not think that a man able to pay rent and support a family has more incentive to press the employer harder to have his wages maintained and increased, than a married woman living at home, or his daughter, who has not got those obligations so directly upon her shoulders?—I do not think that that ought to have anything to do with it.

6410. Do not you think so?—No.

6411. And you do not think it has?—No.

6412. I am only seeking information. The wife's and the daughter's earnings are supplementary; the man is earning enough to pay the rent and to clothe and feed the family, it may not be as well as they would like, but he is getting enough, and he is bound to get enough to do that. The other earnings are supplementary. They make the family better off and make them more comfortable, but still it is possible that the family might do without them, while the family could not do without the man's earnings?—Still, if an intelligent woman is working all day, it is a shame to call her earnings supplementary.

6413. I do not wish to disparage them for one moment, but does not that element rather tend to make the women insist less—I suggest it has in the past—and to press the employer less than the men have pressed for a rise of wages, because there has been rather less necessity for them to press as hard as the men?—I do not think that the married men press any more, though they sometimes go in for advances through their Unions.

6414. But as a matter of fact the women have not put so much pressure on as the men?—Wages have not gone up so considerably of late.

6415. As a matter of fact, the women have not put the pressure on that the men have; the men have formed Unions, they have struck, and they have fought for higher wages, but the women have not?—They will do in the future.

6416. I am putting the question to you, why have not women done so? Is there any reason why the women have not fought like the men have in the past?—Because the women have not been considered very important people, and the working men have not considered them very important. They have held them lightly; they have had inflated ideas of their own abilities and their own strength, and they have rather looked down on the woman, and the woman in the end has got to think it was of no use, but she is beginning to think a little bit different now, I am glad to say.

6417. (Mr. Black.) You advocate the Government setting a good example as to wages, but are you an advocate of a universal minimum wage? You are not recommending that, are you?—No, because women's wages are so low now that I think it would be a shame to crystallise them.

6418. Perhaps putting something into a Government contract would help to crystallise them, would it not?—I have got the idea that if the Government paid good wages directly, that would tend to help us to get the women's wages up with the contractor.

6419. But you do not recommend prescribing it in the contract?—No.

6420. Because that would crystallise a low rate of wage?—Yes.

6421. You rather trust to your own efforts in that way?—Yes. I think the wages boards might be rather good in districts—they might be tried, anyhow.

6422. Do you know what is being done in other districts in the way of women's associations? Is your Manchester example spreading at all?—We hear about the Women's Trade Union League in London, and what they are doing, but we have not really much communication with them. You see Manchester is a big place, and it is a big job to organise the women there.

6423. You have got quite enough to do in your own district?—Yes.

6424. But you always think what Manchester says to-day England will say to-morrow?—No, I think not.

6425. Not in this matter?—No.

6426. (Mr. Hillier.) With regard to your claim for equal pay for equal work, of course you appreciate that if the output of a woman is less than the output of a man it would not pay the employer to give the same wage for the output of the woman as for the output of the man, because the establishment charges would have to be considered?—Yes. It would not be equal, would it, if the output was less—if the woman was putting out much less.

6427. You mean, provided the output was equal in an equal time they should be paid an equal rate?—Yes, certainly.

6428. You would differentiate between the weekly wage of a woman and a man on day labour, not on piece-work, would you not?—In all places where they pay day work or weekly wages they know what the output is, and it would just act in the same way, because where women are on a standing wage, and men too, they have time sheets, and they have got to put down what time is spent on every job. So they know exactly what work is being turned out. Therefore it would work just the same, I should think.

6429. I was referring to where women do, as it were, a section of the work; would you expect a woman to earn as much by the portion she does of that as the man earns who does the other portion?—No; the wages should be in proportion.

6430. Have you any idea of the ratio that proportion should be?—No, I have not at the moment.

6431. And you have not thought of it?—No.

6432. (Mr. Black.) If the employers had it in their own minds to pay the woman the wages they thought fit where she was doing the same work as a man, what do you think they would pay—half wages?—Supposing an employer could give a woman some branches of bookbinding he might give her another 2s. or 3s. a week, and the woman would consider that was very good, as she would be getting an advance in wages. Of course, if there was a local Trade Union it would be for the Union to look into that, and to see what work she was doing, and whether the Union thought that wage was sufficient.

6433. (Mr. Hillier.) What I really wanted to ascertain was whether you are of opinion that a woman should earn in the class of work that she performs as much wages as the men, though she is not doing exactly the same portions of the work, but sections of the work?—I am afraid I cannot quite follow that point; I am sorry.

6434. A woman is employed on a section of the work, and men are employed on other sections of the work; would you consider that that woman ought to draw as much wages per week as the man ought to draw for his work, both of them working the same number of hours?—If the man's section of the work was more skilled than the section which the woman was doing, I should say not.

6435. Or if it was a heavier class of work?—No, probably not.

6436. So there must be always, I think, a less wage paid to a woman than to a man, because a man naturally, by superior strength, would always be able to do portions of work that a woman could not do?—All men are not strong.

6437. That is so, but taking them as a whole, and as a class, a man is the stronger?—Yes.

6438. And he can do more, can he not, than a woman, as a rule?—Of course, I know there are exceptions, but, as a rule, he can do more?—Yes, speaking generally.

6439. That would cause, would it not, a woman's labour to be cheaper than a man's?—But she might get a little more than she is getting now.

6440. I am not speaking of that; I am only speaking of the equality of pay?—There might be cases where the woman was doing the heaviest work. If they had a strong woman and a weak man in the place, they would let the weak man do the lighter work.

6441. What I want to gather is how could we say what should be a fair rate, or the current rate to be paid for the woman's portion of the labour?—I do not think that you can do it in giving out contracts. It would have to be done more by local bodies. You could not follow every contract into the workshop.

6442. Therefore, the Government can only go to the local authorities, you say, or to the locality, to ascertain the rate?—Yes.

6443. And that rate must be the current rate in that particular district?—Yes.

6444. In our contracts it is so now; the rate of wages has to be the rate current in the district?—Yes, but my point is that women are not mentioned; it says "men," or "workmen."

6445. If women were included——?—I think that would help matters, but it would be as well to have the word "women" in.

6446. (Mr. Black.) It would strengthen your position if women were specifically mentioned?—Yes.

6447. (Mr. Hillier.) In regard to the brush-making the difference in the men's and the women's work is rather clearly defined, is it not?—The secretary said that the women had taken away some of the branches from them, but that in the heavier parts of the work the men were still doing it.

6448. You have not made any reference to home work, have you, in your précis?—No.

6449. What is your view on home work?—I think if home work was abolished such a lot of people would suffer, and yet I think that the work is better done in the factory. I have been into some of the houses where home work is done, and really it would be very difficult in many cases for the woman, as wages are now, to go out—it would not pay her to go out. Then it is the poorer class of work that is done in the homes, and the better class of work that is done in the factories, so it is the worst paid work that is given out.

6450. Then you would not recommend that home work should be disallowed?—No, I should not, because I am afraid it would injure so many very poor people.

The witness withdrew.

TWENTY-SECOND DAY,

Thursday, 21st May, 1908.

At 32, Great George Street, Westminster, S.W.

PRESENT:

Sir GEORGE H. MURRAY, K.C.B. (Chairman).

Mr. R. Bailey, M.V.O.
Mr. F. W. Black.
Mr. H. De la Bère, C.B.
Mr. A. Wilson Fox, C.B.
Mr. J. H. Hillier.
Mr. J. J. Wills (Secretary).

Miss Clementina Black, called and examined.

6451. (Chairman.) You are the President of the Women's Industrial Council, London, I believe?—Yes.

6452. Have you any experience of the working of the Fair Wages Clause in Government contracts?—I have not personally visited any of the employers, but my Council have experience of it, as you will see from the notes which I have sent in.

6453. But you have heard of the Fair Wages Clause, I suppose, and you have considered its operation?—Yes. We think, in the Council, that it does not operate much. Practically, we think that it does not operate at all among women, and I am here speaking of women.

6454. That is due, I suppose, mainly to the want of organisation among the women?—It is partly due to the want of organisation among the women, and partly, I think, to there being no machinery from above for carrying out the Clause.

6455. What the Clause binds the contractor to do is to pay the "current rate of wages"; and then the difficulty arises, What is the current rate, and how you are to find it out?—Yes. There is no established rate, of course.

6546. "Established" is not quite the same thing as "current," is it?—No.

6457. What is the practical difficulty in finding out what is the current rate for women's labour in particular trades?—There is a current rate in some trades. For instance, in the West-End tailoring there is a pretty well fixed rate of payment, but in the lower branches of tailoring—what is called the stock trade—there is not really a current rate.

6458. In what sense is there not a current rate? There are a certain number of women being employed upon it; do you mean that they are paid all at different rates?—In any one factory they would probably be paid, roughly, all at the same rate; but as between different factories there are very varying rates indeed. I am not speaking now of Government tailoring; but in the ordinary tailoring, within the last few weeks, I have had an instance of a woman who is paid half-a-crown for making a waistcoat, while there are other women living in the same street in which she lives who get, some 1s. and some 10d., for doing practically the same work. I have myself seen instances of as great differences as from 3s. down to 1s. for waistcoat-making. I do not say there were not slight differences in the work, but they were not differences enough to account at all for that difference in the payment.

6459. In fact, you could not bring all those rates together and compile a current rate out of them?—You would practically invent your current rate if you did.

6460. That difficulty is due, in your opinion, I gather, to the large variation in the rates paid for practically the same work?—Yes. That, of course, is largely due to the fact that there is not only no organisation among the women, but no habit of meeting.

Even if men are not organised, they do meet together more; whereas a woman, after her work is done, generally goes straight home and is not brought into contact with the women working in any other factory, and so the women do not know the conditions of the trade.

6461. Do you think there is also this consideration, which may have something to do with it, that a great many women do not take to their work seriously as their business in life, but come in, perhaps, for a few hours a day, or a few days a week, and are prepared to take almost anything they can get for that?—There is a certain amount of that sort of thing, no doubt; I think that unmarried women, for instance, do not expect to stay in the trade, and then, as a general rule, you will find they are satisfied if they get 15s. a week; but the large majority of them get a good deal less, and they complain of that.

6462. But they do not take any steps to get more?—I do not know how they could.

6463. I mean any practical steps?—Of course, there is a Tailoresses' Union, but it is not strong.

6464. Do you know of any really strong Union among women?—Some of the Unions in the North are strong; and the Shop Assistants' Union, where men and women combine, is very strong among the women; I could not tell you exactly the figure, but I think it is a Union which runs into thousands.

6465. Are they able, practically, to enforce their demands?—They have very largely enforced their demands, and are gradually working up to the special aim in their trade, which is not so much payment as conditions. The textile Unions are very strong, and they have enforced their demand for wages.

6466. May we take it that the tailoring trade is more unorganised than any other?—It is not more unorganised than other women's trades in London. Dressmaking is badly paid; underclothing is, if possible, worse; and boxmaking is, I think, distinctly worse. Roughly speaking, all these trades that do not bring people together in large numbers are unorganised among women. It is only when you get the workers thrown together in large numbers, so far, that women have been very successfully organised. A great effort is now being made, and women do seem to be very much waking up, and I think there is likely to be a great development in unionism among them; but it will take a good while.

6467. What you say points rather to homework as being at the bottom of it, does it not?—No, I do not think so. I think that the homework is no doubt underpaid, but I do not think it is more underpaid than factory work.

6468. In the factory work, of course, you do bring the women together, and I should have thought that would have had the effect you have described?—To some extent it does. It means that in any particular room or working-place it is difficult to pay any woman below the current rate in that room.

6469. It would not extend to the whole factory then?—In many instances we know it does not. I have had an instance within my own observation. There was a strike which happened in a shirt factory, and we found a difference of 50 per cent.—literally 50 per cent.—between the wages of one workroom and another. The women were doing identically the same work, the shirts were cut off the same piece, but they had no idea of this until the strike happened and brought them together, and then inquiry was made into their wages.

6470. They actually did not know what the other people were being paid?—No, not in any of the other rooms.

6471. Was that due to want of curiosity on their part, or was there any objection to it?—There is no doubt that, in some of the shops, shop assistants—and I am speaking here of a particular case—are told that they will be paid a little higher than others if they will hold their tongues—"Don't tell the others"—and there is some reason to think that many of them are told that who are not paid any higher than the others are.

6472. Do you see any practical suggestions that could be made for enforcing the Fair Wages Clause as regards women's labour more effectually?—If instead of a current rate there could be a fixed rate, that could be enforced. Our suggestion is that the example of the Canadian Government should be followed—they actually fix schedules of wages—and that women inspectors should be employed. Having a Labour Department they directed it themselves; but I should suppose that it would be a more proper plan to have representatives of the different Departments that are interested in the work forming a Committee.

6473. We have a Labour Department here, but I am not quite sure that they would undertake very willingly the task of fixing the minimum rate of wages for all Government contracts; do you say that the Canadian Government do it for everything?—I understand so from their reports.

6474. That is, every contract which is made with the Canadian Government contains what you may call a minimum wage clause?—Yes, that is so, evidently. In one particular instance, when the contractor refused to pay a sum which the Department decided was due, the Department deducted 16 dollars odd and handed it to the carpenter who complained.

6475. Is it the minimum wage which they fix, or is it the actual price that is to be paid for the work?—They fix a schedule of prices; but then, of course, their whole business is on a much smaller scale than that of this country.

6476. Are they piece-work rates, or time rates?—Those that I have looked at are piece-work rates, but I should not like to say for certain there were no time rates.

6477. Do you think that would be a practical measure in this country, with the very large amount of business that is done under contracts?—I think there are some trades in which it certainly could be done. I think it could be done in tailoring, because it really is not a very difficult thing to fix a log in tailoring. I say that because I happen to have been present when a log was fixed, when the County Council was considering the question of having its own workrooms. A log was fixed by the representatives of the societies, and, as I say, I happened to be present—I am sure I do not know why, for I had no knowledge of the subject. In three meetings, all I think of an hour each, a complete log for all the clothing—and it represented a very large range—was drawn up, and it was considered a satisfactory affair and to correspond—as I believe it did—to the payments made by private tailors.

6478. Was that on a piece-work basis, or a time basis?—Piece-work rates were fixed upon a time basis, reckoning that each piece of work took so long. That is the way a tailor's log is drawn.

6479. Does that make any allowance for individual variations of individual skill?—It fixed a minimum. Of course, the tailors are only too pleased if anybody can get anything higher.

6480. Does the minimum tend to be a real minimum, or an average, or a maximum?—It tends to be an average, as far as I can judge, in the tailoring trade, but I do not speak as an expert in the tailoring. It seems to me to be so from investigation.

6481. Do you gather that that would be generally accepted by employers as a good solution?—I think it would be accepted by the best employers with gratification. All the better-paying employers, who, I am sorry to say, have almost entirely given up the Government work, say, "We wish indeed to see that done, or to see something of the sort done."

6482. Perhaps the reason why they have given up the Government work is that the work has given them up?—That may be so.

6483. Owing to their rates being too high?—I do not think that, because they are the employers who do in fact pay the better rates.

6484. Quite so; what I meant was that their competitors contrive somehow or another to pay a lower rate?—Yes, they do.

6485. Does the Canadian system work well in practice?—Yes. You see that in all their Government contracts there is a clause preventing contracting ou' and a clause giving to the Minister of the Dep' ment the right to decide disputes—that is a r important point. Then there is a clause cor contractors to put up in all the work-places a schedule of prices, so that any worker knows whether he or she is being paid a fair rate.

6486. Do you think that is an important regulation?—I think it is very important.

6487. Do you think that their own power of seeing to their own interests is not enough without the publication of these rates?—You see that the workers have, as a rule, no notion that there is any such clause as the Fair Wages Clause. Some of the employers declare, as you will find in my notes, that there is none, and the workers have absolutely no knowledge of such a Clause existing.

6488. The employers must know it, because they sign a contract which includes it?—Here is a gentleman, the one to whom we have given the letter O, who said that there was no Fair Wages Clause, by which, I suppose, he meant that it enforced current wages, and there are no current wages.

6489. Strictly speaking, of course he is right, and there is no Fair Wages Clause, though it has been called by that name. Have you thought at all on the question of what the basis for women's wages ought to be?—My Council has put forward the statement that upon Government work it should be 4d. per hour.

6490. I was thinking less of the actual rate than of the basis as compared with men. Should they get the same wages for the same work done in the same time, or may they reasonably take something else?—In very few cases in the trades that I know do they do exactly the same work. In tailoring, for instance, a woman does not ever do the same part, as far as I know, as a man. I do hear that in certain East End shops she has to do what is called man's work, but as a rule, the woman merely puts in the lining and makes the buttonholes, and no man does that at all. So that in the tailoring, for instance, it does not arise; and in the embroidery, as far as I know, no man does the embroidery at all. Therefore, you do not get that position in those two cases. In some trades the women do no doubt perform the same work as the men, but those are not the trades about which we, as a Council, have any special knowledge. We have this feeling that the disputes about men's wages and women's wages very often are really due to the fact that a change in the method of manufacture is introduced. Machinery comes in, a woman is put on to the machine, and then the piece-work rate drops; but it generally drops very much more against the woman than against the man, and the chances are against her getting anything like the same wage that the man earns in the same time. We do feel that the drop is generally greater than is from any point of view equitable.

6491. How would you measure the equity?—I should be inclined to measure it by what an average worker can do in an hour.

6492. Male or female?—Yes, male or female.

6493. And then would you pay both of them alike?—I think, although in equity one ought to pay both alike, that in the present state of things it would be injurious to the women to pay them quite as much, because although many women are just as good workers, there is a tendency for women to be more irregular. Then also they will not, as a rule, take the full time of apprenticeship, because they do not expect to spend their lives in it. You see, if your working life is only going to be ten years, it is not worth your while to spend a long time at an apprenticeship; and they do not do it. One must recognise that difference. They are not there as permanent workers, and therefore, if any employer had to pay exactly the same rate to both, he would generally prefer to have a man.

6494. Do you think that in the interests of the women it is well to force up the rate of their wages as compared with a man's?—Yes; I think the trade would bear it in almost every instance.

6495. But the moment you get within a sensible margin of man's wages, would not the tendency be to drop the woman and to keep the man?—No, I do not think so, because the work is, on the whole, very much easier to her. I do not suppose that above a dozen tailors in London can make a buttonhole, and they certainly would not do it.

6496. But take the case of a trade where the competition between the two sexes is on more equal terms?—Like printing, would you say?

6497. Yes, take printing, for instance. Would the tendency be to exclude women altogether from that trade if you forced up their wages to within, say, ten per cent. of a man's wages?—No. I should think that would be just about the difference in the value of the work—I should think so, but I am speaking from my own judgment in that matter. I think in most instances that is about the difference, and that would not turn the scale.

6498. You think that employers would still be content to take women, if they were paid not more than ten per cent. less than men?—I think they would. Observation teaches us so. I am speaking now without having looked up the figures, but I think you will find that that is about the difference that occurs in the tobacco trade where the men and women do the same work.

6499. I thought the difference would be somewhere nearer a third?—And the woman only gets two-thirds? She has more than that in the tobacco trade. That is a well-organised trade, where the women are well organised—to go back to that point.

6500. Do you mean in cigarette making or in cigar making?—I do not mean in cigarette making, but in cigar making. The men and the women work together, and there is no formal differentiation; but they have quietly differentiated themselves. Very few women do the hand-made work; they can, but few do it They do the machine-made work, which is learnt quicker, and rather worse paid.

6501. We should then get some formula of this kind, that where women are employed they should not be paid more than ten per cent. below the current rate for a man; would that operate?—I think that would hardly operate; for this reason, that they would say "The men do not do this work, and there is no current rate for men in this trade." Most of the trades are so differentiated, you see. In tailoring they would say: "Oh, but that applies to a coat hand"—but the woman is not a coat hand; she may be a waistcoat hand, and so on. I am afraid that if you had nothing but the "current rate," it would be evaded, just as it is now. I do not think that it is possible to deal with the women's wages except by fixing it on an hour basis.

6502. It would become a good deal easier in proportion as they became stronger in organisation? — It would; and I believe it would really give an impetus to organisation, because they would see something directly to be gained by it if they had an organisation that could make complaints of infringements.

6503. Do you think you could always manage to exclude what I call the "pocket-money" worker?—It would not matter if it was on an hour basis, provided she took the line of only working for so many hours.

6504. But supposing she was content to work for a lower hourly rate?—Then it would be, you see, an infringement; the contractor who gave it to her would be infringing the Clause in his contract, and he would be liable to punishment. I do not say it would not be evaded, but I do not think it would very much.

6505. He would have to make out that it was a current rate, and if he had a sufficient number of "pocket-money" workers he would probably be able to do it?—As long as you do not keep a record of the wages fixed posted up it will always be evaded, I think; I do not see how you can avoid it.

6506. The difficulty is, is it not, that it will only be maintained as long as you can compel employers to pay it?—Yes; but I think if there was a fixed wage and a fixed schedule put up in the workshop, you would not find many workers at all willing to work for less.

6507. There is another way in which the employer might evade it, of course. He might put up this schedule for the Government work, and then he might employ his people part of their time on the Government work and part of their time on other work, and square his account by underpaying on the other work?

—He might; but at present he does just the contrary of that, and he pays less on the Government work. We know one instance where a man pays a lower rate on Government work, and brings up the wages of his employees by paying them on the work for private customers at a higher rate.

6508. Why should he put the Government work out at a lower rate?—The explanation given, of course, is —I do not know that it is true—that the contract rates are so low that he cannot afford to pay them more.

6509. But the price of the contract depends on himself and his competitors, surely?—No doubt. If his statement is true, what he has done is to undercut his competitors with the direct intention of paying his workpeople less. But, of course, his statement may not be true, and it may be merely a way of getting it out of his workers.

6510. But do you not think that there would be a danger in fixing rates?—I think there are many employers who would try to evade it—in any case, a certain proportion of the employers would; but I think if the workers had a standard fixed for them by the Government work they would be much more likely to object to doing the other work at a lower rate; they would feel they had a support, as it were, in this thing. Of course, I may be wrong in my judgment, but that is what I think would happen.

6511. You do not know of any case in practice in which that question has arisen, where an employer was found to be paying two different rates, do you?—Perhaps I can make further inquiries about a case which was reported to us, but I do not know whether I could trace it. It is the case I have been speaking of just now. I remember a very similar instance in regard to some cloth that was woven for the Government. It was reported to us—this is a good many years ago—that they had got by special leave a special extension under the Factory Acts to work late, in order to comply with the Government contract. The employer deliberately did all the private work in the hours allowed and did not do the Government work at all until the overtime commenced. That was the story as it was told to us. The women complained, and a deputation came up to the War Office. I think it was Mr. Brodrick they saw; I know we were with them.

6512. Do you think that the employment of women is extending in this country?—In some trades it is extending, but it is very difficult to say for certain in which trades.

6513. Still, they are capturing provinces that were formerly monopolised by men?—They no doubt are. For instance, in the upholstery they are gradually taking over all the sewing parts of the work; I think there is no doubt about that.

6514. Would you feel inclined to put any limit on the scope of their activities; or should a woman be allowed to embark on any kind of work that she thought she was capable of doing?—Yes, I think she should be. I should be sorry to see them go back to work in the mines, but I think as a general principle it is very undesirable to restrict them.

6515. Would you admit that the men have any ground of complaint, because work which they have hitherto done has been captured by women?—I think that they have a ground of complaint, but it is not because they are women, it is because they undersell them. That, I think, is the real ground of their complaint.

6516. And you think that so long as women do undersell them, that ground of complaint is legitimate?—I think it is very natural. Yes, I should think it is legitimate, because it means that the wages are being brought down. Take the case of clerks. We all know that the average wage of clerks in the City of London has been brought down to a rate which makes it very difficult for a man to live upon the salary of a clerk at all—simply because women are taking the work from them, they are doing it at least as well, and earn about a third of the men's payment. That, I think, proves it.

6517. Mainly, of course, because they do not want to maintain homes of their own, and they have not got families to keep?—I think in the particular case of clerks, the pocket-money earner is very much to blame. I think the majority perhaps of girl clerks are not living on their wages, and that they are living on their parents. But I do not think in the industrial world that that readiness to take a low wage exists in nearly so great an extent, unless among the very poor.

6518. They are more anxious to earn their own living, you think?—Yes; and then, you see, poverty presses more. In our special investigations into home-work, we have been surprised to find that the person who keeps wages up is the wife of a man in good work. Of course, that is not at all what we expected when we went into it, but that is the result of the personal investigation of 800 cases, 400 ten years ago, and 400 recently.

6519. She insists on a higher rate of wages for herself?—Yes. When the wages go down, she drops her trade and she will not work at it. Then also she does more per hour, which is rather curious.

6520. The married woman does?—The married woman in comfortable circumstances. It is no doubt largely due to the fact that she is better fed.

6521. On the other hand, the pressure of necessity is much less great upon her?—Yes; and, of course, one must put a little on the other side. No doubt in the ranks of the single and the unsupported would fall cripples and very sickly people, and they must be counted in. But it was proved to us most distinctly—and inquiries made in Scotland, quite independently, brought out the same result—that on the whole the worst-paid workers are invariably those who are dependent upon their work, because they dare not drop it. The woman who is not dependent on it will not submit to the worst conditions. That was not at all what I expected.

6522. It is certainly exactly the reverse of what I should have expected?—It was the reverse of what we expected when we went into it, but that is the result so far.

6523. Do you think that that tendency would be found very widely spread?—It is very difficult for us to say. Eight hundred cases, of course, are not enough to generalise upon, but certainly that was the result as far as our inquiries went.

6524. Where did you draw those cases from?—From different parts of London, in fact, from all parts of London. Our first report made ten years ago dealt with about 37 different trades, and our present report deals with, roughly speaking, the same number, but I am not quite sure how many. Every case was the result of personal observation. The second report came before me; it happened to be I who went through the cases for the drawing up of the report, and when one went through case after case and brought out the highest wages and the lowest wages, it was very remarkable how frequently it was the case that the worst-paid workers were those who were dependent upon their work.

6525. Had the age of the women anything to do with it?—Of course, the very old women, who are dependent upon their work, poor things, got the least of all.

6526. An elderly single woman could not probably insist upon as good wages as the married woman?—No; she seldom can. She is dependent on it, and so is afraid to change.

6527. Because, of course, she makes more of a business of it?—Yes. Then she generally works longer hours, and she is very anxious to do so. I know employers within the last year who are putting their work entirely into the hands of married women, because they say the married woman is a very much more steady worker, and she knows the value of money. That seems to me a very undesirable state of things.

6528. She earns the best wages?—Yes, she does.

6529. And she is the best bargain for the employer?—So he says. For one thing, he says, she does not want to go out and amuse herself; she wants to earn every penny she can for her children.

6530. What kind of trade have you in mind now?—It was in the box trade that these particular instances arose. It does not affect your inquiry.

6531. (Mr. De la Bère.) You made rather a point of the embroidery trade. I see, in your notes?—That was simply because we happened to have made a special investigation.

6532. I am rather glad of it, because the War Office, in which I am interested, has been investigating that trade during the winter. We went into it very carefully, and we found that it presents some rather difficult problems. I should rather like to know whether you consider that the wages in the embroidery trade compare favourably or unfavourably with those generally earned by women in London?—I think they are among the lower grade. I think, perhaps, that is the fairest way of putting it.

6533. You would put them among the lower?—Yes, on the whole. Of course, there are great differences, and the private embroidery trade—if you will forgive me saying so—is a very much better trade than the Army embroidery trade.

6534. That is a point on which I am very glad to hear your opinion. We went through, I suppose, eleven or twelve contractors, and we went through both the rates they paid for their private trade and the rates they paid for the War Office business, and it seemed to us that, comparing like with like, those rates appeared to be very much the same?—I think it depends really on the sort of private trade, and I was perhaps wrong to call it the private trade. I was thinking rather of the prices which are charged to officers for work; there is no doubt that they are charged very highly, and that the women do get better paid.

6535. Then, of course, church work, and that kind of work, is better paid?—Yes, that is a better trade.

6536. Comparing the average Government work with the average private work, we will say in worsted, it seemed to us that there was not very much difference?—I think that that is so perhaps now. When I first made an inquiry into this—which was a good many years ago—there was a very perceptible difference, and I am sorry to say it was distinctly underpaid, compared with such work as hotel work and railway work.

6537. I suppose you know that the War Office work now is comparatively small, owing to the adoption of metal shoulder plates, and so on; I put it to you, that really embroidery now is becoming extinct?—Yes.

6538. I think you agree—and certainly our investigations confirm it—that there is really no current rate at all in that business?—That is so; there is no current rate.

6539. That being so, the so-called Fair Wages Clause, or, let us say the current rate clause, does become perhaps inoperative?—Yes.

6540. Not, I think, from any idleness or slackness on the part of the department, but simply from the nature of things, it hardly applies?—No, it does not apply. Its history, perhaps, explains it. It was introduced, was it not, on the pressure of the men—the organised men, who had a current rate?

6541. No; I should say it was introduced in consequence of the Lords' Committee on Sweating, which I do not think came from the trade unions?—No, it did not 6542. Then another interesting problem which it presented was that this is practically entirely a homework trade, or very largely a homework trade, let me say?—I think you will find instances of a great many employers who used to have their work done in until within a very few years.

6543. Yes; but recently it is largely a homework trade, is it not?—Yes; but is that not solely on the ground of cheapness.

6544. I should have thought that embroidery was a trade which a woman could follow at home perhaps better than any other trade?—She can do it quite as conveniently at home.

6545. It is clear it does not require any plant, it can be taken up at a moment's notice and laid down at a moment's notice, and it can be worked at by the infirm, the crippled, and the various others who for several reasons cannot go into a factory. I should have thought that that was a good explanation of the strength of the home trade element in embroidery?—Yes. There is no reason why it should not be done at home at all, provided the women are properly paid.

6546. In many of our contracts—especially in those which relate to what we may call the sweated trades, such as tailoring, tent-making, the accoutrement trade, and all that—we insist upon all the work being done in the factory. We have not done that hitherto in the case of the embroidery, because it appeared to us that that trade was hardly ripe for it, and the investigations which we made in the winter rather confirmed that view. Would you consider that the introduction of a Factory Clause would be beneficial?—Personally, I should not say it was at all necessary, but my Council does not authorise me to say that, and I am speaking for myself in saying it. Personally, it seems to me that there is not necessarily any objection to home work as such, but there is always a danger of home work being introduced as a means of under-payment.

6547. The great danger of home work, I think, is brought out by the answer which Mr. L. in your notes gave to the investigator, namely, he "gives out all his women's work to a middlewoman, whose name and address were given"?—Exactly.

6548. That is a thing which with home work, practically, you cannot check at all?—It is very difficult to check, and, of course, it means that even if he paid a good rate he does not know what is the rate given to the actual workers.

6549. He takes no interest in his workers at all; he simply gives the work out to somebody who distributes it?—And you will observe that he was one of the men who did pay well when he kept it in.

6550. That is not said here; I am speaking of Mr. L?—I beg your pardon; I was thinking of G, who used to pay well and afterwards had taken to giving it all out. No; I do not think they are ever paid well under these circumstances.

6551. Another great difficulty that we found was that the worker's week was taken up with various items of Army work, which formed a very small portion of her total week, and then she did other work during the time?—Yes, that is the case.

6552. Consequently, whatever earnings we might hope that she would earn on the Army work formed no guarantee that her total weekly earnings would be at all what they should be?—That, again, is why we press for a piece-work payment upon the time basis, because it is only by that you can hope to pay home work properly.

6553. Then, as a further thing, it appeared to us that embroidery was entirely a hand trade, or almost entirely so, and was very much affected by the skill and quickness of the worker?—No doubt; but at the same time I venture to think that such embroidery work as I have seen—I have not seen any very lately—has been paid for at a rate at which even a quick worker would make a very poor living.

6554. A quick worker, do you say, would make a poor living?—I think so. I know an instance of a very experienced woman who has been in the trade a long time, who has been taking work just lately from a woman (who does not appear in the trade directory) at a rate that works out at about 2½d. an hour; and she is a skilled woman.

6555. We found the average earnings were from 15s. to 18s. for fully-trained women; there were some above, of course, and some below; but on the average we found that the earnings of a fully-trained woman on Army work ranged from 15s. to 18s. per week?—Those that I have seen have seldom come up to that.

6556. That was an average taken from the figures of eleven firms holding our contracts at the time. Another difficulty that we came across—and I should be very interested to know what you thought of it—was the very general way in which the apprentice system obtains in the trade?—I do not know very much about that, but we have heard complaints of it, and I do know that in other trades the use of learners to bring down wages is very frequent. The learner is trained, and as soon as she comes to the stage when she would be asking for an adult person's wages, she is sent away and a fresh relay taken.

6557. I have heard of that, and of course that is a thing which it is extremely difficult to check?—It is extremely difficult to check it, and it has been the ruin of lots of women's trades.

6558. They say "You are too slow for this trade; if I were you I would turn to something else," which is a very difficult thing to gainsay, is it not?—Very difficult indeed. They found in Australia that they checked that abuse by forbidding anyone to take a learner without paying her. You cannot now in some of the Australian states take a learner in any trade without paying her 5s. a week.

6559. Of course, that is only a question of degree, because your learner, if you pay her, costs less than the adult. Besides, we found they were being paid on the average from 2s. to 4s. a week?—But that covers the whole extent of their learning, does it not?

6560. Yes?—How long were they in the trade? It is not for me to ask questions, though.

6561. You are quite right; it would be anything from two to four years?—You see if the average represented 4s. in the fourth year an ordinary girl in her fourth year would, if she were on piece-work, be earning something like 10s.; so it is a distinct advantage to the employer.

6562. And it tends to lower the wage?—It does.

6563. That is what I wanted to know. You agree with that?—Yes.

6564. And you also agree, I think, that it is a sort of thing which a Government Department cannot check?—It could only check it, you see, if it were fixing a schedule of rates to be paid and fixed the rate for apprentices in their last year.

6565. Actually fixed the rate?—Yes. I do not believe you can deal with this problem at all except by fixing the rate.

6566. For that, I suppose, you would practically require legislation, would you not, rather than the action of a Government Department?—I do not know, but I do not think so. However, it is not for me to say.

6567. In this way—you could only fix the pay of the apprentices who are to be kept on Army work; I do not think you could say what the pay should be for them on private work?—No; you could not touch the private work.

6568. And as the Government work is only a fraction of the work done by these various people, that would not really have very much effect on their total numbers?—Except in the regard that the other apprentices would rebel if they found themselves paid much less.

6569. You think they would?—I think they would in some places.

6570. Perhaps so?—The apprentices happily are the most rebellious portion of the trade always.

6571. Yes, I think that is generally the case. Do you think that there is much danger at present of the women in the embroidery trade being thrown out by the introduction of machinery? It seemed to us that that was a danger, that if the wages were put up too high for women, machinery would be introduced which would practically throw them out?—If the machinery is really profitable it would be introduced, whether or no.

6572. Of course, if it is clearly so profitable that it is cheaper than the very low rates which are paid to women, it will no doubt be introduced; but it is conceivable that by moving in that direction of raising the rates, you may turn the balance against the women?—Personally, I am always inclined to think that if machinery is coming into a trade, the shorter the agony the better and the quicker it comes the better; but I think it is never worth while to keep a trade by under-paying the hand-workers; I do not think it is really profitable to the workers themselves.

6573. Taken as a class perhaps not, but for the individual it might be?—It is very hard on the individual, but I do not think that one ought to perpetuate under-payment on that account.

6574. (Chairman.) Half a loaf is not better than no bread, then?—It is better to the individual, but not better to the class.

6575. (Mr. Bailey.) In fact, they find other employment?—The old ones do not, the young ones do. Of course, there is always the danger that when you introduce machinery into an under-paid trade, the machine-worker is paid no better by the hour. If I may again quote the box trade, I have seen, this last summer, girls put on to the machine that puts in the staples—the corners used to be done in a different way by hand—and they are being paid for the full factory hours, some of them as low as 6s. a week; others of them, working on exactly the same machine, but in other firms, as high as 12s. a week. Unless something happens in the way of organisation to keep up those wages—which I am afraid will not—in the course of two years they will all be paid 6s., and that will be the current rate. I think that is the sort of danger that you will have to fight if the machine does come in, and if you want to keep up the wages.

6576. (Mr. De la Bère.) Then there was almost a unanimous opinion, in fact they all stated it, that they employ their better hands on the Army work on account of the very stiff inspection?—There is no doubt the inspection is stiff.

6577. Would it not follow from that that the better hands would draw the better rates of wages?—It does not always follow, you know, because it sometimes happens that the extra care that you have to take, occupies you so much longer that it does not really pay you better. We constantly find that the better-paid worker by the piece is not the better-paid worker by the week.

6578. At any rate, I gather that you personally would not consider it a judicious step to introduce a Factory Clause into the embroidery?—I should not; but at the same time I do say that not introducing it makes it much more difficult to inspect the trade.

6579. I do not propose to take you through the various cases of the contractors which you give in your notes, but I presume you would admit that the answers that they gave were not necessarily all Gospel truth?—Oh! dear no. Some of them were not true—at least, when I say that, I mean that the ladies who visited them were very much under that impression.

6580. (Mr. Bailey.) In regard to the stationery trades, we have had complaints, chiefly on the part of the bookbinders, I think, that women are gradually invading, perhaps, the less skilled portions of the trade and are ousting the men, and that the effect of the action of the women generally is to reduce the wages throughout the trade?—Yes, I believe that is the case.

6581. I take it you consider that is inevitable?—It is very difficult to check. I think it is regrettable.

6582. Does any step occur to you as being possible in order to check the reduction of wages?—If the women were thoroughly well organised it would be checked, and, of course, it would be possible—but I am not saying that I should advise it—if a schedule of wages were made, to fix the rates of women and also the departments of women. However, I do not know that fixing the departments of women would be at all desirable.

6583. That, one can conceive, might be attended with very awkward consequences now and then?—Yes, I think it might.

6584. Would the suggestion that was made just now, that women, taking it by and large, should be paid 10 per cent. below men's rates, meet it at all?—I think it would; but I must not be taken as agreeing to that on behalf of my Council. Personally, after a great deal of experience I think it would.

6585. You were talking just now about the box trade; I take it you mean cardboard boxes?—Yes.

6586. (Mr Wilson Fox.) I see you say in your notes that your Council cannot produce any specific cases of recent date in which the Fair Wages Clause has been infringed?—That is so.

6587. Is it because women have not got efficient organisations, such as the men have, that the cases are not brought before the Government departments, or is it because women are more indifferent to the pay they get?—They are not indifferent.

6588. What is the reason for it?—In the first place, they are not organised, so that they do not know to whom to complain; in the second place, they are extremely unaware—partly also because they have no organisation to bring it before them—of the fact that there is any such Clause—most of them do not know it; and in the third place, women are much more afraid of losing employment than men, for the very reason that they are lower paid. The worse you are paid the more afraid you are of losing half a day. I think those are the reasons.

6589. That brings it back to my preliminary point that they have not got the organisation. When men have got a strong organisation at their backs then they are not in such danger of being discharged, are they?—Not nearly; and then the women have not got an allowance if they are out of work.

6590. Exactly; that is what I wanted to bring out—the men have the organisations and the funds?—Yes.

6591. I see you suggest that a piece-work rate should be fixed upon a time basis?—Yes.

6592. You say that the real difficulty lies not so much in fixing the rate as in seeing that the rate is enforced?—Yes, I should think that is so.

6593. I should have thought there was considerable difficulty in fixing the rate?—The men have not found it so in most of the trades.

6594. But the men find there is a difficulty in fixing the rate in the country districts. Supposing a firm goes out to a country district, where there is no rate?—Most of the big Unions have country rates, have they not?

6595. Some of them?—Which Unions have not? The printers have, I think.

6596. Take the printing trade?—They have, I think.

6597. They generally have got a rate in towns, and the men would like a town rate to be paid, say, in the rural districts of Suffolk. They have no rate for such districts in Suffolk; nor in Essex or Norfolk. Supposing that a printing firm goes into the rural districts of Norfolk, the question arises there, What is the current rate?—I suppose the reply of the Union would be that it would be the usual country rate; and they have a country rate, have they not?

6598. No. The reply of the Union would be that they would like the rate of the nearest town?—No doubt.

6599. And the reply of the employer to that would be that he is entitled to set up what, in his opinion, is a fair rate?—I think that is only saying, is it not, that the organisation is not yet perfectly complete, even in the strong trades.

6600. Quite so; but that is what I say, that owing to the incomplete organisation there is no agreed rate. Now, in the case of the women there is very much less complete organisation? — There is no organisation, roughly speaking.

6601. I am only taking your suggestion here, and putting it to you that there is a considerable difficulty in fixing the women's rate?—There is an immense difficulty in fixing a current rate, because there is no such thing; but it is not a difficult thing, I venture to think, to fix a fair minimum.

6602. I see your minimum—I do not say that it is unfair or fair—works out at about 18s. a week?—Yes.

6603. Now, that would be considerably higher than is at present paid, if we are going to apply it to the town and to the country; it would be a very considerable rise, would it not?—We are not speaking for the country. The Women's Industrial Council only represents London, you see, and so we are speaking for London.

6604. Are you only speaking for London?—Yes.

6605. And not for any other town or district?—No. Our work is confined to London, and we do not permit ourselves to speak for elsewhere.

6606. I did not appreciate that the whole of the paragraph in regard to the fixing of the fair rate of wage applied simply to London; but still, 18s. a week, applied as a minimum or even as an average, would entail a considerable rise, would it not?—Yes, I hope so—in fact, I mean, I know so.

6607. Then you are in favour of paying piece-work rates to women?—In some of the trades a piece-work rate is invariably paid, and there are some trades in which it is inconvenient to pay time-rates. It is always inconvenient in the case of home-workers, and you cannot pay a time-rate to home-workers; and where the work sometimes goes home and sometimes is done in factories, you must have a piece-rate.

6608. By paying it according to piece-work there is less danger of women being squeezed out of a trade if the wages are raised, is there not, than if it were paid according to time work?—I do not think it makes much difference.

6609. Supposing the women are paid by the piece and the men are paid by the piece for the same class of work, then they are both paid according to output?—But they are not paid at the same piece-work rate.

6610. No, but we have had demands made here in this room that the women and the men should be paid the same rate of wages for the same class of work?—Equitably they ought to be, but we say there are great drawbacks in their being paid so at present.

6611. Is one of the drawbacks the possibility of women not being employed at all?—Yes, exactly.

6612. On the ground that their output, year in and year out, is not usually as much as the men's?—I think the real difference is due much more to the fact that the employer does not look upon them as permanent workers, and therefore does not consider them as so profitable. I think it is more that really.

6613. You refer to the Canadian Department of Labour in your notes, and you quote their requirement that "a statement of the rate of wages which they agreed to pay to the workmen to be employed on the work in the event of the tender being accepted" should be submitted with the tenders?—Yes.

6614. Is that what you suggest should be done here?—We suggest that some such method should be adopted—that there should be a rate fixed by the authorities, and that that rate should be known to the contractor before making the tender. That is the sort of line we suggest should be followed. I do not know that we want to suggest the details of the way it should be worked out; but that is the principle.

6615. The contractor should be informed what the Government Department consider to be a fair rate; is that what you suggest?—Something of that nature should be done, so that the contractor should know roughly what he has got to pay, or what he will be expected to pay.

6616. But that practically would result, do you not think, in the Government fixing the fair rate of wages?—Yes, it would. That is what we wish to see.

6617. You wish to go so far as that?—We do—a minimum rate, at any rate.

6618. Do you not think it would be sufficient if the Government, having ascertained what the fair rate was, or what the current rate was, were to call for tenders without informing the tenderer what they consider a fair rate? They could reject it for any reason they liked then?—Yes, but it is very difficult to know what are the different considerations upon which a man would base his tender, and how far the element of the wages he is going to pay enters into it. I do not know how far it would be possible without having some statement of the wages to know whether he could do it, or whether he could not do it. We got some very interesting facts about a man who since has had to go out of the business. He did not really understand the trade, and he used to give a tender gaily on what he thought was suitable. Then he found that he could not pay the women properly on it, and he lost heavily.

6619. I can quite understand that the Government can ascertain what a current rate is—that is a question of fact—if they take a sufficient amount of trouble; but it is a very different thing for the Government to say what is a fair rate?—Yes, it is.

6620. After all the Government are not experts in the various trades, and the employers might very well say the test of what can be paid is what is actually paid by a certain number of firms, possibly the best firms. It would be a considerable responsibility for the Government to say that, while no firms were paying a certain rate, that rate would be a fair one?—I do not think it is so very difficult to fix something approaching to a living wage, at any rate. For instance, the proposals in regard to old-age pensions seem to indicate that 15s. a week is regarded as about the lowest rate on which a person can live, even in old age. It would certainly be within the powers of any Government Committee to reckon out what that would run to by the hour, and to fix the minimum according to the work of an average worker in each department. Of course, your sole point of difficulty lies in getting the average worker.

6621. The Government might, of course, take the responsibility of saying that no trade should exist in this country which did not pay, say, £1 per week, and if they could not afford to pay that the trade must go; but it would be a considerable responsibility to take to fix a rate of wages that was not paid by any firm at all—a higher rate than was paid by any firm—and to call that a fair rate?—I think that to call a thing a fair rate, you would have to go back to some extent into the cost of supporting the worker, would you not?

6622. You would have to take as one element from an employer's point of view what is actually paid in the trade, and if you found even two firms in a trade paying a certain rate, you could take that as a proof that it is possible to make a profit and pay that rate?—Quite so.

6623. But supposing you go beyond that, and simply take as your standard what a person can live on decently in London, then it is possible you may fix as what you may call the living wage what is not a wage which that trade can pay, that is to say, the trade would not live if it paid it?—That no doubt would be true as far as regards private trade, but when it is the trade of the Government, do we not fall into rather a different state of things?

6624. It is not the trade of the Government?—It is their work.

6625. It is merely that the Government is employing a contractor?—Still the person who pays is in the last resort the employer, is he not?

6626. Yes?—It comes to this; do you take the position of saying, "Here is this great and rich country, which is not bound to make a profit on what it is doing, and yet it is consenting to pay at a rate upon which its people cannot live"?

6627. I am only putting to you the possible difficulties of Government Departments in dealing with questions of wages paid by contractors; do you think the Government can ascertain as a matter of fact what a current rate is?—Can it?

6628. When you come to the question of a fair rate it is extremely difficult for the Government who are not engaged in the particular business themselves, to ascertain what a fair rate is if a standard is not taken based on what is actually paid by some firm or another?—I venture to say that neither the Government nor anyone else could in most of these trades find out a current rate, because no current rate exists.

6629. That would be so in certain trades, but do you not think in the majority of trades in this country it is possible to find out what the majority of the people are paid in the industry?—In the women's trades I do not think it is.

6630. Do you not think it would be more difficult to say what is a fair rate than what is a current rate?—Not in the least. It is very easy to find out what is the lowest rate that it would cost to keep a person.

6631. That is not of course looking at it at all from the point of view of what it is possible for a trade to pay and keep going?—Yes, but there is a certain standard of actual necessities in the way of food and lodging and so on, the rate of which can be ascertained pretty easily in London.

6632. I quite agree with you that it is fairly easy to ascertain the cost of living in London; the difficulty I see is for the Government to ascertain whether a particular trade can pay its employees a sum sufficient to maintain that standard of living, and yet for the employers to make a sufficient profit for themselves to make it worth their while to continue in business?—It may be difficult, but I think it is less difficult than to find out a current rate.

6633. (Chairman.) Do you see any difficulty under your scheme in fixing different rates for different parts of the country? I am thinking, for instance, of a certain contract which is tendered for by people in London and people at Aldershot; if you prescribe a certain rate for those two you will probably be making a mistake, will you not?—Yes. Aldershot is probably in a very unusual position, because if it is a women's trade——.

6634. Yes, it is?—That means that the women are the subsidised wives of the soldiers, and from our point of view it is not a right thing to be paying those women below a living rate because they are subsidised.

6635. Would you face the exclusion of those women altogether?—No. We should insist upon their being paid by the hour at a fair rate, whether their husbands were being paid or not. We should be inclined to say that the Government ought not to pay a parasitic rate of wage. That would be the line I think we should take on the Council. I think the Government especially ought not to do it as compared with the private employer, because it is not pressed commercially in the same way. It is not a question with a Government Department of whether it can make a profit.

6636. Apart from the peculiarity of Aldershot, it is easy to see that you might have good reasons for having a varying rate in different parts of the country?—Yes, and I should think there should be a varying rate.

6637. But how can you manage that, practically, in issuing tenders, which may go to people in different parts of England, Ireland, and Scotland? You could not have a uniform rate, it is clear, for all those. For instance, there is a large clothing factory in Ireland, as you are probably aware?—Yes.

6638. Are they to be expected to tender at exactly the same rate as a clothing factory in London?—What would happen if they did? Let us consider. It would happen that their employees would make more profit upon a contract than they would if they lived in London. That would be all, would it not.

6639. One result, I suppose, would be a tendency of the workers to collect in that town?—It would intensify a tendency which does exist—on the whole, a very beneficial tendency—to take the big factories out of London. I think that would be the only very serious result.

6640. But you might be dislocating labour rather seriously, might you not, by forcing terms which are not natural? You might be compelling an employer in a particular part of the country to pay what is considerably above the real market rate, even on the basis of a living wage?—I think that is so. You would, if you fixed the rate, have a much greater difference between the Government rate in the country and the Government rate in the town; that is certainly so. Then, of course, the Trade Unions do aim at having different rates, although it is quite true that the Unions would like to fix the higher rate all round—that is not unnatural, but there is a special reason for that. I do think that the difference should not be so great as at first sight appears right, because if you make it very great you tend to draw the country people into the town, which for other reasons is undesirable, so that the difference should be slight, I think. I would make the difference as little as you can; I would not upset things, and you must make a certain difference. The difference must not be so much in favour of the town that you would draw in the country people; and if it is rather in favour of the country, so that you drive out the town people to a slight extent that is not nearly so serious.

6641. All those difficulties make it rather an alarming task, don't you think?—They do make it difficult.

6642. (Mr. Black.) Do you think in the trades that you are acquainted with the firms can be fairly classified on the basis of the wages as fair and unfair—I mean in the way that Trade Unions try to classify them?—Yes, only much more roughly; the demarcation is not so strong in London.

6643. Is it strong enough for a Government Department to find it out, and only to admit the fair wage-payers, and to exclude the others—because that has been advocated?—I think that would be very difficult, and I think it would be apt to lead to misunderstandings.

6644. Do you advocate as a principle that a Government Department should try to find out whether a firm that applies for admission to this list pays fair wages on its ordinary work?—I do not think that; but I do think it is desirable that the Government should give its work to the better-paying firm.

6645. Would you exclude a firm that does not pay fair wages on its ordinary work from the Government list, or would you admit it in the hope of levelling it up by means of the Government clause?—I am afraid I have not very carefully considered that point, indeed, I have not been in a position to; and I should be sorry to say definitely I would not put it on the list without thinking a good deal more about it.

6646. It is a point of importance?—It is a point of considerable importance, but it is not one that I have thought very carefully about, because it has not practically come before me.

6647. It has been urged upon us as a principle that a Government Department ought to act upon, and I put the question to you particularly, because I rather thought you said that if we fix Government rates in the Government contracts that would have a good effect upon the rates for private work, because it would set up a standard?—It is my impression that it would, certainly.

6648. So that you would, if anything, be inclined to put the bad firm on the list of contractors, but insisting, if they got a contract, that they should pay fair wages for that?—Yes.

6649. In the hope that it might be a good example?—I think that would be the line I should take, but I should not like to answer hastily without thinking a good deal more about it.

6650. Supposing we had this fixed rate for Government work in the contract, when the Government work was finished and slack times came, what would be your attitude towards an arrangement between the employer and his workpeople for temporarily lowering the wages rather than losing certain work altogether?—Our experience is dead against the lowering of the wage. We feel that the Trade Unions are right in the line they adopt—short time, but not short wage. You see if you once lower the wage it is awfully difficult to get it back, but if you work short time, when the trade is full again the men work full time, because the employer wants the work done, and the wage is untouched.

6651. Equally, if you let the work go it is difficult to get it back again, is it not? The work may go right away, perhaps out of the country?—That is not so much a question of slackness as a question of change of trade altogether, is it not?

6652. Perhaps it is?—I think a man who is in an ordinary trade, in the tailoring trade, for instance—and all the tailoring trades are slack at certain seasons—ought to be able to meet that difficulty. On this point I think I might add that the Government might be really very helpful to the tailoring trades if it could arrange its contracts so as to cover the slack time.

6653. The slack time being?—The winter months.

6654. I think we have had that, too, discussed here?—Yes, I expect that has come before you already. I can say of my own experience that the amount of suffering in the tailoring trades owing to the long slack time is very serious indeed, and it is not counterbalanced by the frightful drive in the busy time, which is intensified, of course, because then the other work comes on too.

6655. I suppose in your investigations you never came on a case where better wages were paid on Government work than on private work, have you?—I think we have. I cannot fix on one at the moment, but I believe that is so, in fact, in my notes I mention the case of a man (C) who says he pays 8d. whilst somebody else pays 7½d.

6656. I think at some of the factories who work for the Government as they know that they are likely to be inspected they therefore put some of their most skilled workers upon it?—Yes, that is the case.

6657. And the wages on their wage sheets show that they are earning a little above the average of the men on the other work?—I should expect that to be so, and I believe we have had a case or two, although I cannot give any at the moment.

6658. In the big factories they are liable to inspection, and have regular wage books, and so on?—Yes.

6659. Are you advocating that Parliament should fix a minimum wage at the present time?—In certain trades I certainly am.

6660. You do not think it would tend to stereotype a low rate of wage at the present time?—I think if it stereotyped even a low wage that would be rather better than the average wage of the woman worker in in those trades.

6661. Then you would have to trust to Parliamentary action rather than to the Union of the workers to bring that wage up?—No. My own feeling is this—of course, this is a little off the present inquiry——.

6662. Yes, I understand, but I should like to hear you?—What I feel is this, that while the women are so very poor and so very wretched, they have not got the energy or the hopefulness to organise. Below a certain level of wages you cannot get organisation, at least that is our experience, and if once you get them a little better paid and not pulling one another down by absolutely unrestricted competition, then they look round and begin to organise. I may say—this is still a little off the subject—that after the Sweated Industries Exhibition it was very curious to observe how the women who had been better paid at once began to feel things all the more as soon as they went home.

6663. (Mr. De la Bère.) As an alternative to the Government fixing a fair rate of wage, how would the following plan strike you—that the contractor in sending in his tender should send in a schedule of the wages he proposes to pay, and the Department in considering the tender should consider the wages and the rates, and if they seem generally satisfactory should pass them. That would get over the difficulty of difference of locality, I think?—It would certainly be a step in the right direction.

6664. Of course, there would still be the fact that the Government would virtually be endorsing the rate paid, and it would be open to that objection, but I think it would get over the difficulty as to locality?—I think it would.

6665. Because the Government then would not have to fix a uniform rate?—That would be so.

6666. Do you consider that would meet your object?—I think it would certainly go some way towards meeting it, but it would not be very satisfactory unless someone were employed to see that those rates were enforced.

6667. That, I think, is done now. I notice that in some of the embroidery cases mentioned in your notes the contractors are under the impression that no steps are ever taken to see that the Fair Wages Clause is enforced; I think that probably the reason why it has not been brought home to them quite so much as it has in most other trades is that the women do not complain?—That is so; they do not complain.

6668. In the men's trades we get complaints and we investigate them?—Do you not think that as regards the women's trades in the present state of things it would tend to be inoperative?

6669. Yes, I do; and that is why during this winter we have, among other things, looked up the embroidery trade. There is just one other point, and that is in regard to Aldershot, which was mentioned just now as rather exceptional because of the subsidising?—Yes.

6670. Is that not the very point which is at the root of the difficulty of all women's labour — that it is largely subsidised?—It is partly at the root of it; but not entirely, I believe.

6671. Either the woman goes out as a charwoman, or she is living at home with her father or with her husband, or she has some other little industry of her own?—There is a very large number of women who really take their trade seriously, and live by their trade.

6672. Are not their wages brought down by the others?—They are to a certain amount, by that competition.

6673. So that the question of subsidy does very largely enter into it?—I think it enters into it less than would be supposed, except in certain branches. In what might be called the more or less genteel departments, it enters much more than it does in the really industrial work, I think.

The witness withdrew.

TWENTY-THIRD DAY,

Thursday, 28th May, 1908.

At 32, Great George Street, Westminster, S.W.

PRESENT:

Sir GEORGE H. MURRAY, K.C.B. (Chairman).

Mr. R. Bailey, M.V.O.
Mr. F. W. Black.
Mr. H. De la Bère, C.B.
Mr. J. H. Hillier.
Mr. A. F. King.
Mr. J. J. Wills (Secretary).

Mr. George Laurence Gomme, called and examined.

6674. (Chairman.) You are the Clerk of the London County Council, as we know?—Yes.

6675. The Council has had considerable experience of the question which we have to consider of enforcing fair wages, I believe?—Yes, a very considerable experience.

6676. I gather, speaking generally, that the line you have taken is, besides compelling the contractor to pay the rate of wages which is current in the district, to go further than that and to schedule to every contract, I think, the rates of wages and the hours of labour for every class of labour employed under it?—Yes. We have done two things. Where there are Trade Union rates of wages, we have compelled the contractor to pay those rates of wages and observe the conditions; and where there are no Trade Unions, then we have compelled him to pay the wages and observe the conditions of labour current in the district at the time of his tender.

6677. You have gone even further than that, have you not? As I understand, you have actually prescribed in so many words the rates of wages and the hours of labour for every class of labour employed under the contract?—We have asked for a schedule to the contract of the rates of wages and the rules which the contractor is prepared to pay and observe.

6678. I see; you do not prescribe them, but you ask him to state them?—We ask him to state them.

6679. Will you refer to the table on pages 16 and 17 of your Report on Fair Wages and Hours of Labour; that is not scheduled to the contract, is it?—This is a list showing what the Council pays in its own departments to its own employees. Perhaps I might read the heading to our List of Rates of Wages and Hours of Labour: "The rates of wages and hours of labour set forth in part I. of this list are paid and observed by the Council in works which are in the nature of construction or manufacture, and which the Council may resolve to carry out without the intervention of a contractor on a site wholly or partially within a radius of 20 miles measured in a straight line from Charing Cross."

6680. When a tenderer sends in his tender, does he state in the schedule to it what he is going to pay?—He is bound to adopt this schedule, because this schedule is made up from the Trade Union rates, or, if there are no Trade Unions, the ascertained agreement between the employers and employees. This, you will observe, is for work done within a radius of 20 miles. Beyond that, we ask the contractor to fill in his own schedule of the rates of wages that he pays. I have an instance here in one of the contracts where the first part of the schedule is the schedule to which I have just now referred, the second part of it being headed "For all work done outside the site aforesaid"—that is a site within the 20-miles radius—"and a radius of 20 miles measured in a straight line from Charing Cross, in the County of London, namely, at ..." —and here he gives the name of the place—"where all work not done on the site or within the radius aforesaid is intended to be done." Then there is a schedule in which the contractor has to fill up the hours of labour per week and the rates of pay which he gives.

6681. Does that cover both skilled and unskilled labour?—Yes.

6682. Have you covered all trades in the same way?—Yes.

6683. I imagine that where you have organised trades and associations of masters and men, there is practically very little difficulty in enforcing this clause?—No. Those cases, of course, give us very little trouble.

6684. Now, when you come to deal with unskilled labour and unorganised labour, do you not find more difficulty there?—We have found very little practical difficulty, I think. Taking the largeness of the subject, I think the Council has had very few cases of real difficulty.

6685. When the contractor sends in his schedule, does that go before the Council?—It goes before the committee. All the tenders are sent to the committee for examination, and the committee in considering the tender, of course, has consideration to the schedule as part of the conditions of the new contract.

6686. What steps do the Committee take to satisfy itself that the rates which the contractor quotes are fair?—Different practices obtain according to the circumstances. It is generally referred to the engineer if it is an engineering matter, to the architect if it is an architectural matter, and, in fact, to the expert official, to give his opinion to the committee on the matter. We do not make any inquisitorial examination, but professional men know how to advise a committee on matters of that kind. If there were a serious item, of course, they would draw the attention of the committee to it; but if the arrangement seems to be reasonable, and there is no reason to doubt the contractor doing what is proper in accordance with his contract; they would have no occasion to do so, of course.

6687. Take, for instance, a case like this: Take the lowest form of unskilled labour that he employs, and say he puts down 6d. an hour for that; how does the Committee satisfy itself that 6d. an hour is the proper rate in that particular district?—I do not know that it would satisfy itself that that is the rate in that particular district. We should rely upon the complaints that were made to us. If the contractor stated that that was the rate in the particular district and it was found not to be so, we should soon have a complaint. The lists that are in the contract are known to the men.

6688. Of course, the rate for that kind of labour must vary in different parts of London?—Not in different parts of London, surely.

6689. Would you not find a different rate, say, in Tottenham to what you would at Norwood?—Tottenham does not happen to be in London, though it is within the 20-mile radius. I am hardly able to give an opinion on that, but I should say it would not be so on the whole. A large number of workpeople at Tottenham come to London to work; so it is practically a part of London.

6690. I think the Government has found a certain amount of difficulty in that kind of question, and it is nearly always with the unskilled labour, which, of course, is not organised at all. There is a good deal of difference of opinion about what that class of labour is getting in any particular neighbourhood. Woolwich, for instance, differs from Tottenham; and that, again, from the West of London and the South. But you have no experience of that kind of difficulty apparently?—Not on that point. The contractors have put in their figure, and we have not had very serious complaints. Of course, we have had difficulties, but they have not been very serious.

6691. You do not really criticise very much the figure that he puts in, but you trust to complaints being made if it is not sufficient?—I would not say we did not criticise it. If it were an obviously small amount, the probability is that the Committee would not give the contract to that tenderer—I mean, if a contractor put in 5d. when it obviously ought to be 6d., the Committee would take that into consideration in settling the contract.

6692-3. Have you any minimum rate, do you know, for unskilled labour in London?—In London, yes. In the building trade, for labourers and navvies, it would be 7d.; for labourers on night shifts it would be a little higher. Then in the engineering trade, for labourers it would be 6d.

6694. You have nothing below that, I suppose?—We have nothing below that.

6695. Take the still less organised forms of labour, such as women in the tailoring business; how do you deal with them?—We have had no difficulty.

6696. Does the Council make its own uniforms?—No; it lets them out to contractors.

6697. Subject to this Fair Wages Clause?—Yes, subject to that. In the case of the tailoring the Council did fix a rate of wages that it would ask all its contractors to pay.

6698. For every sort of tailoring work?—Yes. All the contractors are bound to pay the Council's rate of wages, so that every contractor who puts in a tender tenders on the same basis.

6699. Is that scheduled to the contract?—Yes, it is.

6700. How did you proceed to draw that up, do you remember?—It is set out in the Report on Fair Wages and Hours of Labour which I have sent in to the Committee, pages 2 and 3. It states there: "In June, 1890, attention was drawn to the fact that in the Council's contracts for clothing there were no scale of charges and schedule of time recognised as fair in the clothing trade, and, therefore, the Fair Wages Clause which was inserted in the contracts was inoperative."

6701. The Contracts Committee, I see, inquired into the conditions with a view to securing a fair rate of wages?—Yes, that is so. They went into the question very thoroughly at the time, and took evidence from the persons mentioned on page 2 of this Report. The Council decided: "(i.) In all clothing contracts a minimum scale of wages for workers and work of every description is to be fixed by the Council. (ii.) Contractors employed in making up clothes to the order of the Council are to be called upon to sign an agreement to pay according to the scale"—to be drawn up by the Council—"and to comply with certain other conditions."

6702. They drew up, in fact, a sort of log?—Yes, that is so.

6703. Does that vary from time to time, or does it remain the same?—That has not varied substantially.

6704. Is it a piece-work table or a time-work table?—It is a piece-work table, and I will hand a copy of it in. You will see it is headed: "The minimum prices to be paid by the contractors to workpeople for making up the work required by the Council from 1st July, 1906, to 30th June, 1907. No deductions to be made for sewings, silk, twist, thread, &c." In the last column you will see is the minimum price fixed by the Council for making up each garment.

6705. That lasts for one year; is it then revised?—It is then renewed for the next year at the time when the Council enters into its new contracts.

6706. Was it intended to represent the current rate, or what you might call a fair rate—I mean, was the intention of the Council merely to arrive at what the best class of employers were paying, or to fix an ideal rate of their own?—I do not think it could be called an ideal rate. I think it was a practical rate derived from the evidence submitted to the Council when they were considering the subject.

6707. That is what was actually paid by the best class of employer, I suppose?—I think that had some effect. Mr. S. King and Mr. J. Compton, representing the clothing contractors, gave evidence before the Committee.

6708. Do you find that these schedules are evaded at all, or are they pretty well acted upon?—As a rule, we find they are acted upon. With reference to your previous question I might perhaps read from page 3 of this report on the clothing question: "All the witnesses agreed that no insuperable, and perhaps no considerable, difficulty would be encountered in fixing a scale of wages that would be satisfactory both to employers and employed." That was the basis upon which the Council fixed its clothing wages.

6709. Probably any rate is agreeable to the employers if they can be quite sure that everybody who tenders must tender on that basis?—Yes; that, of course, would be so if they all tendered on the same basis.

6710. If you were to double those rates, they would be equally satisfactory to the employers, I suppose, provided they were satisfied that they were not going to be undercut by other competitors?—I do not know that that would follow, because it would create a competition with the other workers. I do not think the employers would like to double the rates and create a favoured class of employees.

6711. I was coming to that. Have you any reason to suppose that those are the rates which they pay for other work than the work of the Council?—I am afraid I cannot say. I should like to consider that question.

6712. What has been suggested to us is that these schedules are sometimes ineffective or inoperative, because the employers get round them in this way: they pay the workers who are engaged, say, on the County Council work the prescribed rates, but they only keep them on that work part of the time, and for the rest of the time the workers are on other work paid at very much lower rates, so that the average, on the whole, is not raised?—Of course, I have heard that argument, but we have not examined it, and we have no detailed information on it.

6713. It has never transpired in any of the complaints that you have had that that is what is done?—No.

6714. Apart from questions of wages and hours, have you any difficulty about the employment of women on what is alleged to be men's work?—No, we have no difficulties on that point.

6715. Do you prescribe rates for women as well as for men?—Yes, they are included in the table I have handed in.

6716. That is, for the clothing contract only?—Yes.

6717. Do you do the same in a case like a printing contract, where both men and women are employed on practically the same work?—Speaking generally, I should say we have had no complaints. My reply to that question is that no serious difficulties have arisen in connection with the employment of women on work claimed by men.

6718. What view do you think the Council would take of a case where the standard rates fixed for men were not paid to women, though women were employed on that work?—That is a question which I would scarcely be able to answer. It has not come before the Council as a concrete case.

6719. I should think that it was very likely to arise in the printing and binding trades?—We have had no difficulty with our printing contract in that respect.

6720. Have you got particulars of your printing and binding contract there?—Yes. In the printing contract we have a schedule of the rates of wages and hours of labour, which is headed, "The contractors to pay to all workmen employed by them (except a reasonable number of their legally bound apprentices) within a radius of 20 miles from Charing Cross, wages, and wages for overtime, at rates not less, and to observe, and cause to be observed by such workmen, hours of labour not greater, than those provided for in the following schedule"—and then follow the rates of wages and the hours. The schedule does not differentiate the sexes at all; it simply puts down the figures for all the particular classes of the work.

6721. You would hardly like to say what view the Council would take?—No; I could not say what view it would take.

6722. If to-day one of the contractors employed a large number of women and paid them quite a different rate from the men, would that be regarded as an evasion of the conditions?—Not if the contractors paid them the rates of wages in this schedule.

6723. But they would probably pay the women a great deal less?—Then we should hear of it if that were so. I presume we should have a complaint made, and the Council would then investigate it. But we have had no difficulties of that kind.

6724. You think the Union might complain?—Yes.

6725. Of course, the women would not complain?—No; I was meaning the Union. You should know that our printing is of rather a special kind. It is done during the Council's sessions, and has to be done at a very special rate, rapidly, and so on.

6726. That refers to the minutes, and so on?—Yes.

6727. But take your ordinary job-work printing?—That is not so extensive, and even the bulk of that is required very quickly. They are all London houses who do our printing, and the work is done in the London houses.

6728. In the vellum binding trade I think there are very often questions being raised as to what is proper work for women and what is not?—The vellum binders are in this schedule. We pay them 34s., and we put down the number of hours as 54. Questions of the kind you have mentioned have not arisen before the Council.

6729. In the Government contracts there has been a good deal of question about the alleged encroachment by women on the work of men in that particular trade?—I suppose there would be a very large quantity of the Government printing which would be stock work and could be done within a fair length of time, whereas the bulk of our work is under pressure and could only be done in a London house.

6730. I was thinking for the moment of the binding trade when I was speaking of that?—We do not have a very large amount of binding, and we do the binding of our private papers, and so on, by our own employees.

6731. It rather looks as if it were the intention of the Council to insist that women should be paid the same as men, as you do not differentiate between the sexes and as you prescribe one rate?—I should not like to say that. It would be equally right to conclude that the Council only wanted male workers. I mean the Council has not decided that point; so it might be one way or the other. It might mean either that they wanted women paid equal with the men, or it might mean that they wanted only men employed.

6732. The question has never been raised?—No, it has never been raised.

6733. And you have not prescribed anything as to the relative employment of the sexes in any of your contracts?—No.

6734. A rather similar question arises in cases of the employment of what you might call semi-skilled labour. There is a grade of workman, say, between the lowest form of unskilled labour and the class of man who does the best work. We have had cases in which it has been complained that this intermediate form of labour is employed to the exclusion of the better class, and paid at a lower rate?—We have had a few difficulties of that kind, and when we have pointed out to the contractors that they are employing this intermediary class, they have complied with our request and put the matter right.

6735. You have objected to it, in fact?—Yes.

6736. You would not admit that that was complying with the conditions of the contract?—No, not if they employed more than a reasonable number either of apprentices or of improvers.

6737. I was thinking less of apprentices and improvers than of actually permanent semi-skilled hands?—That we should no doubt have a complaint of, and we should request the contractor to stop the practice.

6738. The Council is satisfied that that is an evasion of their conditions?—That is an evasion of the contract. I have a case here before me where the complaint was made that less than the scheduled rate was paid. It was in reference to assistants who were doing wiremen's work. The Council took the step of examining the firm's books, and as a result it appeared that some of the men complained of in this particular case were improvers. The firm were informed that the Council did not view with favour that method of employing improvers, and that they must comply strictly with the terms of the contract.

6739. But that was a case of improvers?—That was the answer that the firm made to the Council's complaint that not fully skilled employees were in this case employed as wiremen. The answer was that they were improvers, and then the Council informed the contractor that the Council did not agree with that method of doing it. I have the particulars of another case here where labourers were employed to do painters' work. The firm explained that brush hands were employed to paint certain iron work. This explanation was communicated to the Union who had made the complaint, and we heard nothing further in the matter.

6740. So they were satisfied?—I assume that they were satisfied; at all events, the Council heard no more about the complaint.

6741. It seems likely that it might be a serious restriction on the subdivision of labour if you compel an employer to pay every man who takes any part in an operation the standard rate?—It depends upon the class of work, I think, to a great extent. Probably in the case I mentioned last of painters' work, it would be more possible to give the work to an unskilled man there than it would be in a bricklayer's case or a carpenter's case.

6742. But it is the policy of the Council, I gather from you, to restrict that kind of labour as much as possible?—To restrict it to moderate limits and reasonable limits. The Council has no desire to interfere with any genuine use of apprentices or improvers, but they must not be used more than to a legitimate extent.

6743. Supposing an employer thinks that he can manage his business better if he confines his skilled hands to the most skilled portion of the work and gives the less skilled portion of the work to others, and pays them less; would that not be a legitimate way of managing his business?—I am not prepared to answer that question. It would not be a compliance with the Council's contract.

6744. Would they not recognise a practice of that kind?—They would not. But, of course, it would depend entirely on the kind of trade and the skill of the master, one might say, in seeing that the work done by the less skilled man was equally well done; I mean it would depend upon so many conditions, that one could scarcely give a general answer.

6745. I am assuming that the work is done to the satisfaction of the Council by whoever took it; for instance, if they employed a labourer to paint and if the painting was done satisfactorily, would the Council object that they had not employed a skilled painter?—I think so, because that would show that the man who was employed was a skilled painter, even though he happened to be called at the moment a labourer. It is a question then of a man not receiving his proper pay for good work.

6746. Is most of your work done in the London district—I suppose it is?—Yes, most of it is done in the London district.

6747. And you do not often have cases of people who tender from the country or from a provincial district?—We do have cases; for instance, in our tramway work we have tenders from the country for iron work and steel work. But except for special purposes of that kind, the bulk of the Council's work is done in the County of London, of course.

6748. You have no experience, I presume, of a contractor who has established himself in order to reduce his wages bill in a rural district, where there is no other person with whom he can be compared?—No, I think not. The only cases like that have to do with our tramway work, in connection with which we have had one or two difficult cases. I recollect one case of a firm in the Loughborough district, where it was difficult to ascertain what were the correct standard rates.

6749. How did you set about it?—The Council did in that case agree to dispense with the usual schedule. It was quite a special case and had to do with the manufacture of our car bodies.

6750. Did you ever have any complaint about the rates that were paid there?—No, we did not. There was another case which related to the supply of four motor generators and switch gear—that was quite a special case again.

6751. Was that also a case where you had some difficulty in deciding what the current or standard rate was?—Yes. But it was quite a special industry, as you see.

6752. Do you find that the business of inquiring into complaints takes very long?—We have not had a very large experience; no doubt it would be very long if we had to extend it to a great extent. However, now and again we examine the books of a firm of which we have had complaints, and no doubt it takes a reasonable amount of time; but then we do not have many cases, so that, on the whole, I cannot say that a large amount of time is spent upon the examination.

6753. Your experience is that your present system has worked extremely well, and with very little cause of complaint on either side?—Yes; that, I think, would be the general conclusion which I am entitled to come to.

6754. What about the employers; are they satisfied?—So far as I know.

6755. (Mr. De la Bère.) What is about the average annual amount of your contracts—do you know at all? I do not want to know accurately; but would it amount to something like half-a-million a year, or one million, or two millions?—It varies so much, but I might say that our stores alone come to about £350,000 a year. Of course, it depends upon the Council's work.

6756. Going as fully into labour and wages questions as you do, do you find it necessary to keep any special staff for the purpose?—No, we have no special staff.

6757. Your ordinary technical staff, I suppose, does it?—Yes.

6758. Have you found it necessary in any way to increase that staff, as the result of the precautions you take in regard to wages and hours of labour?—I have no doubt it has lead to a slight increase, but not to a definite and perceptible increase in a certain number of officers being appointed for this particular purpose. I have no doubt it has increased the work of some of the offices, and has led to a slight increase of employment.

6759. You have not specialised the work at all?—No, not at all.

6760. Do you in all cases await complaint, or do you keep up a systematic inspection independently of any representations made to you?—We await complaint and investigate each complaint carefully.

6761. Are you at all able roughly to assess the effect upon prices which your wages provisions have had?—No. I may say I have not considered that point.

6762. I asked that because, from what one hears, I cannot help thinking that it must have had some perceptible effect. For instance, one or two contractors of standing have told me that the rate you paid for trousers, I think, is half-a-crown—and I see it is half-a-crown in your clothing schedule—and they seem to look upon the proper rate as 1s. Of course, one may be under and the other over, but there is a wide margin between them, and the difference is so great that if that is a fair illustration of your ordinary work it must, I should say, have had some effect on your prices?—As I have tried to explain to the Committee, the schedule of wages in the clothing contract was quite a special arrangement.

6763. Then it would not be a standard?—I do not think you can take that as a standard of the difference between the Council's practice and the practice in regard to private work.

6764. I do not at all mean to imply that the difference is as 1s. to half-a-crown, but it occurred to me that probably there was some very appreciable percentage of difference?—I think you have got to take the clothing contract quite by itself, because it was arrived at by a totally different process to the other cases. There were no Trade Union rates, and the Council arrived at it by quite a special process of its own.

6765. Turning now to your works contracts, you treat your works contracts rather differently from the others, do you not?—Do you mean the work done by the Works Committee?

6766. There is virtually a fixed schedule, is there not?—Yes, we have that, and the Council's schedule of wages is lodged at the County Hall.

6767. You have never worked out the increased price which probably the Council has to give?—No; we have never entered into that side of it.

6768. Even where the contractor sends in a schedule, if you accept it and give him an order, that involves the endorsement of his rate as in the opinion of the Council a fair living wage, I suppose?—No, I think not. I think it involves simply the fact that it is either the Trade Union rate of wage or the agreed rate of wage between the employer and the employed.

6769. It is conceivable that it might happen that after a contract is placed you might receive a complaint that such and such a rate is not really the Trade Union rate or even the current rate?—Then we should look into the complaint.

6770. But surely the contractor would be in a position to say: "I told you what the rate was, and you accepted it"?—Yes; but if the contractor has told us what was not true, the Council would probably take some action.

6771. He would say, "I submitted my rates to you for approval with my tender, and you approved them?—Yes, but then he made a declaration that those were the rates current in the district at the time and agreed to as between employer and employed.

6772. Then the Council does not bind itself in any way as an accomplice, owing to its having endorsed a rate?—No, I think not.

6773. I gather from what you told the Chairman that you do not find that the fixing of the rate serves to stereotype the various operations of manufacture, or to minimise the efforts to secure improved methods?—I think not.

6774. It has occurred to us that it would have that effect?—I think not. We have had to alter our schedule in consequence of alterations in the rates of wages.

6775. What I am rather thinking of is that a manufacturer might say, "Well, I have to pay such and such a wage, and I find that with my present methods I can afford to do that, and it is not worth my while to improve those methods—to introduce machinery, for instance, or to have improved methods for the distribution of the work"?—That is an economical problem for him to consider.

6776. Which has not presented itself to you?—Which has not presented itself to us.

6777. If the complaint is proved, do you enforce payment from the beginning of the contract, or from the date of the complaint?—For the period for which it runs.

6778. Supposing a man is half-way through a contract, and you receive a complaint that he is not paying the agreed rate of wages—it may be a very disputed point, perhaps—and after going into it and taking evidence on both sides, you come to the conclusion that the Union have made good their case; do you make the contractor pay the increased rate from the beginning of his contract, or only from the date of the complaint?—We make him pay for all the breaches of the contract that he has caused.

6779. Let us say, for instance, that he is paying a man 7½d. an hour, instead of 8d.; he perhaps says "The man is infirm," or "He has not quite reached the degree of competence necessary"; but after going into it, you think the man ought to be paid the 8d.?—We should make him pay.

6780. Would you make him pay the 8d. for the two months the contract has run?—Certainly.

6781. You would enforce a back payment?—Yes.

6781*a*. You would say the contract has been broken ab initio?—Has been broken for all the period, and the complaint is justified.

6782. In regard to foreign orders, sometimes probably you have to place orders for things which are made abroad?—Yes.

6783. Or perhaps even you directly place them abroad; do you in any way follow up the labour clauses in regard to these cases?—We satisfy ourselves generally that the labour in that district of the foreign country is in a good condition generally. We do not inquire into it very narrowly. A famous case arose quite recently.

6784. I was not alluding to that in any way, and my question was not inspired by that, because I know it has been rather a burning question. For instance, supposing you ordered something from the United States, do you at all go into the conditions of labour under which it is manufactured?—It depends entirely on the class of contract. If we were to order things to be manufactured for us, which I do not think we have ever done in the United States—to be actually manufactured for us from the raw material—I hardly know what steps the Council would take.

6785. I suppose sometimes you require, we will say, high-speed tools, or something of that sort—some of these very ingenious American machines, perhaps?—Then they come to us as completed articles.

6786. But they are made in America?—Yes, but we purchase them as a supply—as goods which are not made for us.

6787. You do not go into a question there as to how they are produced?—No, not if it is a question of an article that you may purchase in the market.

6788. You purchase them by contract, I presume?—We agree to purchase a certain number of articles, pencils, say, which are made in Germany; and what we do is to purchase in the open market from a supply house, so many bundles of pencils.

6789. Presumably, they have to comply with your requirements in regard to some pattern, or quality?—Quality, certainly.

6790. If so, why not also in regard to the conditions of labour?—Because they are not manufactured for us; they are simply supplied to us.

6791. (Chairman.) You go into the market and buy like anybody else?—Yes.

6792. (Mr. De la Bère.) You buy by contract, and you use your general stores tender form?—Yes. We want an article of a given quality, and if we can get that in the open market, we buy it in the open market, and we do not go behind that. It is not a question then of things being manufactured for us.

6793. Let us take the case, we will say, of knives; when you purchase knives, say, in the Sheffield district, do you go into the conditions of labour—or it may be files, or scissors, or paint brushes?—I have before me the contract form for brass, gun-metal and copper, gas and plumber's fittings, and things of that kind. It opens with this clause: "The undersigned do hereby contract and agree, on the acceptance of this tender by the said Council, to supply to the Council, if and to the extent the same shall be ordered by it, and in accordance with the conditions of the contract stated below, and in any quantity, all or any of the goods named in the schedule hereto annexed, of the quality or sort, and after the rate or price specified in the said schedule, and further do hereby declare that we pay such rates of wages and observe such hours of labour as are recognised by associations of employers and Trades Unions, and in practice obtained at the date of the tender in the districts where the work is to be done, and where no Trades Union exists, such rates of wages and hours of labour as are generally accepted as fair in the trade." When a Sheffield manufacturer signs that contract, we take it that he knows what he is signing?

6794. Do you take any steps to secure the effective performance of that undertaking?—Not when it is a question of supply.

6795. Suppose you had a complaint that, in regard to some knives, or files, we will say, ordered by you at Sheffield, less than the agreed rate was being paid, would you take steps to investigate that?—We should investigate it, no doubt.

6796. You would?—On complaint, certainly.

6797. Where they were being made abroad presumably you would not go into that question?—We have not had a case where we have had to do it abroad.

6798. In regard to sub-letting, you prohibit sub-letting, except with written permission, do you not?—Except with the written permission of the Council signed by the Clerk of the Council, and imposing upon the sub-letting contractor the same conditions as to labour as are imposed upon the main contractor.

6799. How far do you push that? Of course, there are many products, the components of which are made by different manufacturers, necessarily?—Yes.

6800. Do you, in all those cases, require written permission? To take a concrete example, supposing you put out an order for harness, the metal fittings are not made by the same man that makes the harness; do you require written authority for his obtaining his D's, and his buckles, and all that?—No; that would be taken to be an operation in the ordinary way of his business, and would not be considered a sub-letting of the contract.

6801. I think some of the Government clauses, at any rate, run: "Sub-letting other than that customary in the trade is not permitted"; in effect, that is your practice?—Yes, in practice that is what the Council does.

6802. Do you push your requirements as to fair wages and labour conditions into the preparatory stages of the product? Say you are buying material, for instance—I do not know whether you ever do—would you inquire into the wages paid in the carding of wool, the spinning, and the dyeing?—If we were buying manufactured material, no. If we were buying cotton goods, or blankets, or things of that kind, we should buy them under the clause I have just now read out, as supply; and so long as the contractor states that they are made in accordance with that clause we accept it.

6803. Say you have placed a contract for cloth, and you get a complaint that the carding work has not been paid for at the agreed rate—carding, of course, is a very early stage in the manufacture of any material—do you consider that under your contract you have the right to inquire into the wages paid in the carding, which is often done by an entirely different manufacturer from the one who actually weaves the material?—That is a difficult question to answer.

6804. These questions have not arisen with you?—They have not arisen with us.

6805. Unfortunately they have presented themselves, most of them, repeatedly to Government Departments; they seem to pursue us much more than they do you?—Yes.

6806. I think you are of opinion that the requirement of the Trade Union rate does not lead to any undue inflation of prices as between employers and employed; you do not think that the employers cease to take any trouble to resist unfair demands because they know whatever is claimed and agreed to by them will be paid by you?—I have not considered that point, and I am afraid I am scarcely able to give an opinion upon it worth much.

6807. Do you consider that what I may perhaps call the damnatory clauses in the contract act as a deterrent to any class of contractor, either the better or the worse? Do they frighten away the worse contractor, or does the better contractor object to submit to them?—I think they very likely frighten away the worse contractor; I think I can say that.

6808. But you do not think they at all deter the better one?—We have no evidence upon the subject.

6809. I have had cases where a contractor has come to us and said, "You are inquiring into these matters; our workpeople have been with us 20 or 30 years, most of them; we have never had any difficulty, and we are a very happy family; I really do not know that we shall take your work any longer if you are going to raise these difficulties as between employers and employed"?—I do not think we have had any case of that kind. Of course, it may be that the contracts we enter into are so much smaller than Government contracts that questions of that kind would not arise.

6810. Do you require a contractor to enter into any obligations as regards the other work than London County Council work which he may be doing? Do you require him not only to be paying your rates on your work, but on all the work in his factory—because that is a requirement which it has been represented to us is desirable?—That again depends upon the class of work. If we have a contractor to build us a sewer, or to do a certain piece of construction, we only require him to pay the rates of wages for the particular job, and what he does on other jobs is no concern of ours.

6811. In other words, to take an extreme case, you may be employing a firm whom the Trade Union people consider, to use their technical term, an "unfair house," but as long as he complied with your conditions you would not evict him?—I can scarcely say that, because it depends so entirely upon the class of work. If it were for the manufacture of definite articles or for the construction of any definite piece of work, then the Council only requires the wages to be paid for its work; but for anything else it is governed by the clause that I have just read out, and the contractor must declare that he pays the Trade Union rate of wages.

6812. On all your work only?—No.

6813. It is not necessarily on all his work, is it?—The words are these: he is to "pay such rates of wages and observe such hours of labour as are recognised by associations of employers and Trade Unions, and in practice obtained at the date of the tender in the districts where the work is to be done."

6814. Yes; but I fancy that applies only to his contract with you?—No.

6815. He does not give a general undertaking there that for all his work he will do that; that is his undertaking in his tender to you, that he will pay such rates as are current at the date of the tender?—No; it is a statement that he does pay them, not that he will.

6816. I beg your pardon. I did not notice the point. I am sorry to have troubled you with some of these questions rather particularly, but they have all presented themselves to us, and I was rather anxious to know how you deal with them?—I quite understand. Of course, there is the interpretation of this clause, which is a more difficult question.

6817. (Mr. Black.) Do you advertise all your contracts, or do you keep to any extent to a selected list of contractors?—We advertise almost invariably. It is seldom that we have resort to a selected list, and it is only with very special things.

6818. Then you do not to any great extent employ a selected list of firms?—No.

6819. When you get tenders sent in reply to your advertisements, is it not a troublesome business to find out the status of the people who have sent in tenders?—It causes trouble.

6820. You have to inquire at that stage, not only into their position financially, but to some extent as to whether they pay fair wages?—Yes, no doubt.

6821. You do inquire whether they pay fair wages?—Yes, certainly.

6822. You do not merely accept a statement which they sign to the effect that they have been paying and will pay, under the Council's contract, fair wages, do you? Do you make any investigations as to the previous history of the firm as payers of fair wages?—No. In the first instance, if it comes in under our schedule, we take it that they are going to pay according to the contract they have agreed to; and in the second instance, if it comes under the schedule of wages which they inserted in the contract, we take it that that is what they are paying. Then we leave it to the Unions and the workpeople to make complaint if the firm is not carrying out its contract.

6823. Supposing, before you made any contract with a particular firm, the Trade Union were to write, "So-and-So is not, in our opinion, a fair house, and we ask you not to make a contract with that firm," what would be the attitude of the Council?—We would inquire.

6824. You would inquire into that?—We would inquire into every complaint, certainly.

6825. That might be a firm you had made no contract with previously?—We should inquire.

6826. On that merely, you would inquire?—Yes.

6827. What sort of primâ facie evidence do you require the Trade Union to submit before you take up a complaint against a firm actually holding a contract?—The Trade Union would have to make a statement, and give us, for example, instances of unfair wages.

6828. Then you would require specific instances before you took the case up?—Certainly. Then we should take those instances in hand and pursue them by examination of books, and so on.

6829. I think you publish the names of the successful contractors?—Yes.

6830. With the prices?—Yes.

6831. So that it is easy for the Trade Union to come to you and say, "So-and-so has a contract with the London County Council"?—Exactly.

6832. In our case they are not aware always?—The tenders are opened in the first instance in the open Council; then they are referred to a committee, and the committee report and recommend that a certain tender be accepted. All the tenderers, not only the successful ones, but all those who are not accepted, are mentioned in the report.

6833. Does that become public property from that date?—That is public property.

6834. Do you find that that affects prejudicially the interests of the Council in buying to the best advantage? For example, does any contractor come to you and say, "We are in a difficulty with our contracts for raw material through its being known that we are absolutely certain of getting the contract at a certain price"?—No.

6835. Has that point of view been represented at all to the Council?—Not to any great extent, anyhow. It might have happened, but not to any great extent.

6836. You cannot delay that publication until the contractor has closed with his sub-suppliers of raw material, for instance?—No.

6837. It is a public matter, and you have to take the disadvantages, such as they are, attaching to it?—Quite so. I have some recollection of a case about twelve months ago, but I can scarcely remember it in its entirety.

6838. I suppose it would be impossible for a municipal body practically to adopt any other method?—I think so. Our minutes are, of course, public.

6839. In the case of a dispute between the Council and the contractor as to whether the fair wages of the district had been paid, who is the final authority to settle the matter? Supposing the contractor has sent in a schedule and you have not criticised it, but you have made the contract with him; then it is subsequently alleged that he is not paying fair wages, and you make an inquiry and you find he is not in your opinion, but he still holds to the point that he is—what would then happen?—In every contract there is a clause which makes the professional officer, either the engineer or the architect, as the case may be, the interpreter of the carrying out of the contract. I will read the arbitration clause: "If at any time before completion of the works any question dispute or difference shall arise between the Council or the engineer on their behalf and the contractor as to the construction of this contract, or as to any matter or thing arising under or out of this contract, then such question dispute or difference (unless it relate to matters and things which are under the terms of this contract left to the final decision requisition certificate or order of the engineer) shall be referred to the determination of the engineer, whose decision shall be abided by until the completion of the work, when such questions differences and disputes may as hereinafter provided for be referred to the decision of the arbitrator." That practically puts it into the hands of the professional officer to determine any dispute of this kind.

6840. There is a reference to an arbitrator in that clause; could there be an arbitration on the question of fair wages, or is that quite excluded from arbitration?—No, it is not excluded, but I take it that that would be on a question of law rather than on a question of fact.

6841. Apparently on the wording of that clause, the contractor might claim arbitration?—He might claim arbitration, no doubt.

6842. If, for example, the engineer or the architect said the contractor was not paying fair wages, do you think the contractor might under that clause claim an arbitration on the point?—I am not certain about that.

6843. It seems likely from the general reference to arbitration that he can?—Yes. But I should like to consider this answer, and perhaps let you know a little later on.

6844. (Mr. Hillier.) In inviting tenders for the supplies of ironmongery or cutlery, do the Council have samples submitted to the Trade Union in the district where the work is to be carried out?—Submitted to the Trade Unions, do you say?

6845. Yes, for Trade Union inspection. It has been claimed in evidence that the Trade Unions should have an opportunity of seeing the articles for which tenders are being invited?—We keep samples at our own office, of course.

6846. And that is all?—Yes; we do not distribute the samples.

6847. I notice that right through you have used the phrase "Trade Union rate"?—Yes.

6848. If the rate is agreed between the employers and the employees that is "a rate current," is it not?—When I say the Trade Union rate, in my own mind I include the agreed terms, supposing there were no Trade Union.

6849. So that if the words "Trade Union" were eliminated, the result would be the same?—No doubt; if the terms were agreed between the employers and the employed.

6850. Some such words as these would carry the same weight as "Trade Union rate"?—Exactly.

6851. In piecework trades like cutlery there are Trade Union rates, but the rates differ according to the amount of labour-saving appliances used in the different establishments; if a complaint arose there how would you determine it?—I am afraid I should have to consider that when the complaint arose. It has not at present arisen. We should certainly have to investigate it if a complaint arose, though I can hardly imagine at the present moment how we should deal with it.

6852. You would not think, or would you, that what the men earned in a week would be a fair criterion of whether they were being underpaid or not? For instance, on one process a man can earn, we will say, 40s. a week; on the invention of machinery he is paid a lower price per article, but at the end of the week he receives 40s.; would you consider that an infringement of the Fair Wages Clause?—We should have to take into consideration the actual agreement between the employers and employed in every case. It should not depend on the actual money a man earned so much as on the terms of the agreement.

6853. Do the Council prohibit home-work?—Yes, they have prohibited home-work in the case of tailoring.

6854. In that case only?—Only.

6855. They would not prohibit it in basket work or in brush work, would they?—They have not done so, but they look with disfavour on home-work, unless under proper inspection.

6856. What view would the Council take of firms, we will say, like engineers who work under the Trade Union rules as applied to engineers, although they employ some men belonging to other Unions, say bricklayers, carpenters and joiners? Would your Council consider that those quite subsidiary men should be paid according to the rates of their own Union, or according to the rates of the Engineers' Union?—The Council does not compel a firm to employ only Trade Union men.

6857. But still they have to pay the Trade Union rate?—The Council only ask for the Trade Union rate to be paid.

6858. The case I am putting to you is that of a firm of engineers who employ carpenters or bricklayers, and the engineers' rules, as to working hours for instance, are different from the builders'. If such a man is employed in an engineering firm, according to the rules of his own Union he can claim overtime, we will say in winter, for the difference between 44 hours and, we will say, the 50 or 54 hours worked by the engineers. These engineering firms, so far as I know, do not recognise that, and they make these men work under the rules governing engineers. If a complaint were made to the Council in a case like that, what action would you take?—There, again, I think I should have to consider it at the time when the complaint was made. It is a difficult point, and I should not like to give an answer off-hand.

6859. Of course, it does arise at times?—Yes, and I quite appreciate it. We have only had one case of that kind, which is not settled, but is still under consideration, so I am not able to say what we should do.

6860. I see you extend the operation of the Trade Union rate to a radius of 20 miles?—Yes.

6861. By so doing, you go beyond the Trade Unions, at any rate in the building trade?—Yes.

6862. Their radius is 12 miles?—Yes.

6863. What do you do when cases arise in outlying districts like, we will say, Kingston and Croydon, where there is a scale of rates agreed upon between employers and employees which is a lower scale than the London scale?—That hardly arises in practice. The 20-mile radius is adopted in order to take in the Council's own particular works, and, as a matter of fact, we have nothing at Kingston or Croydon. So, although it does look like an extension of the radius, it is only for the purpose of the Council's own works.

6864. If a builder takes a contract under your terms, he is bound to pay the London rate, is he not, even if he is on the verge of the radius?—Yes, he is.

6865. Therefore, the London County Council might be paying more for its labour than strictly it ought, in cases of that kind?—Yes; my reply to that is that it really does not affect the Council, because it has no work outside the 12-mile radius virtually, except one or two special cases like an asylum or an outside pumping station.

6866. What action would you take in cases where there is a Trade Union, but it is not sufficiently strong to enforce its views upon the majority of the employers; would you consider the Trade Union rate ought to be applied in that case, or would you rely upon the current rate?—We should not take the Trade Union rate, because we have the additional words "and in practice obtained," so that if the Trade Union has not been able to get its scale recognised it would have to be an agreed figure.

6867. Recognised by the employers and the employed in the majority?—Yes.

6868. Then with regard to contracts for furniture, you stipulate, of course, for Trade Union rules?—Yes.

6869. Therefore, you can only have firms tendering for you who comply with those rules?—Yes.

6870. No other firm can tender unless you alter the contract?—Certainly not.

6871. How do you manage with chairs? For instance, I will take High Wycombe chairs, the common form of chair; what steps do you take there?—We put this clause into the contract: "The contractors will, in the production, manufacture and supply of the goods named in the schedule, pay and observe the following rates of wages and hours of labour"—and then we give the rates of wages, etc.

6872. Do you put in the actual rates?—No; we say in general terms, "the rates of wages and hours of labour appearing in the Council's list, and if the contractor employ any workman or workmen in any trade not included in the Council's list, the rates of pay shall not be less, nor the hours of labour more, than those recognised by associations of employers and Trade Unions, and in practice obtained in London."

The witness withdrew.

Miss Clara E. Collet, called and examined.

6873. (Chairman.) You are senior investigator for women's industries in the Labour Department of the Board of Trade?—Yes.

6874. Have you had any opportunity of considering the question of women's wages in connection with the Fair Wages Clause?—I have had to consider it, but not for any practical purpose.

6875. But you have thought of the conditions under which women's wages should be settled, and questions of that kind?—Yes.

6876. I think you are going to offer some evidence as regards the inequality in men's and women's wages, and the causes of it?—In my proof of evidence, I have rather aimed at making my point of view clear, expecting to be asked questions on any part that seemed to you doubtful.

6877. You say, "The man's standard of living must be sufficient to meet the woman's cost of living in addition to his own cost of living": what do you mean exactly by "standard of living" in that connection?—I mean, perhaps, rather his standard of necessary income.

6878. In fact, you mean that the man's wages must be sufficient to keep his family?—Yes, and must include the woman's standard as well as his own, and therefore the woman's standard must be lower than the man's.

6879. You have noticed that women are, on the whole, much less persistent in regard to labour than men; that is to say, they leave the work at a much earlier age than men do?—Yes.

6880. Men naturally go on all their lives, or nearly so, whereas the women drop off?—Yes.

6881. They get married, and leave it?—Yes.

6882. How do you think that affects the rate of their wages?—It affects their efficiency, and therefore must, from the start, limit the amount of their worth.

6883. Do you think a man gets more efficient as he gets older?—I should say he works a great deal better after he is 21 than before.

6884. But from the age of 25 there is very little change in his efficiency, is there?—Of course, I do not know about that. The point is that he is there, and that the majority of women after 25 are not there—they have left.

6885. You seem to think that that fact has affected their efficiency in some way?—Yes, because they never aim at doing anything the best way that it can possibly be done; they are simply aiming at earning some money, and are never interested in their work, except in the cases where they can carry on their work after they are married.

6886. Do you think that applies more strongly to women than it does to men?—Men, I should say, have a great deal more industrial ambition than women. Ambition is encouraged in them, and it is discouraged with girls.

6887. Do you think that men doing the kind of work, or the class of work that women do, would be much affected by that?—They are affected, by necessity.

6888. Are they affected much by considerations of future efficiency?—No. But then the employer demands it. If he is to earn what he considers a necessary income, he must give value for it.

6889. You have noticed a difference between the work which a girl can do, and do well after she is married, and the work which she cannot go on with?—Yes. I think that is the most important feature with regard to securing efficiency. The dress-making trade is one which gives the highest scope for improvement; and therefore you find the earnings ranging from the ordinary rate up to £200, and £300, and £400 a year.

6890. Would you get as high wages as that for ordinary dressmaking?—If a woman has exceptional taste and exceptional ability—she must have exceptional taste and a popular taste, or a good taste—if she has that, and exceptional ability, then as a fitter and cutter from £100 to £200 and £250 is quite a common salary in the West End. Of course, that would only be the case in the West End, or in places like Dublin and Edinburgh—large places where they would have to do as highly skilled dressmaking as in London. From £80 to £200 a year would be quite an ordinary rate for fitters in the West End dressmaking houses.

6891. You say that "in industries requiring a large proportion of skilled and experienced workers, such as printing, the absence of future value diminishes the present worth of young women, in comparison with that of young men"; printing is a good illustration of that proposition, do you think?—Yes, I think it is the best illustration of that, and it would be a more important illustration still if the printing trade had been open to women in London, but it has practically been closed.

6892. It is not a trade in which efficiency is very long deferred, is it?—The few women who have been employed in the printing trade have never aimed at efficiency. In Edinburgh and in the country, so far as I can gather, they do not often aim at doing the whole of the work. I believe in the Women's Printing Society in London, they do do the whole of the work.

6893. And there are no men employed at all?—Men are employed as machine-minders, and they carry the formes to the machine, but the women do the making-up of the pages, and locking the formes at the Women's Printing Society. Generally speaking, I think the girls leave early, and they do not aim at doing anything more than typesetting.

6894. Do you think printing is a trade which women might very well take up more than they do?—Twenty years ago I do not think that there were enough well educated women to have competed in London on the terms that the London Compositors' Society laid down; but now I cannot see that there is anything in it that an ordinary typist could not do as well as men. When I say there is not anything in it, I do not mean any of the quite advanced work or the high pressure work; but so far as competition with men at the same rate is concerned, I believe they could compete now if the experiment were tried, but 20 years ago they could not—there were not enough of them.

6895. Could they compete on fairly equal terms?—On equal terms, I believe. I should have said not, a little while ago, but I was visiting the Women's Printing Society, and I noticed there were three women that were on piecework—they were occasional hands—and they earned 30s. and upwards—about 31s. 4d. one woman earned and 31s. 6d. another. They were being paid 6d. per 1,000 letters instead of 8d. per 1,000 letters, which is the Union rate; so it is clearly quite possible for them to compete at the men's rate.

6896. Have you thought at all on what basis the relation between men's wages and women's wages ought to be fixed?—I think it depends a good deal upon the class of work and in what point the difference lies between them. I have got an instance in the brush trade, which is an example of the case, where, when the two operations were separated, both the men's rate and the women's rate added together came to much less than the total, and the men's rate was below the women's rate. I had better give you the exact figures. It was on a kind of stove brush. The men used to be paid 2s. 1d. for boring 1,000 holes and drawing 1,000 knots. A man, so far as I recollect, did his 14,000 holes in less than a day and half's boring, but he took all the rest of the week to do the drawing. A woman could do as much drawing in a week as a man. When the women took to drawing they were paid 8d. per 1,000 knots, and the men were paid 5d. per 1,000 holes boring. Four women and one man did a little more work than four men had done before and at greatly reduced prices. In that case, it was so much easier to the man to do the part which the woman could not do at all; it was easier to him to do the boring of the holes than it was to do the drawing of the knots. That is a case where, if they had done it all, each one would have been doing something which was harder than their own work.

6897. And the result is that the cost of production is only one-half?—Yes. The man really ought to have got a little more than he did get. He could quite as well, if he had known arithmetic, I think, have got 8d., say, for his 1,000, and then he would have earned more than he had done before.

6898. Those, of course, were purely piece-work rates?—Yes. That is an instance in which I think it is clearly women's work—it is quite obvious; and I should think it would be a waste of time to talk about equalising the rates in a case like that. In printing, it seems to me quite a different thing, because it would only be a higher class of women who could compete on equal terms with the men.

6899. Do you mean a higher class in point of education?—In point of education. For instance, in London I think it would be quite possible to get a considerable number of women who would stay on and who would not leave to the extent that you would have them leaving if you chose your workers from the artisan class. There is a very great difference shown in different trades in that respect in regard to leaving for marriage.

6900. Do you think women would be wise to force up their rate of wages to something within measureable distance of the men's?—No. I think they had much better ignore that side of it and get as much as they can.

6901. Would not the result of that process be that they would inevitably be excluded from employment altogether?—In the printing trade, for instance?

6902. Yes?—In the country I should think so, because I do not think the country could possibly provide the kind of labour that I am speaking of. London has a very large supply of it, but I do not think anywhere else in England there would be a sufficient supply of women's labour for them to compete on equal terms; they would be constantly leaving and new people would have to be taught.

6903. Therefore, they would tend to confine themselves to unskilled forms of labour, owing to the pace at which they disappear?—Yes. They would never aim at doing more than just the type-setting, which means that the employer can never afford to dispense with the men. Also he sometimes would not find the women in a provincial town; he might be left without workers. So he would always want to have men.

6904. How do you think we could meet the difficulty which is felt in the practical application of this Fair Wages Clause, that the rate of men's wages is liable to be cut down by the invasion of women so that it may practically make the Fair Wages Clause actually inoperative?—If the men are simply keeping a quite easy piece of work for which, owing to a Trade Union, they have obtained too high a price, then I think it is simply a question that it is women's work, and if the woman is earning on it as much as she can earn at any other occupation in the district, then I say there is no cause to complain. But in the other cases, I think that the woman's rate ought to rise up to the level where it is indifferent to the employer which he has; it should be the men's rate with the extra expenses deducted from it of employing women.

6905. Would you get a large amount of employment for women on those terms where, as you say, it was practically indifferent to the employer whether he employed men or women? Will he not always want the inducement of economy to get him to employ women at all?—Very frequently it is that the employer has found that he is getting a very poor kind of man or boy, and very difficult to manage, and that the grade that he is touching is becoming more expensive at the same rate. Then I think he looks round to see if he can employ women's labour. I do not know how far that has acted.

6906. Do you think women can hope to force up their rate of remuneration to that point at which it becomes indifferent to the employer which sex he takes?—I think that women can certainly have it when they become efficient enough in such a trade as the printing trade for it to be indifferent to an employer on work in which night-work is of no importance. Of course, if it is a kind of work which has to be done under pressure, and which requires overtime and night work, then women can never be of so much value to an employer; but on the other work I cannot see that there is anything very special about the work.

6907. But cæteris paribus, will not the employer always prefer men to women where the cost, as you put it, is the same, in fact, must not the women, if they are to continue in employment, practically underbid the men?—In one sense everybody underbids everybody else, by either giving better work for the same money or inferior work for less. If the men are becoming very difficult, I can imagine that it would be worth while, because of the women being much easier to work with. The women are not trying to force their wages up, it must be remembered.

6908. From a good deal we have heard, I should have said they were; I mean the demand is rather that for the same work done in the same time and equally well, they should be paid the same as men?—Do any women in the printing trade ask that? I know outside they will say that, but I am not aware that women themselves are asking for it, and I do not think they are asking for it. It is their own contentment with the conditions that prevents their becoming efficient and earning more.

6909. But the people who represent them are certainly asking for it for them?—I do not think anybody can be said to represent working women in these trades.

6910. The men, on the other hand, certainly claim that if women are to be employed, they should be paid the same as men, because otherwise, of course, the men see that the effect of the employment of women is to exclude the men?—Yes. I think that indicates, to a certain extent, that women could compete with men in this particular line on equal terms, or they would not be quite so nervous about it. But the men feel safe in saying that they have no objection to the women coming in at equal rates. In London I think that is a mistake. Formerly no employer would ever try to employ women on a large scale if he had a Union house, for fear of coming into collision with the Trade Unions, but I think now he could do it safely at the Union rate. The apprentice question would be the difficult part, because you cannot limit the number of apprentices to be employed in a women's shop, where the numbers of persons who come and go fluctuate.

6911. Is it a trade that requires a long apprenticeship? I should think that it would require rather a short one?—I cannot see that it should take anything like the time that is given to it. If they went to a printing school, for instance, outside the trade, I should say that any typist who is earning 18s. a week could come up to the standard in another six months. But that is purely by looking at the work; I do not know, of course, how long it would take.

6912. The men claim that there ought to be a seven years' apprenticeship at least?—Because they have to go through a seven years' apprenticeship, not because they think that a seven years' apprenticeship is necessary.

6913. I daresay. Do you think the influence of the Trade Unions is keeping women out of a good many of these employments?—Yes. Certainly the London Compositors' Society have kept women out of the trade.

6914. In London?—In London; and it is only in London, I think, that this kind of efficient woman's labour is obtainable in any large quantity.

6915. Would you not get it in any large provincial town?—No, I think not. You might in Liverpool, where there is a very large commercial class with a large number of girls, the daughters of clerks; and you might in Birimngham, where there are a great number of women clerks. It would be from that class, I think, that the printing trade could draw a good supply; but it is not so numerous elsewhere. In the country it is not like London, which has six million people to draw from—people who would come in every day.

6916. It is rather curious in those circumstances that London should be one of the few places where they cannot get in?—That is because the Compositors Society is so strong.

6917. Is it stronger relatively in London than it is in other towns, do you think?—Yes, I think so—at any rate, it was 20 years ago. That was at the time when they raised this question, and said that they would admit women on the same terms as men, but on no other terms.

6918. There is a good proportion of non-Union houses, I should think, in London?—Yes; but I know 20 years ago they would not venture to fight the men. On a point like this, I should think that the non-Unionists would have joined with the Unionists, and so it was not worth while, because there were not enough women to make it worth while, and there was not any sign that women would be good enough. But since then they have had 20 years of compulsory education.

6919. Did the London Society of Compositors actually prohibit it?—Except upon exactly equal terms, which was the same thing as prohibiting it.

6920. They would not work in a shop where the women were employed on any other terms, I suppose?—Yes, and they would not allow anyone to teach them—they would not allow a Unionist to teach a woman or to finish her work. If a woman did type-setting, they would not allow a Unionist to continue the work begun by that woman, so that they put a stop to any change in organisation. Of course, change in the organisation of labour would be absolutely necessary for the employment of women; but they would have prevented anything of that kind.

6921. You think there is need of caution in applying the Fair Wages Resolution in regard to women and girls?—Yes.

6922. I gather that is mainly on account of what you call "driving"?—Yes.

6923. What exactly do you mean by that?—It is a term very commonly used in the North to express the pressure put upon workpeople to turn out the greatest possible quantity from their machines, but in Lancashire, especially in the north of Lancashire in the weaving district, they complain very bitterly of the pressure put upon them to turn off a very large amount from the loom. One of the questions in factories—and I think it is more important than the question of wages—is the extent to which they are bullied into doing their work and earning very high wages.

6924. You think that does not apply to piecework as much as it does to time-work?—If you fix a minimum from the outside, if a minimum wage is fixed per hour, then the girls will have to do as much work as would be worth that minimum rate. Time-work generally involves a much easier pace than piece-work.

6925. Do you mean that a girl will not get employed at all if she does not work up to the minimum?—She must bring herself up to that standard.

6926. Then the minimum from your point of view ought to be fixed rather low?—I should not fix a minimum time rate in any case where the amount of work will have to be measured by the piece.

6927. Do you think that she will not get as much driving, to use your own expression, on piece-work as she will on time-work?—The employer should not be compelled to drive her; but if he is forced to make her earn a certain amount, then the driving is inevitable.

6928. Then you would not recommend that contracts should have a minimum rate scheduled to them?—Not in any industry which is usually paid by the piece. There are some industries in which it is a time wage; for instance, in the dressmaking industry there has to be a time wage because they do not wish anybody to scamp the work or to be tempted to scamp the work. In the tailoring, I think the most practical thing would be to invite the contractors to send in with their tenders the piece-rates for each part that they propose to pay; then by comparing the different contractors, one would see what was the normal rate. In carrying out the Fair Wages Clause, the important point is to see that you do not accept a tender which is lower than another merely because they beat down the wages.

6929. You would prefer a piece-work schedule to a minimum time-rate?—Yes.

6930. Would it be practicable to draw up a schedule that would work?—I do not propose that you should draw up a schedule for them, but that they should tell you what rates they propose to pay.

6931. But practically it comes to the same thing in the end. The Government would have to decide what the standard rate should be in order to compare the different tenders?—Undoubtedly. It would depend, would it not, upon whether the lowness of the rate were due to a good organisation? It is quite possible for rates to be lower because the employer has some system of organisation which enables him to produce more cheaply. It would be necessary, I think, to find out what wages were earned on those rates, and whether there was any explanation of the cheapness as compared with other people's rates.

6932. That does introduce the very great difficulty into the question that even with a piece-work rate quoted you cannot be quite sure what the conditions are behind it, and you cannot tell exactly what amount of time-wages the worker will get on it. That would make it very difficult for a Government Department, would it not, to compare several different piece-work prices which were submitted to them?—I suppose, in fact, you would choose those that seemed to be the same as everybody else's.

6933. That might mean that you were excluding somebody who quoted a lower price for which there might be a substantial explanation?—Your inspector would inquire into that.

6934. That would require a good deal of investigation before you could place a contract then?—But it would not have to be suddenly done. If you have several contractors regularly employed, you would not have to do a large number of fresh ones.

6935. One of them might introduce some new process which would affect its piece-work rate; he would then quote a lower piece-work rate, the Department would not know exactly what was going on, and would probably reject him with a suggestion that he was sweating. How is the Department to find out what is behind the rate?—Only by inquiry and inspection.

6936. Do you not think that even with a good deal of inquiry it might be difficult to check or to compare the several rates quoted on an equal basis?—The article is the same. You have that advantage, that you know everybody will be giving a rate about the same article. I cannot venture on an opinion till I see what rates they put to it; it might be that you would find that the rates were very similar indeed.

6937. Yes, and you might not. Take a coat, for instance; suppose one man quotes 7s. for a finished coat and another man quotes 6s. 6d.; how are you to decide which is paying the fairer wages to his people?—If he gives you his piece-rate for each part that is made under the piece-rate system you will be able to see, at any rate on the face of things, what was the case. Of course, you might avoid trouble by giving it to the one that paid the higher piece-rate, or if you had employed the other contractor for a considerable time, you might, first of all, find out what explanation there is for his having a lower rate.

6938. In the same way, if a new tenderer came in you would have to go through the whole of his processes and see that his prices were fair?—His factory would have to be visited, and I think it would be necessary to assure yourselves that taking important questions into consideration he is paying to average people the amount of wage common in the trade.

6939. Only that again would be qualified by such things as the facilities he gave his workers, and so on? Yes; I should certainly count those conditions in his favour.

6940. For instance, the pressing arrangements in one shop might be much more convenient than those in another; he would have to go into all that, would he not?—I think the wages books would be a sufficient test.

6941. That would be the real test?—And also at the same time the general impression which one obtains about the tone of a factory—because the appearance of the girls is a very great help in settling a matter of this kind.

6942. I see you are inclined to think that the alleged displacement of men by women and girls does not really take place?—Very rarely indeed is it a real displacement.

6943. Then the employment of women in that way is not increasing?—The employment of women over 25 is not increasing at all; it has been declining. In certain localities and in certain trades you have something which is practically the same thing as displacement, and people are as badly off as if something of the kind had happened. In making a statement like that, I was excluding machinery as one of the causes. I said that women did not displace men, but I would not deny that here and there you have cases where machinery and women together displace men, although in many cases there is no actual displacement; it is an addition to the department, and the men are all employed on something else.

6944. You do not think that women are invading the provinces of men then?—They are getting into easier and better paid work than they did formerly, and that easier and better paid work was involved in the work which the men did—it was part of the work which men have done; but nearly always it is the case that the man has gone to something better. If you look through the changes in the employment of men between 1891 and 1901 you will find that nearly every group which shows a decline in the employment of men also shows a decline in the employment of women. The groups which show an increase in the employment of men are distinctly men's trades. There has been a decided demand in men's trades, which has drawn the better men away from the lower paid trades in which they were at work with women. (See tables appended.)

6945. Have the women replaced them there?—The women have not increased there, generally speaking; it is only that they have not declined to the same extent. But there are certain cases which I thought would contradict that statement that I have been looking at; they do not absolutely contradict the statement, but they should be noted. In Walsall in the saddlery trade the women show an increase in proportion to the increase in the female population, and they do for the whole of England as well, because, of course, that trade is almost concentrated in Walsall. The men, relative to the increase in the male population, show a decline; there was not a decline in numbers employed, but there was a decline relative to the increase in the population. In a case like that I have no knowledge to say whether my statement is true or not, but in Staffordshire there has been a great increase in the demand for railway workers and engine-makers—in the machine and motor trades generally—in fact, there has been a great increase in the men's trades. I think it very probable, therefore, that that increase affected Walsall, and drew off a certain number of men from the trade there. Then looking up to find the age period that was affected, there is a diminution in the number of boys who enter the trade; that is shown over and over again in these trades in which the men are supposed to have been kept out by the women; it simply is that the number of boys entering the trade has diminished, and that seems to me to be a very good thing.

6946. That looks as if the men were leaving that trade altogether by degrees?—No; I think there is enough to carry on the trade; probably with the introduction of machinery the output is quite as large as it need be.

6947. At any rate, the number of men employed does not increase in it?—Not in so great a proportion as the population.

6948. It keeps pace with the population?—Not quite. With women it has slightly increased relative to the female population in the one trade of saddlery. Hosiery is another trade where I thought that the men had been decidedly displaced, but I find that the employment of women in proportion to the female population has slightly decreased. In the brush trade there is a real decrease in the number of men employed; that is a decrease in the number not merely in the rate. There is an increase in the number of the women, not in the rate.

6949. Then practically it is only in what you may call clerical employments that women are increasing at a more rapid rate than the population?—The men are increasing in clerical employment at a much greater rate than women. The normal state of things is for the men to show no change compared with the population, but in the group of commercial clerks the men show a very great increase. (See Table IV. appended.)

6950. Above the population rate?—Yes.

6951. And a much greater increase than the women?—Yes. The men show an increase of 37 per 10,000 of male population, and the women show an increase of 26 per 10,000 of female population. That figure of 37 for the men is very remarkable. There were 78,000 more men clerks and 38,000 more women clerks.

6952. (Mr. Bailey.) In what period was there that increase?—Between 1891 and 1901. Whenever I speak in this manner I am referring to the Census Returns, and I have not anything more recent than 1901.

6953. (Mr. King.) Speaking about driving, you say in your Proof, "It is better for a girl to earn 12s. a week in 48 hours than 16s. a week in 59½ hours"; would it not be possible to drive also in the 48 hours?—Driving for the 48 hours is not so bad as driving for the 59½.

6954. If you fix only a minimum piece rate, would it not be possible for the employer to give the particular woman who is employed on that piece-work so small a quantity that she does not earn a sufficient living wage during the week; therefore, ought there not also to be a minimum time rate?—It is not to the employer's interest to give a girl too little work, if there is machinery.

6955. No; but if there is not machinery, what then? I was thinking more of the tailoring trade?—But the tailoring trade is so largely machinery.

6956. To a certain extent it is, but the contractor might have a large number of orders for which he was paying lower wages than our minimum, and he might split up the higher paid work among his whole force, so that their weekly earnings might be a very small sum, unless we had also a time minimum as well as a piece-rate minimum. He would not pay our minimum for all classes of work that he was performing, assuming that he is a man who wants to sweat his employees?—That depends upon whether you choose a rate which is higher than his ordinary rate. If the contractors send in tenders and state the rate they propose to pay, that would be their ordinary rate.

6957. I am afraid it would not be so judging from experience. They pay more on Government work than they do on their own work—if they are pressed, that is?—Then you would be obliged to have that check of inspecting the factory and inspecting the wage books.

6958. Do you think we could insist that his general rate must be the rate that he proposes to pay on the Government work?—No. I should not do that, if he charges you more because it is Government work. He could not possibly run his factory if he paid the girls on that scale. Of course, if you are content to pay him this extra outlay, he is willing to pay the higher rate, but he cannot do that for the ordinary market.

6959. Then why should the Government pay the higher rate?—I see no reason why it should.

6960. But generally, in tendering, the rate that would be quoted to us would be more than the rate the man is paying on his other classes of work?—Is that so in the tailoring trade?

6961. It is so in the County Council work, I know; and they insist on a minimum?—But the County Council fix the minimum, and I am not proposing that you should fix the minimum.

6962. Should we tell the contractors, or the people tendering, that the rate they put down in their tender must be the rate they are paying to all their employers on every class of work, and that they must not fix a special rate for our work?—I do not feel that I can have any opinion on that until I know how far their rates differ from each other. It might not be necessary.

6963. Would you recommend that we should put 48 hours in our conditions and insist on the 48-hour week?—I am in favour of anything which brings down the hours, and I believe that it could be done without any increased expense to the employer, because these girls aim at getting a certain amount per week, and if they had only to work 48 hours they would get that amount in the 48 hours.

6964. On piece-work they would, of course?—Yes; these trades are all piece-work for the women.

6965. Three paragraphs lower down you refer to some special work, and you say, "It is not 'fair' that women, by political or other pressure, should be forced to demand higher pay for certain work requiring no more skill than other work done by women"—which does not, in fact, require more than ordinary skill. What sort of work is it that you had in mind there that women get more highly paid for than they ought to be paid?—Nearly always, I think, when this question is raised by the Trade Unionists.

6966. That women are paid more highly than they should be?—No. This refers to some new work. They demand that the women should not be given the work except at the rate which has been paid to the men hitherto. It is done frequently on work which is not more skilled than the ordinary women's work.

6967. (Mr. Hillier.) Whether it is piece or time-work—I am speaking now of women's work generally—the best criterion as to the fairness of the wages would be the amount of money they could earn in a week, would it not?—If you take into consideration the distribution of ages and the question whether pressure is applied; I do not think you can always measure it by the earnings, even; because, you see, one factory may have quite a different class of girl from another factory, and a much more efficient class of girl, and consequently you might be paying the same piece-rate and yet have a class of girl so much less efficient, that the weekly earnings would be less.

6968. Would it not be to the advantage of the employer to get the most efficient labour, if he is paying a piece-work rate?—But he cannot always get the most efficient labour.

6969. It would be to his advantage to do it, would it not?—It would be to his advantage to do it.

6970. You suggested that in inviting tenders for the tailoring trade, we should demand a schedule of rates. It would be necessary to make investigation in the case of everyone of those tenders, to see whether they were working under equal conditions, would it not?—I think you should inspect the factory before, or at any rate, when you start with it.

6971. Each one?—I think so.

6972. That would involve a tremendous amount of labour, and then I do not see quite what would be gained. I think what would be the better plan is to stick to our terms, that they should be paid the current rate?—Yes, but you have to find out the current rate for girls. You not only have to inspect the factory itself, and its wages books, but you have to find out what the other people pay in other trades; and so far as I can gather, you have no ground for making those other trades give you information.

6973. Only by comparison with what women in the same class of life can earn in other trades in the district; that would be an index as to the fairness of the rate, would it not?—Yes; but you have to find out what they are paid in the other trades.

6974. But knowing what is paid in other trades, that is what the ordinary earnings of a woman in that district should be?—Yes.

6975. What remedy would you suggest to provide against what I call undue sweating of the unskilled labour of women? You see you have dwelt upon the skilled portion of female labour, but there is a certain amount of unskilled labour where women are employed; what remedy would you suggest to prevent undue sweating there?—Is that labour on something which cannot have a piece-rate?

6976. Yes?—Then I think it would be a minimum wage.

6977. Would you advocate a minimum wage being inserted in the contract?—For what class of work would that be?

6978. Would you advocate that there should be no women's labour that should not be worth a certain rate per hour, we will say, or a certain rate per week, and that that should be the minimum?—Working full time?

6979. Yes?—Provided you do not insist that they must work the full time.

6980. No, you would not insist on that, but you would insist that no employer should be able to get that woman's labour at less than so much per hour, or so much per week?—I should not apply it, for reasons which I have stated, in cases where it is piece-work. I believe that driving does more harm than anything else; and I believe that fixing a minimum, if you fix it high enough, encourages driving; and if you fix it low, I do not see that it does any good. Supposing, for instance, it was a case of scrubbers, then I should fix a minimum. I have received to-day an admirable paper from the Women's Co-operative Guild, which is to be read in June, in which they give their ideas. They are working women, and they give their ideas there as to what the minimum should be in their co-operative societies. At 14 years there should be a minimum of 5s., at 15 a minimum of 7s., at 16 a minimum of 9s., at 17 a minimum of 11s., at 18 a minimum of 13s., at 19 a minimum of 15s., at 20 a minimum of 17s.

6981. They suggest those wages?—Yes, for discussion at their Congress.*

* (Note by Witness on Revise). On June 24th the Women's Co-operative Guild passed the following Resolution: "That as a step towards the adoption of equal pay for equal work, this Congress is of opinion that no Co-operative Society should pay less than 13s. at 18 and 19s. at 21 to their women employees, and all branches to take active steps to secure the adoption of a scale based on these minimums in their Co-operative Societies."

6982. What ratio would they bear to the wages paid to men in the same industry?—If it is a time wage, I think you never do have men doing the same work.

6983. For instance, if a man and woman were employed, we will say 50 hours per week, one doing one kind of work—the man's portion of the work, and the woman doing the other kind of work—the woman's portion of the work, what do you think should be the ratio between the two wages? Do you think the woman ought to earn, we will say two-thirds of what the man is getting?—I should never look at it in that way. I should look at what the woman can get elsewhere, if the choice is between this job and another job. If you insist on her being paid more than they will consent to pay, she has to look round and go to something worse. You do her no good by having any abstract idea of her relation to man's work; her wage is not settled in relation to it.

6984. Do you favour home-work?—I think home work is a very good thing under good conditions.

6985. Then you would not like to see it abolished?—Certainly not.

6986. (Mr. Black.) From your experience as an investigator, do you think there is much difficulty in getting at the current rate for women in any particular case? Supposing a dispute arises between a Government Department and a contractor with the ordinary Clause that he shall pay the current rate of wages in the district, do you think there would be much difficulty in ascertaining what was the current rate?—I do not think I should have any difficulty myself in ascertaining it to my own satisfaction.

6987. How would you go about finding out?—I have brought here some samples of wages. I thought that one of the best ways of giving an impression would be to take what I may call the middle half, leaving the 25 per cent. at the bottom and the 25 per cent. at the top; that is leaving the exceptionally good, and the others who were earning lower wages. In Westminster, in the Bond Street district, putting aside the fitters and cutters, and taking the bodice and skirt hands, I find that the middle half earn from 14s. to 21s., and in Kensington and Marylebone from 12s. to 19s.

6988. That is in itself a wide margin, 14s. to 21s., is it not?—There is all that difference. These are paid time rates, and there is all that difference in the capacity of the girl. The range of women's earnings has greatly increased over a period of years; that means that they are really becoming much more efficient; and, of course, it is in the dressmaking trade that there is most opportunity for such a range. Taking the Soho tailoresses, who work for the West End journeymen tailors, at their shops or at their homes, their full time wage is a high one, only they have a great deal of slack time. Their middle half ranges from 21s. to 27s. That is based on wages of tailoresses working for 120 tailors.

6989. That idea of taking the capacity is rather against the men's Trade Union principle, is it not? They generally tell us that a certain fixed rate is the current wage, and they would hardly admit that from 14s. to 21s., or anywhere between that point according to capacity, was the current wage of the district for a competent worker?—But those men are men, and they are always speaking of people over 21, I believe. These ranges that I am giving you are for women of 18 years and upwards. A large number of them are between 18 and 25 and they are improving, and in this particular trade they go on, if they have got the ability, improving for a great many years, and their earnings increase with their improvement; but, of course, they do not improve in every case.

6990. With a real difference in the type of work they are doing perhaps, or in the relative importance of it?—They do something which people want done, and which cannot be done by men. Men are quite out of it in these trades, although you do have a few men in ladies' tailoring.

6991. An improver ought, strictly speaking, to be employed on a less skilled portion of the work, I suppose; that is to say, the person getting 21s. ought to be doing work of a higher grade than the person who is getting 14s.? I mean, the difference is not a mere difference in capacity?—It is a difference in capacity. She would be put on to work which requires a great deal more taste and a great deal more ability. There is a very wide range of skill. People who might have it in them to earn £2 at printing would only perhaps be worth 14s. at dressmaking. Then I have the wages of 114 tailoresses working for two East End contractors. There I have not got the ages separate. The middle half for all ages is 10s. 6d. to 15s. 11d., the maximum being 26s. 4d. If those under 18 were subtracted, of course, these figures would come much nearer the previous ones I gave you. The tailoring trade I consider comes next to the dressmaking in the amount that can be earned by a capable woman; but they rarely go beyond 30s., and they have no chance of rising to be cutters. Mr. Bowley gives an analysis of the wages for women in the book-folding and bookbinding trades in "Women in the Printing trades," a volume published by the Women's Industrial Council. There, taking all ages, the middle half is 10s. 5d. to 16s. 6d., and the maximum is 24s. You do not need to know anything about the textile trades, and so I need not go into that. But I think that if you take the middle half in any factory from the wage books, that is if you get the whole thing, and then take out the middle half——

6992. And allow for capacity?—Yes—there ought to be a correspondence in almost any factory in the same trade, making allowance for age. You will be able to test it, of course, by the Board of Trade wages inquiry when that is done.

6993. We have had it rather strongly stated, I think by the saddlery people in particular, that a great many of their people actually have gone into workhouses. I do not suppose they contend that that is entirely due to their displacement by women, but that is one of the causes. I take it, therefore, that your general conclusion—that the men have in all cases gone on to better employment—would, perhaps, be subject to a good many qualifications?—Can I take the case of Leicester, which would present a good many things which would be not exceptions to my general statement, because my general statement would not apply to them at all? In the boot and shoe trade the home work amongst the men has stopped, but of the men who used to do this work at home a large number of the older men, not all, refused to go into the factory. After a man has been working at home until he is 40, it is difficult to induce him to go inside a factory. Therefore, you have in the boot trade a large number of men out of work who never will do any work in the trade.

6994. (Mr. Bailey.) Have you any general idea about the increase or diminution of the employment of women in the vellum binding?—I only know these things on the large scale, so far as I can get them from the census.

6995. You do not know about the individual trades then?—No, I have never inquired into the vellum binding at all, and I do not know anything about it.

6996. (Mr. De la Bère.) With regard to the driving, especially in Lancashire, that you have mentioned, does the complaint arise chiefly from the women, or does it come from the men also?—That is a little difficult to answer, because the men do nearly all the complaining for the women in Lancashire.

6997. We had a lady from Lancashire a fortnight ago?—I have been told by a 4-loom weaver that in Burnley, where there are a good many men weaving too, the women are constantly being driven to produce the full amount from their looms, by the fear that a man might be put to take their place. Of course, wherever you have the men and the women very nearly equal, there is a good deal of running them against each other.

6998. The reason why I ask is that the Lancashire weaving trade presents a very striking example where men and women are employed on practically the same work and where they draw the same rate of wages—I think I am right in saying that?—But it is not at all peculiar. I think you will find it very difficult to find a place where doing the same work they are paid a different piece rate of wages.

6999. Perhaps so, but it is very rarely that they do precisely the same work to the extent that they do in Lancashire in the cotton-weaving?—I fancy that in the other industries the earnings are too low to keep the men still competing.

7000. Elsewhere they are either doing different branches of the work or they are not on the same thing; but in Lancashire they are on precisely the same?—Yes, they are doing the same work.

7001. Does not the driving arise from the endeavour on the woman's part to compete with the man, to keep her place, and to be paid at the same rate as the man?—It has always been a woman's rate. It is usual to speak of the Lancashire wages as higher than other people's wages for women.

7002. It is 21s. and something that they mostly get?—That would be a four-loom weaver's wage. A very large number of the women work four looms, but a larger number work three looms. The way in which they are being driven in parts of Lancashire is this—if a woman cannot turn off a certain amount from her four looms she may only have three looms, and that lowers her wages more than she wants them lowered. So she is obliged to work up to a certain amount. But they never go above 25s., and a woman of that capacity in other trades in London could earn a great deal more; they would be forewomen or doing things that brought them a much higher wage. The women got the first start in cotton, because they went into the factory while the men still stayed at the hand-loom at home. They had always done cotton-weaving with their fathers, and there was no question of a different rate when the husband took all the earnings, his wife's earnings and his daughter's earnings as well. When they went into the factory the women went first, and they have always been in the majority—long before there was a Union. I do not believe there was ever any question of a different rate of pay. They earned higher wages formerly than in any other trade, because that was the only trade that had machinery. In any skilled trade that uses machinery the women can earn now more easily, I think, as high wages as can be earned by the four-loom weavers in Lancashire. I took the wages of the middle half so far as I could from the 1886 wages census. I do not think there has been much change: but perhaps there has been an improvement of from 10 per cent. to 15 per cent. in the rates since 1886. The range of the middle half then apparently was 12s. 6d. to 18s. 6d. in the cotton trade as a whole for the women.

7003. Do you think as regards driving there is really very much difference between the piece-rate and the day-rate? Does not the day-rate result in driving by a foreman, we will say, and a piece-rate in the worker driving herself?—The day-rate under compulsion is what I was speaking of. Generally speaking, if you are paid by time you are not expected to work so hard as when you are paid by piece; but if he is compelled to pay somebody a minimum time-wage—more than that girl has been in the habit of earning at the piece-rate—then, in order to bring her up to the standard and show a proper return in the wage books, the employer may have to drive her quite against his will.

7004. Do you not think that the worker on a piece-rate perhaps will drive herself? There is a natural tendency in human nature to earn as much as possible if you are paid by piece, do you not think?—Yes, certainly. But these girls, as I have said in my notes, have a standard of their own, which makes it entirely impossible for outsiders to settle what they ought to earn, because they are content when they have earned a certain amount.

7005. Then, again, on piecework is there not a certain incentive to drive from the fact that an employer cannot afford to keep a piece-worker who does not earn a fair rate and whose output is small? He has his machinery going, his establishment charges, and all the rest of it, and he must get a certain output out of his workers to make it pay?—Yes; but how far he can make them work depends very much upon the state of the labour market around him. I think there are a good many employers who really would not make the girls work as hard as some other employers can. I very frequently note in going through the factories that the high-wage factories were not the nicest ones to be in.

7006. I think that very likely is because the employer has to get his money's worth?—He is quite determined to get more than his money's worth; I think that is what I call driving.

7007. Of course, it is extremely difficult for a Government inspector to judge by any other standard than the earnings. The workpeople may seem to be very happy and contented and to be healthy-looking, but it is difficult for him, I think, to arrive at any conclusions as to, I will not say the fairness of their treatment, but as to the value of their earnings, except by the direct payments made to them?—That is so. I gave you the wages of the middle half of the girls employed by two tailors, East End contractors. One of them showed a decidedly higher range than the other, but the girls there were a good deal older and they were working under a different system which had certainly ensured their not slacking off. Then they were working in a district which was a very unpleasant district to work in. The others were within range of a large park and had very good rooms; they were not driven at all. They were a great deal younger, and I should say were enjoying themselves very much more and were not aiming at producing so much work. My point is that you do a great injury to girls later on in life by forcing them when they are young. They were both, I think, well managed; but there was no question about it that one, so far as wages was concerned, would be given the first place, but if I had had to send a girl to a factory I would have sent her to the other.

7008. Do you think that is a view which the average Union would take in comparing the places?—The women are not really represented by any Union.

7009. Some of them are—I mean there are some women's Unions, at any rate, in the North?—There are; but I was talking of the factory tailoring.

7010. And there is no Union in that?—No representative Union. Even in the North, you know, the women's Unions are under the men.

7011. (Mr. Black.) With one exception that we have heard of?—Yes. There may be more than one exception. But in the large cotton Trade Unions nearly every official, in every branch, is a man.

The witness withdrew.

APPENDIX.

Statement handed in by Miss Collet. (See Q. 6944—6952.)

COMPARISON OF CENSUS OCCUPATION RETURNS FOR 1901 AND 1891.

From the following tables it appears that in the selected group of the most important trades in which men and women compete, both sexes show a decline in employment, compared with population, at every age period, both in England and Wales and in Scotland (Table II.).

In the remaining trades (exclusive of female domestic indoor service) in the majority of which men and women do not compete, the employment of males at each age period between 15 and 65 shows an increase, compared with male population, both in England and in Scotland. The employment of females in England showed a decline, compared with female population, at every age period over 25 and an increase under 25 years of age, the net result being a decline; in Scotland it showed a decline between 45 and 65 years of age and an increase at every other age period, the net result being an increase (Table III.).

The net result of these changes is shown in Table I. The proportionate employment of males shows a net increase in England and Wales and in Scotland; the employment of females shows a net decrease in England and Wales and a net increase in Scotland.

Tables showing for England and Wales and Scotland (a) the number of Males per 10,000 males, and of Females per 10,000 females at each Age Period returned as occupied in 1901 and 1891, with the Increase or Decrease per 10,000 in 1901 compared with 1891: and (b) the Increase or Decrease in actual numbers returned as occupied at each Age Period.

TABLE I.—ALL OCCUPATIONS (EXCLUDING FEMALE DOMESTIC INDOOR SERVICE).

Age Period. Years.	England and Wales. 1901.	England and Wales. 1891.	England and Wales. Increase or Decrease.	Scotland. 1901.	Scotland. 1891.	Scotland. Increase or Decrease.
	(a) Occupied Males per 10,000 Males at each Age Period.
10 and under 15	2,186	2,602	− 416	1,821	2,260	− 439
15 „ 25	9,446	9,384	+ 62	9,573	9,466	+ 107
25 „ 45	9,805	9,773	+ 32	9,864	9,840	+ 24
45 „ 65	9,329	9,341	− 12	9,532	9,567	− 35
65 and upwards	6,063	6,477	− 414	6,716	6,968	− 252
Above 10 years	8,370	8,314	+ 56	8,400	8,325	+ 75
Total Occupied	10,156,976	8,806,415	+1,350,561	1,391,188	1,203,909	+ 187,279
	(a) Occupied Females (exclusive of Domestic Indoor Servants) per 10,000 Females at each Age Period.
10 and under 15	812	961	− 149	983	1,115	− 132
15 „ 25	3,796	3,592	+ 204	4,673	4,326	+ 347
25 „ 45	1,882	2,058	− 176	2,022	2,014	+ 8
45 „ 65	1,704	2,018	− 314	1,682	1,805	− 123
65 and upwards	1,124	1,322	− 198	1,279	1,330	− 51
Above 10 years	2,140	2,233	− 93	2,432	2,369	+ 63
Total Number	2,822,350	2,559,413	+ 262,937	435,523	378,943	+ 56,580
	(b) Increase or Decrease in Numbers at each Age Period in the above group.
	Males.	Females.		Males.	Females.
10 and under 15	− 54,004	− 19,295		− 8,437	− 2,142
15 „ 25	+ 364,158	+ 211,353		+ 57,428	+ 37,870
25 „ 45	+ 715,662	+ 84,977		+ 98,210	+ 19,382
45 „ 65	+ 316,804	− 9,170		+ 38,695	+ 1,040
65 and upwards	+ 7,941	− 4,928		+ 1,383	+ 430
10 and upwards	+1,350,561	+ 262,937		+ 187,279	+ 56,580

TABLE II.—SELECTED GROUP OF OCCUPATIONS IN WHICH MEN AND WOMEN COMPETE, VIZ.: (1) TAILORING, DRESS AND NEEDLEWORK TRADES; (2) TEXTILE TRADES; (3) BOOT AND SHOE TRADE; (4) COMMERCIAL CLERKS; (5) DRAPERS; AND (6) TEACHERS.

SUMMARY OF SELECTED GROUP.

Age Period. Years.	England and Wales. 1901.	England and Wales. 1891.	England and Wales. Increase or Decrease.	Scotland. 1901.	Scotland. 1891.	Scotland. Increase or Decrease.
	(a) Males per 10,000 of Male Population at each Age Period.
10 and under 15	363	512	— 149	277	434	— 157
15 „ 25	1,249	1,374	— 125	1,071	1,347	— 276
25 „ 45	1,061	1,067	— 6	957	1,060	— 103
45 „ 65	843	910	— 67	929	1,015	— 86
65 and upwards	546	643	— 97	680	844	— 164
Above 10 years	942	1,007	— 65	869	1,016	— 147
Total Number	1,145,051	1,066,848	+ 78,203	144,067	146,987	— 2,920
	(a) Females per 10,000 of Female Population at each Age Period.
10 and under 15	541	701	— 160	507	684	— 177
15 „ 25	2,322	2,348	— 26	2,696	2,812	— 116
25 „ 45	987	1,083	— 96	1,138	1,183	— 45
45 „ 65	515	610	— 95	633	720	— 87
65 and upwards	258	300	— 42	398	470	— 72
Above 10 years	1,125	1,205	— 80	1,295	1,372	— 77
Total Number	1,483,734	1,380,706	+ 103,028	231,866	219,412	+ 12,454
	(b) Increase or Decrease in Numbers at each Age Period in the above group.
	Males.	Females.		Males.	Females.
10 and under 15	— 21,670	— 22,403		— 3,320	— 3,542
15 „ 25	+ 12,401	+ 85,701		— 4,650	+ 9,330
25 „ 45	+ 74,072	+ 43,551		+ 4,445	+ 8,150
45 „ 65	+ 16,241	— 2,871		+ 1,616	— 952
65 and upwards	— 2,841	— 950		— 1,011	— 532
Above 10 years	+ 78,203	+ 103,028		— 2,920	+ 12,454

TABLE III.—ALL OTHER OCCUPATIONS (EXCLUDING THE SELECTED GROUP).

Age Period. Years.	England and Wales. 1901.	England and Wales. 1891.	England and Wales. Increase or Decrease.	Scotland. 1901.	Scotland. 1891.	Scotland. Increase or Decrease.
	(a) Males per 10,000 of Male Population at each Age Period.
10 and under 15	1,823	2,090	— 267	1,544	1,826	— 282
15 „ 25	8,197	8,010	+ 187	8,502	8,119	+ 383
25 „ 45	8,744	8,706	+ 38	8,907	8,780	+ 127
45 „ 65	8,486	8,431	+ 55	8,603	8,552	+ 51
65 and upwards	5,517	5,834	— 317	6,036	6,124	— 88
Above 10 years	7,428	7,307	+ 121	7,531	7,309	+ 222
Total Number	9,011,925	7,739,567	+1,272,358	1,247,121	1,056,922	+ 190,199
	(a) Females per 10,000 of Female Population at each Age Period (also excluding Domestic Indoor Service).
10 and under 15	271	260	+ 11	476	431	+ 45
15 „ 25	1,474	1,244	+ 230	1,977	1,514	+ 463
25 „ 45	895	975	— 80	884	831	+ 53
45 „ 65	1,189	1,408	— 219	1,049	1,085	— 36
65 and upwards	866	1,022	— 156	881	860	+ 21
Above 10 years	1,015	1,028	— 13	1,137	997	+ 140
Total Number	1,338,616	1,178,707	+ 159,909	203,657	159,531	+ 44,126
	(b) Increase or Decrease in Numbers at each Age Period in the above group.
	Males.	Females.		Males.	Females.
10 and under 15	— 32,334	+ 3,108		— 5,117	+ 1,400
15 „ 25	+ 351,757	+ 125,652		+ 62,078	+ 28,540
25 „ 45	+ 641,590	+ 41,426		+ 93,765	+ 11,232
45 „ 65	+ 300,563	— 6,299		+ 37,079	+ 1,992
65 and upwards	+ 10,782	— 3,978		+ 2,394	+ 962
Above 10 years	+1,272,358	+ 159,909		+ 190,199	+ 44,126

For changes in each section of this group see pages 208–213 in the Eleventh Abstract of Labour Statistics of the United Kingdom, 1905–1906 (Cd. 3690 of 1907).

TABLE IV.—COMMERCIAL CLERKS.

Age Period. Years.	England and Wales. 1901.	1891.	Increase or Decrease.	Scotland. 1901.	1891.	Increase or Decrease.
	(a) Males per 10,000 of Male Population at each Age Period.
10 and under 15	59	52	+ 7	65	101	− 36
15 „ 25	461	402	+ 59	412	428	− 16
25 „ 45	267	231	+ 36	241	215	+ 26
45 „ 65	148	121	+ 27	138	112	+ 26
65 and upwards	59	49	+ 10	56	48	+ 8
Above 10 years	254	217	+ 37	233	225	+ 8
Total Number	307,889	229,370	+ 78,519	38,511	32,584	+ 5,927
	(a) Females per 10,000 of Female Population at each Age Period.
10 and under 15	8	3	+ 5	28	11	+ 17
15 „ 25	113	38	+ 75	252	75	+ 177
25 „ 45	33	15	+ 18	53	19	+ 34
45 „ 65	5	3	+ 2	4	2	+ 2
65 and upwards	1	—	+ 1	—	1	− 1
Above 10 years	42	16	+ 26	86	27	+ 59
Total Number	55,784	17,859	+ 37,925	15,399	4,284	+ 11,115
	(b) Increase or Decrease in Numbers at each Age Period in the above Group.
	Males.	Females.		Males.	Females.
10 and under 15	+ 1,562	+ 907		− 767	+ 404
15 „ 25	+ 33,048	+ 26,260		+ 1,652	+ 8,328
25 „ 45	+ 32,530	+ 10,099		+ 3,674	+ 2,338
45 „ 65	+ 10,444	+ 618		+ 1,269	+ 51
65 and upwards	+ 935	+ 41		+ 99	− 6
Above 10 years	+ 78,519	+ 37,925		+ 5,927	+ 11,115

INDEX TO EVIDENCE.

I.—DIGEST OF EVIDENCE OF EACH WITNESS.

1. Mr. David Charles Cummings—

Represents Trade Union Congress, Parliamentary Committee, 1–2.

Certain firms pay fair wages to some men only, e.g. (a) on buildings, men may get fair wages: in shop, unfair wages, 4–10. Government Departments will not take action in such cases, 4, 7. Discussion on (a) 157-161. (b) On buildings, a few men receive fair wages, the remainder do not, 11, 113-114, 162-163. Some Municipal bodies will not permit this, 11. (c) While doing Government work, a few men get fair wages, but revert to unfair rate when this is finished, a common practice in trades where men are not well organised, 15. Firms in question compete unfairly with good ones, 17, and should not be encouraged by Government, 18. Discussion on (c) 115–128.

Resolution should be amended so as to exclude all but fair houses from contracts, 19, 67, 80–91.

Where firms move out of town into country and set up their own rates, the rates in nearest town doing similar work should apply, 20–23, 43–44; most employers would assent, 27; difficulties in applying this remedy, 24–47, 92–99, 175–180; lower rates in a new centre tend to reduce them all round, 31; arguments against reducing rates of wages even where cost of living is lower, 36–39; rates of wages vary in different districts, 40–42. Discussion, 136–140, 150–156, 167–168, 180.

Firms have claimed to be in a low-wage district when they are really in another where wages are higher, 44. Oldbury firm, struck off London County Council's list, 44; discussion on limits of district, 129–135. Nearest locality should be held to be proper district in such cases, 45–47.

Wages should be those agreed upon by employers and men, 42, 182. Failing agreement, the rates in nearest district should apply, 66.

Firms should observe the conditions and hours of labour agreed upon by employers and Trade Unions of the district, 48; discussion on relation between day-work and piece-work, 49–59.

A schedule of wages should be posted in the works, 60–65, 110–112, 172–174.

Trade Unions should be informed where contracts are placed, 67–75, 100–110.

Position of Witness's Union, the Boilermakers', 144–149.

Trade Union Rates and wording of Fair Wages Resolution, 164–166.

Some industries have no Trade Union, 169–171.

Evasions chiefly occur in less organised trades, 183–185

Boys' work and men's work, 186–188.

Female labour employed at unfair rates, 137, 140, 183.

---

2. Mr. Thomas Ellis Naylor—

Is General Secretary of London Society of Compositors, 189.

London firms start printing works in country towns where there are no printers and so set up their own rates, 191–201; remedy is to use the term "Trade Union rates and conditions," 198, 224, 257–258; these are agreed upon with employers and could be applied, 199–201, 224–229; they cover such matters as hours of work and excessive overtime, 209; discussion on this, 209A-213, 234–237.

Where works are started in an isolated district, the Trade Union conditions of the nearest town in which they are in operation should apply, 202-208.

Women employed as compositors should be paid men's wages, 191; objections to such employment, 191–197, 209, 238–256; the nature of the work is not unsuitable for women, 193. Very little competition between men and women, but what there is is serious, 238.

Contracts secured on London prices, but work done in the country, 214–221; this practice has the drawbacks of subletting, 222–223

Contractor should be made to declare where work is to be done, 230.

No opposition to labour-saving machinery, 195. Limitation of number of apprentices, 213, 231.

Cheap and excessive boy labour, 209, 213, 231–233.

Is satisfied with the organisations of employers and men, as means of settling wages in London, 259.

---

3. Mr. Arthur Harris—

Is General Secretary of Labour Protection League, a Trade Union for unskilled labour, having from 3,500 to 4,000 members in the Eastern district of London, 262–268; no member is admitted under 21 years of age, 348–353.

Of 31 firms of Government Contractors in the district of his Union, only one pays for unskilled labour so much as 6d. per hour, the rate which in the year 1889, after the Dock Strike, was recognised as the proper rate; the others have paid, in some instances, 3d. to 4½d. per hour for men, and 1½d. per hour for girls, and 22s. per week for men who should receive 30s. per week, 269–274, 283, 284, 293, 301–303, 311, 339, 391–3.

The current rate for unskilled labour on the edge of the London District is 5d. to 5½d. per hour, 307–308.

Quotes rates for various classes of unskilled labour in London District, such as navvy, builder's labourer, docker, corn porter, etc., 274–280, 300, 307–308, 311–316, 341-345, 356.

Not many of the 31 firms do London County Council work; if they did the Union could bring pressure upon them, 322–323.

Applications to Government Departments for redress have been futile, 271–272, 285–299; discussion on this, 317–321, 388–390, 394–395.

The Committee should recommend a minimum or living wage of 6d. per hour, or 30s. per week, for all unskilled labour, 293, 304, 309–311, 339; the minimum to apply to the whole country, 378–380, but there would be higher wages in London on account of greater cost of living, 380–381, 387; his Union desires to assimilate the rates of the various kinds of such labour, 325; discussion on this, 326–340, 356–378.

Difficulties in organising unskilled labour, 305, 311, 324.

Fair Wages Resolution has had an effect in some respects in raising wages, 306, but there has been no satisfaction, 391.

Casual labourers do not take Government or any regular employment, 346–347, 353–355.

Discussion on extent of "London District," 382–386.

---

4. Mr. J. Charles Gordon—

Is General Secretary of the National Amalgamated Tin and Iron Plate, Sheet and Metal Workers and Braziers' Union, 397, 398.

Is far from satisfied with the working of the Fair Wages Clause: from some standpoints is satisfied, but there is room for improvement: it has done some good, 399–401; discussion on this, 447–449, 451; the words "current rate" can be overridden to the detriment of fair employers, 402.

The words "current rate" should be altered to "Trade Union rates and conditions"; these are arranged between employers and men, and are the only really fair conditions, 402; discussion on this, 440–446, 474–483, 532–540; suggested alternative to Trade Union's proposal and discussion on term "district," 491–506.

Every district fixes its own rate subject to a minimum, 432.

Basis of Trade Union rates, 514.

Government Departments have made inquiry into complaints, but have not been quick in doing so, 546–549.

Isolated works, or works with peculiar facilities: Government Departments' ruling of meaning of "current rates" in such cases, 426. Rates in nearest town should rule in such instances, 427; discussion on this, 428–433, 440–446, 507, 527–531.

Desires uniformity of practice in Government Departments, 434; the list of persons invited to tender now sent to Trade Union should be supplemented by name of contractor, 434–438, 541–545.

Boy labour, undue employment of, in disregard of arrangements with fair houses, 419–421; Fair Wages Clause should cover such arrangements, 422; discussion on this, 424–425.

Power of Trade Union to enforce fair conditions in general trade, 524.

Non-union firms: why they do not accept Trade Union conditions, 508.

Witness's trade is all piece-work, 402–434; Piece-work in relationship to time-work, 512–513.

Trade Union places no restriction on amount of output of any worker, 508–511.

Overtime, steps taken to prevent excessive, 512.

Sectionising of work, why Trade Union objects, and how the practice introduces unskilled labour, 404–415.

Machinery, use of, as affecting rates of wages, 520.

Government work, special prices for: Explains and defends these, and denies collusion between employers and men, 416–418; discussion on, 450–473, 484–490.

---

5. Mr. Charles Hickin—

Is Vice-President of the National Amalgamated Tin and Iron Plate Sheet and Metal Workers' and Braziers' Union, 402.

Sectionising the work introduces female, boy, and non-Unionist labour, and ousts fair employers. Such classes of labour follow Government contracts from shop to shop and work excessive hours, 550; evils to the community arising from boy labour, 562; discussion on above, 563-574.

Definition of "district" needed, 497–500.

Women's labour not suitable for the trade generally; it reduces men's wages, 551–553; discussion on this, 554–559.

Contracts have been obtained by firms arranging low rates with workers, 559–561.

Trade Union rates, basis of, 514; as affecting old and inferior workers, 515; discussion on this, 517–520.

Power of Trade Union to enforce fair conditions in general trade, 521–524.

Government work, fixing the prices for, 458, 470.

---

6. Mr. Edward James Rudd—

Is General Secretary of United French Polishers' London Society; its membership, etc., 575–581, 600, 643–645, 665.

Complaints of a Limehouse firm of War Office contractors: (a) they pay less than standard wages all round, 582–583, 589; how they defend their action, 583–588; (b) they employ piece-work unduly, 590–591; discussion on piece-work system, 616–617, 619–621, 639–641; (c) they work almost exclusively for Government, 622; (d) they sublet work to gangers who employ boys, 629, 633, 634, 642; discussion on complaints made, without result, to War Office, 592–593, 623–629, 638.

Complaints of a building firm at Wandsworth who sublet War Office work, 610, 678–679.

Men in slack times occasionally accept unfair rates of wages, 634–635, 642, and shield the employer who is paying them, 610, 611, 662; penalty for accepting less than Trade Union wages, 665–667. Government should insert "Trade Union rates of wage," 583, 594; discussion on this, 594–596, 603–609; these rates are paid by most London firms, 586–587, 597–599, including builders and decorators, 670–673; minimum time-work rates, 583–585, 600, 616.

"London District" for these rates of wage should include Limehouse, 584–587.

London County Council's dealings with an unfair firm, 583, 614, 615, 651–661.

Time-work rate for polishing, including materials, 674–677.

---

7. Mr. John William Clark—

Is General Secretary of Scientific Instrument Makers' Trade Society; its membership, etc., 681–684.

Firms removing into cheap districts and setting up their own rates, 688, 692, 694; instances, 688–699, 772–778, 813–817. Remedy, to apply Trade Union rate of nearest town or district, 688, 710; in his trade, distance would not exceed 10 to 15 miles, 706–709; discussion on this, and on suggested variation of amending words, 705, 706, 774–778, 821–830.

Expert inspectors should deal with Government contracts, 718, 728, 753, 771–772; present system of inspection not efficient, 718, 728, and inquiry unduly delayed, 718; inspectors should not divulge name of Union making complaint, 728–730.

Firm reported to War Office and Admiralty as paying unfair rates and as sectionising the work, 718–727; objects to latter as equivalent to sub-letting, 724–726, 753; discussion, 801–811.

Firms should be allowed to purchase only such parts as are recognised by the trade as bought parts, 811–812; discussion on this, 891–895.

Firms should pay time-work rate of district, 719, 845, 846. Minimum London time-work rate, 685, 686, 770; average rate for piece-work, 687, 720, 847, 848.

Patented goods should be made by Government, 717; discussion on this, 831–844.

Government work being sent abroad, objections to, 714–717; discussion, 899–901.

Piece-master system, objections to, gives instances of system, 720, 730–736, 794, 799, 800, 910–915.

Women's, 745–749, and boys' labour, objections to, 720, 723, 738–742; discussion on this, 736*a*, 737, 743, 744, 750–760, 779–799, 896–898.

---

8. Mr. Thomas Whatley—

Is Secretary of the Contracts Committee, London Clothiers Cutters' Trade Union, which is a London Union only, of about 325 men, 920–926, 955–956, 980.

Hands in list of "fair houses"; they have to meet competition of other firms with whom "current rate of the district" means anything, 928; and who work piece-work rates or exceed proportion of boy labour, or employ women in place of men, 929; such unfair firms pay proper rates to two or three men only, 934; discussion, 930–935, 939, 957, 963–5, 971, 977, 981–1003, 1014–1019.

Complaints to public departments (Post Office, War Office, Board of Trade), 936–939.

Trade Union rates and conditions should be inserted in contracts, 928, 947–949, 972–6; it is frequently inserted in Municipal Contracts, 950–954; definition of Trade Union conditions, 1004–7. Such firms also take low class workhouse clothing contracts, 947. Country rate might be less than London rate, 929.

Contract should not always be given to lowest tender, 1015.

Apprentices allowed by Union, one to five men, 929, 943.

Piece-work an evil, 1003.

Post Office contracts have a deplorable name, and are paid at the worst rate of any, 939.

Government work, high standard of work required for, 941.

Schedule of prices is sometimes inserted in Municipal Contracts, and this is hung up in the workshops of contractors, 952–954.

Women are not employed as cutters, 971; objects to their doing part of the work hitherto done by men, 1003; women's organisations, 1008–1013.

---

9. Mr. Henry Kail—

Is a member of the Committee of the London Clothiers Cutters' Trade Union, 921.

The greatest trouble of Union is with four small firms, 946–947.

Boys' and women's labour, objections to, 958, 962, 965, 995–1000, 1002–3; where allowed, 971.

---

10. Mr. Frederick William Welch, and (11) Mr. Edward Friend—

Is President of the Vellum (Account Book) Binders' Trade Society, 1020, a London Society of about 650 members. Their work, hours and minimum wages, 1028–1037. Members are mostly on time-work; piece-work is not recognised, but should yield a quarter more wages than time-work, 1038–1039.

Complaints made to Stationery Office of breaches of the Fair Wages Resolution, mainly by employment of cheap labour of improvers, women, or boys, 1040–1053; cheap labour is chiefly used on Government Contracts, 1084–1086; discussion on this, 1045–1046, 1051–1052, 1054–1078, 1087–1104.

Where no Trade Unions exist, the firm should pay the rates of the nearest town, 1079–1081; and should not be allowed to make their own rate, although this has been accepted by Stationery Office, 1108; discussion on this, 1105–1116; suggested that cases should be settled by Union and Employers' Association, 1114–1116.

Women, employment of, in this trade is not increasing, 1074–1078. The Union try to prevent it, 1904, as being cheap labour, 1104. Firms would not be likely to employ women if they were paid at men's rate, 1101, 1102.

Fair Wages Clause has been productive of a certain amount of good, 1259.

---

12. Mr. Ben Turner—

Is President of the Union of Weavers and Textile Workers, which covers the West Riding of Yorkshire, 1264–1265. It comprises men and women, 1387, whose work is quite distinct, 1442–1443.

Complains that women and boys are sometimes employed instead of men, 1321–1330.

Complains of War Office approving of differing rates in the same trade district in the case of mills in or near Leeds and Wakefield, 1266–1270, other instances of varying rates in the district, 1286–1293, 1314–1320, desires to have a uniform rate for all the West Riding, 1271–1273; discussion on this, 1274–1283, 1336–1348.

Firms do Government work who get raw material from an unfair house, 1284, 1294–1296, 1332–1335, 1388–1392.

Cost of living is the same all through the district, 1349.

Standard hours should apply as well as standard wages, 1284, 1350–1353, 1393–1394, 1397–1413.

As to agreement with employers about hours and wages and districts, 1286, 1415, 1420–1440.

Trade Union rate of wages should be "current rate," 1297; discussion on how far this is agreed upon with employers, 1298–1301; suggestion to establish a Committee to settle disputes as to "current rate," 1301–1314, 1331, 1381–1385, 1395–1396.

Names of persons securing contracts should be published, 1321, 1354–1380.

Not much sweating in the West Riding, 1386.

---

13. Mr. John Taylor—

Is Secretary of the Anvil and Vice Trades' Association, Dudley, which extends to Birmingham and Sheffield, 1444–7, and does not touch any other smiths, 1541.

Fair Wages Resolution does not help the Union, 1448; suggested remedy to insert "Trade Union rate" which should be uniform all over the country, 1475–1489; discussion, 1490–1498, 1554–7.

Contract placed with the only firm, one at Sheffield, not paying Trade Union rate, 1448–59; complained to India Office, 1458–9; inferior men working for this firm, 1504–1514; discussion on, 1460–1474, 1504–1540, 1543–53.

Government work, extra rate for, 1471–3, 1499.

---

14. Mr. James Holmes—

Is Secretary of the National Hosiery Federation, which covers the main seat of the trade, i.e., Notts., Leicestershire and Derbyshire, and includes 3,000 men and women, 1558–1563.

It is entirely a machine trade and a piece-work one, 1564-1567; discussion, 1622–1623.

No restriction on output or length of hours, 1665–1669.

Prices have been arranged with employers in some districts but not in others, 1567, 1568, 1632–1636, 1678–1679; rates comprise different work and cannot always be compared, 1568–1569; wages workers can earn, 1570–1572; discussion, 1653–1654.

Complaints of firms: (a) that did not pay the agreed Union rates, 1573–1578; War Office decision on this, 1579; discussion, 1580–1582; (b) that paid Union rates whilst in one place, but moving to another (where there were none), excluded Unionists and did not pay Union rates, 1587–1591, 1670–1673, thus making their own rate, 1591; discussion on such cases, 1625–1653, 1683–1692.

Suggests Trade Union rate should be required, or those of nearest town, 1595, or those of town in which firm has its warehouse, 1607–1608; discussion, 1603–1611, 1638–1640, 1646–1653, 1664; admits this might give employers a grievance, 1650–1653; other possible effects, 1664–1665. Why rates should not be less in the country, 1599–1601; exceptions to this, 1640–1645.

Suggests "district" should be defined within which rates should be operative, say, a radius of 10 miles, 1592; discussion, 1593–1599.

Suggests Government should fix a rate for their own work, 1602; discussion, 1658–1663, 1680–1682; impossibly low tenders should not be accepted, 1693–1695; Government work tends to shut out firms from ordinary work, 1676–1677.

Suggests firms should not be allowed to prevent men joining Union, 1582; discussion, 1583–1586.

Differing rates to men and women for similar work, 1611–1621, 1624.

Employment of women, views on, 1615–1618.

Local Authorities, numbers of, who pay "Trade Union" and "current" rates respectively, 1654–1657.

---

15. Mr. James O'Grady, M.P.—

Is General Organiser of Furnishing Trades Union; its scope and membership, 1696–1702.

Difficulty of preventing sweating and unfair competition, Fair Wages Clause in furniture contracts does not carry out Resolution of House of Commons; even after it was passed, fair employers could not tender for Government work except for special branches of it, 1704; unsatisfactory ruling of Government Departments in regard to unfair houses, 1704–1721, 1774–1775, 1817–1820. Government work usually goes to unfair firms, 1718, which are chiefly found among the larger houses, 1776–1780. Trouble is in the interpretation of the words "current rate," 1721.

Suggests, instead of "current rate," "Trade Union rates and conditions," 1723, or those of nearest town, 1728. As to arranging rates for an isolated firm, or a firm moving into the country, 1740–1744; Trade Union rates, etc., are agreed upon with employers, 1739; discussion, 1722, 1763–1768, 1780.

Suggests that names of firms securing contracts should be given to Trade Unions, 1745–1751.

Suggests that Government specifications for furniture, and system of inspection, need improvement, 1752–1762.

Machinery, use of, as affected by Fair Wages Clause, 1769–1773.

Women's and boys' labour is affected by Trade Union "conditions," 1787–1816.

Apprenticeship, reasons in favour of, 1807–1809

---

16. Mr. Joseph George Dibdin—

Is London District Secretary of the Electrical Trades' Union, which has 2,300 members; its scope, 1821–1828; its relations with the Engineers, etc., 1880–1895; its objections to piece-work, 1919–1925.

Fair Wages Clause as it stands is a farce, 1829; (a) Government Departments delay decision on complaints till work is finished, when action would be too late, 1829–1831, 1850–1851, 1866, 1870, 1896–1901, 1907–1911; (b) firms ought to be in the habit of paying fair wages before they get Government contracts, 1829, 1866–1870, 1912–1917.

Suggests that "Trade Union rate" should be required, 1831–1842; how far this rate is recognised or agreed to by employers, 1842, 1854, 1864, 1872–1879, 1885–1888; instances of firms not paying it, 1851; discussion, 1843–1849, 1851–1864, 1871–1879; as to fair wages for members of his trade, 1891–1895, 1905.

Trade Union "conditions," 1900–1902; difficulties of Union in enforcing its rates of wages, and of Government Departments in dealing with contracts, 1903–1906.

---

17. Mr. Samuel George Porter—

Is General Secretary of the United Society of Brushmakers, which has over 1,300 members (men only) and covers the United Kingdom, 1926–1930. It does not look after interests of women workers, 2033. It has no objection to machinery, 2034–2035. Discussion on scope of Society, 2036–2038.

Fair Wages Resolution has been ineffectual in Government work in his trade, 1931–1933; employers disregard it owing to its indefinite character, 1934–1935; Union is handicapped in case of firms who have established a monopoly in a district; instance at Norwich, 1936–1937, 1964–1967; proportion of fair and unfair houses, 2022. Discussion, 2023–2030, 2032.

Women, employment of, has increased, 1977. Objections to it, 1977. Suggested remedy (of using phrase "Trade Union rate") would help to stop it, 1982; discussion, 1978–1984, 2033, 2041–2053.

"Cheapest is usually the approved tender"; objections to this, 1986–1989.

London firms open factories in suburbs, taking to a great extent workpeople with them, and then change the wages, 1968–1971; discussion, 2039–2041.

Goods are now imported partly manufactured, 1972; explanation and discussion, 1998–2010.

Suggests as remedy the use of words "Trade Union rate of wages," 1938, 2056. The Union does not desire any conditions in addition to Union rate of wages, 2054, 2055; such a rate is nearly always agreed upon with employers, 1900; where no Union rate exists, then that of nearest town should apply, 1939; the Union rate should apply universally, 1945, though it may vary in amount in different places, 1959, 2012, 2021; discussion, 1940, 1962, 1991–1996.

---

18. Mr. William Coleman—

Is Secretary of the Basket, Skip and Hamper Makers' Federation, which comprises five Trade Unions and 1,000 members, all men. It does not recognise female labour generally in the trade, 2057–2063; discussion, 2071–2073, 2154–2158, 2173–2184. The trade is a piece-work one, 2064. The Federation was formed in regard to Government work chiefly, 2064, 2091–2092; its lists of rates are generally accepted by employers, 2093–2099; discussion, 2102–2113, 2159, 2162; it forbids home work, 2064; discussion, 2120–2135, 2149–2153, 2164, 2169–2170. Earnings of a basket maker, 2171–2172.

"Trade Union rate" should be substituted for "current rate," 2064, which, also, badly hits London basket makers, 2088. Instances of firms who have been found subletting (a prevalent practice, 2066–2081, 2136–2139) or employing girls, or paying them and men less than Union rates for Government contracts, 2064–2074; discussion, 2114–2135. Firms who pay Union rates for Government work only, 2088. Difficulty in finding out rates paid, owing to men's silence, 2088, 2099–2101.

Federation should be given names of persons who get contracts, 2081–2087.

Suggests that basket contracts should extend over a year instead of a few months, alteration of date would lead to use of maturer willows, 2088–2089; discussion, 2140–2148.

Laying complaints before heads of departments, 2165–2167.

---

19. Mr. George Dew—

Represents Amalgamated Society of Carpenters and Joiners, a Union spread over the whole country; witness is a member of the London County Council, 2182–2183.

Union members are supposed to work at a recognised rate, 2203. Union does not recognise piece-work, nor does any good class employer, 2234. There is an agreed rate with employers in London and in nearly every important district, 2188–2189.

Fair Wages Resolution has done a great deal of good to his trade, more especially in London district: men on Government work now get fair wages, 2184–2186, 2367–2368.

Evasions of Fair Wages Clause: these occur both in Government and private work, 2190–2194: many cases in Plymouth district, 2195. Instances (a) Admiralty contractor at Keyham refused to allow overtime rates for extra hours, and discharged Union men, 2196–2198. Admiralty decision unsatisfactory, 2198–2201; (b) Admiralty contractor at Turnchapel paid less than Union rates; no action taken by Admiralty, 2202–2204; (c) another firm in same district also paid less than Union wages, but had to refund, 2202; (d) a firm in Plymouth refused to pay walking money, 2204. Discussion on (a), (b), (c) and (d), 2304–2308; (e) War Office contractor at Netley paid less than Union rates; no settlement with War Office; correspondence, 2204; (f) Office of Works contractor at Kingston, within the 12-mile radius of London district, pays less than Union rates, 2206; no intervention by Department, 2206; Union not helped by Government in outer belt of London where Union is weakest, 2210; (g) Office of Works contractor at Sutton, similar case to preceding, 2213–2214; (h) Office of Works contractor at Enfield only pays Union rates, &c., when on Government work: the Union men unable to take employment, 2218; (i) War Office and Office of Works contractors at Woolwich represent that joiners, who should be paid 10½d. are cabinet-makers, whose rate is 10d., 2222–2224; discussion, 2409–2411; (j) two Croydon firms working for Post Office and Office of Works; Departments did not interfere, but allowed firms' plea that there was a local rate of wages, 2225–2227; (k) a Norwich firm doing War Office work, &c., paid Norwich rates when men were working in London, 2228; no redress from Departments, 2228–2231; (l) an Admiralty firm of electrical engineers at Norwich pay carpenters below Union rate, 2231–2232; (m) a firm at Doncaster doing Post Office work is unfair both as to wages and working conditions, and perhaps by having work done by piece-work, 2234; discussion on (m), 2360–2361.

Discussion on War Office cases, 2369–2381; on Office of Works cases, 2359.

Suggestions:

(1) Employer to declare he has paid, and will pay, Trade Union rates and will observe Trade Union conditions. "Trade Union rates" and "current rates" are the same thing, 2236; would not object to adding to "Trade Union rates" the words "as agreed upon," 2237–2238. Discussion on (1), 2239, 2266–2269, 2295–2302, 2382–2385.

(2) Employer to display schedule of wages and hours of labour, 2236.

(3) Employer to keep his books open to inspection by Government official, 2236; discussion on (3), 2362–2366.

(4) That penalties similar to those in London County Council's contracts be enforced for evasions, 2236; discussion on (4), 2386–2394.

(5) That the wages to be paid should be printed in contract, 2227A–2228.

Witness thinks the House intended in passing the Resolution that Government work should only be done by fair employers, 2219; discussion, 2220–2222.

Asks that Government Departments should strictly accept arrangements between employers and men, 2227, and should employ only firms which are "fair" in every part of their business, 2231.

No local variation of the Union rate in the London district, 2209.

Trade Union rates, range of, and how the rates are fixed, 2244; discussion, 2245–2254, 2256, 2265.

Sectionising of work not practised or recognised in his trade, 2255–2256, 2270–2272.

Conciliation boards, 2244, 2402–2411.

Unskilled labour, securing fair wages for, or for workers under isolated firms in remote districts, 2274–2294, 2396–2398.

Women and girls, rate for, in making clothing, 2399–2401.

---

20. Mr. William Lane—

Represents Sheffield Trades Management Committee of the Amalgamated Society of Carpenters and Joiners, 2412–2414.

Differentiation in grades of work not recognised by Union, 2446–2450.

Union receives all complaints from men and could make representations to Government, 2459–2462.

Complaints as to Admiralty and War Office contractors in Sheffield, 2417, who do not pay all their men the standard wages as Union contends they should, if they hold those contracts; it would be to the firms' advantage if they paid standard rates, 2415, 2416–2421, 2425, 2426, 2430, 2438, which should apply to all, irrespective of men's skill, 2447. Discussion, 2439–2446, 2448–2452.

Complaints now made relate to men who may not be directly employed on Government work, 2429–2432.

Defence put forward by the firms, 2419–2421, 2428, to which Union does not agree, 2419, 2420. Union men still working at firms' rates, 2421–2424. Offer made by Union in regard to working hours, 2424. Firms desire a good grade of man for these inferior wages, 2428.

Standard rate for carpenters not recognised at steel works, 2433–2436; discussion, 2437–2446.

Conciliation Board for Sheffield building trades also not recognised at steel works, 2453–2458.

---

21. Mr. Robert Holmshaw—

Is Secretary of Sheffield United Cutlery Trades Council, of the Scissors Grinders' Union, and of Sheffield Federated Trades Council. Member of City Council and Education Committee, 2463.

The trade has piece-work rates, only, which are generally fixed with employers, 2467–2469, 2507–2509; they are subject to variations by discount or by price per dozen, 2487, 2521.

In Scissors Grinders' Union only sons of members are admitted as boys, 2580, 2581. There is no limit as to numbers, 2582. This is not a rule of all industries, 2579. There are no women, 2583. Discussion, 2470–2474.

Fair Wages Clause: Gives only small benefit owing to slowness and difficulty of investigation, 2464–2466. Union objects to agreed rates and discounts being modified in Government contracts, 2474, 2475, 2495, as is done by a number of small firms, 2489, 2490, to obtain these contracts, 2496. These are practically the only contract work in the cutlery trades, 2497, 2498. Skill of workmen should not affect standard rates, 2550, even if so agreed between employers and men, 2547–2549, 2551–2553. Discussion, 2476–2486.

Union desires to know what Government contracts are made, 2499, 2567; it does not, however, receive schedules, 2500, 2513, because not affiliated to Parliamentary Committee of Trade Union Congress, 2513, 2554. Size of contract does not affect standard rates, 2538–2541, 2573. Discussion, 2568–2572, 2574–2578.

Suggestions:

(1) The standard rate for Government work to be the nearest to that paid by majority of firms for same class of work, 2491. This would make price often higher than now, 2492–2494. Discussion, 2522–2532.

(2) Tender forms for Government contracts and name of successful firm to be sent to Union, 2501, 2559, 2561. Discussion, 2502–2506, 2555–2558, 2560–2566.

(3) Firms to state on tender forms, rates of wages, hours of labour and conditions of employment, 2510. Discussion, 2533–2537.

(4) Standard rates to apply equally to Union and non-Union men, 2585–2586. Discussion, 2587–2599.

---

22. Mr. George Henry Shaw—

Is Secretary of the Pen and Pocket Blade Forgers' Protection Society, 2600, whose last case of complaint was nine years ago, 2606. Condition of wages at present satisfactory to this Society, 2607, 2608. Also represents the Spring Knife Grinders' Union and the Spring Knife Cutlers' Union, 2602, 2609; last complaint of the latter was eight years ago, 2649, but they are not satisfied at present, 2650. Piece-work rates only in these trades with exception of one firm, 2622–2624 (2616). Cutlery Trade Unions object to employment of girls, 2613, 2641, one firm only employs them, 2617, 2639, 2644. Their part of work is easy, but dirty and unsuitable, 2614, 2618–2621. The men want easy work as well as hard work, 2641. Discussion, 2638–2640, 2642–2643.

Fair Wages Clause: The trade find great delay in settling a price with employers, 2602, 2603, 2606, 2651, and difficulty in obtaining schedules, 2604. Discussion, 2633, 2653–2655.

Employers should meet trade representatives to fix standard rate, 2636, 2637.

Patterns of article to be contracted for should be sent to their Union, 2659.

Current price: The Forgers' Union adopted as the standard the price paid for Government work by majority of firms, 2605.

Instance of firm supplying inferior steel to that contracted for, 2604, 2635, 2660–2662. Of paying less than standard rate, 2610, 2611, 2615; discussion, 2663–2665; by scamping work, 2611.

Discussion as to whether volume of work makes a difference in rates, 2625–2631.

Subletting of work: Trade does not desire it, 2669. "Little master" system is dying out, 2667; discussion, 2668–2670.

---

23. Mr. Alfred S. Mappin—

Represents Sheffield Machine File Cutters' Union, 2671.

It has piece-work rates only, 2688, and a minimum rate per dozen files, 2692, 2693.

Objects to women doing men's part of work, 2820.

Substitution of machine-cut for hand-cut files, 2675, affects rate of wages paid, 2676.

Evasions of Fair Wages Clause, 2673; in sectionising work, 2678, employer takes too much off skilled men's wages, 2679–2680. Discussion, 2681–2687, 2689–2691, 2694–2703, 2708, 2709, 2821–2823. Sectionising impairs quality of work, 2706, 2707, and leads to employment of girls and boys, 2713; discussion, 2715–2725, 2755, and best firms do not take Government work, 2756. Discussion, 2757–2760, 2784. Sectionising not objected to by Union if it does not reduce wages and number of skilled workmen nor impair quality of file, 2788, 2789. Discussion, 2790–2803.

Union should have easier access to schedules, 2735, 2810, to ascertain quality of steel required, 2737, 2739, 2750, 2776, as affecting rates for labour, 2728–2734, 2738, 2764–2766, 2777–2782, 2785–2787. Government at present accepts inferior files, 2726, 2743.

Union should see list of firms eligible to tender, 2740, as many on list at present could not execute contract, 2814; discussion, 2815–2816.

Union desires more uniform test of files, 2741; discussion, 2742–2749, 2783, 2818.

Standard rates should be adopted by employers, who at present do not regard them, 2752, 2769–2773. Failing this, average rate of six firms, three chosen by employers, three by men, should be taken as current rate, 2752; discussion, 2753, 2754, 2804–2809.

24. Mr. Walter Crofts—

Is Secretary of the Table and Butcher Knife Hafters' Trade Society, 2824.

Its prices are adjusted for each article made, 2863–2865.

Complaints of firms of Admiralty contractors who paid low rates of wages, piece-work, 2826, 2831–2832; discussion, 2836–2868.

Agreement made by employers and men of one firm should not be held to be current rate for district, 2833–2835.

Names of firms holding Government contracts should be given to Society, 2827–2830; in absence of this information, Society has been unable to complain of low rates paid, 2827–2830, 2845, 2846.

Firms have complained of inability to obtain Government contracts, 2860–2862.

Rates claimed by Society are those that have been paid, 2865–2868. Society objects to reduction of rates when a large order is involved, 2826.

Effect on rates of wages of improved facilities for workers provided by employers, 2850.

---

25. Mr. John Templeton—

Is General Secretary of the Scottish Typographical Association, 2869, which has agreed rates of wages with employers, 2874, all over Scotland, 2871, 2877; Society is divided into compositors and machine men, 2888.

Fair Wages Clause: No benefit, 2878, 2879.

Cheap Female Labour: is chief cause of complaint, 2880, 2883, 2886, 2932, 2933, this is confined to Edinburgh, 2887, where all the composing on Government work is done by girls, 2895, 2952; discussion, 2953–2963, they are chiefly employed on Government work, 2893, and some other work, 2894; discussion, 2895–2897, chiefly reprints, 2970, 2971. Female labour is not objected to if paid at same rate as men, 2898, 2908, 2973; discussion, 2899–2902, but work is unsuitable for women, chiefly owing to its unhealthy nature, 2906–2907, 2935, 2936, 2950, 2951, and the conditions of work, 2972, 2973, girls do not stay at the work, 2928, 2937, 2970, 2971, so have no organisation, 2890, 2891, 2903; discussion, 2904–2906, nor current rate of wages, 2911; discussion, 2913–2919, 2936–2939, nor apprenticeship, 2903, of which usual time is seven years, 2929; discussion, 2930, 2931, but they can learn a single part of work in twelve months, 2946; discussion, 2943–2945, 2947, 2948.

There are a few labourers employed in lifting formes, etc., who are also underpaid, 2940.

---

26. Mr. George Simpson—

Is member of the Committee of the Edinburgh branch of the Scottish Typographical Association, 2870.

Female Labour: Three-fifths of largest firms employ women in fluctuating numbers, 2926–2928, 2937–2938. The majority are employed on general composition, 2922, which is not recognised by Union as an ordinary practice of the trade, 2923, 2924. In some firms girls do all the Government work, 2955, which is largely schedules. Reprint work is also done by them, 2966–2969. Number of girls employed necessitates only partial employment and wages for them, 2972, while conditions are very unhealthy, 2973.

---

27. Mr. Simeon Webb—

Is General Secretary of the Galvanised Hollow Ware Sheet Metal Workers and Braziers' Association, 2974, 3083. Discussion, 2975–2979.

Association has fixed piece-work rates of wages, 2980, 2981, which are paid usually without trouble, 2983. Discussion, 2984, 2985.

Fair Wages Clause: No benefit, 2986.

Current rates: difficulty of exact definition, 2986, 2997; discussion, 2997–3003. Delay by Departments in answering complaints, 2991. Discussion, 3025–3034. Instances where, machinery being used, rates were unduly lowered, 2987. Discussion, 2988–2990, 3046, 3047, 3062–3075. Trade Union leaves men to arrange with employers a fair allowance for part done by machinery, 3091, 3092. Rates for special articles are fixed between employers and men, 3106, 3107, if satisfactory, rate is taken as Trade Union rate, 3108. Discussion, 3120–3123.

Government work is best class work and requires greatest care, 2995, 3110; discussion, 3111–3119; it is paid for at higher rates than ordinary, 3006. Discussion, 3007–3017. Three firms who have a large part of the work do not pay these rates, 3059–3061.

"Little Master" system of subletting work, 3037, objected to by trade, 3043; discussion, 3037–3045.

Trade should see patterns of Government work to know exact rate to charge, 3018. Discussion, 3019–3021, 3049–3053, 3084–3089.

All Government work should be marked so that men can recognise it, 3004. Discussion, 3051–3053, 3076–3080. (Witness, however, agrees that this is not necessary if patterns are seen as suggested in 3085.)

"Current" rates should be altered to "Trade Union" rates, 3001, if reasonable majority of firms accepted them, 3022–3024.

Trade would like a private inquiry, by a Government Inspector, between employers and men, 3055–3057. Discussion, 3096–3105.

---

28. Mr. Henry Wilson Howes—

Is Secretary of the Printing Machine Managers' Trade Society, 3125, a member of the Executive of the London branch of the Printing and Kindred Trades' Federation, 3132, and also a member of the Industrial Education Committee, 3147.

Trade does not recognise piece-work at all, 3127.

Apprenticeship of seven years necessary for membership, 3146. Discussion, 3147.

Fair Wages Clause: Complaints of evasion:—

(1) Men underpaid at piece-work rates, 3127. Discussion, 3128–3130.

(2) Government work transferred from London to Dunstable, 3130, 3131, which results in loss of work to London branch, 3130, 3132; discussion, 3135–3136, at Dunstable only, unfair rates are paid, 3132, 3199, 3200, 3208. Discussion, 3192–3210. If Typographical Association rates were paid there, trade would not complain, 3157. Discussion, 3148–3164, 3192–3210.

(3) Instances of employment of women on machines, 3132, 3134, 3137; discussion, 3138–3140; objectionable, irrespective of wages paid, 3138; discussion, 3175–3191.

(4) Instances of preference given to non-Union men, 3133, 3141; discussion, 3142–3144.

(5) Unfair extra work at General Post Office Printing Department, 3140, 3141.

Employers' and men's associations should meet to arrange fair rates, 3211–3222.

---

29. Mr. William Coffey—

Is Secretary of the London Consolidated Society of Journeymen Bookbinders, 3223, also represents London branch of the Bookbinders' Consolidated Union and the Society of Day Working Bookbinders, 3258, 3259, covering London and twenty-mile radius, 3226, 3227, 3258.

Trade Unions have an agreement with employers, 3225, and have limit to number of apprentices, 3253, 3254, 3257, 3291.

Stationery Office contracts given to "unfair" houses, 3228, where unapprenticed boys are employed to do unskilled parts of work, 3232; discussion, 3233–3236; Trade Unions object to this because these boys can do one part of work only, so are thrown out of employment when they are grown up and want full wages, 3237; discussion, 3238–3240, 3278–3283; and also because it is prejudicial to apprenticeship, 3247–3249, discussion, 3284–3290.

Employers complain of inability to get Government contracts owing to methods of unfair houses, 3260.

Trade Union does not object to certain amount of unskilled labour, 3241, 3255. Discussion, 3242–3246, 3268–3272.

Trade Union objects to employment of women (after a certain stage in the work) unless they are paid same rate of wages as men, 3292, 3293. Discussion, 3294–3302.

---

30. Mr. Frederick Charles Tolhurst—

Represents Amalgamated Society of Lithographic Artists, Designers, Engravers, and Process Workers, 3303. Society is officially recognised by employers in provinces, 3368, 3382, but not in London, 3361, 3372. Society has no agreed time rates with employers, 3363, 3383, who, however, pay their minimum fixed rate in practice, 3310, 3311, 3320, 3362, 3363, 3373, 3374, 3385, 3386. Discussion, 3387–3402. Above minimum rate wages vary widely according to capabilities of men, 3335. Discussion, 3341–3348, 3364, 3365. A number of boys are employed in trade and occasionally women, 3340.

Instance of a firm doing Government work who do not pay minimum rate, 3314–3317. Complaint made to the firm and to the Stationery Office, 3318, 3319.

Same firm does not pay usual "overtime" rate, 3309, 3322; discussion, 3323–3329, 3349–3359, 3377–3381, which, however, is not so usually adopted as ordinary time-rates, 3330–3335.

---

31. Mr. George Power—

Represents Midland Leather Trades' Federation, 3403. The fixed piece-work rate of this Society is accepted in saddlery trade only, 3411–3414, 3439, 3446, 3447. Discussion, 3451–3458, 3471–3483. No time rates are recognised, 3423, 3429–3432, 3484. Discussion, 3485–3503. Union gets to hear all men's complaints, 3522–3524.

Fair Wages Clause: Trouble about this has been increasing, 3408–3410. Complaint of firm of War Office contractors who arranged piece-work prices with men and afterwards employed cheap time labour, 3416, 3417, 3422, 3425, which results in inferior work, impossible to detect, 3418–3420, 3426, 3465–3470. Union men proceeded with work as employers placed onus of completing it on them, 3421, 3427.

Current Rates: Majority of firms do not pay these, 3506–3535, 3524–3529. Individual firms make their own rates, 3504. Trade Union rates to be fixed between employers and men should be substituted for current rates, 3511–3514.

Female labour not objected to if not used to cheapen men's rates, women's work being inferior, 3433; discussion, 3434–3445, 3515–3521. No current rate for women's labour, 3460–3464, which is entirely unorganised, 3445.

---

32. Mr. Samuel Davis—

Is Secretary of the Walsall Bridle Cutters' Trade Society, 3530. Nothing to add to evidence of previous witness (Mr. Power), 3531.

Fair Wages Clause: Employers will not pay Society's current rate, 3532, 3533.

"Trade Union Rate" should be fixed between employers and men, 3534–3543.

---

33. Mr. William Millerchip—

Is Secretary of the National Amalgamated Lock and Key Smiths' Society, 3544. Trade works almost entirely by piece-work, 3568, and has no agreed rates with employers, 3564; discussion, 3565–3571*a*.

Complaint to Admiralty, 3576, 3638–3641, of firms subletting work to men at their own homes, who in turn employ others and sweat them, 3545, 3546, 3577; discussion, 3578–3593, 3613–3622, 3634–3642, 3645–3658; this is usual with some firms and for Government work only, 3547, 3548, 3580; discussion, 3581–3590, 3613–3627, and is done to cheapen production, 3549, as Government work is best-class work, 3550, 3551. Inferior work results from this, 3552; discussion, 3607–3612, and wages are lower, 3553, 3554.

Present Admiralty contractors are entirely satisfactory to Society, 3643, 3644, 3652.

Society wants to know names of firms who receive contracts, 3556; discussion, 3557–3559, and to see patterns of Government work, 3594; discussion, 3595–3606.

Society wants standard rates for Government work fixed between employers and men, 3560; discussion, 3561–3563; difficulty now is definition of "current rate" and its enforcement by Departments, 3572–3577.

Society thinks number of learners should be limited, 3623–3626; discussion, 3627–3633.

---

34. Mr. Edward Latchford—

Is Secretary of the Amalgamated Society of Brushmakers, 3659, which covers United Kingdom, 3660. Trade is piece-work, 3661, and Society has local agreement with employers in most districts, 3662–3665, for "pan-work" only, 3673, 3676, 3677, though working with United Society of Brushmakers, 3738, 3739, cannot arrange prices with employers for "drawn" work, 3740; discussion, 3759–3764.

Current Rate: Difficulty of definition, 3668, owing to districts, 3670–3673, and sub-divisions of work, 3675, 3755–3758. "Trade Union rate" ought to be substituted for "current rate," 3685; discussion, 3686–3703, 3678.

Union objects to subletting work to men who do it at home, 3678; discussion, 3679–3683, 3755–3758; this leads to low rates and sweating, 3684, and to difficulty in defining "current rate," 3678. Insertion of clause in Government contracts to compel articles to be made in factory, and for payment of wages direct to workers, 3723, would be accepted by the trade in some districts only, 3731. Discussion, 3724–3735, 3765–3768.

Society wants Government to give names of firms who receive contracts, 3714, as is done by Municipalities, 3715–3718.

Cheap Female Labour, 3704, 3705, employed to do easier part of the men's work, 3706; Union objects to this, unless women are paid at same rate as men, 3709. Discussion, 3707–3713.

---

35. Mr. Alfred Masters—

Is Secretary of the Bone Brush Makers' Trade Protection Society, 3769, which has piece-work rates, 3788, agreed upon with majority of employers, 3772, 3773, in London only, 3825–3830.

Complaints made to Departments that firms with Government contracts do not pay current rate, 3777. Discussion, 3789–3795. Difficulty of this has been that employees would not speak until lately, 2781–2785.

Some firms are "fair" for woodwork but not for bonework, 3802, 3815, because Bone Brush Makers' Union is not so strong, 3806; discussion, 3798–3806. Firm that employs non-Union men because they will not pay Union wages, 3808–3811.

Trade objects to Government work being paid for at lower rate because it is of simple pattern, 3816. Discussion, 3817–3824.

Fair wages should be agreed upon between masters and men and accepted as standard, 3796, 3797, 3812.

---

36. Mr. John Thomas Morrison—

Is Secretary of the London Saddle and Harness Makers' Trade Protection Society, and of the Military Harness and Accoutrement Makers' Trade Union, 3831, both covering London district only, 3833, 3834. Former has an agreement about wages with employers, 3856, 3860, but the accoutrement trade has none, 3864, 3882.

Fair Wages Clause has stopped cutting down prices except at quiet times, as now, when large majority of Government contractors pay much less than usually accepted price, 3838, 3839, 3883, 3884; discussion, 3885–3893, and evade their agreement, 3871, 3877; discussion, 3840–3877.

Sub-contracting, on basis of bonus to foremen, 3906–3909; discussion, 3968–3975, is carried out, but is very difficult to prove, 3903–3913, and this accounts for increase in employment of women, 3930, 4012, who, however, work in the factory, 3950–3952.

Trade has made no complaints owing to men's wages books now belonging to employers, 3880, 3881, and so being inaccessible to Trade Union, 3879; discussion, 3992–4001.

Employment of cheap female labour increasing, 3894, 3991, though most of work is impossible for women, 3895–3898, who produce inferior work, 3899–3902. Trade Union does not object to employment of women on the parts they can do if paid same wages as men, 4005–4014.

Trade Union wants enforcement of Trade Union rates by War Office, 3903, though these rates are not accepted by majority of contractors, 3914–3916; discussion, 3917–3928, 3931–3940.

Trade Union wants one of their own officials to accompany, or previously advise Government Inspectors, 3903; discussion, 3976–3985.

Motor work has done much harm, 3941, but not reduced rate of wages in harness trade, 3942, 3943; discussion, 3944–3948, 3958–3967.

Change of accoutrement material by War Office has slightly affected trade, 4002–4004.

---

37. Mr. Robert Charlton—

Represents the National Amalgamated Society of Enginemen, Cranemen, Boilermen, Firemen and Electrical Workers, 4015, which is a strong Union, 4042, on North-East Coast, and in Scotland, 4016. Society has time rates only, 4021, which have to be separately arranged for each job, 4024. Discussion, 4020–4025.

It is impossible for men to tell if a job is for Government or not, so all work done by Government contractors should come under the Fair Wages Clause, 4030–4032.

Instance of works where men are paid below usual rates, 4017–4019. Society complained to Admiralty, 4026, who said the firm maintained they paid current rates for district, 4026, 4027, 4028, which should be Glasgow, 4054, as there are no special circumstances to justify the lower rates, 4046; discussion, 4047-4081. Management of these works will not recognise Trade Union, 4025, and men are afraid to join it, 4093–4096, owing to preference given to non-union men, 4106–4109. If majority of men desire it Government should insist on employer's recognition of Trade Unions, 4089; discussion, 4086–4098.

Trade Union rates should be paid by Government contractors, 4038; discussion, 4039–4040.

---

38. Mr. Willie Milnes—

Is General Secretary of the National Glass Bottle Makers' Society, which is common to the United Kingdom; the trade is almost entirely in Yorkshire, 4110–4113.

The Fair Wages Clause has assisted them, 4117.

A Joint Board of employers, comprising the very large majority of them, and of men, arrange price list and wages, 4114–4115; these apply throughout the Kingdom, 4162–4170.

A small number of firms pay less than standard rates, 4119–4120; discussion, 4112, 4123, 4139–4141.

Some Government contractors who pay fair wages pass on foreign goods as their own work, 4120–4121, 4127; discussion, 4122, 4124–4126, 4128–4132, 4144–4151.

London merchants buy goods abroad to fill Government orders, 4133, which Witness regards as subletting in violation of their contracts, or what should be their contracts, 4136; discussion, 4134–4138, 4144–4151.

Foreign bottles, bought as such by Government, not objected to, 4152–4154.

Secretaries of Trade Unions should have list of Government contractors, 4118, 4127–4133. Mr. Steadman now gives this information, 4142–4143; discussion, 4155–4161.

---

39. Mr. John Chater—

Is Chairman of the Coventry Engineers and Allied Trades Federation, 4171–4172. The engineering trade in Coventry is pretty well organised, 4264, but difficulty arises for want of an employers' federation, 4265–4271.

Has found difficulty in getting current rate of wages enforced, a firm of Government contractors refusing men who ask for it, 4182–4184; Federation cannot find out what Government Department is concerned, nor whether firm holds a direct contract, 4184; discussion, 4234.

Suggests in regard to Government contracts:—

(1) That departments shall settle and keep a list of rates, hours and conditions of employment to be observed by firms tendering, 4173, which shall be based on those of the district concerned, 4175, as adjudged by a committee, 4177–4185; discussion, 4174, 4176–4181.

(2) This list shall be revised from time to time, 4186–4187.

(3) To provide for semi-skilled labour, the Committee may frame standard conditions of employment where they do not already exist, 4188; discussion, 4189–4191.

(4) That systematic overtime shall be forbidden; discussion, 4193–4218, 4237–4264.

(5) Where a firm refuses to discuss terms with the men, the Committee may make an award, 4219.

(6) Firms refusing Trade Unionists to be penalised, 4220; discussion, 4221–4224.

General discussion on (1) to (6), 4225–4236, 4255–4263, 4272–4277.

---

40. Mr. William Sharrocks—

Represents the Staffordshire district of the Boilermakers and Iron and Steel Shipbuilders' Society, 4278, which covers the whole country, 4312–4313. The Union is a very strong one, 4326–4327.

The Fair Wages Clause is a dead letter in Staffordshire, 4279, where nearly all the troubles arise, 4328.

Although rates of wages for each district are agreed upon between employers and Trade Union, firms doing Government work are paying 10 to 20 per cent. less, 4281; has asked Government Departments without result for names of Government contractors, 4282; discussion, 4283, 4329–4331. How Wolverhampton Corporation deals with such cases, 4283; discussion, 4284–4289, 4304–4311.

Contractors contend that they comply with the Fair Wages Clause if they pay standard rates to men on the contract work only or to men who are fully skilled, i.e., "competent workmen," 4284.

Contractors declare they are in a low-wage district when they are in another where wages are higher, 4290; how a district is defined, 4291–4292; discussion, 4293–4296, 4301–4303, 4312–4325, 4332–4341.

Complaint of firm doing Admiralty and War Office contract work, 4297.

Contractors should pay all their workmen rates recognised between fair employers and Trade Unions, 4298; discussion, 4299–4303, 4342–4358. Men's advantage to enter the Union, 4359.

---

41. Mr. Albert Robert Burns—

Represents the Birmingham branch of the Union of Saddlers' and Harness Makers, 4360.

Fair Wages Clause is defeated only in Birmingham and district, 4361, because there is no longer an agreement with employers as to fair wages, 4362–4365; they are now at starvation rates, 4365, one could not now very well say what is "current rate," 4366–4368, owing to difference in systems in different factories, 4368; discussion, 4375–4377.

Government should arrange an agreement between employers and men as to price for Government work which should be common to the whole Kingdom, whether a firm worked in a town or the country, 4369–4374; discussion, 4378–4402. Conference to settle wages should meet every five years, 4402–4403; discussion, 4404–4405. Thus there would practically be no competition, 4405; discussion, 4406–4413.

Why no local differences should exist in wages, 4383–4397.

Machinery facilities given by employers would vary wages, 4398–4402.

---

42. Mr. Stanley C. Straker and (43) Mr. Edward Unwin—

Mr. Straker is chairman and Mr. Unwin is vice-chairman of the London Master Printers' Association, and both witnesses are members of the Council of the Federation of Master Printers, etc., of the United Kingdom, 4414–4415.

Mr. Straker's firm do a little, and Mr. Unwin's scarcely any Government work, 4418–4419.

Mr. Straker does not object to Fair Wages Clause as it stands, 4424; it is taken up largely in a form sometimes more and sometimes less stringent in municipal contracts of which Mr Straker's firm do a large quantity, 4420–4423.

Mr. Straker.—Current Rate of Wages: No difficulty should arise in fixing this in a case where there is only one employer in a district, 4425; in his own case at Redhill he arranged rate which was that at which he could obtain workmen, and this was afterwards agreed to as fair by the Trade Union, 4426; discussion, 4427–4429. No difficulty in getting labour in this case, 4433.

Mr. Straker does not agree that in case like above the "Current Rate" should be that of nearest centre; the tendency now is to put printing works into the country in isolated places, where living conditions are better and cheaper, with a view to getting labour, 4430–4432; discussion, 4542–4545. The rate set up here would naturally become rate of the district, 4434; the employer fixing it at what he thinks is reasonable, taking all attendant circumstances into consideration, 4437, this rate is practically agreed to by his men, 4453. Mr. Unwin concurs, 4453. Discussion on whether such a rate can be accepted as "Current Rate," or whether "Current Rate" is rate forced on employer by Trade Union, or whether it is the rate created by the laws of supply and demand, 4437–4439.

Mr. Unwin.—Views upon these points instanced by his own cases at Chilworth and Woking; the law of supply and demand, coupled largely with public opinion, will, in the end determine the rate in cases of isolated works, 4440–4446; discussion as to amounts actually paid, 4447–4449.

Difficulties in accepting Trade Union conditions; they are so varied, and are rather forced on employers than agreed to by them, 4454–4457, but where agreed to, employers can hardly object, 4458. They would operate against making trade efficient, against piece-work, against using new machinery, discussion, 4455–4456, and would revive the distinction between Non-Unionist and Unionist labour, 4459; discussion (with both witnesses), 4460–4472, 4475. Instances of such conditions, 4549; discussion, 4565–4572.

No difficulty in recognising Trade Union rate of wages, 4473–4476; discussion, 4549–4554.

No differing rates of pay in this trade for Government and non-Government work, 4476–4477; discussion, 4478–4481.

Women's work and payment, which must be at lower rate than men's, 4482, 4514; discussion, 4557–4558.

Sectionising work: no reason for objecting to it, 4515, it being a question of sub-division of labour and of specialisation, 4516–4517; practice gives signs of increase, and might tend to raise wages, 4518–4527; discussion, 4559–4562.

Mr. Unwin.—His house is non-Unionist; would employ Unionists if they would come to him, 4450–4452.

Mr. Straker.—No objection to the giving of names of firms who obtained contracts, 4527, 4529. (Mr. Unwin.) It is unnecessary publicity, 4528; would not object to publication if it were restricted to certain details, 4530; discussion, 4562.

Mr. Straker.—Posting details of wages and hours in factory: no actual objection, but it would have drawbacks, 4531–4533. Mr. Unwin. Thinks it necessary, 4534; as to inspection of firm's pay sheets, 4535–4541; discussion, 4563–4565.

Mr. Straker.—Newspaper Offices and Trade Union rules and conditions, 4546–4548.

---

44. Mr. William Fraser and (45) Mr. Thomas Richards—

Mr. Fraser is a managing director of Neill and Company, Limited, of Edinburgh, while Mr. Richards is secretary of Alexander Thom and Company, Limited, of Dublin, 4573, 4574, who are entirely a Trade Union firm, 4627. In Mr. Fraser's firm type is all hand-set, 4593, 4594, 4612, 4613. Numbers of men and women employed in printing trade in Scotland, 4622, 4623.

Mr. Richards.—Fair Wages Clause: Satisfactory working of this, 4624, 4625, 4628, 4629.

Mr. Fraser.—Current Rate: No difficulty in Scotland in defining this, 4575, 4576, including Edinburgh, where all printing houses are in city, 4576–4578. Scale is not same in all towns, 4579, 4580.

Mr. Fraser.—Employment of Women: Major part of compositors' work done by women, 4581, 4582; earnings of these women (half on time and half on piece), 4583, 4584. They are apprenticed for three years, 4586, and some of work is done entirely by them, 4588, 4589; they do not do so much in week, so wages are lower, 4590, but they are not undercutting men, as for same work in same time they would get same wage, 4590–4593. No organisation, 4616, as they generally do not stay after twenty, 4617, 4618. Women are more economical than men, but not so satisfactory, 4674–4676. Mr. Richards does not employ women compositors at all, 4640, but would be glad to see women's labour defined as the part of the work they can do, 4645; discussion, 4646–4649.

Mr. Fraser.—Some men are retained as compositors to do hardest work, 4658, 4614, 4615, and their wage is nearly double average women's wage, 4586, 4587.

Mr. Fraser.—Trade Union Conditions: Would make no difference, as they work under these at present, 4596–4598; also no objection to enforcement of these wages and conditions for all work, 4599, 4604, though a Government contract held by another firm was paid at higher rate than ordinary work, 4599; discussion, 4600–4603. Mr. Richards would object to these conditions, 4654; discussion, 4655–4664, 4677, and gives difficulty in applying them to all work done by a firm, 4679–4681.

Mr. Fraser.—Sectionising of Work: Could not agree to give work to any man, as only some men can do special work, 4605; discussion, 4606–4613. Mr. Richards does not have much difficulty in this way, 4641, 4644; but tendency is towards more sectionising, 4642, 4643, 4650–4653.

Mr. Fraser does not object to giving names of Government contractors to Trade Unions, 4619, 4620, though he objects to posting up of wages, 4621, 4622.

Mr. Richards objects to inspection of firms' books by Government Inspector, 4667; discussion, 4668–4669. Mr. Fraser concurs, except in case of specific complaint, 4670; discussion, 4670–4673.

Mr. Fraser.—Boy Labour: A few apprentices only, 4595. Mr. Richards.—Difficulty on this subject now arranged, 4626.

Mr. Richards.—Country Printing Office: Rates at this compared with nearest towns, 4630–4635, 4638, 4639; firm had no difficulty in fixing rates in country, 4636, 4637; but it works under very unfavourable conditions in Dublin, 4636, where piece rates are very high, 4665, 4666.

---

46. Mr. George Macfarlane—

Is a Past President of the National Federation of Building Trade Employers of Great Britain and Ireland; is in business in Manchester, 4688; where district is clearly defined, 4775. Discussion on limits of that district, 4776–4785. Practically no piece-work in this trade, 4730, 4751. In most large towns there are "working rules," signed by employers and men, 4695; discussion, 4693–4697, 4797–4802; though there are only about 25 per cent. of Trade Union men in trade, 4773, 4774.

No objection to Trade Union conditions if clearly specified, and if agreed upon between employers and men, 4690, 4701–4703; the schedules should specify wages, hours of labour and other working conditions under which contract must be carried out, 4690. Conditions and rates vary in different districts, 4691–4693; discussion on causes, etc., of this, 4697–4700, 4708, 4752–4768, 4786–4789, 4804–4810.

It is impracticable to compel Government contractors to pay current rates for all their work, 4704–4708; discussion, 4767–4772, 4803–4806, 4810–4812. Trade Unions ask for rates of higher-rated districts to be paid elsewhere, 4708; discussion, 4709–4714, 4731–4737.

No objection to publishing names of contractors and prices, 4790; nor to inquiries into their books, 4792, if Government think case is bonâ fide, 4796; discussion, 4793–4796.

Skilled and unskileld labour, 4715, half-skilled labour, 4716; discussion, 4716–4723, 4738–4743. Distinction between work of cabinet makers and joiners a difficulty in this connection, 4724; discussion, 4725–4729, 4744–4750.

---

47. Mr. William Francis Wallis—

Represents the Master Builders' Federation, 4821. Building trade is well organised, agreements with men, 4825. Number of Trade Union men in trade varies with district, 4835–4837.

Fair Wages Clause: Presents no difficulty in witness's long experience of Government contracts, 4823, 4824; discussion, 4852–4856.

Current Rate: Sometimes more in country districts than in nearest towns, 4826–4830; discussion, 4857–4862, actual rates depending upon law of supply and demand, 4831, 4832; discussion, 4867–4871. Builders do not set up country works to get lower rates, 4874; discussion, 4872–4876; no lodging money paid, 4833. No objection to substituting "Trade Union rate as agreed upon" for "current rate," 4834.

Objects to Government contractors being compelled to pay current rates on all their works, 4838, but agrees that contracts should be given only to firms that are in the habit of paying full rates, 4842, 4843; discussion, 4863–4866.

Half-skilled and unskilled labour, 4844. So little used in the trade that no question would arise, 4845; discussion, 4845–4851.

---

48. Mr. John Cuthbert Bailey and (49) Mr. Francis Ralph Benham—

Mr. Bailey is Chairman of the Staffordshire Potteries Manufacturers' Association, 4877, and General Manager of Doulton Potteries, Burslem, 4882. Mr. Benham is member of firm of earthenware manufacturers (George Jones and Sons, Ltd., Stoke-on-Trent), 4878. Mr. Bailey. Much experience of Government work, 4879-4881, which varies with different Departments, 4889. Piecework rates only, 4886. Workmen partially organised, few in Trade Union, 4887, 4888.

Mr. Bailey.—Fair Wages Clause: Merely a matter of form, 4882, 4893, Mr. Benham concurs, 4893. Mr. Bailey.—No complaint made by men, 4883, but firm is willing to meet them now and fix "minimum wage" as they are asking for an advance, 4894-4896, 4908, 4930.

Mr. Bailey.—Current rate: Firms would not tender if Government objected to rates paid, 4890, 4902, 4916. No uniform rate in trade owing to varying qualities and conditions of work, 4884, 4885, 4888, 4898. Mr. Benham concurs, 4898, 4899. Mr. Benham—But fair to take average rates of twelve firms as current rate, 4891, 4892.

Mr. Benham.—Thinks it unfair that firms should be made to pay Trade Union rates to which employers may not have agreed, 4897, 4898, 4900–4902, 4904. Mr. Bailey concurs, 4901, 4902. Mr. Benham.—But not if agreed upon between employers and men, 4902–4905. Mr. Bailey concurs, 4904. Mr. Benham.—Objects to paying this for all work, 4906, 4907. Mr. Bailey concurs, 4906.

Mr. Bailey.—No objection to publication of names of contractors, 4918, 4919. Mr. Benham objects to this because contracts not usually sent to manufacturer direct and middleman takes away his custom from firms who make direct contracts, 4920–4922. Mr. Bailey concurs, 4922. Mr. Benham.—Although perhaps this would not apply to Government Contracts, 4920, 4923–4925. Mr. Bailey concurs, 4924, discussion with Mr. Benham, 4925–4929.

Mr. Bailey.—Unskilled labour: difficulty now in one branch owing to new process, 4909; firm agree to fix prices with men for "test" but dispute about number of hours they will work, 4910, 4911. Sub-division of work benefits eventually skilled men, 4912–4915. Mr. Benham concurs, 4914, 4915; Mr. Bailey, though workmen object to it, 4917."

Mr. Bailey.—Government test does not determine quality of goods, 4898, 4931. Mr. Benham concurs, 4931. Mr. Bailey.—Only true test is lasting qualities, 4931, 4932.

Discussion with Mr. Benham and Mr. Bailey who agree that certain patterns for Government work could be improved, 4933–4942.

---

50. Mr. John Allen—

Represents the National Federation of Merchant Tailors, 4943–4946. Not much experience of Government contracts, 4944, 4987. Great want of organisation in trade, 4952, owing to ease in picking up lower branches, 4953; discussion, 4975–4977, 4993, 4994, 5006–5010, 5032–5034. Work in trade is largely sub-divided, 4947, 4948, with varying rates according to description, 4991. All rates should be by time taken, 4990, 5044–5046.

Fair Wages Clause: Sound in principle, 4949, but Government ought to do more to see it is enforced, discussion, 4951, 4955–4957, 4978, 4988. Not many complaints when put in Municipal Contracts, 4968, but fears that prices sometimes paid are too low to be considered fair rates, 4969; clause is meant to enforce a "current" rate, 4971.

Current Rate: Reasonable rates usually current in factory, 4958; returns of outworkers now necessary, 4958*a*. Agrees with posting in works schedules of wages paid, etc., 4951, 4952, 4959, 4974, 5011, 5018, 5019; also that there should be a minimum rate in contract, 4960, 4995, 4996; dependent on age and proficiency, 4962, and different for men and women, 5047–5049, with daily (not hourly) employment by time log, 4967, 5044–5046; discussion, 4961–4967, and employers should send in with their tenders rates of wages paid, 5012–5014. Discussion on difficulties of Government knowing if wages were fair, 5020–5043. Difficulty in fixing current rates owing to variation, 4972, 4973, 4985, 4986, 4989, and also owing to shifting people from Government work to other work, 5003. Current rate must be fixed between employers and workers, 4992, and then it will be easier to detect evasions, 5004–5007.

If "fair rates" were paid for Government work the people would see same price was paid for other work, 4980; discussion, 4981–4983, 5015–5019; employer more likely to do the Government work for lower prices, 4997; quality of this work is not very high, 4998; discussion, 4999–5004.

Objects to taking rate of nearest town where country works are set up, 4949, 4950, 5026. Prices must vary all over country according to conditions, 5046.

Sub-letting: Government work goes largely to firms that sublet, 4954, 5032.

No objection to names of successful tenderers being published, 4950, 4951.

---

51. Mr. Ernest N. Kent—

Is Chairman of British Brush Manufacturers' Association, 5051, 5052, 5112, 5113; effect of formation of an association on levelling up wages, 5114–5124. Mostly piece-work rates in this trade, 5060. Though some time-work, 5061; discussion, 5062–5065. No agreement with men as to price for complete article when machine-made, 5066–5069, 5073, 5074.

Fair Wages Clause: Agrees with present form of this in Government contracts, 5054–5056. Few complaints from men with regard to this clause, 5125–5127.

Current Rate: Objects to this because of difficulties arising from introduction of machinery, 5057–5059, 5070; discussion, 5071, 5072; no current rate in this trade now, 5074. Determination of current rate when only one firm in district, 5080–5083.

Introduction of Machinery: Effect of this on wages 5059–5069, 5073, 5074, 5077–5079.

Trade Union Rate: Objects to being compelled to pay this, 5075; discussion, 5076, 5077, but pays it in all but one branch, 5141, 5178, 5179, 5191. Trade Union have not proposed a new rate for machine part of work, 5151–5159.

Employment of Trade Union Men: One-fifth of men employed are such, 5139; discussion, 5136–5140, 5178, 5179.

Home Work: Part of work generally done at home, 5084; discussion, 5085–5090, 5185–5187. No sub-contracting in this work, 5091, 5092, 5175–5177; objection to clause compelling work to be done in factory, 5093; discussion, 5094, 5095, 5170–5174. Effect of home-work on wages, 5096–5100. Firm supplies material, 5183, 5184.

Employment, wages, and hours of women in this trade, 5100–5105, 5186, 5187; they are not paid at same rate as men, 5106–5108, and Witness objects to so doing, 5190. Some parts of men's work now done by women, 5142, 5188–5190. No objection by men to this, 5142, 5143.

Publication of Contractors' Names: Does not object to this, 5109, 5111, 5167–5169. but approves of interval before publication, 5160–5166.

Government Work: Special rates paid for this, 5129; discussion, 5128–5135, 5144–5150.

Bought Parts: Witness does not use these, 5180–5182.

---

52. Mr. Charles Hamilton Watkins—

Represents British Brushmakers' Association and is a Director of Hamilton and Co., Ltd., London, 5192, 5193.

Current Rate: Difficulties of fixing this in trade, 5194, 5195; discussion, 5214–5222, 5231–5234, though this firm contends they pay fair wages, 5236, as by making a comparison with piece-work rates, allowing for machinery, they can show they pay higher rate than Trade Union one, 5237–5243.

Trade Union Rates: Firm does not agree to this, 5211, but makes its own with men, 5208–5211, and objects to paying Government work rate for all work done, 5212. Difficulties in adoption of Trade Union rates, 5255, 5257, especially in Painting Brush Trade, 5256–5262.

Government Work: Goes chiefly to progressive firms using machinery, 5196, 5197, whose wages are fairly satisfactory to men, 5198. Men used to go to firms having Government Contracts as work is easier and they can earn more, 5202*a*–5205, 5224–5228, though this is not so prevalent, 5248.

Home Work: None of this, 5200, 5201. No objection to being compelled to do all work in factory, 5235.

Sectionising of Work: To which Trade Unions object explained and defended, 5202, 5202*a*, 5205–5208.

Employment of Women: Objects to paying them same rate as men, 5229, 5230.

Publication of names of Government Contractors: No objection to this, subject to interval before publication, 5213.

Country Works: Firms do not usually take advantage of the fact that they can lower their wages there, 5244, 5245.

Shortage of Labour: In Painting Brush Trade, 5246, 5247; effect of this on wages, 5250–5254; has increased the number of apprentices, 5249, 5250.

---

53. Mr. Arthur Mason—

Represents British Brush Manufacturers' Association, 5264, and is in firm of J. Mason and Sons, Marylebone, 5263. Witness agrees generally with Evidence given by Mr. Watkins and Mr. Kent, 5265, and considers that their opinions fairly represent those of their Association in general, 5307–5309.

Current Rate: Difficulty in defining this, 5266, 5267, 5270. Firms do not act together but pay rates varying in different districts, 5277. This firm contend, and think they could prove, that they pay fair rates got by deducting from Union rate a certain sum for machined parts, 5291, 5292; discussion, 5294–5301.

Trade Union Rates: Very old and not now paid, 5273–5275, 5279–5281.

Trade Unions: Not very strong in this trade, 5268; and large proportion of non-Union men employed, 5269, 5286–5288, 5312, 5313. In Union shops no non-Union men are allowed, 5282, 5283, but firm employing only Union men would have great difficulty in competing with non-Union firm whose work is sub-divided, 5302–5305. Union men do not care about bass-broom work, 5313; they are employed by this firm on pan work only, 5316; discussion, 5313–5317.

Sectionising of Work: Trade Unions object to this, 5278, and will not alter prices to meet it, 5279–5281, 5285, 5315.

Employment of Women: Increasing in trade, 5288–5290. Fair rate for women, proof of this to Government, 5294–5300. Witness considers that bass-broom work is not suitable for them, 5310, 5311, 5313.

"Drawing" Hands: Entirely unorganised and no fixed rates, 5272, 5306; discussion, 5270–5276.

---

54. Mr. William Bagley—

Is Chairman of Yorkshire Glass Bottle Manufacturers' Association, 5318, 5319, which covers Yorkshire only but affects whole trade, 5320, 5321.

Current Rate (as agreed upon, 5357); Association makes yearly agreement with skilled men as to wages, 5322, discussion, 5323–5327, the same rate covers Yorkshire, Wales and London, 5328, discussion, 5329–5334, and is universally paid, 5335, 5336, 5344–5348, though flint trade branch is not so well organised in this way, 5348; discussion, 5349–5351.

Government Work: Not much of this, 5337, but firm is not bound under the contract to make articles in their factory and may even import bottles from abroad, 5337–5342, to which Witness sees no objection so long as their origin is indicated, 5364–5366, as it is difficult to detect foreign bottles, 5367–5370. Witness sees no reason why firm supplying Government should not buy articles from another British manufacturer, 5392, discussion, 5390–5403, but not foreign ones, 5392, 5399. Unnecessary red-tapeism in Government Contracts, 5379; discussion,, 5380–5389.

Fair Wages Clause: Witness considers this really unnecessary in contracts, 5358, as it is easy to detect instances of sweating, 5361; discussion, 5357–5363.

Employment of women: Objects to their being paid same rate as men, 5352.

Witness objects to proposal that all work should be carried out in factory and paid at Trade Union rates, 5352, discussion on difficulty in doing this in subsidiary trades, 5353–5356, 5371–5376.

Publication of Contractors' Names: Witness objects to this, 5377–5379.

Bottle Machine, recently invented in America, is likely to greatly affect this trade in the future, 5342, 5343.

---

55. Sir Andrew Noble, Bart., K.C.B.,; 56. Mr. Arthur Greenwood; and 57. Mr. Alexander Siemens.

Sir Andrew Noble: Witnesses represent Engineering Employers' Federation and the Shipbuilding Employers' Federation, 5404.

Sir Andrew Noble. Fair Wages Clause: Does not affect this trade at all, 5483, but no objection to it as long as it is properly interpreted, 5405. Witness says that wages must vary according to skill of men, 5405, 5425, and that he takes no notice of Trade Union rates but pays lower in many cases, 5406, 5407. Mr. Siemens concurs, 5411, 5510, but the rates are fixed by agreement with the Trade Unions. Mr. Greenwood concurs, 5413, 5414; discussion on above points, 5407–5415. Mr. Siemens and Sir Andrew Noble: Objects of Clause, discussion, 5420–5424.

Sir Andrew Noble. Unskilled labour: Current rate for, 5416, 5417. Mr. Siemens, Royal Arsenal, hours and rates for unskilled men, 5418–5420, whose rates also vary because even their skill varies, 5427, 5428. Sir Andrew Noble. Semi-skilled labour, 5428.

Mr. Siemens. Skilled labour at Royal Arsenal, minimum Trade Union rate is fixed, 5420, 5422, 5424, but the more skilled the man is the more he earns, 5425–5427.

Sir Andrew Noble. Current Rate: No difficulty in defining this, 5411, 5416; varies in different districts, 5425, 5429, as does average skill of men, 5425, 5429. Mr. Siemens. Objections to current rate, 5420–5423.

Mr. Greenwood. Trade Union Rates: Subsidiary trades are paid less than their usual rates; reasons, etc., 5479–5481. Mr. Siemens does not allow Trade Unions to affect trade in this way at all. Discussion (with special reference to cabinet-makers and joiners), 5502–5515. Mr. Greenwood concurs, 5526; example of very low rate for unskilled man, 5516; discussion, 5517–5527, 5533. Competent men, rates for these in all branches depend on work, and an unskilled man may be competent to work on Government work, at some particular thing; discussion, 5527–5532.

Mr. Siemens. Trade Union Conditions: Would not object to these, if based on agreement just made between employers and men, 5448; discussion, 5447–5451. Sir Andrew Noble and Mr Greenwood concur, 5449. Sir Andrew Noble, but minimum rate is strongly objected to, 5451, 5452. Special low rates also paid to old men, 5452, to which Trade Union does not object, 5453. Mr. Greenwood concurs, 5455. Discussion, 5454–5456.

Sir Andrew Noble. District rates vary in different districts as does average skill of men, 5425, 5429. Mr. Siemens. Definition of district limits by Trade Unions is agreed to, 5430–5432. Mr. Siemens. One employer only in district, rate is fixed by supply and demand, and unfair wages are practically impossible; discussion, 5433–5440, 5484, 5485, 5501. Sir Andrew Noble concurs, and says that skilled labour would be paid more in this case and unskilled labour less, 5441, 5442. Mr. Siemens and Mr. Greenwood concur, 5442. Mr. Greenwood. Rate of nearest place where same industry was being carried on would not do, but a rate must be agreed between employers and men, 5443–5445. Sir Andrew Noble concurs, 5446. Mr. Siemens. Influx of non-Union or Union men would not lower rate in a district, 5486; discussion, 5487–5495.

Sir Andrew Noble. Female Labour: Women employed only on work which they can do better than men, but they can never be paid at same rate, and do not compete with them, 5458. Mr. Greenwood and Mr. Siemens concur, 5461–5463; discussion, 5457–5469.

Sir Andrew Noble. Publication of Contractors' Names: No objection to this, but decision would rest with Government Department, 5470, 5471. Mr. Greenwood concurs, 5472; discussion, 5472–5477. Mr. Siemens does not think interval before publication would be really necessary, 5496. Mr. Greenwood concurs, 5499; discussion, 5496–5500.

---

58. Mr. Henry Hall Bedford, and 59. Mr. Albert John Hobson—

Mr. Bedford is the Master Cutler of Sheffield, 5534, though not in the Cutlery Trade, 5555. Mr. Hobson is President of the Sheffield Chamber of Commerce, 5535.

Fair Wages Clause: Mr. Bedford. No alteration in wording is needed, 5578, 5633. Mr. Hobson concurs, and considers that the fault lies in the Clause not being enforced, 5637. Objections to a local tribunal, 5623–5624.

Mr. Hobson suggests that an "Inquiry Department" be formed to examine for all Government Departments, cases of alleged Evasions; if an Evasion is proved cost of inquiry to be borne by employer; if not, by Trade Union, 5620–5622. Mr. Bedford concurs, 5622.

Current Rate: Mr. Bedford defines this, 5572. A standard price exists for all hand-work in the steel, file and edge-tool trades, which, witness believes, is adhered to by all "fair" firms, 5537, 5572, but modified on the introduction of machinery to a rate agreed between employers and Trade Union, 5537, 5562, 5563. Mr. Hobson concurs, and states that this rate has advanced more by the provision of facilities than by raising the price, 5563. Wages not lowered in slack times, 5625. Mr. Bedford concurs, 5625.

Mr. Hobson. Trade Union objections to a time-work rate by which men can earn no more than by piece-work, 5573. Mr. Bedford. On which men work faster and earn more, 5573. Mr. Hobson. In some cases 40 per cent. more is earned and employers prefer it, as more work is got out of machines, 5574. These Sheffield trades have no standard time rates, 5573. Mr. Bedford. Most of work must be piece-work, 5562, 5572. Mr. Hobson concurs, 5562.

Special Prices for Government Work: Mr. Bedford. Same rates cannot be paid for Government and Commercial work, 5560, 5561, as the patterns of the former are often not made commercially, 5543. Large size of Government orders justifies special prices, 5538, 5548, 5550, 5557, 5559, 5573, Mr. Hobson, and enables workmen to quote lower price with perfect fairness to themselves, 5540, 5541. Mr Bedford concurs, 5541. Mr. Hobson. A case of this description was complained of by Trade Union to Admiralty, who, after inquiry, were satisfied that price paid had been suggested and agreed to by men and was perfectly fair to them, 5541–5547, 5558, 5620, 5621. These difficulties will always exist where Trade Union members are in the minority, 5548, 5549. Witness contends that a price can be proved "fair" when amount (not rate) of men's wages has been increased by the work, 5448, 5660, and if special prices were not allowed work would go to inferior contractors, 5550, 5553. This should justify seeming conversion of "current rate" into "fair rate," 5549, 5550. Rates paid for Government work in some branches of Witness' trades are occasionally lower than those paid commercially, 5559. Mr. Bedford. This does not occur in File Trade, 5559. Mr. Hobson. No net profit can be made on Government work, though it is much appreciated, as payment is certain, 5557, 5558, 5616. Mr. Bedford. Enforced payment of a fixed standard rate for Government work offers no inducement to manufacturers to obtain improved facilities to cheapen production, 5558. Mr. Hobson concurs, 5558, 5623, 5624, and considers that rates should fluctuate with market as in commercial work, 5624.

Sectionising: Mr. Bedford objects to Trade Union suggestion that only skilled hand labour should be employed, as unskilled labour helps the unemployed, 5569, 5570, and is absolutely necessary where whole tendency of a trade is to cheapen production by securing improved machinery, 5570, 5571, 5575, 5576. Mr. Hobson concurs, 5570, 5571, and states that this semi-skilled labour cannot impair Government work, as quality depends not so much on labour employed as quality demanded, 5570. Mr. Bedford has only heard of one case of skilled men claiming to do unskilled work, 5634–5640. Mr. Hobson concurs, 5637, 5640. Mr. Bedford. Improved methods either displace skilled workers or increase their wages, as employers must generally offer them inducements to take up new methods, therefore, employers cannot get all advantages as alleged by Trade Union, 5575–5578. Mr. Hobson concurs, 5576–5577.

Subletting: Mr. Bedford. Restriction not advised though workmen are generally paid direct, group piece-master system is a trade custom, but men are always paid on a recognised scale of wages, 5603–5609, 5615. Mr. Hobson concurs, with slight differences in his own trade, 5605–5609, 5613–5616, 5919. Mr. Bedford. Smaller manufacturers are dying out and being replaced by factory firms, 5617–5619. Mr. Hobson concurs, 5619.

Boys, Women, and Apprentices: Mr. Bedford. They have not depressed wages in Sheffield trades which are mostly so skilled as to require years of training, 5564. Mr. Hobson. Employment of women in the lighter Sheffield industries is traditional, 5565, 5566, 5568, and not increasing or displacing men, 5566, 5568. To forbid the employment of women on Government Contracts, except at men's wages, would be a great injustice to the women, 5556, who would be difficult to replace, as this is essentially women's work, 5565, 5567, for which no men's rate exists, 5568. Mr. Bedford concurs, 5566, and states that Trade Unions should not regulate conditions of employment, especially as to number of apprentices; some time ago this caused a serious dearth of forgers in the light edge-tool trade, 5564. Mr. Hobson. Great difficulty now to get apprentices to keep up number of men at present employed, 5568.

Publication of Contractors' Names: Mr. Bedford objects strongly to this as market might be raised against successful contractors. If men do not recognise Government work it follows that it is paid for at current rate, or complaints would be made, 5579–5602. Mr. Hobson concurs, 5579–5602.

Government Patterns: Mr. Bedford. A more widely spread exhibition would be advantageous to contractors, 5611, 5612. Mr. Hobson. This is unnecessary, unless Departments desire utmost competition, as contractors always obtain the information, 5611, 5612.

War Office cutlery contracts go to inferior firms, as this department does not take such a keen interest in quality as Admiralty, whose work is still in the hands of good firms, 5551–5554. Mr. Bedford concurs, 5555–5557, but states that War Office edge-tool, file and steel trades contracts are given to good firms, 5557.

"Cast steel": Mr. Bedford. No longer a definition; if "crucible cast steel" is required the word "crucible" must be used or Siemens-Martin steel may be substituted, 5610. Mr. Hobson concurs, 5610.

Tender Forms: Mr. Hobson does not express an opinion on sending these to Trade Unions, 5626–5632. Mr. Bedford concurs, 5633.

---

60. Mr. Herbert Henry Bartlett—

Represents the London Master Builders' Association, 5641. Wages, as agreed between employers and men, are generally accepted throughout the country, 5642, 5646–5649, 5673–5676. Association receives few and trivial complaints in the year from men, 5659.

Fair Wages Clause: Satisfactory and needs no alteration, 5658–5659.

Current Rate: Identical with Trade Union rate in London District, 5674.

Trade Union Rates and Conditions: (As agreed between employers and men, 5642) Apply equally to men employed in workshops and on buildings, 5652–5654, and are strongly enforced by Trade Unions, 5644. For unskilled labour, no agreed rate but a minimum is now paid, 5650, 5651. All disputes are settled by a Conciliation Board, 5645.

Publication of Contractors' Names: Is already a practice of the trade and is not objected to, 5655–5657.

Limit of London district, 5693, 5645. Very few cases of firms who set up their own rates on the outskirts, 5644, 5645, discussion (with special reference to Kingston), 5661–5670.

Country: Rates usually agreed between National Federation of Employers and workmen, 5677. Objects to being compelled to pay rate of nearest town, 5659, 5660. Few districts have no standard rates, 5678, 5679. London men when employed on country jobs are paid London rates, 5680–5686, hence different rates for same work paid on same building, 5685.

Apprentices: Limitation of number, 5671, 5672.

Differentiation in grades of work, 5685, 5686.

---

61. Mr. Frank Moore—

Represents the Midland Counties' Hosiery Manufacturers' Association, 5687, districts covered, 5694, 5696, 5758. Association practically always pays piece-work rates, 5689–5692, as agreed between employers and workpeople, 5692–5694, 5697–5709, 5712, 5713, 5717; these are country rates, 5783, and vary with the districts, 5695, 5696, 5718–5721, 5724, 5727–5730.

Current rate: No difficulty in defining, 5688, 5753–5757, and employers cannot set up their own rates as men are migratory, and would not accept less than usual, 5708, 5714–5716, nor could the Government fix rates, 5725–5727. Witness objects to paying rate of nearest town, 5727; discussion, 5746–5750, or town where a firm has its warehouse, 5751, 5752. Migration of manufacturers to local villages, 5699–5702; discussion, 5703–5710. War Office was satisfied that fair rates were paid in this area, 5713.

Trade Union Rates and Conditions: Witness employs Unionists and non-Unionists indiscriminately, 5744–5745, and has no objection to conditions if reasonable, 5722–5723. Agreement with Trades Union officials for lower rates was vetoed by men, 5699, 5700, 5760.

Female Labour: Largely employed, 5707, 5730, 5749, as women are non-Unionists, 5707. They have displaced men to some extent, 5740-5743.

Publication of Contractors' Names: Witness approves of this, 5731–5735.

Machinery tends to improve wages of skilled men, 5740, discussion, 5741–5743, effect of different types of machinery on wages, 5753–5757.

Differentiation in grades of work, 5736–5739.

---

62. Mr. James Scott—

Represents the Master Saddlers' Federation of the United Kingdom, and is President of the Saddlers' and Harness Makers' Employers' Association, 5761. Scope and membership of these, 5764–5766, 5815–5817, 5870. Witness is in business in London, 5761–5763, 5783, 5814, and has not had much experience of Imperial Government contracts, but a great deal of Indian and Colonial contracting, 5767, 5784, 5839. Accoutrement makers are not included in this employers' federation, though they are in men's federation, 5813–5817. Prices for Government work in this trade are laid down by men, and have been agreed to by employers, 5768–5776. Members of federation are not bound to pay these rates, 5777–5779, but the rates paid are fairly uniform, though higher in London than in provinces, 5780–5783.

Fair Wages Clause: Witness considers it good in principle, but has had little experience of it in practice, 5784–5786.

Current Rate: Difficulty in fixing this for district as some firms sublet part of work to women at home though forbidden by Fair Wages Clause to do so, 5836–5841, and Trade Union contend that these women must be paid at same rate as men, 5788-5791, 5795–5797, though it has been a practice for many years in trade to pay them a much lower rate, 5792–5797. Witness does not object to compulsory payment of current rate, 5798, nor to payment of rate of nearest town if no current rate exists, 5868–5872.

Witness suggests alteration of "current rate" to "Trade Union rate," and thinks that employers would not object to paying this for all work, 5799–5812; discussion, 5863–5867.

Female Labour: Employed in one part of work only, though more of it could be done by women, 5820–5822, 5828, 5829. Witness does not consider employment of female labour is increasing in saddlery; reasons etc., 5827–5832, 5835, though it is in accoutrement trade, 5833, 5834. In very heavy work it is possible that women could not do it properly, but this is not so in saddlery trade, 5842–5849. For exactly the same stitching a woman is paid only half as much as a man, though work is equally good, 5873–5882.

Publication of Contractors' Names with interval before publication not objected to, 5850, 5852; discussion, 5851–5859.

Sectionising: Tendency in Saddlery trade is for men to generalise, not to specialise, so that "sectionising" is very little practised, 5815–5826.

Relative proportions of Union men to non-Union men: Witness has no idea of this, 58605862.

---

63. Mr. Ernest Wakely—

Is Hon. Secretary of the Master Bone Brush Manufacturers' Association, 5883, 6026; its small membership, 5885.

Fair Wages Clause: Witness prefers no alteration in wording, 5923–5926, since "Trade Union rates, as agreed between employers and men in a district," would not affect his trade owing to lack of organisation, 5916–5922.

Employers pay almost uniform rates for work throughout, 5887, 5890–5895, 5914, 5935–5940, 5977, 5978, a very small part (fashioning) is done by men at Trade Union rates, 5886, 5887, 5906, 5911, 5920, rest is done by machinery and highly sectionised female and boy labour, 5888–5892, 5894–5897, 5905, 5906, 5912–5915, 5928–5932, 5937, 5949–5968, 5973, 5978, 5979, 6000, 6001, 6008, 6012, 6015, 6020, 6022, 6025, to which the men strongly object, 5896. This sectionising is so increasing as to put boys and women on the "fashioning," which is hard, unsuitable work, 5896, 5906–5910, 5927, 5937, 5938, 5950, 6006–6008, 6020, 6023, 6024.

Government Work: Much appreciated, 5934, though Government pays very low prices, 5934, 5935, 5977, 5995, 6014. Practically all this work is now in the hands of firms employing boy labour, 6024, 6025. Witness suggests that the Government should dispense with competition, i.e., fix a definite rate for each article and distribute them amongst the various employers, 5944–5948, 5954, 5985A–5991, 5994–5999, 6009–6015, and also desires the exclusive employment of male hand labour, 5949–5964, 5975–5982, 5997, 6001–6012, 6015, 6016.

Subletting: A recognised trade custom, 5966, 5967, and if prohibited would cause great hardship to workers, who are mostly married women, 5968, 5973, 5974. Wages are paid direct, 5968–5974.

Isolated Firms: Many employers move into the country to cheapen production, 5918, 5919, 5976, 5983, 5984, 5986, 5990, the lower rates then paid being justified by cheap living conditions, 5985, 5992, 5993.

Publication of Contractors' Names: Witness is not adverse to this, but is doubtful if it will serve any good purpose, 5941–5943.

Apprentices: No restriction of number, 6001–6005.

Foreign Competition: A serious menace, 5899, 5933, 5975–5977.

---

64. Miss Margaret H. Irwin—

Is Secretary of the Scottish Council for Women's Trades, 6027, its work, 6028, 6035, extent of witness' experience, 6028, 6185, 6186.

Women employed on work common to men also are generally paid lower rates, 6031, 6098, 6099, 6100, 6126, 6139, 6193, 6221, 6222, which have even decreased in the needlework trades and certain branches of the textile trades, 6170, 6171, of which cotton-weaving is now, to women, a decaying industry, 6170.

Women and machinery are steadily replacing the skilled hand labour of men, 6059, 6060, 6108, 6112, 6133, though possibly machinery gives men employment otherwise and enlarges and cheapens production, 6133–6138. Female labour is cheaper in districts having only men's industries, 6094–6096.

Similar rates for men and women for equal work done in the same time would be justifiable, 6050, 6078, 6145, but if enforced women would be eventually excluded from most trades, 6050, 6067, 6078, 6106, 6113, 6127–6132, 6146, 6148, as they are not so efficient, 6031, 6032, 6044, 6047, 6048, 6052, 6053, 6057, 6067, 6068, 6129, 6130, only producing two-thirds of a man's production, 6072–6074, 6103, 6105, 6148, though some employers do not agree to this, 6039, 6053–6056. Present wages are out of proportion to their efficiency, 6044, 6045, 6049, 6066, 6085, 6106, 6107, 6157, 6158, 6194, examples of this, 6068, 6192–6194.

Women's low wages are due to:—

(a) Their wages being traditionally lower than men's, 6038, 6043, 6044, 6166, 6167, the result of (b).

(b) Lack of organisation, 6031, 6034, 6043, 6088–6093, 6117–6120, 6149, 6153, 6167–6169, 6172, 6173, though this is improving, 6036, 6120.

(c) Industrial work being regarded by most women as only a temporary occupation, 6035, 6037, and the very serious competition of partially supported women, 6150–6152, 6155, 6159, 6161, and the counteracting of low wages by social condition, 6220–6224.

Current rate: None exists, 6029, 6030, 6074, 6087–6090, 6120, 6162.

Witness' Council suggests that a minimum rate for Government work based on men's wages, but allowing for relative differences in cost of living (which is cheaper in country districts, 6211), inferior skill, etc., 6039–6043, 6066–6087, 6094–6097, 6125, 6127–6131, 6154–6158, 6211, should be fixed by the Government, 6092, 6093, 6101, 6154, 6160, 6207–6210, preferably by an independent official, 6213–6215, as is the system under the Labour Department of Canada, 6216, 6217. This rate should be higher than the present wages, 6101, which are arbitrarily fixed with employers and vary in each workshop, 6074, 6100, 6123, the average being about 10s. per week, 6100, 6163, though this varies with the district, 6165, and very low rates are occasionally accepted in slack times, 6123–6125, 6127. A higher rate for women would not lower men's wages, 6181–6184, 6209, 6210.

Government Work: Government does not pay good prices to contractors, 6121, 6122.

Army uniforms are now made only by one Scotch firm, 6185–6190, that firm pays good wages, 6191–6193.

Witness suggests that Government Tailoring orders should be placed for delivery in the slack period, i.e., August to Ferbuary, 6195–6199.

Definition of Women's Work: Men's Unions in some trades bar women from work quite suited to them, 6058, 6065, 6066, 6139, 6143, 6144, 6178, but the definition is clear in Tailoring, Typographical, 6032, 6033, and Bookbinding Trades, 6144, where women do easier part of men's work, 6139–6144. Tailoring Trade Union alone recognises this, 6141, 6174, and now accepts women members, though few have joined, 6174, 6175.

Trade Union Rates and Conditions: Men's Union in Lancashire and Yorkshire textile trade have same piece-work rate for both sexes, recognised by employers, 6120, Scottish textile trades employ women exclusively, 6086, 6100, 6115–6120, 6177.

Tailoring trade is now considering the framing of a tailoresses' "log," 6130.

Home Work: Lower wages, 6179, Witness suggests that it be only restricted by a minimum rate, etc., as its total abolition would throw deserving people out of employment, 6180.

Employers suggest that Government should fix price per garment, 6207, 6208.

Witness knows of cases where home work, though forbidden, has been employed on Government work, 6200–6206.

Apprentices: Unnecessary length of apprenticeship imposed by men's Trade Union in typographical trade has resulted in the employment of women, 6060, 6064, who become efficient about three years, 6061–6064.

---

65. Mrs. Sarah Dickenson—

Is one of the Joint Secretaries of the Manchester and Salford Women's Trade and Labour Council, 6225, representing the following Trade Unions:—Society of Shirtmakers, 6229, 6339–6341; Tailoresses, 6229 (also represented on Joint Clothiers' Committee, 6246–6248); Women in Printing and Bookbinding, 6229, 6278–6281, 6322; Cigar Makers, 6229; Society for Women in the Electrical Trades, 6229; the Machine, Electric and Other Women Workers' Union, 6326–6332; and other Societies in the Textile Trades, 6228, 6229.

The apathetic attitude of the men's Unions and of the women themselves has resulted in present low wages and lack of organisation among women, 6226, 6227, 6243, 6302, 6342, 6345, 6355–6359, 6416. Witness considers negligible the competition of the casual or partially supported worker, 6347–6354, but admits that low wages are counteracted by social condition, 6352.

Women are usually organised separately from the men, 6235, 6292. A combined Union exists in the Cotton Trade, but is unsatisfactory as the interests of the workers are not identical, 6236, 6237, 6380–6383. Witness can give no information as to progress of organisation in other districts, though her Council occasionally communicates with the Women's Trade Union League in London, 6422, 6425.

Organisation has much improved, 6234, 6323, 6326, and there is now a women's Union in all the large towns, 6323. This has raised women's wages considerably, 6230–6233, 6285–6290, 6325, 6326, and education has enhanced their value as workers, 6405–6408, though they are generally paid at a lower rate than men, 6227, 6392, and out of proportion to their efficiency, 6342, 6343, 6345. Witness quotes wages now paid for Tailoresses, 6257–6259, 6365–6373; Bookbinders, 6230–6231, 6286, 6290; women in Ironworks and Foundries, 6325, 6333–6338; Shirtmakers, 6340; Coremakers, 6336–6338; Electrical workers, 6336; French Polishers, 6343; and Brushmakers, 6338.

Witness admits that, generally speaking, a lower wage will always be paid to women as they do less work than men in the same time, 6307–6311, 6387–6389, 6426–6441, but contends that same rates should be paid to men and women for similar work done in the same time, 6302–6315, 6321, 6362, 6373, 6380, 6381, 6384–6388, though this might eventually exclude women from the industries, 6304, 6312, 6315, 6362–6364, 6391, but such a rate has had an opposite effect in the Lancashire Weaving Trade, 6228, 6304–6306, 6363, 6364, 6400–6404.

Fair Wages Clause: Witness suggests that the present wording should be so altered as to clearly enforce payment of the current rate for women, 6226, 6263, 6264, 6272–6274, 6320, 6324, 6375–6378, 6444–6446, but has heard of no complaints of this omission, 6275, 6276.

Current Rate: Exists where women are organised, 6230, 6231, 6235, and varies in each district, 6441, 6443.

Where districts have no Union, 6322, and in the case of isolated works the rate of nearest district where a Union exists should then apply, 6265, 6268–6270, 6322.

Minimum Rate: This has been raised in Bookbinding Trade, 6230–6231, 6286, and is now being agitated for in Tailoring Trade, 6232.

Witness suggests that the Government, as an example, should employ women directly in Government factories at a fixed minimum of £1 per week, 6257–6263, 6270, 6271, 6291, 6374, 6376, though this rate should not be prescribed in contracts, 6377, 6417–6421, as it would no doubt become universal, 6266, 6272.

Wages Boards might be tried, 6421.

Trade Union rates and conditions: Some employers have agreed to these, e.g., the bookbinding trade, 6230, 6231, and one tailoring firm doing municipal contract work, 6238, 6241, 6243, 6245. This firm paid less than Trade Union (women's) rates to women employed on municipal contracts, 6241, 6242, though Manchester Corporation's Fair Contracts Committee took no action, 6244, 6246, 6252–6254. The Trade Union rate was ultimately enforced by the Joint Clothiers' Committee, 6245–6255. Another firm in the same town and doing similar work employs women, who will not join the Union, and are in consequence "sweated" very badly, 6243.

Where no agreement exists it is understood that Unions would interfere if any reduction was attempted, 6235, 6334.

These rates are enforced, 6232, 6239, 6242, 6245, 6246, 6249–6255, 6333–6335, 6342, and apply to both Unionists and non-Unionists, 6240, 6287, 6288. The highest being 18s. to 20s. per week paid at Linotype works, 6333, 6334.

Definition of women's work: Generally distinct, 6227, especially in tailoring, bookbinding, 6227, 6228, 6278, and Lancashire weaving trades, 6304–6306, 6363, 6364, 6900–6904, and in brushmaking trade where one-third of the work is now done by women, 6345, 6346.

Women are now doing work hitherto done by men, 6228, 6294, 6304–6306, 6325, 6343–6346, 6360, 6361, 6447, and in some cases are more efficient, 6304–6306, 6400–6404. Men's Unions (with the exception of the Coremakers' Union, 6336) strongly object to this encroachment, 6226, 6294–6296, 6318–6319, 6321, 6383.

Witness considers that all trades should be open to women, 6300, 6301, and that men's Unions bar women from quite suitable work, 6277, 6278, 6298, 6299, 6344, 6392, and though they generally do part of the work only, 6227, 6228, 6277, 6278, 6321, 6392, it is not necessarily the easiest, 6303, 6394, as in some parts of Scotland where women work in foundries and where there are furnaces, 6395–6399.

Women's Unions have not yet decided to extend the sphere of women's work, 6297, 6298.

Home Work: Witness does not desire its abolition as this would throw many deserving people out of employment, 6449, 6450.

Over-production and the increasing use of machinery a cause of present unemployment among women, 6315–6317.

---

66. Miss Clementina Black—

Is President of the Women's Industrial Council, London, 6451.

Women's Unions: Shop Assistants' Combined Union is strong, 6464, as are also the Textile Unions, 6464, 6465, but Tailoring, Dressmaking, Underclothing, and worst of all, Boxmaking, are very badly paid, 6463, 6466, as these are the trades where women are not brought together in large numbers, 6466; in some factories different rates are paid for same work in different rooms, 6468–6471.

Fair Wages Clause: Council thinks it does not operate at all among women, 6542, 6543, which is partly due to want of organisation among women, 6454, 6460, and partly to lack of Government supervision for enforcing Clause, 6454. Women do not complain of infringements as they are often unaware of the Fair Wages Clause, and also owing to their lack of organisation and funds, if dismissed, 6586–6590. Some employers say there is no Fair Wages Clause, as it enforces current rate when there is none, 6487–6489.

Current Rate: Difficulty in finding this due to large variation in rates paid for same work (example in Tailoring Trade), 6455–6460; and, slightly to some women not taking work seriously, 6461. Witness suggests fixing a schedule of fair minimum rates (about 10 per cent. less than men's rate, 6496–6502), for Government work, as is done by the Canadian Government, 6472–6476, 6592–6601, 6613–6632, this schedule to be put up in Factories, 6485–6487. Though Witness does not think it could be done in all trades, it might certainly be done in Tailoring and was actually done by the London County Council, 6477–6478. The rate thus fixed would be accepted by employers, the better class of whom have given up Government work, 6479–6484, though minimum suggested is above average it only applies to London, 6602–6606, and would prevent the pocket-money worker taking lower wages, 6503–6506. Witness does not think that Government Contractors could evade this by cutting prices paid for general work as this is often better paid than Government work, 6507-6511, and witness thinks rate should vary slightly in different parts of the country, the difference must not be enough to draw country people into the town, 6633–6640, but agrees that if the contractor was compelled to state wages to be paid on Tender forms it might overcome the difficulty of difference in locality, 6663–6667.

Embroidery trade: Wages paid in this trade are among the lower grade of women's wages, 6531–6533, and private work is better paid than War Office work, 6533–6536. There is no current rate in this trade, 6538–6540, which is almost entirely home-work, often given out through a middle-woman, which is a great danger, 6542–6550, but witness would not advise compelling it to be done in a factory, 6546, 6578. Average earnings in embroidery trade, 6551–6556. Owing to the strictness of inspection best hands are employed on Government work, but the extra care necessary lowers their wages, 6576–6577. Witness suggests a fixed rate for last year of apprenticeship, 6556–6570.

Machinery: Witness thinks it benefits class but not the individual, 6572–6574, and after introduction of machinery in an underpaid trade the machine worker is often no better paid by the hour.

Lowering of wages in the stationery trades owing to increased use of female labour, 6580; witness thinks this could be checked by a uniform rate being paid to women, 6582–6585.

Witness considers that employment of women is increasing and ought not to be restricted, but that clerks especialy have legitimate cause for complaint, as their women competitors generally do not live on their wages as they do in the industrial trades, 6512–6518, 6673, where, however, witness found that the best paid and most satisfactory workers were married women, as they can insist on higher rates than the single woman dependent on her work, 6518–6529. Instance of a contractor at Aldershot, where the women are subsidised soldiers' wives, 6633–6636, 6669–6673.

Unfair firms: Witness would not exclude these from tendering for Government work as, if successful, rates paid might have a good effect on their ordinary rates, 6642–6649.

Witness would not countenance lowering of rates in slack period, 6650–6654, and suggests Government contracts being given at this time, 6652.

---

67. Mr. George Laurence Gomme—

Is Clerk to London County Council, 6674.

Rates in L.C.C. Contracts: Fixed schedule of wages applies to places wholly or partly within 20-mile radius, 6676, 6680. Council has fixed rates for clothing trades, 6696–6702, 6708, 6709, 6761, 6762. Beyond radius contractors submit schedules with their own rates, which are usually on same basis, 6677, 6678, 6680, 6768. Latter schedule covers skilled and unskilled labour, 6681, 6682, 6692, 6693, and applies to Furniture Contracts, 6868–6870, and manufactured articles, 6793, 6794. Complaints of incorrect statement of wages would be investigated, 6769–6772, 6795, 6796, 6823–6828. If complaints were proved, after acceptance of tender, payment would be enforced throughout the contract, 6777–6781*a*. Council's present system of dealing with complaints quite satisfactory, 6753, 6754, though complaints rarely received, 6690. Committee refers rates to an expert official, 6685, 6686, and often accepts or refuses tender accordingly, 6687, 6690, 6691. Objection of contractors if rates were doubled, owing to likelihood of a favoured class of workers being created, 6710. Witness unaware if Council's rates are similar to those paid by employers for other work, 6711. Clothing rates arrived at from evidence submitted whilst Council was considering the question, 6706, 6707, which should not be taken as a standard, 6763, 6764. No complaints made of evasion by employers, 6712, 6713. Council's piece-work list for clothing (copy of which was handed in), is renewed yearly, and does not vary substantially, 6703–6705. No complaints received, regarding manufacture of material in its early stages by a different manufacturer; Witness, therefore, unable to say how the Council would deal with this, 6803–6805. Witness also unable to give Council's procedure if complaints arose (a) where labour-saving appliances were used (hitherto none had arisen), 6851, 6852; (b) through difference in hours, in the case of firm of engineers employing carpenters or bricklayers (engineers' rules differing from builders'), 6856–6858. Case still under consideration, 6859. Questions in dispute during the carrying out of contract determined by professional officer, 6839. Contractor might claim arbitration, though Witness is not certain, 6840–6843. A list shown of Council's rates of wages and labour within 20-miles' radius of Charing Cross, to its own workers where no contractor intervenes, 6679. Council's radius for the operation of Trade Union rate is 20 miles, as against Trade Union 12-miles' radius, 6860–6862. Within the former, London rates are paid, 6864, though Council's work is virtually within 12-miles' radius, 6746, 6747, 6863, 6865.

L.C.C. Fair Wages Clause: A statement that contractor already pays fair wages, 6815, 6816. Council has no difficulty in enforcing clause, 6683, even in cases of unskilled or unorganised labour, 6684. Witness agrees that damnatory clause in contract is more likely to be a deterrent to the worse than the better contractor, 6807–6809.

Female Labour: No difficulty regarding this, 6695, 6714, 6717–6719, 6723, 6732. Council has fixed rates for Tailoring Contracts, separate for men and women, 6715, 6716, though no differentiation of sexes is made in schedule for other trades, but Witness could not give Council's opinion regarding this question, 6720, 6721, 6729–6733. If women were underpaid, Trade Union would complain, 6723–6725. In Printing and Vellum-binding the question has not arisen, 6728.

Current rate: Witness considers that Trade Union rates and wages as agreed between employers and workers where no Trade Union exists, are synonymous with "current rate," 6847–6850. Council does not enforce these throughout factory, where contractor is doing a particular job for them, 6810. For anything else, contractor binds himself to pay current rates, 6811–6814. Witness considers there is no variation of rates for similar labour in London, 6688, 6689. Cases occur sometimes where current rate is difficult to decide. Witness gives instances in connection with special industries, 6748–6751. No complaints received of rates paid, 6750.

Home Work: Council does not approve of this; prohibited in the case of tailoring, 6853–6855.

Sub-letting: This is not permitted—except where customary in the trade—without the written authority signed by the Clerk of the Council, 6798–6801.

Council objects to semi-skilled labour used to exclusion of higher rated work, 6734–6736, 6742. Upon request, contractors have stopped the practice, 6737. Two instances of this were given, 6738, 6739, one being satisfactorily explained, 6739, 6740, as it was more possible for the work in question to be done by an unskilled workman, 6741. Witness considers that a labourer doing a painter's work satisfactorily, demonstrates he is being underpaid and should be called a painter—hence Council's objections, 6743–6745.

Council's staff not much increased by work in connexion with fair wages clauses, 6756–6758, which work is not specialised, 6759, the Council awaiting complaints and investigating these, not keeping up a systematic inspection, 6760. Very few complaints received, 6752.

Names of successful contractors published, 6829–6833, which publicity does not prejudice the interests of Council in buying to the best advantage, 6834–6838.

Witness states that all Council's contracts are advertised, not restricted to selected list of firms, 6817, 6818. Tenders occasion work regarding inquiry as to status, fair wages, etc., 6819–6821. Where Council invites tenders for supply of ironmongery, etc., samples are not submitted to Trade Unions for inspection, 6844–6846.

Occasional alteration of schedule according to alteration in rates of wages, in order not to restrain the securing of improved methods, 6773–6776.

Annual amount of Council's contracts varies, stores alone coming to about £350,000 a year, 6755.

Foreign Orders: In regard to these, wages not so thoroughly gone into, so long as condition of labour is good generally in the district, 6782, 6783. Manufactured articles (of which foreign orders are principally comprised) are purchased by Council in open market, 6784–6787, 6789–6792, such as pencils, etc., 6788.

---

68. Miss Clara E. Collet—

Is Senior Investigator in Women's Industries in Labour Department of Board of Trade, 6873.

Fair Wages Clause: Witness has only considered this as applied to women's wages, 6874, 6875, and thinks there is need of caution in this respect, 6921.

Causes of Inequality in Men's and Women's Wages: Women do not take industrial work seriously, 6879–6881, or aim at future efficiency, 6885–6888, 6891, 6908, and except when the work can be carried on after marriage, 6885, 6889, 6989, most women leave a trade at about twenty-five, 6884, 6943. This absence of future value diminishes present worth of young women, in comparison with young men, in industries requiring a large proportion of skilled and experienced workers, such as Printing Trade, 6891, which in London is practically closed to women by the Compositors' Society, 6891, 6913, 6914, a strong Trade Union, 6916, 6917, which twenty years ago refused to admit women unless on equal terms with men, 6917–6920, and forbade its members to teach women or to continue work commenced by them, to prevent change in organisation which is essential to the employment of female labour, 6920. Women are employed with great success by the Women's Printing Society, 6892, 6893, 6895, are permanent, 6899, and do all the work, 6892, 6894, except machine-minding and the carrying of formes, for which men are employed, 6893. Witness considers that, except on high-pressure work, overtime and night work, 6894, 6906, they could successfully compete on equal terms with men, 6894, 6895, 6898, 6900–6910. Women generally are not at present forcing up their wages in the Printing Trades, 6900, 6906–6909. Men's wages must be sufficient to keep their families and also include the women's standard, which must therefore be lower, 6876–6878. Trade Unions frequently demand that women should not be given new work except at rates paid to men hitherto, 6917, 6919, 6965. This is not "fair," as the work often requires no more skill than other work done by women, 6965, 6966. Amount earned on piece-work is no guide to "fairness," 6967, though same rates are nearly always paid to men and women, when working on similar piece-work, 6998–7000. Men rarely do same time-work as women, 6982. A general equalisation of men's and women's wages is impossible, as some work is essentially women's work, 6898, 6904, 6905; Witness gives examples:—An operation in Brushmaking—at which women can earn more than men, 6896–6898. Dressmaking, which offers exceptional opportunities to efficient workers; maximum wages, 6889–6890; average wages in London Districts, 6987. Tailoring, 6955, offers next best opportunities, 6989–6991; average wages in Soho, 6988, 6989, and East End, 6991. Bookbinding and Book-folding—average wages for all ages, as given by Mr. Bowley in "Women in the Printing Trades," published by Women's Industrial Council, 6991. Lancashire Factory Weaving, where women are employed on same work as men and at practically the same rates, 6997–6999. Originally a women's trade and present rate is a women's rate, 7001, 7002, and usually considered higher than women's wages in other trades, 6998–7002.

Current Rate: Could be arrived at by comparison of women's wages in same class of life in all trades in a district, 6972–6974, 6983, 6986–6992.

Minimum Rate: Time-rate paid in Dressmaking Trade, 6928. A minimum rate might be fixed for all unskilled and time-working female labour, provided that full time is not insisted on, 6975–6979. Witness cites minimum time-rates proposed by Women's Co-operative Guild, 6980, 6981. In piece-work industries, a time-work minimum should not be enforced, as this often results in "driving," a serious matter now in factories, 6923–6929, 6953, 6954, 6980, especially in North Lancashire Weaving Trade, 6923–6929. Witness agrees that a high piece-work rate and the competition of the women against the men also results in this, and gives examples, 6996–7007. Hours per week for piece-workers should be less: Witness is in favour of reducing the hours, which would entail no increased expense to employers, as girls aim at getting a certain amount per week and would do the work in that time, 6963, 6964. Never to employers' interests to give women too little work when employed on machinery, 6954, or to employ inefficient labour, 6968, 6969. Contractors should state on tender forms wages proposed to be pad for each part of work, 6928–6930, 6970. Witness believes these would be ordinary commercial rates, 6956. Witness can give no opinion as to whether Government should enforce payment of ordinary commercial wages on all Government work, 6962. Higher rates usually paid on London County Council Tailoring work, 6960, 6961. Witness does not suggest that Government should fix minimum rate, 6930, 6931, 6961 (as done by London County Council, 6961), but make a comparison of wages sent in on tender forms, 6928, 6931, 6932; although practically this would necessitate the Government fixing a standard of comparison, 6931. Care should be taken when accepting an exceptionally low tender, as this might be due to cut-down wages, usually the case, 6928, or, on the other hand, to the tenderer's improved organisation, facilities, etc., 6931, 6932, 6935, 6939, 6940. Frequent and thorough Government inspection, 6940, 6941, 6957, 6972, should remove all doubt, 6733–6938, 6941, 6957, 6970–6972.

Organisation: Women are not really represented by any Union, 6909, 7008–7011, even in Cotton Trade Unions nearly all officials are men, 6996, 7011.

Home Work: A good system (under good conditions), 6984, 6988, and should not be abolished, 6985. Stoppage of home work in Boot and Shoe Trade threw many men out of employment who would not work in factories, 6993.

Displacement of Men: Witness considers that women have rarely displaced men, 6942, though in some cases women and machinery together have done this, 6943, as in Brush Trade, 6948. Witness quotes from Census Returns (1891 to 1901), 6952, 6994, and shows, that in proportion to population, employment of women over twenty-five is declining, 6943, and states that women generally are getting into easier and better paid work, part of work formerly done by men who have now gone to something better or into other trades, 6994. There is also a diminution in number of boys employed, particularly in Walsall Saddlery Trade, 6945, in which employment of female labour has increased in proportion to female population, and men have declined, 6945–6948. Clerical employments show a remarkable increase in number of men, 6949–6951, Witness can give no statistics as to Vellum-binders, 6994, 6995.

Apprentices (with special reference to Printing Trade): Limitation of number impossible in a women's shop where number of workers fluctuates, 6910. Excessive period of apprenticeship imposed by men's Unions, 6911–6913.

II.—GENERAL INDEX.

[NOTE—In this Index the figures refer to the Question Numbers in the Evidence.]

Accoutrement trade:
See Evasions. Leather Trade.
ALLEN, MR. J. (Q. 4943–5049.) Digest of Evidence. Page 305.
Anvil trade:
Anvil and Vice Trades' Association (Dudley). Taylor, 1444.
See also Current Rate. Evasions (Unfair Wages). Government Contracts. Trade Union Rates and Conditions.

APPRENTICES—APPRENTICESHIP:
Advisability of apprenticeship. Welch and Friend, 1064–1070; Dibdin, 1882, 1883; Coffey, 3278–3291.
Numerical limitation of apprentices. Naylor, 231–233; Gordon and Hickin, 419, 420, 539, 540; Rudd, 645; Clark, 736*a*–744, 751, 752, 758–760, 779, 780; Whatley and Kail, 929, 943, 1004, 1005; Welch and Friend, 1064–1070; O'Grady, 1787–1809; Holmshaw, 2580–2582; Howes, 3141–3147; Coffey, 3253–3258, 3270, 3291; Millerchip, 3624–3633; Fraser and Richards, 4626; Bedford and Hobson, 5564, 5568; Bartlett, 5671, 5672; Wakely, 5854.
No specific limitation. Clark, 736*a*–738; Dibdin, 1881–1883; Watkins, 5249, 5250; Collet, 6911.
Restriction of terms and work of apprentices. Clark, 739–743, 896, 897; Turner, 1321–1330; Templeton and Simpson, 2903, 2931; Howes, 3147; Coffey, 3241; Irwin, 6064; Gomme, 6738–6740; Collet, 6912, 6913.
Minimum rates for apprentices as a check to unfair dismissal. Black, 6556–6570.
Conditions relating to female apprentices. Whatley and Kail, 971; Templeton and Simpson, 2929–2931; Fraser and Richards, 4586–4594; Irwin, 6060–6064; Dickenson, 6230, 6231, 6277, 6286; Collet, 6910, 6989–6994.
See also Evasions (Apprenticeship). Government Contracts. Machinery. Sectionising.
Army contracts:
See Evasions. Government Contracts. Leather Trades.
"Army Houses." Whatley and Kail, 946, 947.

ASSOCIATIONS AND FEDERATIONS REPRESENTED.
See Employers' Associations. Trade Union Rates and Conditions.
BAGLEY, MR. W. (Q. 5318–5403.) Digest of evidence. Page 306.
BAILEY, MR. J. C. (Q. 4877–4942.) Digest of evidence. Page 305.
BARTLETT, MR. H. H. (Q. 5641–5686.) Digest of evidence. Page 308.
Basket makers:
Basket, Skip, and Hamper Makers' Federation. Coleman, 2057.
See also Current Rate. Evasions. Government Contracts. Homework. Subletting.
BEDFORD, MR. H H. (Q. 5534–5640.) Digest of evidence. Page 307.
BENHAM, MR. F. R. (Q. 4877–4942.) Digest of evidence. Page 305.
BLACK, MISS C. (Q. 6451–6673.) Digest of Evidence. Page 310.
Boilermen:
See Enginemen.
Bookbinding trades:
Bookbinders' and Machine Rulers' Union. Welch and Friend, 1110.
London Consolidated Union of Journeymen Bookbinders. Coffey, 3223.
Vellum (Account Book) Binders' Trade Society. Welch and Friend, 1020.
See also Current Rate. Evasions. Female Labour. Government Contracts. Trade Union Rates and Conditions. Unskilled Labour.
Bottle machine, Owen's. Bagley, 5342, 5343, 5366.
Bottle trade:
National Glass Bottle Makers' Society. Milnes, 4110.
Yorkshire Glass Bottle Manufacturers' Association. Bagley, 5318.
See also Current Rate. Evasions (Subletting). Female Labour. Government Contracts. Subletting.
Bought parts:
Importation of ready-made "parts." Cummings, 158–161; Clarke, 714–717, 811, 812, 891, 899–901; Porter, 1972–1974, 1998–2001, 2004, 2005–2007–2010; Macfarlane, 4768–4772; Gomme, 6782–6792.
Boy labour:
See Apprentices. Machinery.
Braziers:
See Tinplate Workers.
Bridle makers:
See Leather Trades.
Brushmaking trade:
Amalgamated Society of Brushmakers. Latchford, 3659.
Bone Brushmakers' Trade Protection Society. Masters, 3769.
British Brush Manufacturers' Association. Kent, 5051; Watkins, 5192; Mason, 5264.
Master Bone Brush Manufacturers' Association. Wakley, 5883.
United Society of Brushmakers. Porter, 1926.
See also Current Rate. Evasions. Female Labour. Home Work. Machinery. Trade Union Rates and Conditions.
Building trade:
National Federation of the Building Trade Employers of Great Britain and Ireland. Macfarlane, 4688; Wallis, 4821; Bartlett, 5641.
Unskilled labour in. Cummings, 157–163; Harris, 274–283.
See also Current Rate. Districts. Evasions. Government Contracts. Government Inspection. Trade Union Rates and Conditions. Unskilled Labour.
BURNS, MR. A. R. (Q. 4360–4413.) Digest of evidence. Page 303.
Cabinet makers:
Controversies as to demarcation of work between cabinet makers and other trades. Dew, 2222–2224, 2335–2339, 2345–2359; Macfarlane, 4727–4730, 4744–4750; Noble, Greenwood, and Siemens, 5502–5533.
See also Furnishing Trades.
Carpenters and Joiners:
Amalgamated Society of Carpenters and Joiners. Dew, 2182.
Sheffield Trade Management Committee of Carpenters and Joiners. Lane, 2412.
Difficulties arising as to their employment in other trades than building. Lane, 2433–2450; Bagley, 5371–5376; Noble, Greenwood and Siemens, 5479–5481.
See also Building Trade. Cabinet Makers. Evasions. Government Contracts. Government Inspection. Machinery. Trade Union Rates and Conditions.
CHARLTON, MR. R. (Q. 4015–4109.) Digest of evidence. Page 303.
CHATER, MR. J. (Q. 4171–4277.) Digest of evidence. Page 303.
Cigar makers:
Society of Cigar Makers. Dickenson, 6229.
CLARK, MR. J. W. (Q. 681–919.) Digest of evidence. Page 297.
Clothing trades:
Amalgamated Society of Clothiers' Operatives. Whatley and Kail, 1010.
Joint Clothiers' Committee. Dickenson, 6246–6248.

Clothing trades—continued.
London Clothiers' Cutters' Trade Union. Whatley and Kail, 920.
See also Current Rate. Evasions. Government Contracts. Trade Union Rates and Conditions.
COFFEY, Mr. W. (Q. 3223–3302.) Digest of evidence. Page 301.
COLEMAN, Mr. W. (Q. 2057–2181.) Digest of evidence. Page 299.
COLLET, Miss C. E. (Q. 6873–7011.) Digest of evidence. Page 311, 312.
Compositors:
See Printing Trades.
Conciliation boards:
Should deal with general questions. Dew, 2402–2408; Lane, 2458
"Contracts Committee":
Suggested formation of. Chater, 4186, 4188, 4191, 4219.
Cotton trade:
See Textile Trades.
Country districts:
See Current Rate.
Coventry:
See Engineering and Shipbuilding Trades.
Cranemen:
See Enginemen.
CROFTS, Mr. W. (Q. 2824–2868.) Digest of evidence. Page 301.
CUMMINGS, Mr. D. C. (Q. 1–188.) Digest of evidence. Page 296.
CURRENT RATE:
Definition:
No difficulty in defining. Fraser and Richards, 4575–4580; Bagley, 5344; Noble, Greenwood and Siemens, 5411, 5416; Moore, 5688, 5753–5757.
Difficulty in. Shaw, 2635–2637; Webb, 2986–2996; Power, 3446–3458; Latchford, 3668, 3670–3673, 3675, 3740, 3755–3764; Burns, 4361–4368; Bailey and Benham, 4884–4888, 4898, 4899; Allen, 4958, 4972, 4973, 4992–4994, 5003; Kent, 5067–5072; Watkins, 5194, 5195; Mason, 5266, 5267, 5270; Bedford and Hobson, 5537–5550.
For Female workers. Templeton and Simpson, 2902, 2903; Scott, 5789–5791; Irwin, 6039–6043, 6066–6087, 6094–6097, 6125, 6127–6131, 6150–6161, 6211; Dickenson, 6258–6264, 6286–6292; 6320; Collet, 6874, 6875, 6970–6974.
In unorganised trades. Cummings, 164–171; Allen, 4985, 4986
For Machine workers. Kent, 5059–5069.
Suggested enforcement of Trade Union Rates and Conditions. Cummings, 42, 48, 164–167, 182; Naylor, 198–201, 213, 224–229, 257, 258; Gordon and Hickin, 399, 402, 440–446, 474–483, 532–540, 562, 563, 566; Rudd, 583, 594–596, 603–609; Clark, 688–699, 705–710, 769, 770, 774–778, 821–830; Whatley and Kail, 928, 947–949, 972–976, 1003; Welch and Friend, 1163, 1164; Turner, 1297–1301, 1321–1330; Taylor, 1475–1498; Holmes, 1595, 1603–1611, 1632–1636, 1646–1653; O'Grady, 1721–1726, 1736–1739, 1763–1768, 1780–1790; Dibdin, 1829–1849, 1852, 1869, 1871; Porter, 1938–1957, 1982, 1987, 1990, 1996, 2054–2056; Coleman, 2064, 2102, 2113; Dew, 2236–2239, 2244, 2266–2269, 2382–2385; Lane, 2433–2436; Holmshaw, 2585–2599; Mappin, 2751, 2752; Crofts, 2828, 2829; Templeton and Simpson, 2865–2868, 2874–2877, 2935; Webb, 3001, 3002, 3022–3024, 3105, 3120–3123; Howes, 3130–3136, 3148–3164, 3192–3210, 3212–3214, 3219; Tolhurst, 3363–3375, 3383–3402; Power, 3511–3514; Davis, 3532–3543; Latchford, 3685–3689, 3703; Masters, 3796, 3797, 3812; Charlton, 4038–4040; Milnes, 4114, 4115, 4162–4170; Chater, 4175–4185; Sharrocks, 4279, 4290–4310, 4312–4328, 4332–4341; Burns, 4369; Straker and Unwin, 4425–4429; Macfarlane, 4690, 4698–4703, 4795–4802; Wallis, 4834; Allen, 4949, 4950, 4991, 4992, 5031; Kent, 5069–5077; Watkins, 5212, 5257; Bagley, 5322–5336, 5353–5357, 5372–5376; Noble, Greenwood and Siemens, 5407–5411, 5447–5451, 5479–5481; Bedford and Hobson, 5537, 5548–5550, 5562, 5563, 5572; Bartlett, 5648–5650, 5673, 5674; Scott, 5799–5809, 5863–5867; Wakely, 5886, 5887, 5915, 5917, 5918; Gomme, 6765–6768, 6847–6850.
Adjudicated by Local Tribunal. Turner, 1312, 1313; Holmes, 1653, 1670–1692.
Objected to. Bedford and Hobson, 5623, 5624.
Should be rate as paid by fair firms. Holmshaw, 2491–2498, 2523–2532, 2587, 2598, 2599; Shaw, 2604, 2605; Mappin, 2752–2754, 2804–2809; Millerchip, 3573; Bailey and Benham, 4891, 4892.
As applied to Municipal Contracts. Whatley and Kail, 949–954; Holmes, 1654–1657; Dew, 2396–2401; Allen, 4954, 4955, 4968, 4969; Gomme, 6676–6680, 6768, 6868–6872.
For Isolated Factories:
Adoption of rate of nearest town doing similar work. Cummings, 20–47, 92–99, 152–157, 175–180; Naylor, 191–208; Gordon and Hickin, 426–433, 440–446, 499–531; Clark, 688–699, 705–710, 772–778, 813–830, 928; Welch and Friend, 1079–1081; Holmes, 1595; O'Grady, 1727–1744; Dibdin, 1873–1878; Porter, 1939–1944, 1959–1963; Dew, 2274–2294; Scott, 5868–5872; Dickenson, 6226, 6268, 6270, 6322.
Not in favour of. Straker and Unwin, 4425–4433; Wallis, 4826–4830, 4857–4871; Allen, 4949, 4950, 5026, 5046; Noble, Greenwood, and Siemens, 5441–5446, 5501; Bartlett, 5644, 5645, 5659–5670, 5680–5686.
Rates to be regulated by neighbouring factories of other trades. Kent, 5080–5083.
Firms with branches should be subject to uniform rates. Holmes, 1625–1658.
Unskilled labour:
Rate determined by conditions of supply and demand. Noble, Greenwood and Siemens, 5418, 5419.
In London building trades. Harris, 311–316; Gomme, 6691–6694.
Raw materials:
Recommendation that current rate should be extended to raw materials. Turner, 1284, 1294–1296, 1332–1335, 1388–1392.
Mainly a piece-work rate:
Basket trade. Coleman, 2064.
Brushmaking trade. Latchford, 3661; Masters, 3788; Kent, 5059–5069; Wakley, 5888–5992.
Cutlery and File trade. Holmshaw, 2467–2469, 2487, 2507–2509; Shaw, 2622–2624; Mappin, 2687, 2688; Bedford and Hobson, 5562, 5572–5578.
Hosiery trade. Holmes, 1567; Moore, 5688–5692.
Leather trade. Power, 3411–3414, 3423, 3429–3432, 3484, 3485
Lock and Key trade. Millerchip, 2568.
Staffordshire Pottery trade. Bailey and Benham, 4886, 4888.
Steel metal workers. Webb, 2980–2985, 3058.
Tin plate workers' trade. Gordon and Hickin, 417, 434.
See also District. Government Contracts. Home Work. Machinery.
Cutlery trades:
Master Cutler of Sheffield. Bedford, 5534.
Pen and Pocket Blade Forgers' Protection Society. Shaw, 2600.
Scissors Grinders' Trade Society. Holmshaw, 2463.
Sheffield United Cutlery Trades' Council. Holmshaw, 2463.
Table and Butchers' Knife Hafters' Trade Society. Crofts, 2824.
See also Current Rate. Evasions. Government Contracts. Government Inspection. Home Work. Trade Union Rates and Conditions. Unskilled Labour.
Cutters:
See Tailoring Trade.
DAVIS, Mr. S. (Q. 3530–3543.) Digest of evidence. Page 302.
DEW, Mr. G. (Q. 2182–2411.) Digest of evidence. Page 299.

DIBDIN, Mr. J. G. (Q. 1821–1925.) Digest of evidence. Page 299.
DICKENSON, Mrs. S. (Q. 6225–6450.) Digest of evidence. Page 309.
DISTRICT:
Discussion on the term. Gordon and Hickin, 497–507.
Contention that Croydon and Kingston are in the London District, Dew, 2341–2344; Gomme, 6863, 6864.
Agreed rates according to districts, Naylor, 200; Harris, 382–386; Clark, 706–709; Sharrocks, 4311–4316; Bartlett, 5643–5646; Moore, 5693–5697, 5713, 5717; Gomme, 6676, 6679, 6680, 6766, 6860–6864.
Should be determined between Trade Unions and employers. Sharrocks, 4291–4294, 4301–4303, 4312–4325.
Isolated firms should be included in nearest district. Cummings, 44, 46, 97, 98, 129–175; Clark, 772.
See also Current Rate Evasions.
Edge Tool trade (Sheffield):
See Cutlery Trade.
Electrical trades:
Electrical Trades' Union. Dibdin, 1821.
See also Cabinet Makers. Engineering and Shipbuilding Trades.
Embroidery trade. Black, 6533–6570, 6576–6578.
EMPLOYERS' ASSOCIATIONS AND FEDERATIONS REPRESENTED:
British Brush Manufacturers' Association. Kent, 5500; Mason, 5263; Watkins, 5192.
Engineering Employers' Federation. Noble, Greenwood, and Siemens, 5404.
Federation of Master Printers and Allied Trades (United Kingdom). Straker, 4414; Unwin, 4415; Fraser, 4573; Richards, 4574.
London Master Printers' Association. Straker and Unwin, 4414.
Master Bone Brush Manufacturers' Association. Wakely, 5883.
Master Sadlers' Federation of the United Kingdom. Scott, 5761.
Midland Counties Hosiery Manufacturers' Assotion. Moore, 5687.
National Federation of Building Trade Employers of Great Britain and Ireland. Macfarlane, 4688; Wallis, 4821; Bartlett, 5641.
National Federation of Merchant Tailors. Allen, 4943.
Saddlers and Harness Makers' Employers' Association. Scott, 5761.
Sheffield Chamber of Commerce. Hobson, 5534.
Shipbuilding Employers' Federation. Noble, Greenwood, and Siemens, 5404.
Staffordshire Potteries Manufacturers' Association. Bailey and Benham, 4877.
Yorkshire Glass Bottle Manufacturers' Association. Bagley, 5318.
Engineering and shipbuilding trades:
Coventry Engineering and Allied Trades Federation. Chater, 4171.
Engineering and Shipbuilding Employers' Federation. Noble, Greenwood, and Siemens, 5404.
Society of Boilermakers and Iron and Steel Shipbuilders. Cummings, 144–149; Sharrocks, 4278.
See also Current Rate. Electrical Trades. Evasions. Female Labour. Government Contracts. Trades Union Rates and Conditions.
Enginemen:
National Amalgamated Society of Enginemen, Cranemen, Boilermen, Firemen, and Electrical Workers. Charlton, 4015.
Engravers:
See Printing Trades.
EVASIONS:
Alleged evasions of the Fair Wages Clause:
Methods of evasion:
By sub-letting. Naylor, 222, 223; Gordon and Hickin, 520; Clark, 724–726, 753, 801–812, 891, 892; Porter, 2002, 2006–2010; Webb, 3037–3045; Millercip, 3546–3555, 3577–3580, 3615–3627, 3634–3637, 3648–3658; Latchford, 3678–3684; Morrison, 3841, 3903–3913, 3968–3975; Milnes, 4120–4122, 4124; Allen, 4954, 5032; Kent, 5180–5182; Irwin, 6204.
By sectionising. Gordon and Hickin, 550–559; Welch and Friend, 1048; Mappin, 2678–2690, 2695–2703, 2708, 2709; Coffey, 3239, 3240; Bedford and Hobson, 5541.
Evasions—continued.
Alleged evasions of the Fair Wages Clause—continued.
Methods of evasion—continued.
By overtime, Naylor, 209, 234–237; Gordon and Hickin, 512; Tolhurst, 3349–3359; Chater, 4192–4218, 4237–4254.
By payment of alleged unfair wages. Cummings, 4–11, 15, 18, 162; Harris, 271, 272, 339; Rudd, 619–621, 634, 635, 662–667; Whatley and Kail, 929–939; Welch and Friend, 1042, 1104; Turner, 1284; Holmes, 1683–1692; Dibdin, 1878–1880, 1885–1888; Dew, 2223–2227, 2371; Lane, 2415–2426, 2430, 2438–2452; Webb, 3046, 3047, 3062–3075; Howes, 3133; Coffey, 3260; Davis, 3532, 3533; Masters, 3795, 4120; Sharrocks, 4281, 4282, 4329–4331, 4353.
4120; Sharrocks, 4281, 4282, 4329–4331.
In isolated factories, Naylor, 201; Welch and Friend, 1105–1108; Taylor, 1482–1487; Holmes, 1625–1632; Sharrocks, 4290.
By excessive and unfair employment of boys and apprentices. Cummings, 11, 162, 163; Naylor, 213; Clark, 720, 723, 730–736, 744, 750, 755, 756, 799, 800, 910–915; Whatley and Kail, 929, 934, 958–965; Coffey, 3232–3240, 3273–3275; Wakely, 5937–5940.
By female labour Gordon and Hickin, 550–559; Whatley and Kail, 971, 981–1019; Welch and Friend, 1077, 1078, 1104; Holmes, 1611–1621; Howes, 3140; Morrison, 3885, 3930–3933; Wakely, 5934–5940; Black, 6633–6636, 6669–6673.
Concrete cases of alleged evasion mentioned by Witnesses:
By sub-letting. Rudd, 610, 678, 679; Clark, 718, 877–879; Porter, 1998–2006; Coleman, 2064–2066, 2073–2081, 2096, 2107, 2110, 2120–2135, 2167, 2168; Millercip, 3581–3593, 3638–3642.
By sectionising. Whatley and Kail, 957; Mappin, 2691–2695, 2821–2823.
By overtime. Turner, 1284–1286; Dew, 2196–2201, 2218; Howes, 3127–3129; Coffey, 3209, 3222–3228, 3249–3259, 3277–3281; Tolhurst, 3322–3337; Charlton, 4018, 4019; Black, 6511.
By payment of alleged unfair wages. Cummings, 30, 31, 87, 88; Harris, 281–283, 288, 301–303, 306, 317–321, 381, 388–395; Rudd, 582–592, 642, 643; Clark, 718, 719; Turner, 1266–1270, 1286–1289, 1314–1330, 1415, 1416; Taylor, 1448–1474, 1504–1514; Holmes, 1575; O'Grady, 1705–1707, 1714–1716, 1719–1721, 1778; Dibdin, 1848–1850, 1872; Coleman, 2064–2066, 2114–2119; Dew, 2206, 2213, 2214, 2218, 2222–2231, 2360, 2361; Shaw, 2604–2606, 2610–2617, 2634, 2635, 2651, 2652, 2660; Crofts, 2826, 2831, 2832, 2836–2838, 2841–2847; Webb, 2987–2993, 3025–3034; Tolhurst, 3314–3321; Power, 3416–3431, 3465–3470; Masters, 3807–3811; Morrison, 3884–3893; Charlton, 4019, et seq.; Chater, 4181–4184, 4234; Sharrocks, 4283, 4284, 4290, 4294, 4303, 4324 4359; Burns, 4366.
In isolated factories. Cummings, 21, 32, 33, 44, 97–99, 129–135, 137; Welch and Friend, 1042; Holmes, 1587–1591; Porter, 1936, 1937; Dew, 2201–2204; Howes, 3130–3136, 3148–3164, 3192–3210; Sharrocks, 4325, 4434; Moore, 5705–5717, 5749.
By excessive and unfair employment of boys and apprentices. Rudd, 583, 628–642; Welch and Friend, 1042–1045.
By female labour. Cummings, 137; Welch and Friend, 1042, 1046–1048; Holmes, 1587–1591; Coleman, 2064–2073; Shaw, 2612–2617; Templeton and Simpson, 2887, 2888, 2899, 2906, 2908–2933, 2966, 2973; Howes, 3132–3139; Masters, 3805; Morrison, 3894–3898, 3903–3905, 4012; Fraser and Richards, 4584–4587; Irwin, 6113, 6114; Dickenson, 6241, 6242, 6246, 6252–6254.

Evasions—continued.
See also Bought Parts. Current Rate. Female Labour. Government Contracts. Government Inspection. Home Work. Machinery. Overtime. Sectionising. Trade Union Rates and Conditions. Unskilled Labour.
Factory Acts:
See Government Inspection.

FEDERATIONS OF EMPLOYERS:
See Employers' Associations and Federations Represented.

FEMALE LABOUR:
Board of Trade (Senior Investigator for Women's Industries). Collet, 6873.
Manchester and Salford Women's Trades and Labour Council. Dickenson, 6225.
Scottish Council for Women's Trades. Irwin, 6027
Women's Industrial Council. Black, 6451.
Employment:
Restriction considered undesirable. Bedford and Hobson, 5565–5567; Irwin, 6065, 6066; Dickenson, 6294, 6296, 6300, 6301, 6392–6416; Black, 6514.
Desirable only under adequate rates and conditions. Naylor, 247–251; Welch and Friend, 1074–1078, 1091, 1092; O'Grady, 1813*a*, 1816; Porter, 1982, 1983; Mappin, 2819, 2820; Templeton and Simpson, 2896–2898, 2901–2905; Coffey, 3292–3302; Power, 3433–3441, 3464, 3515–3521; Latchford, 3704–3713; Morrison, 4005–4014; Straker and Unwin, 4482–4488; Fraser and Richards, 4643–4649; Kent, 5106, 5188–5190; Watkins, 5229–5236; Bagley, 5342; Noble, Greenwood, and Siemens, 5458; Bedford and Hobson, 5565; Scott, 5788, 5868; Collet, 6904; Irwin, 6145–6148; Dickenson, 6302–6304, 6336, 6362, 6364, 6380–6391; Black, 6503–6506.
Employment rejected unconditionally. Gordon and Hickin, 564; Clark, 745–749; Shaw, 2540–2644.
Efficiency:
Considered as equal to that of male labour. Holmes, 1624; Porter, 2044; Straker and Unwin, 4483; Kent, 5107–5109; Noble, Greenwood, and Siemens, 5457–5462, 5465, 5467; Collet, 6889, 6890, 6910, 6987–6997.
Considered less than that of male labour. O'Grady, 1810–1815; Porter, 1984, 1984*a*, 2041–2043; Coleman, 2173–2181; Shaw, 2618–2621; Mappin, 2715–2755; Templeton and Simpson, 2906, 2907, 2935, 2950–2962, 2970, 2971; Howes, 3132; Power, 3438–3445, 3515–3521; Latchford, 3706–3708; Morrison, 3895–3902; Straker and Unwin, 4492; Fraser and Richards, 4588–4594, 4674–4676; Allen, 5047–5049; Watkins, 5229, 5230; Mason, 5310, 5311; Moore, 5740–5743; Scott, 5842–5849; Wakely, 5906–5910, 5927, 5960–5963, 6020; Irwin, 6031, 6034, 6044, 6047, 6048, 6052–6057, 6067–6074, 6103, 6105, 6129, 6130, 6143, 6144, 6148; Dickenson, 6227, 6228, 6278, 6307-6311, 6387–6389, 6426–6441; Collet, 6885–6888, 6891, 6892, 6899–6903, 6908, 6968.
Wages:
Enforcement of current rate. Mason, 5294–5300; Irwin, 6039–6043, 6050, 6066–6087, 6092–6097, 6100, 6101, 6105–6107, 6125, 6127–6131, 6154–6158, 6160, 6207, 6211; Dickenson, 6307–6316, 6320–6334, 6373; Collet, 6900–6906, 6975–6981.
Causes of depression of women's wages. Straker and Unwin, 4504–4514; Watkins, 5229, 5230, 5236, 5237; Scott, 5790, 5791; Irwin, 6031–6034, 6038, 6039, 6043, 6085–6110; 6117–6131, 6139–6144, 6149–6159, 6166–6173, 6181–6184, 6192–6194, 6209–6212, 6220–6234; Dickenson, 6315, 6316; Black, 6662, 6668.
Organisation as affecting wages. Holmes, 1615–1618; Templeton and Simpson, 2890–2892, 2903, 2904, 2915–2928, 2936; Power, 3445, 3446, 3460; Fraser and Richards, 4616–4618; Moore, 5707; Irwin, 6031–6037, 6087–6093, 6117–6120, 6139, 6149, 6153, 6157–6179; Dickenson, 6232–6292, 6302, 6323, 6325–6346, 6355–6359, 6416; Black, 6461–6466, 6572–6575, 6586–6590; Collet, 6909, 6913–6920, 6996, 7008–7011.

Female Labour—continued.
Wages—continued.
Displacement of men:
Consequent upon increasing female labour. Naylor, 191–197, 209, 228–256; O'Grady, 1813*b*; Porter, 1977–1980; Templeton and Simpson, 2878–2883, 2886, 2887, 2923–2928, 2937, 2938, 2966–2970; Howes, 3132, 3134, 3137–3140; Tolhurst, 3340; Power, 3433–3438; Morrison, 3930; 3991; Fraser and Richards, 4581–4589, 4593; Kent, 5142, 5143; Mason, 5287–5290; Scott, 5833; Wakely, 6021–6024; Irwin, 6060, 6086, 6108, 6115, 6117, 6177; Dickenson, 6304–6306, 6321–6325, 6345, 6346, 6361, 6363, 6400–6404; Black, 6454, 6460, 6487–6489, 6512, 6517, 6542, 6543, 6580, 6581, 6586, 6590; Gomme, 6729; Collet, 6891–6910, 6949–6951, 6996–7007.
Rare occurrence of this. Turner, 1442, 1443; Noble, Greenwood and Siemens, 5468, 5469; Bedford and Hobson, 5564–5566; Scott, 5792–5794, 5827–5830; Collet, 6942–6954.
See also Apprentices. Current Rate. Evasions. Home Work. Machinery. Sectionising. Sweating. Wages Boards.
File trade:
Sheffield Machine File Cutters' Union. Mappin, 2671.
See also Current Rate. Evasions (Sectionising). Female Labour. Government Inspection. Sectionising.
Firemen:
See Enginemen.
FRASER, Mr. W. (Q. 4573–4687.) Digest of evidence. Page 304.
French polishers:
London United Society of French Polishers. Rudd, 575.
See also Current Rate. Evasions. Furnishing Trades.
FRIEND, Mr. E. (Q. 1020–1263.) Digest of evidence.
See Welch.
Furnishing trades:
Furnishing Trades' Association. O'Grady, 1676
See also Current Rate. Evasions (Unfair Wages). Government Inspection. Machinery.
Galvanised Hollow ware workers:
See Tin Plate Workers.
Glass Bottle trade:
See Bottle Trade.
GOMME, Mr. G. L. (Q 6674–6872.) Digest of evidence. Page 311.
GORDON, Mr. J. C. (Q. 396–574.) Digest of evidence. Page 296.

GOVERNMENT CONTRACTS:
Suggestion that the Government should restrict contracts to "Fair Firms." Cummings, 19, 80–91, 115–128; Whatley and Kail, 1015–1019; Welch and Friend, 1118; Dibdin, 1829, 1865–1869, 1912–1917; Dew, 2218–2222, 2231, 2236; Bedford and Hobson, 5560, 5561.
Suggested fixing of rates by Government. Harris, 307–310; Holmes, 1602, 1658–1663, 1680–1682, 1693–1695; Dew, 2227*a*, 2228, 2396–2398; Holmshaw, 2510–2520, 2523; Morrison, 3914–3928; Chater, 4188–4191, 4225–4236, 4272–4277; Burns, 4369–4374, 4378–4402; Straker and Unwin, 4475–4479; Allen, 4960–4967, 5012–5014; Scott, 5799, 5812; Wakely, 5944–5948, 5954, 5985*a*, 5991, 5994–5999, 6009–6015; Irwin, 6121–6125, 6216, 6217; Dickenson, 6257–6263, 6270, 6271, 6374, 6376, 6377, 6417–6421; Black, 6472–6476, 6496–6502, 6592–6601, 6613–6632.
Objections to Government's fixing rates. Bailey and Benham, 4897, 4898, 4900–4904; Watkins, 5212; Noble, Greenwood and Siemens, 5405, 5451–5456; Moore, 5725–5727; Collet, 6961, 6975–6981.
Suggestion that rates and conditions on Government contract work should be exhibited at the factory. Cummings, 60–65, 110–112, 172–174; Whatley and Kail, 951–954; Dew, 2362–2366; Straker and Unwin, 4531–4541; Fraser and Richards, 4621, 4670–4673; Allen, 4951, 4974, 5011; Black, 6485–6487.
Suggestion that Contractors should furnish Departments with Rates at time of tendering. Allen, 5012–5014; Black, 6613–6615; Gomme, 6677–6680, 6685, 6793.
Suggestion that Contractors' names should be published or furnished to Trade Unions. Cummings, 68–74, 100–110; Gordon and Hickin, 434–438, 541–545; Welch and Friend, 1138–1142; Turner, 1321, 1331, 1354–1380; O'Grady, 1745–1751; Coleman, 2081–2087; Holmshaw, 2501–2506, 2513–2518, 2555–2566; Crofts, 2827–2830; Millerchip, 3556–3559; Latchford, 3714–3718; Milnes, 4118, 4127–4133; Macfarlane, 4790–4791; Bailey, 4918; Allen, 4950, 4951; Kent, 5109–5111, 5160–5166; Watkins, 5213; Bartlett, 5655–5657; Scott, 5850–5859; Wakely, 5941–5943.

Government Contracts—continued.
Objected to. Benham, 4920–4929; Bagley, 5377–5379; Bedford and Hobson, 5579–5602.
Instances of special Government work paid at special rates. Gordon and Hickin, 416–418, 450–473, 484–490; Taylor, 1471–1473, 1499–1501; Coleman, 2088; Webb, 3006, 3017; Fraser and Richards, 4599–4603; Wallis, 4830; Kent, 5128–5135; Bedford and Hobson, 5541–5553; Black, 6655–6658.
Objection to special rates being paid for Government work. Masters, 3816–3824; Macfarlane, 4704–4708; Wallis, 4838–4841; Bailey and Benham, 4906, 4907; Kent, 5128–5135, 5144–5150; Bedford and Hobson, 5538–5541, 5550, 5557–5561, 5573; Collet, 6956–6960.
Standard of efficiency for Government contracts. Whatley and Kail, 941; Shaw, 2778, 2779; Webb, 2995, 3110–3119; Millerchip, 3607–3612; Allen, 4998–5004; Bedford and Hobson, 5551–5557, 5619; Black, 6576, 6577.
Placing of contracts abroad. Clark, 714–717, 899–901; Porter, 1975.
Suggested alteration of period of year when contracts are given out. Coleman, 2088, 2089; Irwin, 6195–6199.
Suggested prohibition of boy labour for machinery on Government work. Wakely, 5092–5096, 5997, 6001, 6012–6015.
Small profit to employers on Government contracts. Bedford and Hobson, 5557, 5558; Wakely, 5934–5936, 6012–6014.
See also Current Rate. Evasions. Sectionising. Unskilled Labour.

GOVERNMENT INSPECTION UNDER FAIR WAGES CLAUSE:
Need of more efficient Government inspection. Gordon and Hickin, 421–423, 546–549; Clark, 718, 728–730, 771–772, 781–786, 889; O'Grady, 1752–1762, 1817–1820; Dibdin, 1829–1831, 1850, 1851, 1870; Coleman, 2165–2168; Holmshaw, 2464–2466; Shaw, 2611; Mappin, 2726, 2739, 2741–2750, 2764–2783, 2785, 2818; Power, 3417–3425, 3465–3470; Millerchip, 3552; Sharrocks, 4282; Bailey and Benham, 4931, 4932; Allen, 4954–4957; Bedford and Hobson, 5610, 5620–5622.
Inspection under Factory Act considered sufficient. Allen, 4953, 4958, 4963.
Suggested method of private inquiry. Clark, 728–730; Webb, 3055–3057.
Inquiry by Board of Trade. Cummings, 83.
See also Government Contracts.

Government specifications:
See Government Contracts. Patterns.

GREENWOOD, Mr. A. (Q. 5404–5533.) Digest of evidence. Page 306.

Harness makers:
See Leather Trades.

HARRIS, Mr. A. (Q. 262–395.) Digest of evidence. Page 296.

HICKIN, Mr. C. (Q. 396–574.) Digest of evidence. Page 297.

HOBSON, Mr. A. J. (Q. 5534–5640.) Digest of evidence. Page 307.

Hollow ware workers:
See Tinplate Workers.

HOLMES, Mr. J. (Q. 1558–1695.) Digest of evidence. Page 298.

HOME WORK:
Extent of. Coleman, 2159, 2170; Kent, 5091, 5092; Bedford and Hobson, 5619; Scott, 5835, 5836; Wakely, 5966, 5967.
Not objected to under adequate rates and conditions. Kent, 5084–5090, 5093–5100, 5170–5177, 5183–5187, 5195–5197; Wakely, 5966–5968; Irwin, 6179, 6180; Dickenson, 6449, 6450; Black, 6542–6550, 6578; Collet, 6984, 6985, 6988.
Objected to, and its abolition advocated. Coleman, 2064–2066, 2120–2135, 2149–2158; Millerchip, 3635–3638; Latchford, 3679–3684, 3723–3735, 3755–3758, 3765–3768; Watkins, 5235.
See also Evasion (Sub-letting). Female Labour. Sweating. Wages Boards.

Hosiery trade:
Midland Counties Manufacturers' Association. Moore, 5687.
National Hosiery Federation. Holmes, 1558.
See also Current Rate. Districts. Evasions. Female Labour. Government Contracts. Machinery. Trade Union Rates and Conditions.

HOWES, Mr. H. W. (Q. 3125–3222.) Digest of evidence. Page 301.

Improvers:
See Apprentices.

Industrial Education Committee. Howes, 3147.

Inspection:
See Government Inspection.

Iron plate workers:
See Tinplate Workers.

IRWIN, Miss M. H. (Q. 6027–6224.) Digest of evidence. Page 309.

Isolated Firms:
See Current Rate. Districts. Evasions. Trade Union Rates and Conditions.

Joint Clothiers' Committee. Dickenson, 6246–6253.

KAIL, Mr. H. (Q. 920–1019.) Digest of evidence. Page 298.

KENT, Mr. E. N. (Q. 5050–5191.) Digest of evidence. Page 305.

Labour Protection League: Harris, 262–268.

LANE, Mr. W. (Q. 2412–2462.) Digest of evidence. Page 300.

LATCHFORD, Mr. E. (Q. 3659–3768.) Digest of evidence. Page 302.

Leather trades:
Brown Saddlers' Society (Walsall). Power, 3429, 3485–3487, 3502.
London Saddle and Harness Makers' Trade Society. Morrison, 3831.
Master Saddlers' Federation. Scott, 5761.
Midland Leather Trades Federation. Power, 3403.
Military Harness and Accoutrement Makers' Trade Union. Morrison, 3831.
Saddlers and Harness Makers' Employers' Association. Scott, 5761; Burns, 4360.
Walsall Bridle Cutters' Trade Society. Davis, 3530.
See also Current Rate. Evasions. Female Labour. Government Contracts. Government Inspection. Machinery. Sectionising. Trade Union Rates and Conditions.

Lithographic Artists:
See Printing Trades.

Local Tribunals:
See Current Rate.

Lock and Key smiths:
National Amalgamated Lock and Key Smiths' Society. Millerchip, 3544.
See also Current Rate. Evasions. Government Contracts. Government Inspection. Home Work. Sub-letting.

London Bookwork and Newspaper Scale:
See Trade Union Rates and Conditions.

London County Council:
Generally. Gomme, 6674.
See also Current Rate. Sweating.

MACFARLANE, Mr. G. (Q. 4688–4820.) Digest of evidence. Page 304.

MACHINERY:
Advantages of machinery. Naylor, 195; Porter, 2034; Bedford and Hobson, 5570–5576; Moore, 5740–5743; Irwin, 6133–6138.
Employment of women and boys on machinery. Holmes, 1615–1621; Porter, 2034, 2035; Templeton and Simpson, 2898; Howes, 3137–3140; Wakely, 5960–5963; Black, 6575.
Displacement of skilled men by machinery. Naylor, 195; O'Grady, 1772–1774; Fraser and Richards, 4590–4593; Kent, 5151–5156; Bedford and Hobson, 5570–5578; Wakely, 5888–5892, 5894–5897, 5906, 5909–5915, 5928–5830, 5937, 5949–5963, 5978, 5979, 6008, 6020–6022; Irwin, 6059–6062, 6102, 6108, 6111–6113.
Fixing of rates for machinery work. Gordon and Hickin, 520; O'Grady, 1769–1774; Webb, 3091, 3092; Morrison, 3941–3948, 3958–3967; Kent 5059–5069.
See also Evasions (Boy Labour). Government Contracts.

Manchester and Salford Women's Trades and Labour Council:
See Female Labour.
MAPPIN, Mr. A. S. (Q. 2671–2823.) Digest of evidence. Page 300.
MASTERS, Mr. A. (Q. 3769–3830.) Digest of evidence. Page 302.
Military Harness and Accoutrement makers:
See Leather Trades.
MILLERCHIP, Mr. W. (Q. 3544–3658.) Digest of evidence. Page 302.
MILNES, Mr. W. (Q. 4110–4170.) Digest of evidence. Page 303.
Minimum Rate:
See Apprentices. Current Rate. Government Contracts. Trade Union Rates and Conditions.
MOORE, Mr. F. (Q. 5687–5760.) Digest of evidence. Page 308.
MORRISON, Mr. J. T. (Q. 3831–4014.) Digest of evidence. Page 302.
Municipal Contracts:
See Current Rate. Sweating. Trade Union Rates and Conditions.
Naval Contracts:
See Evasions.
NAYLOR, Mr. T. E. (Q. 189–261.) Digest of evidence. Page 296.
Nepean, Mr. Morrison, 3841–3844.
NOBLE, Sir Andrew, K.C.B. (Q. 5404–5533.) Digest of evidence. Page 306.
O'GRADY, Mr. J., M.P. (Q. 1696–1820.) Digest of evidence. Page 298.
Overtime:
See Evasions.
Owen's Machine:
See Bottle Machine (Owen's).
Patterns of Government work:
Suggested improvements in. Gordon and Hickin, 452–465; O'Grady, 1752–1762; Bailey and Benham, 4936–4942.
Exhibition of. Shaw, 2659; Webb, 3018–3021, 3048–3053, 3084–3089; Millerchip, 3594–3606; Bedford and Hobson, 5611, 5612.
Piece-master system:
See Evasions (Sub-letting).
Piecework:
See Current Rate. Evasions (Boy Labour).
PORTER, Mr. S. G. (Q. 1926–2056.) Digest of evidence. Page 299.
Pottery trade:
Staffordshire Potteries Manufacturers' Association. Bailey and Benham, 4877.
See also Current Rate. Government Contracts. Government Inspection. Sectionising. Trade Union Rates and Conditions.
POWER, Mr. G. (Q. 3403–3529.) Digest of evidence. Page 302.
Printing trade:
Amalgamated Society of Lithographic Artists, Designers, Engravers and Process Workers. Tolhurst, 3303.
Federation of Master Printers and Allied Trades of the United Kingdom. Straker, 4414; Unwin, 4415; Fraser, 4573; Richards, 4574.
London Master Printers' Association. Straker and Unwin, 4414.
London Society of Compositors. Naylor, 189.
Printing Machine Managers' Trade Society. Howes, 3125.
Scottish Typographical Association. Templeton and Simpson, 2869, 2870; Fraser and Richards, 4686.
See also Apprentices. Current Rate. Evasions. Female Labour. Government Contracts. Unskilled Labour.
Publication of Contractors' names:
See Government Contracts.
Raw materials:
See Current Rate.
RICHARDS, Mr. T. (Q. 4573–4687.) Digest of evidence. Page 304.
RUDD, Mr. E. J. (Q. 576–680.) Digest of evidence. Page 297.
Saddle makers:
See Leather Trades.
Scientific Instrument Makers' Trade Society. Clark, 681.
See also Apprentices. Current Rate. Evasions. Government Contracts. Government Inspection. Trade Union Rates and Conditions.
Scissor Grinders' Union:
See Cutlery Trade.
SCOTT, Mr. J. (Q. 5761–5882.) Digest of evidence. Page 308.
Scottish Council for Women's Trades. Irwin, 6027.
SECTIONISING:
Extent of. Scott, 5815–5826.
Fostered by employment of girls. Shaw, 2640–2642.
Necessary under adequate rates and conditions. Clark, 744; Mappin, 2706, 2707, 2713–2725, 2755, 2788–2803; Benham and Bailey, 4912–4915, 4917; Allen, 4947, 4948; Watkins, 5207, 5208; Bedford and Hobson, 5569–5578, 5634–5640; Gomme, 6734–6745.
Objections to. Gordon and Hickin, 406–415, 568–574; Dew, 2255, 2256; Mappin, 2821–2823; Morrison, 4012; Watkins, 5202, 5202*a*, 5205–5208; Mason, 5278–5281, 5285, 5302, 5305; Wakely, 5886–5892, 5894–5895, 5927–5932, 5937, 5938, 5949–5968, 5793, 5978–6001, 6006–6008, 6012, 6015, 6020, 6023–6025.
See also Current Rate. Evasions (Sectionising).
Semi-skilled labour:
See Unskilled Labour.
SHARROCKS, Mr. W. (Q. 4278–4359.) Digest of evidence. Page 303.
SHAW, Mr. G. H. (Q. 2600–2670.) Digest of evidence. Page 300.
Sheet metal workers:
See Current Rate. Tinplate workers.
Shipbuilding trade:
See Engineering and Shipbuilding Trades.
Shirt Makers' Society. Dickenson, 6229, 6339, 6340.
Shop Assistants' Union. Black, 6464.
SIEMENS, Mr. A. (Q. 5404–5533.) Digest of evidence. Page 306.
SIMPSON, Mr. G. (Q. 2869–2973.) Digest of evidence. Page 301.
STRAKER, Mr. S. C. (Q. 4414–4572.) Digest of evidence. Page 304.
SUB-LETTING:
Inadvisability of restriction. Coleman, 2136–2139; Bagley, 5392–5403; Bedford and Hobson, 5603–5609, 5613–5619; Wakely, 5966–5976.
Sweating fostered by. Millerchip, 3546; Morrison, 3841; Noble, Greenwood and Siemens, 5501; Kent, 5175, 5176.
See also Evasions (Sub-letting).
SWEATING:
Instances of sweating in Municipal and Commercial work. Rudd, 583, 614, 615; Turner, 1386; Allen, 4953, 4958*a*; Dickenson, 6238–6243; Irwin, 6170, 6171; Dickenson, 6238–6243.
Unfair firms unable to compete for high-class Government work. O'Grady, 1704.
House of Lords' Committee on Sweating. Black, 6541.
See also Evasions. Home Work. Sub-letting.
Tailoring trades:
London Clothiers' Cutters' Trade Union. Whatley and Kail, 920.
National Federation of Master Tailors. Allen, 4993.
Scottish National Operatives' Tailors' Union. Irwin, 6174.
See also Apprentices. Clothing Trades. Current Rate. Evasions. Female Labour. Government Contracts. Government Inspection. Trade Union Rates and Conditions.
TAYLOR, Mr. J. (Q. 1444–1557.) Digest of evidence. Page 298.
TEMPLETON, Mr. J. (Q. 2869–2983.) Digest of evidence. Page 301.
Textile trades:
General Union of Weavers and Textile Workers. Turner, 1264.
Lancashire Weaving Trade. Irwin, 6174, 6176.
National Hosiery Federation. Holmes, 1558.
Women's Trade and Labour Council. Dickenson, 6225.
See also Current Rate. Evasions. Female Labour. Government Contracts. Machinery. Trade Union Rates and Conditions.
Tin and Iron Plate Workers:
Galvanised Hollow Ware. Sheet Metal Workers and Braziers' Association. Webb, 2974.
National Amalgamated Tin and Iron Plate, Sheet Metal Workers' and Braziers' Union. Gordon and Hickin, 397.
See also Current Rate. Evasions. Government Contracts. Government Inspection. Home

Tin and Iron Plate Workers—continued.
Work. Sectionising. Trade Union Rates and Conditions.
TOLHURST, Mr. F. C. (Q. 3303–3402.) Digest of evidence. Page 302.

TRADE UNIONS REPRESENTED:
Amalgamated Society of Brushmakers. Latchford, 3659.
Amalgamated Society of Carpenters and Joiners. Dew, 2182; Lane, 2412.
Amalgamated Society of Lithographic Artists, Designers, Engravers and Process Workers. Tolhurst, 3303.
Anvil and Vice Trades' Association. Taylor, 1444.
Basket, Skip and Hamper Makers' Federation. Coleman, 2057.
Boilermakers' and Iron and Steel Shipbuilders' Society (Stafford). Sharrocks, 4278.
Bone Brush Makers' Trade Protection Society. Masters, 3769.
Bookbinders' Consolidated Union. Coffey, 3258, 3259.
Coventry Engineers' and Allied Trades Federation. Chater, 4171.
Electrical Trades' Union. Dibdin, 1821.
Galvanised Hollow Ware Sheet Metal Workers' and Braziers' Association. Webb, 2974.
Labour Protection League. Harris, 262.
London Clothiers' Cutters' Trade Union. Whatley and Kail. 920.
London Consolidated Society of Journeymen Bookbinders. Coffey, 3223.
London Saddle and Harness Makers' Trade Protection Society. Morrison, 3831.
London Society of Compositors. Naylor, 189.
Machine, Electric and Other Women Workers' Unions. Dickenson, 6326–6332.
Manchester and Salford Women's Trade and Labour Council. Dickenson, 6225.
Midland Leather Trades' Federation. Power, 3403.
Military Harness and Accoutrement Makers' Trade Union. Morrison, 3831.
National Amalgamated Furnishing Trades' Union. O'Grady, 1696.
National Amalgamated Lock and Key Smiths' Society. Millerchip, 3544.
National Amalgamated Society of Enginemen, Cranemen, Boilermen, Firemen, and Electrical Workers. Charlton, 4015.
National Amalgamated Tin and Iron Plate, Sheet and Metal Workers and Braziers' Union. Gordon and Hickin, 396.
National Glass Bottle Makers' Society. Milnes, 4110.
National Hosiery Federation. Holmes, 1553.
Pen and Pocket Blade Forgers' Protection Society. Shaw, 2600.
Printing Machine Managers' Trade Society. Howes, 3125.
Scientific Instrument Makers' Trade Society. Clark, 681.
Scissor Grinders' Trade Society. Holmshaw, 2463.
Scottish Typographical Association. Templeton and Simpson, 2869.
Sheffield Federated Trades' Council. Holmshaw, 2463.
Sheffield Machine File Cutters' Union. Mappin, 2671.
Society of Cigar Makers. Dickenson, 6229.
Society of Dayworking Bookbinders. Coffey, 3259.
Society of Shirtmakers. Dickenson, 6229, 6339–6341.
Society of Tailoresses. Dickenson, 6229.
Society for Women in the Electrical Trades. Dickenson, 6229.
Society of Women in Printing and Bookbinding. Dickenson, 6229.
Spring Knife Cutlers' Union. Shaw, 2602.
Spring Knife Grinders' Union. Shaw, 2602.
Table and Butcher Knife Hafters' Trade Society. Crofts, 2824.
Trade Union Congress Parliamentary Committee. Cummings, 1.
Typographical Association. Howes, 3149.
Union of Weavers and Textile Workers. Turner, 1264.

Trade Unions represented—continued.
United Cutlery Trades' Council. Holmshaw, 2463.
United French Polishers' London Society. Rudd, 575.
United Society of Brushmakers. Porter, 1926.
Vellum (Account Book) Binders' Trade Society. Welch, 1020.
Walsall Bridle Cutters' Trade Society. Davis, 3530.

TRADE UNION RATES AND CONDITIONS:
Not recognised by employers. Latchford, 3662–3665, 3675–3677; Mason, 5273–5281; Noble, Greenwood, and Siemens, 5406–5415, 5502–5527, 5533.
Ability of Trades Unions to enforce fair conditions. Gordon and Hickin, 521–524; Morrison, 3856, 3860–3864; Wallis, 4825, 4826; Allen, 4977; Bartlett, 5644.
Allowance for lodging money in isolated districts. Wallis, 4833.
See also Apprentices. Current Rate. Districts (Trades). Evasions. Female Labour. Government Contracts. Trade Unions Represented. Unskilled Labour.
TURNER, Mr. B. (Q. 1264–1443.) Digest of evidence. Page 298.
Typographical trade:
See Printing Trade.
Universal and Uniform rates:
See District. Trade Union Rates and Conditions.

UNSKILLED LABOUR:
Labour Protection League. Harris, 262.
Organisation of unskilled labour in dockyards and building trade. Cummings, 157–163; Harris, 229, 326–340, 343, 344, 356–378.
Suggested limitation of work for unskilled labour. Mappin, 2679–2684; Coffey, 3232–3247; Bedford and Hobson, 5570.
Variation in rates owing to lack of organisation. Harris, 305, 311, 324; Noble, Greenwood, and Siemens, 5424, 5425, 5442.
Suggested fixing of minimum rate. Harris, 293, 309–311, 339.
Proportion of skilled and unskilled labour in printing trade. Coffey, 3268–3272.
Objections to extensive employment of semi-skilled labour. Gomme, 6734–6738.
See also Building Trade. Current Rate. Machinery. Trade Union Rates and Conditions.
UNWIN, Mr. E. (Q. 4414–4572.) Digest of evidence. Page 304.
Vice trade:
See Anvil Trade.

WAGES:
Agreement existing between Employers' and Workmen's Associations. Gordon and Hickin, 432, 433; Whatley and Kail, 1009, 1010; Dew, 2263–2265, 2274–2294; Coffey, 3225–3227; Power, 3496, 3502, 3524; Masters, 3772–3776, 3826–3830; Morrison, 3873, 3884, 3931–3940; Charlton, 4020–4025; Chater, 4265–4276; Sharrocks, 4343; Straker and Unwin, 4472; Allen, 4952, 5009; Watkins, 5208–5211, 5255–5257; Bagley, 5345–5350; Bedford and Hobson, 5537, 5562, 5563; Bartlett, 5647–5651, 5673–5686; Moore, 5699–5709, 5760; Scott, 5769–5781; Wakely, 5886–5894, 5914; Dickenson, 6279–6288.
Suggested establishment of universal minimum rate. Harris, 309; Rudd, 667, 668; Taylor, 1554–1557; Burns, 4369–4374, 4378–4386, 4404–4409; Wakely, 5898, 5954.
Impossibility of establishing universal rates. Clark, 872; Bailey and Benham, 4898, 4899; Black, 6633–6637.
Wages as affected by living conditions. Cummings, 31, 36–39; Clark, 773–778; Holmes, 1599–1601, 1640–1645; Wakely, 5985, 5992, 5993; Irwin, 6211.
See also Apprentices. Current Rate. Female Labour. Government Contracts. Government Inspection. Machinery. Trade Union Rates and Conditions. Unskilled Labour.
Wages Boards:
Method for regulating women's wages. Allen, 4959; Irwin, 6127–6132; Dickenson, 6421.
See also Conciliation Boards.
WAKELY, Mr. E. (Q. 5883–6026.) Digest of evidence. Page 308.

WALLIS, Mr. W. F. (Q. 4821–4876.) Digest of evidence. Page 305.
WATKINS, Mr. C. H. (Q. 5192–5262.) Digest of evidence. Page 306.
Weaving trade:
See Textile Trades.
WEBB, Mr. S. (Q. 2974–3124.) Digest of evidence. Page 301.
WELCH, Mr. W. (Q. 1020–1262.) Digest of evidence. Page 298.
WHATLEY, Mr. T. (Q. 920–1019.) Digest of evidence. Page 297.
Women's Industrial Council (London). Black, 6451.

EYRE &
SPOTTISWOODE
Bookbinders
EAST HARDING ST
LONDON.